—A correspondent of the London Times tells a singular story of the means by which certain tract institutions of Great Britain have endeavored to preserve the monopoly of their business. If it be true, the Jesuits whose behavior we quoted the other day from Pascal were scarcely in advance of their Protestant imitators. In one case, the religious society reduced its prices and undersold an enterprising printer at Bristol, who had ventured to put out tracts and small religious works at a price originally below the society's. In another, a clergyman had conceived the idea of carrying out "a systematic course of tract distribution throughout the army, navy, and mercantile marine," meaning, when strong enough financially, "to produce and circulate his publications at the usual publishing prices, without deducting one farthing for administration, "the cost of which, with societies, renders large profits necessary and monopoly desirable." The first step of the tract institutions was to dislodge him by artifice from his establishment, which they succeeded in doing, with heavy loss to him and his supporters. Not to be defeated, however, he withdrew to London for his headquarters, and, during nine months in the year, visited the different towns with so much success, that he despatched his tracts to all parts of the kingdom and the colonies. His opponents accordingly formed a new combination. To quote the most extraordinary part of the sequel:

"A person was despatched throughout the northern counties to wait on the contributors to his institution, and to represent to them that his wife had left him, and that he was living in open adultery. While this emissary (who afterwards made his escape) was busy in the north, a reverend secretary of one of the tract societies in London called at the clergyman's house, where he gave a false name, and feigned himself a layman desiring to purchase tracts. This person (who was identified) subsequently made sundry objections to the clergyman's report, which led the clergyman to place the whole of his books, papers, and vouchers in the hands of Messrs. Quilter, Ball & Co., the eminent accountants, with a request that they would examine them. This was forthwith done, the accountants confirming the accuracy of the reverend gentleman's statement. A new method of annoyance was resorted to. The clergyman had unadvisedly been led to mix with certain persons in the interests of the enemy, who presented a fallacious account of what occurred, which they printed and circulated. This statement was answered. So heavier artillery was brought up. The Scripture-readers and missionaries in the employment of the societies were, under the threat of dismissal, prohibited from circulating any of the clergyman's publications, and a person was despatched throughout the United Kingdom to warn the clergyman's contributors to discontinue their subscriptions!"

—The Italian correspondent of the Daily News says that a new theatre now building in Florence is to be made the scene of a politico-literary experiment that possibly will do something toward raising the character of the Italian drama. It is proposed to call into existence a purely Tuscan company, who shall speak in a strictly Tuscan idiom, and shall represent Tuscan manners. The manager of this company is already designated; Tuscany already boasts a great actor—Landini. The proprietors of the theatre have put forth a manifesto signed by nine of the most respected of Italian men of letters; among others by Fambri, Member of Parliament for Venice, and writer of plays; Fusinato, a poet of repute; D'Arcias, a dramatic critic; Fanfani, lexicographer, and author of a collection of Tuscan idioms. "Next to the unity of government," the manifesto says, "and the unity of arms and of laws, unity of language is that which serves to render close felt and profitable the unity of a nation." The new theatre, then, is to be an academy for the dissemination of Tuscan as the only Italian of the future. Whatever it may do as regards effecting that object, it would not be surprising if some good plays were to be written for it.

THE LIFE OF BUNSEN.*

In 1817, Bunsen, then a young scholar twenty-six years of age, without means, but guided and patronized by the historian Niebuhr, was introduced in Rome to the house of Mr. Waddington, an English gentleman who resided there with his wife and three daughters. Mutual esteem and affection soon brought about his marriage with Miss Frances Waddington, and this union, hallowed by wonderful harmony of sentiment, conviction, and temper, proved a source of unbroken felicity to the warm-hearted Bunsen throughout his long and smoothly flowing life. It lasted forty-three years, terminating with his death, at Bonn, in 1860. Five sons and five daughters, all born in the Palazzo Caffarelli, the seat of the Prussian legation, on the Capitoline, all well-educated, and most of them highly accomplished, survived their father. Shortly before his death, he said to his wife: "Write yourself the history of our common life. You can do it: you have it in your power;—only be not mistrustful of yourself." The book which we have before us proves that he was not mistaken. Few lives have so fully and so well been presented to the public by a writer of either sex.

It is true, the work consists mainly of letters by Bunsen himself, chronologically arranged and mostly translated from the German; but the numerous contemporary notices and letters by the authoress with which they are interspersed, and, still more, the introductory or explanatory sketches and remarks which serve to connect and elucidate them, or to complete their contents, evince an ability, knowledge, and force of thought more than amply sufficient for the task. Some of the sketches actually rise to the dignity of contemporaneous history. There is many a page—of the twelve hundred constituting the "Memoir"—which, we believe, owes its insertion to the conjugal piety of the collector rather than to its intrinsic merit or biographical interest, but there is not a single line written by the authoress which we should prefer not to have. "Fragments from the Diary of a Daughter" add to the charm of the whole. It must, however, be stated that this is only a "Memoir" of the life of the man Bunsen in his various spheres—domestic, social, literary, and political—and not a work on the writer and statesman as such.

Strictly taken, Bunsen hardly deserves the name of statesman. Whether employed as secretary of legation under Niebuhr, as chargé d'affaires, or as minister resident at Rome (1818–1839), as minister to the Swiss Republic (1840–41), or in the same capacity at the Court of St. James (1841–1854), he was but a scholar chosen on account of his literary eminence and reputation to represent with due dignity—but passively, if we may say so—the Prussian monarchy abroad; and what little influence he exercised upon public affairs under Frederic William III. and Frederic William IV. was due to moral and theological suasion, to friendly personal relations, but not at all to his public position. In whatever he attempted by way of ambassadorial representation or mediation, he almost uniformly failed, and his subsequent career as peer of Prussia under William I. as Regent, was too short to have any significance. Though his political activity is far from being devoid of interest to the student of the history of our times, his achievements all belong to the literary sphere alone. His "Description of the City of Rome" and "Basilicas of Christian Rome;" his ecclesiastico-critical writings on Ignatius of Antioch, on Hippolytus, and their times; his "Christianity and Mankind" and "God in History;" his unfinished "Bible," his "Egypt's Place in Universal History," and a number of other works—all products of vast knowledge and unremitting research, though, perhaps, not of equally remarkable critical or philosophical acumen—will long commemorate his name in the literature of two nations, the German and the English.

The "common life" of Mr. and Mrs. Bunsen—the baronial title was bestowed on the eminent plebeian as late as October, 1858, in obedience to a resolution uttered by Frederic William IV. on the last day of his consciousness—though marked throughout by an even tenor, and altogether undisturbed by striking changes, was a life of uncommon richness. In the first twenty-two years we see them established on the Capitoline, near the Tarpeian Rock, their palazzo overlooking the Eternal City, which they quit only to spend the summer months in a villa at Frascati, among the hills of ancient Tusculum, or on excursions to Tivoli, Naples, and Tuscany, Bunsen alone extending his journeys as far as Berlin and London. Literature in its widest sense, music and painting in their highest development, the grandest monuments of classical or Christian antiquity, the latest discoveries of archæological research, the political and religious topics of the day—all these engaged the hours unclaimed by special studies or by official and domestic duties. Among their friends or guests at Rome, we find the painters, Cornelius, Overbeck, and Schnorr; the musicians, Neukomm, Baini, and Kocher; the sculptors, Thorwaldsen and Schadow; the diplomatists, La Ferronays, Laval-Montmorency, Saint-Aulaire, the witty Gagarin, and Italinsky, whom Bunsen regarded as his greatest instructor in diplomatic affairs; the Egyptologists, Champollion and Lepsius, the former Bunsen's master, and the latter his disciple, in that field; the Orientalist, Prokesch-Osten; Thirlwall, Ticknor, Nott, Hare, and Pusey; Chateaubriand, Platen, Walter Scott—shortly before his death—Zhukovski, and the noble-hearted but unfortunate Leopardi, to whose memory, in spite of his unbelief, the pious authoress devotes pages of admiring recollections; Alexander von Humboldt, Radowitz, and Stein, whom Bunsen "felt to be his king," revering him above every contemporary German but Niebuhr, his benefactor, "lord and master," "equally sole of his kind with Rome;" the Russian exile, Turgeneff, an admirable man, "whom it would take pages to describe, . . . a Tartar prince, and looking like one, yet of the most polished manners, and consummate talent for conversation;" Ampère, to whom Bunsen appeared not only the representative of Prussia to the Papal See, but of German learning to Roman antiquity; Mme. Récamier and the Grand-Duchess Stéphanie, of Baden; the Crown-Prince (afterwards King) Louis of Bavaria, and Frederic William III., Frederic William IV., and William I., of Prussia, the latter two as princes. Pope Gregory XVI. himself once visited the Protestant minister at Frascati. Surrounded by associations like these, addicted to archæological and ecclesiastical research, and in friendly intercourse with the Papal dignitaries, it cannot be surprising that Bunsen, speaking of Rome in a letter to his pious Protestant sister, Christiana, exclaims: "All other towns are as villages and parvenus in comparison with this queen of the earth."

But all this admiration for Rome was powerless to affect in the least Bunsen's ardent enthusiasm for Protestant Christianity. This enthusiasm he had imbibed in his native town, Arolsen, from the teachings of his parents and of Christiana, his elder by eighteen years. It had been strengthened, during his university years at Marburg and Göttingen, by intercourse with friends like Brandis, Lachmann, Lücke, and Abeken. It had been fanned into a flame by the spirit of religious and political revival which pervaded Germany in the years preceding and following the down fall of Napoleon—years which Bunsen, who was no fighting man, spent in making literary journeys through Germany—partly as companion to Mr. William B. Astor, of this city—to Holland, Copenhagen, and Paris, and finally to Italy, and in studying Icelandic, Danish, Hebrew, Arabic, and Persian, preparatory to a comprehensive study of the history of religious ideas among the ancients, and chiefly in the East. In Rome, while studying Plato, Ferdusi, and the Koran, Roman, Etruscan, and Egyptian antiquities, he still more zealously pursued ecclesiastical and hymnological researches, with the object of elaborating a liturgy for the use of the united Lutheran and Calvinist congregations, as the crowning work of the Evangelical Union, then being carried out by Frederic William III. in Prussia. His leading ideas in church matters were: Unity without uniformity; catholicity coupled with nationality; a fixed liturgy, with a certain latitude; representation of the congregation. The American Episcopal development of the English ecclesiastical institutions he regarded as "the greatest event in the modern history of church constitution," though he regretted that the Episcopal Church in the United States was "not learned and enlightened enough to be able to throw off some rotten supports of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries." These liturgical endeavors, from which sprang a "Hymn and Prayer-Book," "essentially" his "work of life and love," brought Bunsen in close personal contact with Frederic William III. and his sons, and when called to Berlin, in

* "A Memoir of Baron Bunsen, late Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary of His Majesty Frederic William IV. at the Court of St. James. Drawn chiefly from family papers by his widow, Frances, Baroness Bunsen. In two volumes." London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1868. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. New York: James Miller.

1827, to be consulted about the king's own "Agenda," royal favors were so profusely showered upon him that envy soon commenced following his footsteps. The open-hearted and easily captivated religious philosopher, who divided his time between the court and the society of men like Schleiermacher, Savigny, Wilhelm von Humboldt, Gneisenau, Rauch, and Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, the father of Felix, was as yet unable to perceive how slippery a ground he was treading in the vicinity of the throne. Only much later, during the Cologne and other Prusso-Papal imbroglios, his interference in which cost him the King's as well as the Pope's favor, he learned to feel "the stifling midnight air" of that locality and "those times, teeming with suspicion, redolent of hypocrisy, saturated with death." The Crown-Prince's favor, however—or, as Bunsen flattered himself, his love—still remained to him, and the days of Frederic William's "patriarchal" reign in state and church were numbered. With conflicting sentiments in his heart, he went to see England, "that precious jewel of Europe," the "Ithaca" of his dreams, the model state of his immortal Niebuhr—free, Christian, Protestant, anti-revolutionary, constitutional, conservative England—which received its fiery admirer, "the dweller on the Capitol," with open arms. Nobles, statesmen, scholars, and theologians vied with each other in doing him honor. He was then, as Zhukovski remarked and the biographer confirms, "un enfant de cinquante ans." His trustfulness and hopefulness were boundless, as was his faith in God, Christ, and Luther, in Germany and England, and in his own power to achieve enduring good.

The second half of the "common life"—we repeat this expression on account of its appropriateness—is still more interesting, and decidedly more historical, than the first. The scene, the associations, become more and more varied, the aims higher, the results of experience more mature. England, which unfolded before the Bunsens all its natural, social, and artistic treasures; Wales, on the confines of which was the delightful home of Mrs. Waddington, a lady who, according to Lepsius, united "the majesty of Queen Elizabeth with the grace of Mary, Queen of Scots;" Scotland, whither Bunsen makes excursions; Switzerland, where, near Bern, they found a "home . . . . commanding such splendor of nature as not to admit of a craving for change," and where Bunsen spent a year "of vigorous purpose, of energetic occupation, of activity not debased by struggle, . . . . of 'rejoicing as a giant to run his course,' of overlooking the regions to be traversed, the intellectual provinces to be won, the mental victories to be achieved;" the Prussian Court, whither Bunsen was often called; the lovely valley of the Neckar, whither he retired when his official career was terminated by his sudden recall from England, and he could exclaim, "The cord is broken and the bird is free, the Lord be praised;" the southern coast of France, where he vainly tried, in the last winters of his life, to find a cure for a tormenting disease; the Rhineland, his last abode—all these are presented to the reader in letters, notices, and remarks the more truly instructive the less they were originally meant to be descriptive or to become public. Royal palaces are opened to us. We are now and then allowed to look behind diplomatic coulisses. We become acquainted with a large number of the leading scholars, statesmen, nobles, and princes of Europe, such as Dr. Arnold, in whom Bunsen revered a British Niebuhr; Macaulay, Whewell, Muir, Max Müller, Renan, Pertz, De Wette, Tocqueville, Palmerston, who was as skilful in rowing a boat through an "unusually rough sea" as "in steering the vessel of the state," while Bunsen had often to acknowledge his general unfitness for the helm; Peel, Russell, and Gladstone, who esteemed him as he esteemed them; Aberdeen, who "believed in God and the Emperor Nicholas;" Buol-Schauenstein, who, speaking with full approbation of the inauguration of the second French empire, Dantonically said: "Enfin, c'est qu'on ne vient à bout de dominer cette canaille qu'en leur inspirant de la peur: c'est là aussi notre politique—à nous, en Autriche;" Guizot, who designated the same Napoleonic performance as "une honteuse comédie;" Gagern, Kamphausen, and Vincke, together with whom Bunsen, in 1849, zealously worked for the consolidation of Germany as an empire under the house of Hohenzollern; Gervinus, with whom, ten years later, he shared social ostracism for not participating in the South-German ravings against Napoleon and Italy; Lords Ashley, Derby, and Anglesea; the Dukes of Wellington, Argyll, and Cambridge; Prince Albert and Queen Victoria, "a good woman"—to speak with the Welsh nurse of Prince Arthur—"quite fit to have been a poor man's wife, as well as a queen;" and Czar Nicholas, a ruler without "ideas or imagination," but not without "inward dignity," who first appeared to Bunsen as "a grand presence," but to whose baleful influence over the mind of Frederic William he in his latter years mainly attributed the degradation of his favorite monarch's policy, and the decline of Germany's hopes for unity and freedom.

It is Bunsen's connection with the last-named monarch which forms the principal part in his external life. High-spirited and generous-minded—at least in his prime—learned and fond of ancient and mediæval art, ambitious of originality, full of romantic ideas and shadowy conceptions, prone to mysticism and pietism, and desirous to immortalize his reign by new and lasting creations in the fields of politics, religion, art, and science—though decidedly devoid of genius, great powers, and sagacity—Frederic William IV. for a time found a tolerably congenial mind, a supporter and adviser, in the Christian archæologist of the Casa Tarpea, whose ambition and predilections resembled, and whose learning and ability surpassed, his own; who was a stranger to trade, industry, and other common pursuits of mankind, and had entirely turned his back upon physical sciences; whose faith and piety extended to the very verge of superstition and bigotry, overshadowing his religious philosophy, which seemed to range undecided between Lessing, Kant, Schleiermacher, Schelling, and Hegel; and whose conservatism, charitable mildness, and devotion to benefactors, made him an easy counsellor to an affable and insinuating prince. But this connection, so flattering and promising to Bunsen, who had "passed alone Jordan with his staff," was doomed to be utterly barren of results. Whether superior or inferior to their age, the king and his plebeian friend were both far behind it, and—what is worse—in relation to its leading ideas and tendencies, the mental development of the former was steadily retrogressive, and that of the latter just as steadily, though slowly, progressive. Long before 1848, Bunsen found out that everything was going wrong in Prussia, and that there were few things he could enjoy at his master's court besides Tieck's "Puss in Boots," Mendelssohn's music to the great Trilogy of Æschylus, the Antigone of Sophocles, Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus, and similar performances, and he appeared to himself "like the insect which, though singed, flies ever and again to the flame." But only after 1848 could he exclaim: "I have become of full age. The last scales have fallen from my eyes." Despondingly he added: "The last tears will soon dry away in them." His public life, like that of his king, had proved a failure. His liturgical reform schemes, his pleadings for Prussian constitutionalism on the English pattern, his endeavors in the cause of German unity, his exertions in behalf of Schleswig-Holstein—had all been for naught. Bigoted pietists, selfish nobles, the Czar, now ruled exclusively the king's dimmed conscience and understanding. Every great cause had been betrayed or abandoned. And yet worse was still to come. In 1852, Bunsen himself had to sign the London protocol, which sacrificed the German Elbe duchies to Denmark. Bunsen was so enraged that he was afraid of turning Jacobin in his old age. His political liberalism had long been steadily growing.

Bunsen's early correspondence, full of his inner life and religious sentiments, hardly betrays any sympathy with movements for political freedom, except the struggles of Germany against Napoleon. He warmly sympathizes with Greece, but in her struggle he saw chiefly the contest of Christianity with Islam. The South-American wars of independence and the Spanish revolution of 1820 are nowhere mentioned. The Neapolitan revolutionists of the same year he calls "a wretched set of people, Atheists and Jacobins." He is delighted that the Carbonari, in 1821, "ran away like hares." The French 1688, as he called the revolution of July, 1830, though predicted by him, appears to him more terrible than he has expected. Not a line is devoted to Poland's heroic grapple with Russia in 1831. In 1833, he addresses Dr. Arnold as "the antagonist of that dissolving atheism, political and religious, of 1789 . . . . who will never bend the knee before the Trinity of the Utilitarians—the idol of shallowness—in which Washington is the Father, Franklin the Son, and Steam the Πνεῦμα," etc. Before he goes to England, he is a Tory in her politics. But scarcely does he begin to be politically active when his views commence changing. He becomes a moderate Whig in English affairs, finds England with her church more rotten than he ever dreamt before, is more and more proud of Germany and her spirit of free enquiry, turns constitutional reformer in Prussia, execrates the extinction of the Republic of Cracow, bows to the fiat of the revolution of 1848, glorifies the Frankfort Germanic constitution as heaven-born ("descendit cœlo!") works for the independence of Schleswig-Holstein, advocates Germanic confederation on a free basis, rejoices over the world exhibition as a gathering of the people, abhors the new imperial French régime as worse than Nero's, deplores the destruction of Poland, exults in the fall of Sebastopol, calls the bigoted and retrograde Stahl party in Prussia a "nefarious party," couples, in his politico-religious meditations, 1789 with 1517, predicts vengeance ("exsurget ultor!") on the betrayers of "the German Prince called the People," turns his eyes more and more with love towards America, is heart and soul with the enemies of the "abomination," Slavery, and its twin, Repudiation, declares the Slave States doomed, is in raptures over the deliverance of Italy, speaks with youthful enthusiasm of Garibaldi, and almost with his dying breath he says: "All power founded on supposed privileges must perish; it is all of evil. The United States of America have much yet to do—much for their future—to purify themselves—to make themselves free." These words were spoken a few days before the election of Mr. Lincoln.

His last religious utterances were full of glowing fervor and child-like faith—though his religious convictions, too, had undergone modifications, and he had long left behind many a biblico- or ecclesiastico-critical co-worker and fellow-antagonist of rationalism.

The touching account of his last days and of his death forms one of the most charming parts of this, in many respects, incomparable "Memoir." Baroness Bunsen will hold a place in literature not to be dissociated from that of her lamented husband.

MacCARTHY'S TRANSLATIONS OF CALDERON.*

Mr. MacCarthy has been unfortunate in the title of his book, which does not convey an adequate idea of its contents. It is a translation into imitative English verse of two of Calderon's autos sacramentales, or one-act dramas, written in praise of the Eucharist, and acted during the festival of Corpus Christi.

These religious dramas were of early origin, and, in the beginning, under the direct supervision of the Church, whose clerks were the actors. In after times they became so profane and filled with scurrilous jests that they were forbidden to be acted by ecclesiastics or in the churches, and so took place in the open air during daylight. Most of the early Spanish dramatists wrote autos sacramentales with more or less success, Lope de Vega, with his astoundingly prolific genius, completing some four hundred. But it was reserved for Calderon to take these rude beginnings and, as he did with the secular drama, raise them to the highest point of their development, and impart to them the wonderful brilliance and variety his mind could give even to the abstract ideas of theological dogmas. These dramas were written for a specific purpose—to glorify the Eucharist; in some this occupies a prominent position, in others there is but a slight allusion at the end. The characters in these plays are as varied and singular as can be imagined: the Virtues and Vices, Faith, Grace, Sin, Nature, Judaism, Heathenism, Idolatry, Vanity, The World, Wealth, Poverty, The Human Soul, Death, the various plants and trees, and a host of others. The plots are equally singular, comprising Bible stories, legends of the Church, mythological fables, and passing events of the day; these are all the medium for conveying religious instruction, often in the shape of the most subtle scholastic theology. Such are a few of the characteristics of the dramas Mr. MacCarthy has introduced to the English reader. The difficulties he has overcome are great, and relate principally to the metre, which is so essential that any translation which does not follow it closely must be a failure, and any that does is far from necessarily being a success.

The usual Spanish dramatic metre is the trochaic of seven or eight syllables, with that characteristic rhyme (or the "ghost of it," as Dean Trench terms it), the asonante, which is a vowel rhyme, or similarity of the two final vowels (sometimes of but one) of the alternate lines, the same vowels often running through whole scenes of many hundred lines. The Spanish language is so rich in vowel sounds that the difficulty a Spanish poet finds in writing this verse is in keeping the intermediate lines from being asonante also. With the English it is different, and the corresponding verse is not only difficult to be obtained, but is unsatisfactory, and at best only an apology for full consonant rhyme. This poverty of the English in asonantes forces Mr. MacCarthy to a process of substitution (as u-e for the Spanish u-a, and e-e for e-o), which, however, is a fault of our language and not of Mr. MacCarthy, who has done his work wonderfully well—far better than seemed possible.

This is not his first attempt,† and it is pleasant to be able to state that he has surpassed his previous translations in the present volume. In the former there was a certain stiffness and obscurity in his verse, which here is smooth and clear, often rising into poetry of a very high order. He has caught the spirit of Calderon, and gives us all his fire and brilliance. But while conceding that Mr. MacCarthy has done exceedingly well, he undoubtedly has not naturalized the asonante; he has rather furnished a proof that it will never be used except for translations from the Spanish.

He has translated an elaborate essay by Dr. Lorinser, and one by Señor Pedroso, which he has prefixed to his translations; the latter, from its mysticism and obscurity, might profitably have been omitted. Of infinitely more value than these is the running commentary of foot-notes which Mr. MacCarthy has added to his translations. They are admirable, and invaluable to a reader unacquainted with the doctrines of the Catholic Church.

The first auto translated is "Belshazzar's Feast," a fortunate selection, for it is probably unsurpassed in dramatic effect and poetic description, and withal is much less encumbered with theology than most others. The persons are: King Belshazzar, Daniel, Idolatry, Vanity, The Thought, Death, and an Equestrian Statue. The Thought, like many of Calderon's characters, is a very elastic conception, representing the court-fool of the king, and so dressed; then the thought or mind of the king, and again Human Thought. In the first scene Thought, in an interview with Daniel, informs him that Belshazzar that day celebrates his nuptials with Idolatry, although already wedded to Vanity. Daniel breaks out into lamentations, and retires as the king enters with Vanity and Idolatry. After a flattering address from the latter, the king follows with a long and characteristic description of the events which have happened in that region since the creation, including a fine poetic account of the flood and the building of the tower of Babel. A portion of the former we here present as a good specimen of Mr. MacCarthy's versification and imitation of the asonante:*

"First began a dew as soft
As those tears the golden sunrise
Kisseth from Aurora's lids;
Then a gentle rain, as dulcet
As those showers the green earth drinks
In the early days of summer;
From the clouds then water-lances,
Darting at the mountains struck them,
In the clouds their sharp points shimmer'd—
On the mountains rang their butt-ends:
Then the rivulets were loosened,
Roused to madness, ran their currents—
Rose to rushing rivers—then Swelled to seas of seas."

. . . . "The strong bridle of the sand,
Which the furious onset curbeth
Of the white horse of the sea
With its foam-face silver fronted,
Loosened every curbing rein,
So that the great steed, exulting,
Rushed upon the prostrate shore,
With loud-neighing, to o'errun it."

. . . . "Till the moment came, the sea,
To its God-given laws made subject,
Wondering, saw once more, once more
The pale earth, now moist and musty,
With its tangled, matted hair,
Full of wrinkles, cracked and crumpled,
Lifting up its mournful face,
Touched, but warmed not, by the sunbeams,
Lifting its sad countenance,
Draped with sea-weeds, dank and muddy,
And in silent eloquence,
With a grateful heart saluting,
O'er the Ark, the bow of peace,
Shining golden, green, and ruddy."

Belshazzar expresses his intent to rebuild the tower of Babel, and is told by Daniel that the hand of God will overthrow his proud designs. Death enters and declares to Daniel his mission as the dread avenger of Jehovah's wrath, but Daniel will not permit him to kill the king until he has given him warning. This he does first in an interview with Thought (as the thought of Belshazzar), and then with the king himself, who confesses that he has received a life he is bound to pay to Death when he is pleased to claim it "on shore or sea." The king is roused from the melancholy into which this interview has plunged him by his wives, and especially by Vanity. Death, when he sees his first warning disregarded, throws the king and Thought into a sleep, and then follows an exquisite monologue filled with deep, beautiful poetry. In this sleep Death is about to kill the king, but again Daniel interferes, and Belshazzar dreams a fevered vision of power and success, which, at its close, changes into the last warning given by Grace, the Image seen by Nabuchodonosor solemnly rebukes the idolatry of his descendant. Again Idolatry soothes the terrified monarch, and diverts his mind by telling him of a great feast she has prepared for him, and begging him to order for it the sacred vessels brought from Jerusalem. He consents; the table is spread; Death enters as an attendant and serves the king, who drinks a toast to Moloch, the God of the Assyrians. A clap of thunder echoes through the banquet-hall, deep gloom settles over the scene, and on the ceiling a hand writes, "Mene, Tekel, Peres." Daniel interprets this to the king, who, on hearing his sentence, calls on his wives and Thought to help him, but they are humbled and powerless, and Death draws his sword and stabs him, telling him the cup he gave him was the death of the soul, but this is the death of the body. The auto then closes with the usual final allusion to the Eucharist, here suggested by the desecration of the sacred vessels, typifying unworthy communion.

† "Circe; or, Love the Greatest Enchantment, etc. From the Spanish. By D. F. MacCarthy." London: Longman & Co. 1861.

* The asonante in the original is u-a, as dura, justa, for which Mr. MacCarthy substitutes u-e, as dulcet, summer.

A fragment of another auto, The Poison and the Antidote, is translated in the appendix, and is so beautifully done as to make us regret it was not completed. We have criticised this work from a purely literary point of view, but there is another point of view, and it is from that, evidently, that Mr. MacCarthy wishes his book to be regarded, that is, from the religious or Roman Catholic one. It is natural that he, an ardent Catholic, should see many beauties in Calderon, and particularly in his autos, which are invisible to us, and with which literature has nothing whatever to do.

As Dr. Lorinser (in the introductory essay) says, a knowledge of Catholic faith and of Catholic theology is absolutely necessary in order thoroughly to understand Calderon, and we might add, that thoroughly to enjoy him, that not to be often offended by him, one needs not merely a knowledge of the dogmas of the Roman Church, but also a genuine belief in them—a belief of the kind that is called "faith"—and particularly in that one so difficult of apprehension by the mind of the natural man, Transubstantiation.

JEAN MACE'S BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.*

JEAN MACÉ, since 1861, when his first juvenile, the "History of a Mouthful of Bread," was published, has enjoyed an enviable popularity in France as a writer for children. Two years ago his first book had passed through seventeen editions, had been adopted by the University Commission at Paris among their prize books, and, through Mrs. Gatty's translation, had become favorably known in England. In this country he is still but little known. He has, however, achieved so marked and singular a success in a difficult branch of literature that it seems proper to preface any statement of the kind of service he has performed for children and their instructors by some account of him personally.

He was born in Paris, on the 22d of April, 1815. He was educated at the College Stanislas, where he afterwards held the position of professor of history. Subsequently he served for three years in the army, afterwards becoming secretary to his former professor of history, Theodore Burette, with whom he remained till the death of Burette, in 1847. During his secretaryship he had become much interested in politics, and in 1848 assumed the editorial management of a political journal called La République, which he retained until compelled by the coup d'état of 1851 to relinquish politics. He then left Paris, and sought shelter with a friend, Mademoiselle Verenet, who presided over a school for girls at Beblenheim, a village near Colmar, in the northeastern part of France. With this lady he became acquainted in 1850, having been charged by the parents of one of her pupils with a message for her, which, as he was then travelling in her neighborhood, he found it practicable to deliver in person. He was delighted with the little school, and carried away with him, on leaving, recollections so pleasant that, when forced to quit Paris, this school at once presented itself to him as a most desirable place of refuge.

"When," he says, "the gust of December, 1851, came, I was among the leaves that it swept away; but, happier than many others, I flew to the little paradise the image of which had remained present to my mind. I was invited to fill the post of professor of the natural sciences; but, ere long, attracting to myself all branches of instruction, from book-keeping to geology, together with history and literature, I abandoned myself with daily increasing delight to the happiness of intellectual and moral paternity, the chief of the social functions when the soul is raised to a level with its vocation. I was at last in my true calling. After capriciously trying a little of everything, it was found that I was born for a professor in a young ladies' school."

Since making this fortunate discovery of his true vocation M. Macé has steadily devoted himself to educational pursuits. He has been for several years associate editor of a fortnightly journal called the Magazine of Education and Recreation, and is also engaged in establishing public libraries, and in efforts to promote popular education throughout France. He is best known, however, by the series of children's books which he began in 1861, and which justify, in a very thorough manner, his claim to the "intellectual and moral paternity" of youthful minds. The ordinary end of educational books, the presentation of facts in an orderly and intelligible manner, is very admirably attained by them, but it does not constitute half their value. Another merit which they pre-eminently possess, that of adapting knowledge to the capacities of children, and offering it in an attractive form, is also a subordinate one. The main charm of the books is that their best service is given to the education of the thinking faculty. This "History of a Mouthful of Bread," for instance—which, it may be as well to say, since its title scarcely explains its character, is a series of letters to a child on the nature and functions of the digestive apparatus, is not only thoroughly well adapted to the comprehension of any ordinarily intelligent child of ten or twelve years old,—the facts are not merely so aptly illustrated, so delightfully told that they cannot fail to be interesting—but they are still vital with a life derived from that of M. Macé's theories, which they almost necessarily impart to the minds of his pupils. The child who has studied it understandingly will not only have been taught the components of his blood, the action of his heart and lungs, and the functions of his digestive tube, but will also have learned to look at nature with the eyes of a naturalist—to find brothers in all animate things, to speculate curiously on the degrees of affinity between himself and an earth-worm, between himself and a vegetable. Adult readers, to whom we heartily recommend both this book and its companion, the "Servants of the Stomach," will gain from them something more, which the children will fail to appropriate. M. Macé talks very pleasantly to his little people, and not the less so because he amuses himself with occasional by-play which is beyond them. He has a tendency to make rapid and somewhat fanciful generalizations, and his military experiences, his political theories, serve frequently to furnish him with illustrations and significant analogies which we find amusingly suggestive. His humorous touches, too, are sometimes over the heads of his immediate audience, and one can imagine M. Macé seated with grave face before his classes—the books, by the way, have an admirably preserved colloquial tone which constantly suggests the attentive, interested faces of childish listeners—and smiling covertly as he administers the "little digs" of which no one but himself is aware. This, for instance, which occurs in a lesson on the order of rodents. He has been explaining that rats and mice must gnaw constantly, even at boards when nothing more appetizing offers itself, because their teeth, growing in the same manner as the human finger-nails, need to be incessantly filed down to prevent their attaining a fatal length. They have also prodigiously long digestive tubes, enormous hearts, and consequently voracious appetites.

"Perhaps you do not catch at once the connection which exists between the size of the heart and of the appetite; yet it is very simple. Large barrels are requisite for those who brew a great deal of beer, and large hearts for those who make a great deal of blood. Now, it is the blood, as you know, which carries heat—in other words, life, throughout the body; when it pours in in torrents the fire goes twice as fast, and consequently the feeding must be kept up. A medical friend of mine told me that he once had some rats sent to him—a boxful, in fact—for one of those scientific experiments which one would venture to condemn more earnestly if their results were not sometimes beneficial. Next morning there were only two or three animals to be found, and these had eaten up the others. See the consequence of having too much heart!"

His generalizing tendencies are more clearly seen in the "Servants of the Stomach," which, for this and other reasons, is hardly so well adapted to the use of young children. It is a history of what M. Macé calls the "walking machine;" that is, the bones, muscles, nerves, and brain. This he gives without calling in the aid of any other illustrations than can be afforded by words; but the subject is too complicated to admit of being treated successfully in this way before an uninstructed audience. To the adult reader who can fall back on his knowledge of the skeleton, and recall the manner in which the muscles are braided upon it, M. Macé's presentation of his facts must seem marvellously pertinent and clear, and the book can hardly be too highly spoken of as a manual for teachers. Its value as a text-book for children would, however, be greatly enhanced by the introduction of suitable wood-cuts.

From his study of the human body M. Macé constantly reverts to his studies of the body politic, and institutes between them an analogy from which he draws most of his illustrations. Thus, the digestive organs, acting independently of the will, form an internal republic, communicating with the brain by means of the great sympathetic nerve, but quite incapable of being impressed by it; that is, of having any of its functions interfered with by the will, unless some parts of its own organization are defective. The whole system of the voluntary organs constitute, on the other hand, a kingdom in which the brain is absolute monarch. The human body he takes to be the model on which all civilized societies necessarily tend to form themselves, and, as in the body these two forms of government are found harmoniously united, he concludes that in its formation we have "an explanation of that double instinct which leads nations to seek strength in centralization and freedom in decentralization.

"The domain of the brain: I know perfectly well where to look for it in governmental regions. The apparatus of relation is our Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the department of the muscles bears so strong an analogy to that of war, that military comparisons have continually presented themselves to my mind whilst we have been engaged in this study. It is evident that a guiding will is necessary. Nations could not do better than imitate Nature, who has placed all the powers of the body under one guidance, whose action is felt in every part when a struggle has to be maintained against the stranger. . . . But other laws govern the interior life. The nutritive apparatus of a country, its commerce, its industry, the incessant labor of its citizens, by which public wealth is kept up, and, let us also add, the throbs of a national heart; all this the ganglionic system full plainly shows us requires to be left to itself. It would be a fine affair if the brain had to watch over the service of the stomach, or if, at its convenience, it regulated the movements of the Master who disposes of its life. Besides, how could it accomplish all this, and what would become of the poor body if the least drowsiness attacked the universal centre? Happy is it for us—and do not let us be slow to own it—that Nature has armed herself against these encroachments of power, and only made them possible by some false step on her part. I have already told you that when government interferes with what does not concern it, it is the fault of the ganglia. Remember the history of the 'cardiac plexus.'"

We have given so much space to these physiologies that we have left ourselves but little in which to speak of M. Macé's fairy tales, a translation of which, by Miss Booth, was issued last year; or of his "Grandpapa's Arithmetic," which we have also before us. We do not think well of the latter as a text-book, though it may give some useful hints to teachers. The idea of the book is to obviate the difficulty which little children find in understanding the elementary processes of arithmetic, by explaining to them, by means of a story, the theory of these operations. We find the machinery employed by M. Macé for this purpose to be very cumbrous, and think, also, that the idea is an erroneous one. Practice must come before theory; and to "assist in the invention of arithmetic," after M. Macé's fashion, would not only be apt still to leave a child unable to numerate, add, subtract, multiply, and divide, but also as incompetent to reason further from its premises as "Pinchinette's" explanations in this story of the apple merchants confessedly left her little brothers. In the education of the mind, as much must at first be done by sheer memorizing as in the education of the muscles by repeated movements.

The "Home Fairy Tales," as Miss Booth rechristens the "Tales of the Little Castle"—a name derived from that given to Mademoiselle Verenet's school, will be found amusing by children; but, though they are all intended to display and correct childish faults, yet, even if children nowadays, unlike those of a generation back, were disposed to give heed to the morals of the tales they read, they could hardly be profitable. M. Macé commits the error of describing children precisely like those to whom he tells the story—with faults, manners, and surroundings exactly like theirs, and to them introducing purely imaginary beings, charged with what any child feels to be impossible errands. There is no room left for the play of the imagination; it is held stationary by the flat realism of one side of the story, and the utterly incongruous supernaturalism of the other. There are some pleasant little bits of nature in the stories, and many amusing fancies; but M. Macé has too practical a mind, and too little poetical imagination, to be a teller of fairy tales.

The Moonstone: A Novel. By Wilkie Collins, author of "Armadale," etc. With many Illustrations. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1868.)—Mr. Wilkie Collins's new book is very suggestive of a game called "button," which children used to play, and probably play now. A number of little folks being seated in a circle, each with hands placed palm to palm in front of him, one of the party, who holds a button, comes in turn to each of the others, and ostensibly drops it into his closed hands. Of course, but one of the party can receive it, but in each case the same motions are gone through with; and having made his rounds, the principal performer enquires, "Who's got the button?" Each one, including him who has it, but who intentionally misleads the rest, guesses at the puzzle, and he who guesses right carries the button at the next trial. The "Moonstone" riddle is so like in its essential features to this child's-play, that it might very well have been suggested by it. Mr. Collins's art consists, in this particular case, in converting the button into a yellow diamond, worth thirty thousand pounds; in calling the players Hindoos, detective policemen, reformed thieves, noble ladies, and so on, and in thus more effectually distracting his reader's attention from the puzzle itself, which turns out at last, like most of Mr. Collins's mysteries, to have no vital connection with his characters, considered as human beings, but to be merely an extraneous matter thrown violently into the current of his story. It would perhaps be more correct to say that there is no story at all, and that the characters are mere puppets, grouped with more or less art around the thing the conjurer wishes to conceal until the time comes for displaying it. These books of his are, in their way, curiosities of literature. The word "novel," as applied to them, is an absurd misnomer, however that word is understood. There is nothing new in Mr. Collins's stories, if the reader has ever read a book of puzzles, and they serve none of the recognized purposes of the novel. They reflect neither nature nor human life; the actors whom they introduce are nothing but more or less ingenious pieces of mechanism, and they are all alike—like each other and like nothing else. They teach no moral lessons; they are unsuggestive of thought, and they appeal to no sentiment profounder than the idlest curiosity. They are simply conundrums. It is for this reason that Mr. Collins, wise in his generation, deprecates any attempts on the part of his critics to tell the plot of his stories. One commits, however, no breach of trust in speaking of the theatrical properties which supply, in our author's case, the place of dramatic ability. He cannot create a character, unless the solitary instance of Count Fosco be an exception; he can only dress a lay-figure with more or less of skill. Take his "Moonstone," for instance—which, as far as the real business of the plot is concerned, might as well have been a black bean or a horn button—call it a yellow diamond, stolen, centuries ago, from the forehead of an Indian idol, and make its recovery a part of the religion of three mysterious, lithe, swarthy East Indians in flowing white robes, and there is a chance of awakening, in the most hardened of novel-readers, a curiosity which would assuredly have slept over the possible whereabouts of a button.

But it is hardly worth while to go on. One might say of the book, that it is like a pantomime—the characters appear to speak, but really say nothing, and are merely conventional figures, and not characters at all. Mr. Collins ventriloquizes behind each of his puppets, in order to give a sufficient number of misleading sounds. But his art is bad, and he has not art enough—his voice always betrays him, and the reader is never deceived into thinking that it is anybody but Mr. Collins that is talking. We do not know of any books of which it is truer than of Mr. Collins's to make the damaging remark, that nobody reads them twice, and that when the end of the first perusal is reached, everybody thinks his time has been wasted.

The Works of William Shakespeare. Edited by Charles Knight. (London: George Routledge & Sons. 1868.)

"Chandos Classics."—The Works of William Shakespeare. Life, Glossary, etc. Reprinted from the original edition, and compared with all recent commentators. (London: Fredrick Warne & Co. New York: Scribner, Welford & Co. 1868.)—Both of these books give all Shakespeare for half a dollar, and are to be regarded as marvels of cheapness, especially if the elegance of their typography is considered. Their first appearance was accompanied by a publisher's quarrel, as to which we knew nothing at first hand; but so far as we do know, we should say that Messrs. Warne & Co. are certainly blameless, and Messrs. Routledge & Sons perhaps blameless. However, the books being once in the market, we fear the public would be only very slightly influenced by moral considerations in making choice of which of the two to buy. As it happens, a decision based on other considerations can easily be reached. The Warne Shakespeare is decidedly superior to its rival, and is to be chosen for these reasons: The type used—of the same size in both editions—is, of course, very small; the Routledge Shakespeare is printed on tinted paper, and the other on white, so that the page is less clear-faced, and—to our eyes at least—less legible in the Routledge than in the Warne. The second objection to the Routledge edition can be made clear by a quotation: That edition, in the "Second Part of King Henry Fourth," in the fourth act and the first scene, thus prints three speeches, made by Lord Hastings, the Archbishop of York and Lord Mowbray respectively:

> "Hast. Besides, the king hath wasted all his rods
> On late offenders, that he now doth lack
> The very instruments of chastisement;
> So that his power, like to a fangless lion,
> May offer, but not hold. Arch. 'Tis very true—
> And therefore be assured, my good lord marshal
> If we do now make our atonement well
> Our peace will, like a broken limb united,
> Grow stronger for the breaking. Mowb. Be it so.
> Here is returned my lord of Westmoreland."

In the Warne edition the different speeches, no matter how short, are in no case run together into one paragraph, but the first word of each begins a new line, whether the space of the line immediately preceding is left unfilled or not. In the third place, in the Warne edition the leaves—quite as wide in the margin as the leaves in the Routledge edition—are cut, and the book thus made all ready for immediate use. Then again, the Warne Shakespeare is the first of a series of cheap publications to be issued by the same firm, which is to have the general title of "The Chandos Classics," and is to include the best uncopyrighted works in the English language. It is better, then, to buy the "Shakespeare" whose appearance will match that of the "Milton," "De Foe," "Boswell," and "Arabian Nights" that will probably follow. Finally, the Warne edition contains a brief, well-written life of the poet, which the other edition wants.

As concerning the enterprise in general, apart from the rival claims of this or that edition or house, nobody—not the most bigoted devotee of large-paper copies or fine editions—can have anything to say but words of praise. It is one of the most gratifying signs of the times that there is an eager demand for the best literature in forms so cheap that the very poor can afford to become readers of it, and that there is a willing supply of it, as well as an eager demand. That there should be fifty-cent editions of Shakespeare, and that there should be hundreds of thousands of purchasers of them, are facts that must bother a Carlylist a good deal, and from the contemplation of which men entirely sane will derive a reasonable pleasure.

Our Branch and its Tributaries. Being a history of the work of the Northwestern Sanitary Commission and its auxiliaries during the war of the rebellion. By Mrs. Sarah Edwards Henshaw. (Chicago: Alfred L. Sewell. 1868.)—We rise from reading this book with a high respect for the author, and with a better appreciation of the spirit and performances of the Sanitary Commission than we have derived from any other source. The great task of constructing from the voluminous records of a society which had four years of uninterrupted activity, and was in constant correspondence with three thousand subsidiary organizations, a narrative that should be at once complete, comprehensive, and entertaining, has been achieved by Mrs. Henshaw with remarkable success. The honor of being selected for so grave and delicate a work is in itself a compliment to which, in the case of a woman, our praises could add nothing. The four extraordinary women who carried, so to say, the Northwest Branch on their shoulders, displaying business and executive capacity, initiative force, and endurance to a degree not commonly associated with their sex, may, together with their present chronicler, safely challenge comparison in their respective departments. What next has appeared to us most striking is the variety of services which this Branch rendered, originating many—as, for instance, the Hospital Directory at Louisville and the Eye Infirmary at Chicago. And after this the faith and enthusiasm and liberality of the West, feebly attested by figures too large for comprehension, seem, and always will seem, wonderful. But of all this we can give no hint here. Mrs. Henshaw has traced the origin of the Branch, and depicted its laborious but triumphant career, in a manner to leave nothing to be desired. Along with it she gives a very accurate sketch of the different stages of the war, particularly in the Southwest. Everywhere her narrative is enlivened with well-chosen anecdotes, of which Mrs. Bickerdyke furnishes a large and humorous portion, while occasionally—as in the passage which describes the terrible prescience of impending conflicts, or that which represents the field of Shiloh after the battle—there is an affecting pathos. "The rest [of the patients at Mound City]," writes Dr. Tiffany, March 27, 1862, "have been sent to Cincinnati and St. Louis, to make room for the men who are to be wounded next Saturday at Corinth."

The literary style of this history is, generally, irreproachable. The same may be said of the publisher's workmanship, which, we are told, is as nearly all Western, from press to paper, as it could well be. We have certainly never seen a better-made book bearing a Western imprint, wherever manufactured.

The Week.

CONGRESS met on Monday, and immediately adjourned after having provided by resolution for possible meetings on the 16th of October and the 10th of November. There was pretty sharp practice shown in getting the resolution through the House. The Republican members knew that a quorum would not be present, and were in their seats at twelve o'clock precisely. The Chaplain made his prayer, and was so long about it that the Republicans began to get uneasy, as the presence of a single Democrat to make an objection would prevent the transaction of any business without a quorum. But every one of the five or six Democrats stayed out of the Chamber till after prayer-time, and, as a just punishment for this neglect of their devotions, the resolution was passed within five minutes after Mr. Boynton had made an end of speaking. The Democrats made some attempts in both House and Senate to recover the ground which they had lost, but without effect. It is all fair, we suppose. The Republican members seemed to be in very good spirits, and confident of the success of Grant and Colfax, the latter of whom was heartily congratulated by his friends. The exigencies of the campaign are, of course, what prevented the assembling of a quorum. Except Mr. Trumbull, whose recent domestic affliction keeps him silent, there is hardly a Congressman who has not been doing hard work; and there is more before all of them.

A miscreant named Pierce, who is running for Congress in Georgia, having resolved to make an incendiary speech at Camilla, armed and equipped a force of two hundred and fifty negroes, provisioned them for three weeks' service, and set out for the county town. A deputation of the prominent citizens met the mob at China Church, five miles from Camilla, and entreated them not to go into the town for the purpose of overawing the white citizens. They were begged at least to enter without arms. They would grant neither request, and marched in with banners flying and drums beating. Suddenly they halted and "clamored for a man named Johns. Johns, in company with Doctor Twitty, presented himself, when a hundred guns were levelled at them. The former, being intoxicated, fired." The mob, which had now somehow increased to four hundred and fifty, "was vigorously attacked and driven back and, panic-stricken, took to flight." The people felt compelled to chase it four miles, killing as they went. So the Associated Press reporter says. His report is obviously and childishly false. For a man who has had his amount of practice in misrepresentation he is a bad bungler. The truth of the matter is that the high-handed injustice of the Georgia Legislature is having its natural effect; it has put fresh heart into every young ruffian in the State, and now there is no place there where the shooting of a negro by a drunken white man may not very probably lead to unprovoked murder by wholesale. Evidently Pierce had a political procession in charge; probably not one in ten of the negroes had arms with him; "a hundred guns were levelled at Johns," yet Johns kills a negro without molestation, and the citizens, who were in terror of being overawed, killed negroes indiscriminately for a couple of hours or more. Reasonable accounts say that the sheriff of the county went out to meet Colonel Pierce, and told him the citizens had decided "to let no Radical speak in Camilla." This is the function of a Southern sheriff just now. There is nothing like having officers of the law in a community. Pierce having forgotten that the Georgia of to-day is not the Georgia of a month ago, but more like her natural self, went forward, and was shot for his pains. Governor Bullock's message to the Legislature, urging that the President be asked to supply troops, has been given to a committee who will probably shelve it. The Legislature has passed the law excluding negroes from the jury-box, and if this Legislature does not the next one will disfranchise them. The negroes on their part are to hold a convention which will probably result in an address to Congress and the Northern people, but what Congress can do for them it is not easy to see.

What the Northern Democratic leaders can be thinking of in not stopping these disturbances at the South is inexplicable. Unless, indeed, we explain it on General Butler's theory, that the New York managers do not want Seymour elected, but care only to get this State into their hands, which they hope to do by help of his name. But even if that is all their desire, we wish them joy of their task in gratifying it. Negroes killed as those were at Camilla make votes for Grant in New York as well as elsewhere. Of course, if "the people" have resolved that they will not be overawed, and that "no Radical shall speak in Camilla," Mr. Tilden's labors are made more arduous; in fact, it is not easy to see what he is going to do about it, but certainly he would do well to do something quickly, or the "serene confidence" with which he looks forward to November, whether he looks beyond the State line or not, will get him laughed at.

If Alabama is to be carried for Grant and Colfax, as the Secretary of the Union Republican Committee promises, it will not be without exertion, as witness these following remarks make by the Montgomery Mail, a paper the conductors of which—we presume it is they—ask us to call attention to their articles. "Make them Show their Colors" is the heading of one of them. It sets out by declaring that the Republican party "is hated at the South with a hatred which is deep and restless as the ocean and boundless as eternity," and "which stops just short of the knife." Which does n't stop short of the knife, would be a correcter way of putting it. "The merchants of Mobile and New Orleans," it goes on, "give employment to no porters, draymen, or hack-drivers who do not carry a Seymour and Blair flag at their horses' heads. We appeal to the merchants of Montgomery to do likewise"—an appeal not made in vain we dare say, and which possibly may "bring these miserable, incendiary, insidious men to reason." If not, they may as well understand that "we are tired of it, and that they and their carpet-bag leaders must sleep in the gutter together." Alabama is a doubtful State, but there is an undiminished likelihood that the Republicans will carry Florida, Louisiana, and North Carolina. As for the Northern States, Pennsylvania has become safer than she was a week ago, and is probably Republican, in October, by from five to ten thousand majority; Ohio is perfectly sure; Indiana, Senator Morton says, will give ten thousand majority next month. It would be a bold Democrat who should bet that Seymour will carry even New York after these States have gone against him.

We do not wish to be too critical with so honest and well-meaning a man as we believe Governor Baker, of Indiana, to be, but every Republican who opens his lips in public at present about the national finances ought to know exactly where he stands and what he means. We doubt if Governor Baker knew either one or the other when he gave utterance to the following words in his speech at Portland (Ind.) the other day:

"For my own part I believe the five-twenties are payable in greenbacks; not in greenbacks to be ground out to redeem them, but in the greenback that existed when the debt was made, and which were limited to $440,000,000 when the debt was made, in 1864. If you ask me what I would do, I would put a new loan on the market at a lower rate of interest—say one thousand million of dollars at four per cent.; and what would be the consequence of the adoption of that policy? Here is a man has some bonds of the present issue. He walks up to the counter with a thousand dollar bond and gets a thousand dollars in greenbacks for it. What does he do then? He takes his thousand dollars in greenbacks, and buys with it one of the new four per cent. bonds of a similar value. Thus a debt bearing six per cent. interest is changed into one bearing only four. And so the process would go on, until, by turning your three hundred and fifty millions of greenbacks over and over again, you have changed the entire debt into four per cent. bonds, with a saving of from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 per annum."

Now, no man "walks up to a counter with a thousand dollar bond" without a motive, and Governor Baker must supply his man with a sufficient motive for the extraordinary course which he here marks out for him, before he will get us to believe that he will follow it. The man in question will, in our opinion, not act in the manner described by Mr. Baker, because he can at present, by selling his thousand dollar bond in open market, obtain for it not one thousand, but eleven hundred dollars, or thereabouts. Secondly, suppose he took one thousand dollars in greenbacks for it over the counter, he would have the right, under the existing law, to convert the thousand dollars at once into a bond bearing not four per cent., but six per cent. interest, and he would, assuredly, prefer six to four per cent. Under these circumstances, for "the process to go on," as Mr. Baker would wish it to do, human nature must undergo a radical change. On the other hand, if Mr. Baker attempts to force his man to convert, he at once damns the new loan by bringing the Government into financial disrepute, and if, when the Government tries to issue a new loan, difficulty is found in disposing of it, it will be owing to speeches like these, in which the nation is gravely advised by leading politicians to put on its contracts a construction which is contrary to the understanding on which its creditors lent it money, and contrary to the express, long continued, and never repudiated representations of its authorized agents.

General Butler has been visited in this city by a Herald reporter, for the purpose of getting his "views" on various subjects. The reporter extracted from him, amongst other things, an explanation of the extraordinary course of the Nation and Boston Advertiser, in opposing his re-election to Congress. The secret cause of the hostility of the Nation to him is, it appears, his having opposed the contribution of certain surplus funds of the Recruiting Committee of Boston towards the establishment of the paper, in 1865, which has, as might have been expected, earned for him the undying hostility of its conductors. Considering that they were, until the morning of the 21st of September, 1868, entirely ignorant of the opposition aforesaid, we leave him to imagine with what malignity they would have followed him up had they known of it. The reason of the Boston Advertiser's enmity to him is, we regret to say, much less creditable than that of the Nation." It was, he says, "one of the first papers to publish to the world his views on financial questions; but subsequently he was employed professionally to commence a libel suit against the publishers of the Advertiser, for an obscene slander, which they had uttered against a talented and estimable young lady, and compelled them, under a threat of prosecution, to make a full and ample apology." Thereupon, the despicable sheet turned against the great statesman, and, to use his own words, "has never since been able to discover any good qualities in him." So it is with all the general's enemies. We have no doubt, if he had time to give us a full account of them, we should find that, although they may be numbered by the hundred thousand, there is not one whose hostility is not due to the general's having frustrated some piece of villany or performed some noble or virtuous action.

We were, however, very much gratified to see attributed to him, the other day, some remarks on the public debt, at Salisbury Beach, in which he spoke of it "as something to be proud of; because it showed that the resources, credit, and strength of the American people surpass those of any other country on earth." He seems hitherto only to have looked at the debt as furnishing the raw materials for a swindle, or, at all events, the means of playing a good trick on a parcel of unscrupulous usurers. So this new view of it shows that he is making progress. It, nevertheless, affects us, and we fear will affect the general public, very much like the reflections of a "cracksman"—we intend the comparison to apply to the general's mental processes, and not to himself—over a basket of plate, previous to carrying it off and melting it down. "What wonderful proof," the burglar might remark, "does this accumulation of the precious metals, in the possession of one family, afford of the enormous resources and the rapid material progress of our country, and of the certainty with which industry and frugality and careful investment are rewarded under our admirable form of government. And, then, we have only to examine the moulding and chasing of these spoons, forks, vegetable-dishes, and cake-baskets to feel proud both of the mechanical skill and artistic culture of our incomparable artisans, and to curse the hard fate which compels one to cast such tasteful objects into the pot, and dispose of the bullion to one's "fence."

The general's nomination is still doubtful, but the chances are in favor of his getting it, as he is likely to take more trouble to secure it than anybody else to prevent him. There has been some talk of running Richard H. Dana against him, but, we fear, not talk enough. There is no doubt, however, a strong opposition to him in the district, and at least one of the local papers, the Salem Gazette, speaks out freely against him, and until the 28th, when the Convention meets, there will be room for hope. There is, perhaps, nothing more remarkable in his tactics than his careful avoidance, all through the canvass, of all allusion to his financial schemes, which, while in Congress, he held of sufficient importance to make them the ground of an attack on the public credit. It must be remembered, too, that he is not simply a greenback man of the Pendleton school, but is in favor of directly depriving the public creditor of a portion of the interest promised him, without any cover or subterfuge. It remains to be seen whether any New England constituency is simple enough to allow a candidate for re-election to put out of sight, as of no consequence, the most prominent portion of his Congressional career.

The performances which a number of religious people are carrying on in the den, in this city, occupied by John Allen, "the Wickedest Man," etc., have reached a point at which the interference of those who have any reverence for sacred things becomes absolutely necessary, and we are glad to see that the New York correspondent of the Advance has uttered a strong protest against them. The final touch of horror and repulsiveness has been given to the whole affair by the appearance of the poor wretch Allen himself—who passes most of his time in a state of drunkenness—in the country districts, as a preacher of righteousness, with a small charge for admission. He is said to have presented himself to the very small audience which his agents were able to collect at Stamford in a state of stupid intoxication. We do not deny that men like Allen may be suddenly reformed—Gardner's case proves it—but we can hardly think of a graver outrage, both on religion and morality, than the sanction, by clergymen or members of churches, of the theory that a life-long ruffian, reeking from a stew kept by himself, can be qualified by a week's repentance—even supposing it to have been sincere—to go out and preach, to anybody, the way of salvation.

There is no doubt that the belief in the speedy outbreak of a war on the European continent is general and grows stronger, and that it is in France only that people look for the signs of the conflict. The Emperor's late pacific speeches have produced no effect, and are supposed either to have no meaning or to have a double meaning. Every time he opens his lips a covert declaration of war is looked for, and the Bourse is tremulous with excitement, the late political defeat of the Government being considered likely to increase the chance of hostilities. A large army has been collected at the camp at Châlons, and has been going through its manœuvres in the highest state of efficiency, and the opposition grows bolder than ever, and is making its arrangements to contest every vacant seat in the Corps Législatif with a resolution which it has not exhibited for eighteen years. A history of the coup d'état by M. Ténot, which gives an account of the shooting in cold blood of peasantry and artisans of the provinces during the week following the coup d'état, under the superintendence of the Napoleonic préfets, is having an enormous sale, and seems to be taking the place of the Lanterne, which is temporarily eclipsed, owing to the difficulty of finding a printer. The last number was entirely made up of extracts from the works of the Emperor, but they looked so atrocious that nobody in Paris could be found audacious enough to set them up, and M. Rochefort began to find difficulty in getting a place to edit his paper—a prosecution having been already commenced against him in Brabant for outraging a friendly sovereign.

There seems to be no general agreement as to the side from which the trouble will come. Prussia, of course, will be the antagonist, but whether the quarrel will begin on the side of the Rhine or on the side of Italy is the question. Lamarmora has been made so unpopular by the late revelation, that he has run some risk of being mobbed, and there have been rumors—which, however, the Moniteur has contradicted—that Italy, instigated by Prussia, is pressing for a withdrawal of the French troops from Rome. Things at Rome are in a bad way, carnally speaking; that is, the Pope is in excellent health, and the Zouaves are deserting by the hundred, through ennui, non-payment of wages, and indifferent food. Attempts have been made for some time to distract them by rumors of the coming of the Garibaldians, but these have lost their power, and the corps is dissolving slowly but surely, the deserters going over the Italian border to live among the heathen.

Some interesting details of the working of the Italian revenue laws have been published, from which it appears that, while the custom receipts fall slightly below the estimates, the stamp and registration duties are yielding a considerable surplus; but the public lottery, sad to say, seems to be the steadiest source of revenue after all, yielding in the last six months $6,000,000—a striking indication of Italian love of gambling, when we consider that the lottery only yielded $2,000,000 in France in 1836, the last year of its existence.

The quarrel between Count Usedom and General Lamarmora, arising out of Lamarmora's publication of the count's note, written in 1866, laying out a plan of campaign for the Italian army, assumes every day a worse complexion for Lamarmora. It will be remembered that it had its origin in some slighting reference to the Italian operations in the Quadrilateral made in a history of the war recently published by the Prussian staff under General Von Moltke's superintendence. This irritated Lamarmora, and led him to publish the note addressed to him by Count Usedom, containing, as Lamarmora believed, and as he thinks the world will believe, a wild plan of campaign, by which the Italian army was to turn the Quadrilateral, and march straight on Vienna, and probably to its own destruction; but this despatch, it now turns out, he had never communicated to his Government, but quietly pocketed, and fought on a plan of his own. To this the Prussian Government replies officially that, for the slight put upon Italy in Von Moltke's history of the war, it is not responsible, and then unofficially, through an "inspired" correspondent of the Cologne Gazette, tells a very damaging story about Lamarmora, and its reason for addressing him the despatch which he suppressed. The story is in substance this. Napoleon knew and approved of the treaty between Italy and Prussia, and was anxious for the war, believing that if Prussia were defeated she would call for his assistance and give in return the left bank of the Rhine, and Austria was in that case to cede Venice to Italy in return for Silesia. But Lamarmora, on his part, being a creature of Napoleon's and taking no step without the approval of the Emperor, also engaged to localize the war—that is, not to carry it out of Italy, so as not to interfere too seriously with the Austro-French plans; and knowing Italy would have Venice in any case, he took the field without any serious intention of fighting. Prussia, knowing he was in close communication with the French Government, had avoided thus far communicating with him in writing; but, its suspicions about him increasing, Count Usedom wrote him the despatch which has raised the discussion, addressing it to him as Minister of Foreign Affairs, so as to ensure its being laid before the King and cabinet, and asking formally from the Italian army a kind of co-operation which would frustrate the French schemes and prevent Austria being able, by a sudden surrender of Venice, to precipitate her whole force on Prussia. Lamarmora, however, got out of this difficulty by pocketing the despatch which has now, for the first time, seen the light, and engaged the Austrians in such a way as to ensure them an easy victory, the battle of Custozza being, to the general-in-chief, one of the most disgraceful in history. The French plans were, however, completely broken up by the tremendous victory of Sadowa; and France and Austria, instead of dividing Prussia between them, found themselves both at its mercy.

There has been a good deal of indignation excited on both sides of the water by Mr. Roebuck's insulting language with reference to this country at the Cutlers' Banquet at Sheffield, at which Mr. Reverdy Johnson was present. Mr. Roebuck's offence consisted in giving a very disagreeable account of the composition of this people, and applying sundry opprobrious epithets to the Irish, French, Spaniards, and Italians whom he supposes to pour in here year by year in what he calls a "feculent tide," and to whose influence he attributes the monopoly of the Government by "the buccaneering element" in the population and the exclusion of educated men from public life. Mr. Johnson did exactly what he ought to have done—sat still and said nothing, and the next day, in reply to an address, corrected the Roebuck absurdities in perfectly calm and temperate language. We observe that some of our contemporaries think he ought to have left the room. But then there is such a thing as giving importance to people and things which would otherwise possess none, and this is precisely what an ambassador would be guilty of who left a dinner-table because Mr. Roebuck was being silly and impudent. Mr. Roebuck has for a long time had absolutely nothing but what he is pleased to call his "imprudence" of speech to rely on for the preservation of his political position, and to drive Mr. Johnson away from a dinner-table by the display of it would be for him an immense success. The English papers have been very sharp with him, however, and he has attempted a lame defence in a letter to the Times, in which he says that in drawing a horrible picture of the governing classes in America, he was simply furnishing an à fortiori argument for the success of popular government in England. To do him justice, he said nothing nearly as bad as he said during the war, or as some of those who are now rebuking him said also. His presence at the banquet was no doubt a misfortune, but then he is member for the borough, and there was no getting rid of him. We observe that in his letter to the Times he puts forward a plea for immunity from the attacks of the press which is not uncommon here—that he was "a veteran politician."

There are telegraphic accounts of a revolution of the first magnitude in Spain, including a revolt of the fleet—an incident, as far as we know, unprecedented in the history of civil dissensions, and of a greater or less portion of the army. That this storm was coming has been evident ever since the exile of the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier, whose expulsion gave the malcontents a rallying-point and their cause a look of respectability. Minor indications came two or three weeks later, in the resignation of several of the leading generals, and as long ago as the 1st of September it was generally believed in Paris, by those most familiar with Spanish affairs, that Gonzales Bravo's tenure of office was a question of days. Of the movement now pending we get only very confused details, although it seems likely to end in the overthrow of the Queen's Government. A revolution begun and carried out by the army and navy does not seem likely to be succeeded by anything very stable and promising.

VERMONT AND MAINE.

The importance of foreseeing the result of a Presidential campaign is so great, not only to politicians, but also to business men, that we are not afraid of wearying our readers by renewing our speculations upon the vote of November, and explaining every circumstance which lends confirmation to our predictions. There is so much at stake in the approaching election—so many great financial interests depend upon its result—that it is eminently desirable to ascertain with accuracy and certainty the drift of the popular current; and for this purpose the issue of every political contest since the nominations were made deserves careful examination.

First, in apparent weight, came the Kentucky election, with a Democratic majority of 88,000 in place of 70,000 last year. This was a fact of some value, as indicating a concentration of the white vote in the Southern States, and an increased degree of bitterness on the part of the Democrats; but it proved nothing more. The total vote of the State was not as large as in 1866, by at least 14,000; and this indicated the lack of great enthusiasm in a State indisputably Democratic. Moreover, the main contest is to be decided in the North, and not in the South; and an election in a Southern State where no colored man could vote, was no sign of the general result. The Territorial elections, in Idaho and Colorado, have no value except as remote indications of the prospect in Nevada and Nebraska. The Republican party has fully held its own in these Territories; but from these returns alone, we should be slow to form any general conclusion. The Oregon election, as we said when the first reports from there were received, gave reason to expect that the Democrats would carry both Oregon and California next November; but the vote of the Eastern States may yet influence California in a different direction, and private accounts lead us to expect that it will.

The elections just held in Vermont and Maine are of a kind totally unlike any of which we have yet spoken, and they are worthy of a more careful analysis. They have been only superficially noticed by the press in general, and their peculiarities are too complex to be seen or comprehended at a glance. The first indication afforded by these elections is that the aggregate vote in the Northern States will be not only much larger than any ever before cast, but larger in proportion to the number of electors than on any previous occasion. An ordinary election does not draw out 60 per cent. of the qualified electors. An active election draws out perhaps 66 per cent. A very excited election brings out 75 per cent.; but society must be stirred to its depths if a proportion materially larger than this appears at the polls.

Now, in both Vermont and Maine the electors have voted in greater numbers, whether absolutely or relatively considered, than have ever before been known. The census returns show that the population of Vermont has remained stationary for many years, while the ratio of increase in Maine has been small, and steadily declining. The vote of Vermont at a State election has usually been about 45,000, even in Presidential years. It has never reached 56,000 on any previous occasion, and never exceeded 50,000 since 1844, except in the years 1849, 1856, and 1864. It has now reached the really astonishing figure of 58,000—a figure which we should have thought utterly incredible before the returns came in. And this, let it be noted, is at a mere local election, the result of which was never for a moment in doubt, and which therefore presented no inducement whatever for the use of special exertions to draw out a full vote. It was an almost spontaneous demonstration of popular interest, attended with results such as are usually obtained only by means of the strenuous and interested exertions of politicians. The election in Maine was much more seriously contested; and the increase of vote in that State is not, therefore, so extraordinary a phenomenon as in Vermont. But it is nevertheless remarkable. The total vote of Maine has never much exceeded 120,000, and has never reached that point since 1860. The increase of population has probably been less than five per cent. But the increase of vote is ten per cent., the aggregate now being considerably over 130,000. From these facts it may safely be inferred that the seeming apathy of the people is simply the result of their having made up their minds, and become indifferent to the clamors by which it is usually sought to change the current of a political canvass.

The next indication of these elections is that the Republican party holds its ranks unbroken, and commands the same proportion of the Northern vote as in 1864 and 1866, with the single exception of the temporary aid which it received from the Fenians in 1866. That aid it has lost, and it is of some importance to ascertain how much it amounted to. The Fenians were greatly disgusted with Mr. Johnson in September, 1866; and some four or five thousand of them in Maine either voted the Republican ticket, or abstained from voting at all. This raised the Republican majority that year to 27,000, when without this it would not have exceeded 18,000. Still, even with this aid, the Republican vote in 1866 only reached 69,000. It is now over 75,000. So in Vermont, the Republican vote is the largest ever cast, and is immensely greater than was ever before polled for a candidate at a mere State election.

An attempt has been made to belittle the result of these two elections by comparing the majorities with those which were given on former occasions under exceptional circumstances. Vermont has given a little larger majority on two occasions only—the Presidential elections of 1856 and 1864, when Frémont had 28,400 majority, and Lincoln 29,100. It now gives 27,500; but this is simply because the Democrats did not on those occasions feel any encouragement to poll their whole strength, whereas on this occasion they did. Moreover, the majority of this year has never been even approached at any previous State election. The majority at the State election of 1864 was less than 19,000, and at that of 1856 23,000. So the 21,000 majority now given by Maine is compared with the 27,000 given in 1866, and the majorities given at the Presidential elections of 1860 and 1856, when the Democrats had lost all hope and made no effort to poll their real vote. But these comparisons are fallacious. At no previous election in Maine, where a full vote was cast, and a real contest made, has the Republican majority reached 18,000, while it has usually been much less. It is now, on a straight party struggle, at least 3,000 in advance of this figure, and this represents the actual gain of the party in the State.

There is no reason why the same influences which have controlled Maine and Vermont should not also operate in other States. The Fenian vote did not help the Republicans to any appreciable extent outside of the northern districts of New England, New York, and Illinois. Its loss would have reduced the majority of 1866 in New York 7,000, and that in Illinois 10,000. But this is a matter of small moment. If Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana give handsome Republican majorities in October, New York may be saved, and Illinois will certainly be largely Republican. It is said that the vote of Maine in September, 1856, did not save Frémont in Pennsylvania, nor foreshadow the general result of the campaign. But the vote of Maine then corresponded with the vote of all that portion of country which was not on the border of the slave States, or bound to them by commercial interests. That distinction no longer exists. Philadelphia and "Egypt" have both been converted, and are to be relied upon for Grant. The North is more homogeneous now than it was in 1856; and the vote of Maine is now, as it has been ever since 1860, indicative of the current throughout the North. Moreover, the Northern States even in 1856 were largely Republican, and would have elected Frémont but for the Southern vote being cast solidly against him. The Southern vote is now divided, the Northern electoral vote largely increased. If Grant should only run as well as Frémont did in 1856, he could not fail to be elected.

View it in what light we may, it seems impossible to arrive at any other rational conclusion than that the September elections have decided the contest in favor of Grant. It remains for October to determine whether his majority shall be overwhelming, and whether the next House of Representatives shall be as strongly Republican as the present; but the main question of the canvass is settled to the satisfaction of every impartial mind.

THE WORKING-MEN'S CONGRESS.

The International Labor Congress has just been holding its second meeting at Brussels, and although we have, as yet, no report of the discussions, the general report of the working of the organization since 1866, which has been received, and is the composition of one of their leading men, Mr. Shaw, of London, gives one a fair idea of the amount of progress they have made in certain directions within the last two years. The proceedings at the first meeting of the Congress, in 1866, were made the subject of an elaborate and interesting article by M. Louis Reybaud, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, but the conclusions he drew from them as to the mental condition of the working-men were anything but flattering, and he made no secret of the fact that he would consider the assumption by them of the power of legislation, in the present state of their training as full of danger to the highest interests of society. The present report does not contain any direct expressions of opinion on economical questions. It is simply a history of the various attempts made to spread the organization in the different civilized countries of the world, but the tone of it makes one fear that the members have not improved much in the art of stating their own case. It would, if it were a well-arranged statement of facts, be very valuable, but it is slangy and abusive, and full of exaggeration, so that it is really impossible to learn from it exactly what has been done or what we may expect to be done. Moreover, one cannot learn from it, with any approach to accuracy, what difficulties the organization has had to contend with in the different countries, as all its opponents are denounced with about the same degree of violence. There seems, indeed, to be no difference in the guilt and depravity of its enemies. They are all in the same stage, and that the lowest.

At the closing of the last mail only one subject had been discussed—that of war; and of this discussion we have only a very brief sketch. Moreover, it is not a subject possessing much interest for the working-men in this country, inasmuch as the wars against which European workmen declaim are wars which—though they themselves are the principal sufferers from them—they do nothing to begin and can do nothing to bring to an end, and which are mostly carried on for dynastic considerations, although the immediate and palpable object may be an accession of territory, and a consequent addition to the national strength. On most other points, however, there seems to be very little difference of opinion between the European and American workmen. Their economical theories appear to be very similar, and they both appear to concur most cordially in the determination to use any political power they may possess now or attain hereafter to embody these theories in legislation; and the general belief and expectation that in every civilized country they are very near the possession of this power, secures for their talk an amount of attention to which, on its own merits, it is not by any means entitled. The ideas of men who are likely before many years to rule the world are always interesting, and those of the working-men in Europe on various social topics show that they dream of a future for society in many respects very different from that which the philosophers and "men of education" have worked out. For instance, most intelligent friends of the race are looking forward to the complete attainment of individual independence, and regard individual freedom of action as one of the blessings of the coming democratic age. The working-men seem to desire nothing of the kind. In fact, they detest individual freedom, look on it as the cause of most of their woes, and take the most elaborate pains to repress and root it out. Freedom of contract and of trade is also commonly supposed to be one of the most valuable features of the democratic régime. The working-men hold both in abhorrence. They would allow no laborer to sell his labor, or contract to sell it, on his own terms. In other words, they appear to be in nearly every country eager to go back to the state of things which Turgot abolished in France, in which the laborer was the slave of a corporation composed of men of his class. Like those corporations, too, the modern trade organizations are the deadly foe of strangers and persons unable to pay their "footing," and put the principle of monopolies in force with regard to the only article over which they have any control with a remorselessness and rigor which have never been surpassed by the pre-revolutionary monarchies in the palmiest days of jobbery. At the end of the last century the throwing open of all occupations to all men—or, in other words, the concession to every human being of the right of using his faculties in any way he saw fit, was hailed as one of the greatest gains to humanity achieved by the French Revolution; but if we are to believe the trades-unions, it was no gain at all, but a loss. One great aim of the trades organizations of our day is, in fact, to keep down the number of persons engaged in each calling, by limiting the number of apprentices. Now, suppose every trade well organized, as the working-men seek to make them, and the population to go on increasing, there would, though the number of trades increased also, be every year an increasing number of young men thrown out amongst the unskilled class, forming a mass somewhat corresponding in social position to the Hindoo Sudras. We do not mean to say this social ideal will ever be realized; the forces of the age all work against its realization. We are now simply talking of what the working-men in Europe seem to have in their minds as a desirable possibility, if we may judge from their talk and organized action.

The position of the European working-men regarding female labor appeared at the last congress to be exceedingly discreditable, contrasting most unfavorably with the ground taken on this subject by the labor conventions here. The Europeans make a prodigious fuss about prostitution, and in some mysterious manner fasten the blame of it on the Government and on that villanous entity, "society;" but when it comes to the point of supplying a practical remedy by advocating the admission of women to a fair competition in the labor market, they hesitate and shirk the question. The utterances of the convention now meeting in this city on this subject are all that could be desired; but we do not see how, on the trades-union theory of the rights of those who are already engaged in the exercise of the various trades, women can be admitted indiscriminately to the labor market any more than young males. If the fact that the multiplication of laborers has a tendency to diminish wages furnishes a justification for restricting the admission of male apprentices to the various trades, women ought not to have any chance; for their numbers are enormous, and their field of activity limited greatly by nature. The bricklayers, masons, and carpenters are, perhaps, safe from their intrusion under any rule; but how about the compositors, painters, carvers, gilders, shoemakers, and so on?

The denunciations of capital, with which the speeches and reports of all labor congresses abound, and their general acceptance of the theory that capital is necessarily the enemy of labor, are not as unnatural as they seem, though they are not based on a strictly accurate view of the case. What is commonly called the conflict between labor and capital, and what the laborers believe to be such, is in reality a strife between the laborer and the capitalist as to who shall have the larger share of the profits; and in this strife the capitalist is undoubtedly the laborer's enemy, inasmuch as, let his profits be ever so large, he gives the laborer as small a share of them as possible. And owing to the laborer's poverty or ignorance, the capitalist is frequently able to put him off with a much smaller share than the laws of trade or the state of the market entitle him to. This has been strikingly illustrated by the revelations recently made by Canon Girdwood regarding the condition of the agricultural laborers in England, from which it appears that for fully fifteen years the laborers in his parish have been receiving about half the market rate—that is, about half what they might have obtained by going to a town about two hours' distant by rail. Behind all this, of course, there lies the broad fact that the more capital there is for investment, the better it is on the whole for the laborer. But it is not wonderful that the laborer cannot as yet see it distinctly, in spite of the preaching of the political economists.

A great deal of what seems most preposterous in the sociology of working-men is due to a belief, by which all enthusiastic philanthropists are in a greater or less degree possessed, and that is a belief not simply that the human race tends to perfection, but that it is likely to reach it before long. Very few, doubtless, would accept this doctrine in the bald form in which we here produce it. Most reformers, if asked to state their opinion on this point, would talk of the kingdom of heaven as of indefinite remoteness; but there are very few schemes of radical social reform which are not based on a secret, though it may be vague, expectation that it is really at hand, and that with a little help from legislation and from education our eyes may behold it. The difficulties opposed by the constitution of human nature to the working of the very best laid political and social plans, which weigh too heavily on the souls of "practical statesmen," hardly weigh at all on the souls of working-men; and the prodigious progress of the world within the past fifty years, the wonderful capacity for self-improvement which human nature has shown since the American and French Revolutions gave it a chance to work out its own salvation, naturally nourish the sweet delusion that all things are possible to it. We do not think it at all likely that sound and just views on this subject will be reached till democracy has had half a century or so of trial over the whole civilized world.

THE MASSACHUSETTS CONVENTION.

We have received letters from several delegates complaining of the reports of the Massachusetts Convention which appeared in the papers in this city, and on which the brief comments we made on the proceedings in our last issue were based, and giving us a version of the story which is materially different from that circulated by the reporters. The subject is worth a second notice, because it furnishes an interesting illustration of the way in which the "Wickedest Politician in the United States" may, under the existing caucus system, make one of the most moral, and upright, and intelligent States in the Union appear to approve of him and support him, and of the way in which the party press can be depended on to aid in his attempts at imposition. We spoke some weeks ago of the arrangement made between General Butler and his only formidable rival in the Fifth District, by which Dr. Loring was to have the general's support in seeking the nomination for the Governorship, while the general was to have the doctor's in securing a renomination to Congress. Dr. Loring is an old Democrat—and, as we remarked three weeks ago, a miniature copy of the old politicians of national reputation who made politics a trade, and a mean one, for the thirty years before the war—who joined the Republican party in 1864, and who does not possess a single claim of any kind to its respect or confidence. About General Butler we have already spoken our minds freely. The two worthies had no sooner completed their compact than they began to set the press claque to work to give it an air of popularity, and prepare the way for it before the Convention; and nobody who does not read the newspapers diligently and regularly, as editors for their sins are compelled to do, can have any idea of how much may be done in this way to prepare a simulacrum of popular favor. It is not necessary for this purpose to obtain access to the editorial columns of any of the leading journals. They all either have regular correspondents at points of interest, or are glad to receive letters from volunteers, and the first intimation one often gets that "something is in the wind" is the appearance of letters and paragraphs calling attention to the praiseworthy performances of A., and the fever of devotion he is exciting among the "young men"—this class being selected as a good index of the drift of popular sentiment. Accordingly, about the time that General Butler had his arrangements completed, the ultra-Radical journals—whose swallowing of him is, perhaps, as curious a case of morbid psychology as is to be found—began without apparent cause to praise him highly, ascribe the prevalent abuse of him to Copperhead hatred of patriots, and to publish letters from correspondents showing how he was loved in his District. Then they took to praising Dr. Loring, in whose service, according to the correspondents, "the young and active Republicans" were eagerly laboring, and the process was kept up, with decent intervals, till the Convention met at Worcester.

If anybody will take the trouble to examine the reports of the proceedings of the Convention, published in the same papers, he will see how perfect the recording arrangements of the Butler-Loring firm were. It must be remembered that General Butler appeared before it as a man who had virtually repudiated the party platform on a point of vital interest, and had joined with the Democrats in an assault on the public credit in Congress—who, for personal reasons, is disliked and distrusted by nine out of ten intelligent and respectable Massachusetts Republicans, and the defeat of whose schemes was undoubtedly the object which brought together such an unprecedentedly large number of delegates. Yet his speech is the only one reported at any length, though Richard H. Dana spoke weightily and ably. We are told that Butler received a "warm and exceedingly gratifying reception from all present," and that "at an enthusiastic caucus, held the evening before the Convention, he appeared and made an eloquent speech." At this caucus Mr. Dana was speaking when Butler entered, and the supporters of the latter having applauded him, as in duty bound, he marched straight up to the platform, turned round, took no notice of Mr. Dana, and commenced a speech of his own for Loring—the whole performance being, says a prominent delegate, in writing to us, "the greatest and most indecent piece of rudeness I ever heard of." It was so plain, however, that there was no chance for Dr. Loring, that General Butler withdrew his name, and the next day William Claflin was nominated by acclamation. But whom does the reader suppose the Tribune reporter produces, as taking the leading part in nominating him? Why, General Butler, to be sure. Loud calls "were heard that he should take the platform. He complied with this demand amidst wild and enthusiastic cheers." So that the country is given to understand that Butler was the foremost man of the Convention, its greatest favorite, and the most influential supporter of the Republican candidate. The facts are, we are assured, that he was utterly beaten in everything; that his supporters were few but noisy; that all that management could do was done for him; and that he was compelled to keep his principal stock in trade since the death of impeachment—his financial theories—stored away in his pack; "that he avoided the whole question of finance," and had to submit to the adoption of a platform in which his darling idea is scouted.

Now this is all very well as far as it goes. But the story has a painful side, and it is this: that so much exertion should be necessary in a State like Massachusetts, and in a body like the Republican Convention, to defeat and put down a man of General Butler's character and antecedents; that "moral reformers," who profess to live by the rule of pure truth and pure justice, should hug his knees, bespatter him with praise—which we do not like to call lying, but which they know very well can only be manufactured by perversion, suppression, and false suggestions, and by the use of a standard, both of moral and political excellence, such as no public man has ever yet been judged by amongst any Christian people; and that it should be possible for such a man so to manipulate the leading newspapers that men like Richard H. Dana should, in the report of the procedings of a body like the Massachusetts Convention, be put completely out of sight, their sayings ignored, and General Butler put in the foreground as the model for youth. The incident is now old, but we recur to it for two reasons. One is, that General Butler has still his renomination to get for the Fifth District; and the other is, that, as we have said, the affair affords a good illustration of the way in which the caucus system, working in combination with a press which party spirit has made forgetful of its highest duty, can be made to raise a barrier between practical politics and the best moral and mental perceptions of the community.

CAMPAIGN ENTHUSIASM.

Three months ago, many good Republicans were troubled by what they considered a want of enthusiasm for Grant—meaning, of course, an absence of nervous excitement about his name or his person, and an indisposition to give violent and uproarious expression to the feeling of admiration created by the contemplation of his career. This defect was supposed to be particularly remarkable in the West, which has usually been considered, owing to the greater freshness of its population, the home of enthusiasm; and we remember meeting with more than one shrewd observer who came back from that region troubled by the calm with which the mention of the Republican candidate was received. There did not seem, they said, to be any "magnetism" about him—magnetism, in political parlance, meaning that personal quality which in Europe causes the populace to take the horses from a man's carriage and draw it themselves, and which here excites intense eagerness to shake hands with him, and get his autograph, or a lock of his hair, or, in the case of woman, to kiss him. "Magnetism" does not seem to be necessarily connected with any particular kind of intellectual constitution. Webster had it, and so had, in a far greater degree, Clay. Jackson had it, but Calhoun had not, and the want of it is constantly mentioned still as a reason why some of the ablest men in the country need not look for a high place in the management of public affairs.

Now there is no denying that Grant does not possess "magnetism," in the sense in which the word is ordinarily used. His general bearing is not that of a sympathetic man, of a man on whose breast one is tempted to lay one's head and weep. His look does not invite kisses, and his hair does not lend itself—to use a Gallicism—to being cut off in locks. He makes a poor figure at receptions when a few of his fellow-citizens "desire to take him by the hand." He shakes hands, even on the greatest occasions, with a cold, stern, impassive air, which naturally begets the impression that he does not enjoy shaking hands with some hundreds of people whom he never saw before, and this chills the more gushing of his admirers. We have on more than one occasion been present when the sight of his unmoved, and apparently immovable, features has reduced a smiling, glowing hand-shaker, who had just danced up to him with extended arm and an inane but carefully prepared compliment on his lips, in the twinkling of an eye to a limp, broken-down bore, for whom life had lost its charms and from whom earth had withdrawn its welcome. In fact, as a show candidate Grant is probably the worst that ever took the field, and to the class of politicians who attend to the spectacular part of a campaign, get up the serenades, the processions, the great effects and striking situations, he must be a source of continual trial and disappointment. For the use of these gentlemen Seymour is worth ten Grants, putting aside altogether Seymour's immense rhetorical superiority. Seymour really has "magnetism." He has the power of putting on his face a show of interest in the small affairs of other people, and of putting on an air of dignity which, strange as it may seem, is worth more to a public man in America than in any other country in the world; and he has what is perhaps more valuable than all, tears within easy reach. "As a weeper," to use Colonel Brown's language, "he surpasses Job Trotter;" and though tears shed publicly have in all ages been regarded by the more reflective of the race with extreme suspicion, they are still, and will probably always remain, very powerful with the multitude, if used sparingly and with tact.

It is undoubtedly this want of availability for spectacular purposes on Grant's part which created the doubts about his popularity which existed three months ago, and which have even made their way to Europe, and have been made the subject of wondering comment in a recent number of the London Spectator. There has never been a Presidential candidate with which those whose business it is to shift the scenes and arrange the lights and roll the thunder-barrels of the canvass have found it harder to deal. Compared, for instance, from their point of view, with Frémont, he seems a heavy burden for manufacturers of enthusiasm to carry. Frémont's way of wearing his hair was of itself sufficient to exert a powerful influence on the popular mind, while Grant's straight, and not particularly well-kempt locks, parted low down at the side, are singularly wanting in picturesqueness. Then, Frémont's face is one of those which, particularly to women, suggest vast possibilities, and it really did suggest vast possibilities during his canvass, as was shown by the expectations entertained of him when he went West to take the command at the beginning of the war. He was confidently expected by the sentimental portion of the Republican party, although he had never set a squadron in the field, to sweep through the Confederacy like a whirlwind, and the tenacity with which the same set of enthusiasts clung to his "Body-Guard," as one of the wonders of the contest, long after the general's own military pretensions had been reduced to ashes, was a striking illustration of the kind of stuff of which political enthusiasm is made.

Moreover, Frémont had the immense advantage—we are still looking at the matter from the theatrical point of view—of resting his claims to confidence on an exploit of which few people had heard till his nomination, and the nature of which was only imperfectly understood at any time. He was sung all over the land as "The Pathfinder of the Rocky Mountains." What this was exactly not many knew, but it had an awful sound, and closed the mouths of doubters as effectually as M. Jourdain's was closed by being raised to the dignity of "Mammamouchi." Grant's exploits, on the other hand, were so well known, so long dwelt on, so familiar in our mouths, before he was presented to us as a Presidential candidate at all, that none of us is much moved or excited when he is asked to vote for the hero of Vicksburg and Chattanooga—that is, for the man who has performed two of the greatest military exploits of a century which is crowded with the greatest wars of history. It would be hard to cite a more remarkable proof of the injurious effect on reputations which the exceeding publicity of our day causes. The newspapers literally take all the polish off great names, and wear out the fame of the most famous men in half a dozen years, owing to the jaded condition to which their iteration reduces the popular faculties of wonder and admiration. There is hardly a great military name in history which would retain much of its lustre if it had been exposed to the action of the periodical press, because there has to be in all really shining and enduring fame—all fame by which the imagination is really roused—a touch of mystery. Gustavus Adolphus, Wallenstein, the First Napoleon, Nelson, and even Wellington were happy in having lived and fought before the age of newspapers, and thus leaving memories dimly seen through the fog of oral tradition, of brief despatches, of ill-compiled chronicles, and of popular songs.

In our day the whole world stands by the hero on the quarter-deck or at his headquarters, pores over the map with him, reads his reports over his shoulder, watches him changing his shirt and eating his breakfast, holds his bottles up against the light to see what liquor he drinks, debates the probable effects of alcohol on the coats of his stomach and his nervous fibre, and in two or three years has heard the story of his battles so often that nine men out of ten begin to feel as if they could have won them themselves. Tests of this kind, of course, nothing but the first order of genius can endure. The minor heroes of even the greatest contests succumb under them. We know of few things in the annals of war more pathetic than the fate of Corse, of Allatoona. He is now, we believe, a revenue assessor or collector somewhere in the West, an obscure and almost forgotten man, and yet had he done in any of the great European campaigns what he did in Sherman's he would have been raised to lasting eminence. He held through a long day, with a handful of men, a position, on the retention of which Sherman's fortunes depended, against the assaults of a whole army, and this not as a solitary and unlooked-for display of resolution, but as the legitimate result of a faithful and dauntless character, for Sherman, when he saw from the heights of Kenesaw the smoke of battle round Allatoona, said he felt no anxiety, for he knew that Corse was there.

We are, and always have been, however, of the number of those who have not been troubled about the absence of enthusiasm about Grant personally, and for two reasons. One is, that we look on the qualities which do most to arouse enthusiasm, in the politician's sense of the word, as defects in a Presidential candidate; and the other is, that the rapid growth of the community in intelligence, experience, and self possession has made enthusiasm unnecessary for the winning of political victories. It is one of the unpleasant but suggestive truths of history, that the very worst enemies of the human race have been those who commanded most popular enthusiasm, and that it has, on the whole, done rather more for bad than for good causes. The exploits of "popular idols" have not always resulted in much good for humanity. The history of progress is, in fact, the history of the growing supremacy of reason over the affairs of men, of the relegation of feeling to the background, of the appearance of judgment as sovereign in fields once wholly given up to passion. Perhaps the most striking and significant feature of the American Revolution was the conduct of it by a silent, methodical, repelling-mannered man, who carried on war as a disagreeable business, and eagerly abandoned affairs of state for the raising of tobacco. It is difficult to avoid seeing in the selection of another man of a similar character for the place once held by Washington, at this second great crisis in the national affairs, an indication that his type of character is, after all, that which occupies the highest and most permanent place in the popular mind, and that after sixty years of gushing, noisy, "magnetic" politicians, with tears in their eyes for every woe, a long yarn for every passenger, and an empty harangue for every stump, the kind of public man whom, after all, most Americans would like to see their sons imitate, is a man like Washington or Grant, who has done much and said little, and to whom the effects of his acts on his "prospects" are amongst the last and least of considerations.

One other thing tells powerfully in Grant's favor, and that is the rapid growth not of this community only, but of all civilized communities, in those qualities which come with age in the individual man, that is, in distrust of mere sentiment in the management of affairs, and in the habit of weighing consequences and balancing pros and cons. The saying of Fletcher of Saltoun, which magazine writers have so long delighted to quote, "Let me make a people's songs, and I care not who makes their laws," has become, in fact, utterly worthless, considered as an epigrammatic statement of the proposition that the world is governed rather by sentiment than by reason. Nations cannot now be governed by songs. He who seeks to rule men in our day must convince them, not simply move them. Poetry itself, in becoming more metaphysical, shows the depth of the change which has come over the modern world. The same remark may be made of the popular novel, which perhaps more than any other species of literature influences popular thought. Even popular amusements grow more and more intellectual. Those which appealed wholly to the feelings have almost died out. Convivial songs, as we remarked the other day, which played so prominent a part in society in the last century, are no longer heard, or, if heard, the singing of them is looked on as a species of buffoonery. In fact, human character in the civilized world takes everywhere a graver cast, and the effect of the change is naturally seen more distinctly in politics than in any other field of human activity. The chanting, weeping voter, carrying "the great statesman" on his shoulders, or following him blindly to the polls and hanging on his lips round the stump, is a spectacle which grows daily less and less familiar even to the mind's eye. In a few years more he will take his place in his historical niche, in the same row with the lord and serf, a creature of this world no longer. Even in the campaign now pending one sees in the speeches of the orators abundant signs that they are conscious of his vanishing. The vast majority of the addresses are argumentative to a degree never known before; personalities and clap-trap have never in any other campaign played so small a part; calm, unimpassioned appeals to the reason have never played so great a one; and this novel character of the oratory is made all the more striking by the fact that the contest follows close on a bloody war, and that the leaders on both sides are largely men who were conspicuous on opposing sides on the battle-field.

MR. WHITTIER ON "CAMPAIGN SONGS."

To the Editor of the Nation:

No one feels more deeply than myself the importance of securing a Republican victory at the coming election. What little I can do to effect it shall be done. But I have written no song for the campaign, and shall write none. In the first place, I believe other and more practical appliances are needed. Nothing short of the harp of Orpheus, which "drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek," could exorcise or charm to sleep the evil spirits of Democracy. In the second place, I could not write a song if I tried.

The lines quoted in the Nation of the 10th inst. are simply garbled extracts from a poem, not a song, written at the close of the Mexican war, and the "crisis" to which they refer was the then pending question whether slavery should be held to its original limits or extended over a continent. Judging from the passages quoted, somebody has been very freely manipulating the text, interpolating and altering it without scruple, until, like the Palmer in "Marmion,"

> "The very mother that him bare
> Would not have known her child."

If the editor of the Nation will take the trouble to look at the poem itself, herewith enclosed, he will, I think, unhesitatingly acquit me of any intention of song-writing, and perhaps conclude that his critical shrewdness was a little at fault in not giving me the benefit of a doubt.

Amesbury, 11th, Ninth Month, 1868. John G. Whittier.

[We make whatever apology is proper for not recognizing our old acquaintance, "The Crisis," when it turned up as a campaign song. There certainly was a familiar look about it—indeed, that was commented on by the critic—but the mutilation of the fragment which alone was given prevented perfect recognition. This happened all the more easily that it was found, in the shape in which we published it, in a collection purporting to contain only the poetry of this campaign—a collection first printed some three or four weeks ago in the Herald. As for Mr. Whittier's incapacity for song-writing, we do not quite assent to his opinion. True songs he would not attempt, probably, but much of his poetry is fit for chanting, so to speak; indeed, "chants itself," and was perfectly well adapted for use in past campaigns.—Ed. Nation.]

GENERAL BUTLER AT THE WORCESTER CONVENTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Will you permit me to say that I think you have attached altogether too much importance to General Butler's course at the Massachusetts Convention, and, indeed, have taken a wrong view of it? As the public eye is no little on General Butler, his position ought not to be mistaken.

At the Worcester Convention, General Butler had two objects to effect. In both these he not only failed, but signally, conspicuously, and confessedly failed. His first point was to prevent the Convention from taking any action upon the subject of the payment of the bonds. To this end, he made three speeches, one the night before and two at the Convention. In neither of them did he venture to defend or even to state his position. In all three of them he urged that no action be had on the subject. To this he bent all his force. He was personally well enough received by an audience of two thousand persons, delegates and lookers-on; but what was the result? The result was that the Committee on Resolutions introduced the strongest resolution in favor of the payment of the bonds that any Convention has passed yet. It calls for payment "in gold and silver," and denounces the payment in greenbacks as "a fraud on those who trusted the country." A chairman was appointed to introduce the resolutions, who, it was known, was prepared to defend this resolution if attacked by General Butler. When read, this resolution drew out special applause. General Butler made no attempt to object to it on any ground, and it passed with no opposing voice. General Butler may have found consolation in the newspaper reporter's "tremendous applause" at his hard hits on the Democrats, but he totally failed in all he cared about, and knew it, and the whole Convention knew it.

His other object was to secure the nomination of his co-laborer, Dr. Loring, for Governor. In this, too, he met with a decided and rather a mortifying defeat. To secure this nomination he made a speech the night before at the meeting so much looked to to influence the action of the next day. This speech was a failure. He made a mistake of judgment, which was taken full advantage of by the gentlemen who followed him, and it was felt that General Butler lost prestige. The next day, one of his two speeches was to withdraw his candidate. This is not all. He was obliged to admit in terms that he withdrew him absolutely, with no compromise, and because he could not be chosen. If he had done less, a ballot would have been demanded.

Now this was the position of General Butler. He lost prestige. He was a humbler man when he left the Convention than when he came to it. He saw that he had no support of any consequence, either in character or numbers, for his position on finance, or for his candidate. He made his third speech to recover credit, in the State and abroad. In that he talked only on matters as to which Republicans had no difference, and talked well enough, and gave no opportunity for reply. And the truth is, the majority felt that it was a kindness to give him applause on those points, as he was down on the others.

Any fair-minded person present will corroborate my statement. I do not wish to see éclat given to General Butler by the Nation to which he is not entitled, and his failure turned into a triumph, merely because he spoke loud and often. Massachusetts.

ABSTRACT RIGHT OF COPYRIGHT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

I have read diligently such arguments as have fallen in my way in favor of international copyright, including your own, and regret to find myself unsatisfied. I say regret, because in a modest way my own affinities are with the literary guild, and it is more comfortable to find one's self agreeing with one's class; and besides, I own to being a little staggered by the weight of respectable opinion that seems to set that way. Still, without being satisfied, I do not dogmatize on the other side, but should like a better statement of the whole ground, such as no doubt you may be able to present.

In the first place, I demur to the assumption of the abstract justice of the case by which you appear to me desirous to foreclose all argument. If a point of abstract right is to be assumed on either side, I hold it should be the abstract right of mankind, or of the community, to the best service that any man can give—especially the best intellectual service that any man can give. To take an extreme case, an English physician states that at any given time there are from twenty-five to thirty thousand cancer patients in Great Britain. If any man, at any outlay of genius or skill, should discover a remedy for that disorder, it would be a crime against humanity to monopolize the discovery for his private gain. And this view of the case is enforced not by statute, perhaps, but at any rate by the professional code, which denounces a secret remedy as empiricism or imposture. Now, when we are dealing with the abstract right of the case, this point of professional honor or morals gives, I think, the true ground of judgment which should apply, if it were possible, in every line of genius, science, or educated skill. I entirely accept, as to this, the doctrine of Comte, that the man is to be regarded only as the limb, or servant of humanity, and under an absolute obligation to do it the best service he can. And in this view—as long as we stand on the ground of abstract right—absolute free-trade in thought, and in all the highest productions of thought, is the real ground for us to occupy. At least, I still wait to be convinced of the contrary.

And so it is not till we come from the ground of abstract right to the service to the need of the service itself, that the argument for copyright fairly comes in. That is, it is purely a matter of expediency or public interest. Comte himself denied both the right and the expediency, appealing to his own example in giving his own immense labors as a free gift to the public. In this particular instance it was only the gift of a moderate debt to his publisher; and so it may not be thought to add much to the force of his argument. But—till further advised—this seems to me the only safe and right ground for a copyright-law at all: to give every author, or thinker, or inventor a sufficient inducement to do his very best work for the public, and a reasonable security against pecuniary loss. When the law has done this, it has done, I consider, all that the law can be justly called on to do. And it is quite indifferent whether it does this by copyright, patent-right, pension, bounty, or special commission—as to an artist, or to a corps of scientific explorers. The business of the legislator, as representing the interest of the public, is to secure the very best result from the intellectual force and training actually extant in the community. Doubtless he secures this most conveniently and cheaply on the whole, and with least odium or scandal, by the temporary monopoly of a copyright. And this I hold to be the only tenable ground on which any copyright-law at all can be defended.

Again, the efficiency of a law to secure its object is the only test, I admit, of its sufficiency. Whether an international copyright is desirable or not, justifiable or not, depends purely, I think, on whether the monopoly under a single government is a sufficient protection or encouragement to develop the best mental activity of the people under it. In Belgium, for instance, a kingdom only as large as Vermont, it clearly was not enough. So Belgium developed little or no native genius, and was a sharp thorn besides to the French publishing interest; and an international copyright treaty was fairly justified by the peculiar case. England and America offer a very different state of things. Either of them, singly, offers the largest reading public in the world, with the possible exception of Germany; and the statistics of authorship seem to show that the existing laws offer all the encouragement that can be decently or righteously claimed. That there are irregularities in the book-trade which need the attention of our law-makers, I am not in the least disposed to deny: I take Mr. Parton's word for it. That some form of international copyright may not even yet prove the only way to deal with them, I am not qualified to dispute. But I have yet to see any statement of the case which should satisfy me of the expediency or the essential justice of subjecting the commerce of thought between the two countries to the conditions which either might impose, or of sacrificing the public advantage and convenience to abstract and imaginary claims.

One other consideration was suggested by the last article I saw in the Nation upon this subject. It was, if I remember correctly, recommended to authors to take very high ground of personal rights in urging the matter upon legislators—to complain, in short, of having been systematically defrauded of a just claim in all past legislation. The virtual claim for damages thus presented seems to me to offer a very fair illustration of the bog we shall run into if we persist in arguing this question on abstract grounds. I do not know how it would be legally; but, in justice, surely the claims of longest standing are the ones that should be settled first; and a claim of so lofty a nature as this is asserted to be, I suppose, could never be outlawed. To say nothing of the suits for damages that might be brought from the heirs of Shakespeare, or Milton, or of the translators of the Bible (if any are now alive), it is a little hazardous—is n't it?—to admit in advance our liability for the enormous bill for arrears sure to be presented by the family of Thackeray, and the living Dickens and Reade.

Ann Arbor, Michigan, September 9, 1868. A.

["A." can hardly have read attentively what has appeared in the Nation on this subject. We have not argued it anywhere from the point of view of "abstract right." What we have said is, that a man's property in his writings rests on the same basis as his property in his house, and is entitled to the same protection from society. What that basis is we have not discussed, though we have not the slightest objection to state what we think about it at the proper time. We have said, moreover, that in our opinion the reason why people fancy that property in books is peculiar, is that the means required for its protection are peculiar—it being the only kind of property which cannot be protected without giving the owner a monopoly. We, too, accept Comte's doctrine, that "the man is the limb, or servant of humanity, and is under an obligation to do it the best service he can," but we deny emphatically that legislators are bound to enforce this obligation by penal legislation, or by the refusal of protection for the fruits of a man's labor. I am bound to use my fortune as well as my ideas for the benefit of my fellow-men; but it would be in the highest degree inexpedient and tyrannical for the magistrate to step in and regulate my expenditure to that end; and yet this is substantially what society does to the author when it refuses him a copyright, or at the end of a certain period delivers his books to be scrambled for by the reading public. It would undoubtedly be a very fine thing if every man were to use all the money he accumulates, over and above what is necessary to furnish a comfortable maintenance for himself and his family, in works of public utility; but it only needs a very little study of history and of human nature to teach us that if men were compelled by law to do this, it would simply result in fatal injury to civilization and the drying up of the fountains of charity. The business of the legislator is no doubt "to secure the very best results from the intellectual force and training extant in the community," but the experience of mankind and the principles of human nature both teach us that he is doing this most effectually when he is providing ample security for all species of property. In fact, the provision of security is the great end of civil society. Attempts to justify the practice of stealing authors' writings, selling them, and pocketing the money, on high humanitarian grounds, strike us as closely resembling the old Southern mode of justifying the slave-trade, by alleging the desirableness of bringing "the benighted African under the benign influence," etc.

The last article in the Nation on this subject did advise authors "to take very high ground of personal right in urging the matter on legislators;" but that an inconvenient claim for mesne profits might be based on this ground is an objection which we confess did not occur to us, and does not now strike us as very forcible. The answer is, when the heirs of Milton and Shakespeare and of the translators of the Bible, and the families of Dickens and Thackeray, bring in their bill, we shall not pay it, and shall leave them to their legal remedy, which we suspect they will not easily find. Moreover, the argument, that if we acknowledge the existence of an abuse, those who have suffered from it will start up and claim damages, is one which might be used against all reform. If you cheapen and quicken justice, for instance, you are bound, it might be said, to compensate those who have suffered from the law's costliness and delays.—Ed. Nation.]

MARINI'S PROCESS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In No. 158 of the Nation, current series, a very interesting letter from Florence, descriptive of Prof. Marini's wonderful discoveries in the mummification and petrifaction of animal tissues, was published. Since that time, in No. 26 of Vol. XV. of the Friend, a publication of the Society of Friends, I have stumbled upon a description of a similar process of petrifaction, which I thought might interest some of your readers. The paper from which I copy the article was published in Philadelphia, in February, 1842. I do not know, but suppose that Dr. Valentine Mott was the author of the "Travels" from which it was quoted. As an instance of the periodicity of invention it is certainly curious.

"CHEMICAL PROCESS OF PETRIFYING HUMAN FLESH.

"The most novel and piquant treat of all others to me, in the beautiful capital of Florence, was my several visits to Signor Sigate, a scientific gentleman possessed of a wonderful art, unique and unknown to all the world beside.

"Incredible, if not marvellous, as it may seem, he had discovered a chemical process by which he could actually petrify in a very short time every animal substance, preserving permanently and with minute accuracy its form and internal texture, and in such a state of stony hardness that it could be sawed into slabs and elegantly polished!

"He had in this way formed a museum of various animals, such as frogs, fishes, toads, snakes, and a great variety of parts of the human body in a natural and diseased state. In my presence he threw the human liver, lungs, heart, and other parts thus petrified about the floor with perfect impunity and without the least injury being done to them.

"Still more curious, he had, with Italian taste, cut them into small polished squares and arranged them into complete tables of mosaic work, so that it gave him as much delight as it did me astonishment to find that I could with my finger designate to him on this precious centre-table for a surgeon's drawing-room the appropriate name and character of each individual object thus spread out before me in a pathological chart of real specimens.

"Thus a pulmonary tubercle or ulcer here, a hydatid of the liver there, a cicatrix in the brain in another compartment, and a calculus in the kidney or ossification of the heart's auricles and valves in a fourth.

"It struck me that for all anatomical and surgical purposes and all objects of natural history this was an art of inappreciable value, and the most desirable ever discovered; and with that view I conversed with him relative to a visit to our country, believing it would be of national importance if we could have the benefit of his services. I even entered into some preliminaries of a negotiation, with the design of obtaining him for my own purposes, but I found him sadly involved in debt, and that his demands were too exorbitant to be complied with.

"I, however, made him liberal offers, and did not entirely despair that he would have acceded to them, when, to my regret, about three weeks after we left Florence, I was informed by letter that he was suddenly attacked with a violent inflammation of the lungs which proved fatal, and, what is as much to be deplored, that his unprecedented discovery died with him. He never would divulge the least part of his marvellous process, but when pressed by me on the subject, hinted that he had acquired it in his various journeys in remote Eastern countries; and it is to be fondly hoped that some one may ere long appear who, in pursuing this enquiry, will be enabled to recover the art among those people from whom he intimated he had obtained it.

"It is worthy of observation how, in this extraordinary process, art accomplishes in so short a time what nature requires so long a period to effect, and then never with anything comparable to the perfection, we may say almost identity, with which the mode preserves an exact fac-simile of the original—in fact, the original itself. In this surprising and almost magic art not only, as we have said, the precise exterior outline is faithfully and exactly represented, but also the most minute and delicate interior arrangement of structure admirably perpetuated; as, for example, the entire viscera of the chest and abdomen, with all their varied and beautiful convolutions, were clearly exhibited, retaining even the colors of the blood-vessels in preparations of frogs, birds, and other animals, besides the human body.— Dr. Mott's Travels."

LITERARY.

During this month Ticknor & Fields will publish these works: "What Answer? A Story of To-day," by Miss Anna E. Dickinson; "Smoking and Drinking," by James Parton; "Yes and Perhaps," a new volume of stories by Edward Everett Hale; "Plain Thoughts on the Art of Living," by Washington Gladden, who is, we believe, a clergyman, and an essayist in the Springfield Republican. In October, the same house will issue several poetical works, but it announces one book, "Halpine's Poems," which, according to the Citizen, is to be published by Harper & Brothers, and by "no New England house." To the "diamond" editions of favorite authors a "Scott" is to be added. "Locksley Hall" is to appear in a small quarto with nineteen illustrations, by Mr. W. J. Hennessy, and we are to have a new book of poetry by Longfellow—"The New England Tragedies," of which none has yet appeared in print. "The Atlantic Almanac for 1869" will also appear in October, and in the same month we are to have the long-promised "Passages from the American Note Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne." In the month of November another often announced book will appear—Browning's new narrative poem, and a new volume of poems by Lowell. "Saul," a Dramatic Poem, by Charles Heavysege, is, we presume, the Canadian poem with that title which Doctor Holmes in the Atlantic some years ago praised highly, being therein very kind. The author of that "Saul" has since been writing other scriptural poetry for the New Dominion Monthly; we remember a poem founded on the story of Jezebel, which, if it did not quite exhaust the capabilities of that great subject, was yet not without an occasional strong passage. "Dramatic" poems, however, we are not likely to get from Mr. Heavysege. Lucy Larcom, too, is to be published in November, appearing as a poet; "The Diary and Correspondence of Henry Crabbe Robinson" is to be published from advance sheets; there is to be a "Red Line Whittier," complete, with illustrations; there is to be a new book—"The Gates Ajar"—by Miss E. Stuart Phelps; a new book by Mrs. Stowe, which is to be called "Old Town Folks;" and a new Longfellow's "Hyperion," which, with twenty-four photographs of the Rhine, Switzerland, and the Tyrol, cannot help but be a very charming book for all young gentlemen and ladies, to say nothing of all people who remember having been such.——"On the Wing" is an illustrated book for youthful sportsmen. "The Flower and the Star" is a juvenile book written and illustrated by Mr. W. J. Linton. "The King's Lily and Rosebud" is by Mrs. Diaz, and "Cast Away in the Cold" is a story of adventures in the ice by Dr. Hayes. This is certainly a promising list of books.——Messrs. Porter & Coates, of Philadelphia, announce new editions, illustrated by Mr. F. O. C. Darley, of "The Scottish Chiefs" and "The Children of the Abbey."——Messrs. Harper & Brothers announce "Theatrical Management in the South and West for Thirty Years," by Mr. Sol Smith, a retired actor.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce the speedy appearance in book form of Mrs. Davis's "Dallas Galbraith."——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton announce "Poems," by Mr. John James Piatt, and a series of plays with the general title, "The Standard Drama, as Performed by Edwin Booth." Each play will be published separately. The same firm have just achieved an enviable stroke in engaging Hans Christian Andersen as a regular contributor to their Riverside Magazine, which now will have to be read by the elders of the household as well as by the children, who long have had excellent reason to delight in it. Mr. Andersen's stories begin with the November number. The announcements of "juveniles" begin to be very numerous, but it is hardly necessary for us to mention such as we do not review. As a rule, neither the names of the books nor of the authors convey any intelligence to the reader.

—We have received the "Prospectus of the Philadelphia School of Design for Women," for the school year commencing September 14, 1868, from which we gather that the school has been in operation for twenty-five years; and inasmuch as we find among its recent benefactors some of the most philanthropic and liberal citizens of Philadelphia, we conclude that it has served and is serving a useful purpose, and is worthy to be sustained. "The courses of instruction pursued in the school," we are told on page 10, "have for their object the systematic training of young women in the practice of art, and in the knowledge of its scientific principles, with the view of qualifying them to impart to others a careful art-education, and to develop its application to the common uses of life, and its relation to the requirements of trade and manufactures." And at the termination of the elementary studies, it appears from page 15, "the student will be conducted through whatever special branch of practical art she may possess the aptitude for. These branches consist of pattern designing, lithography, landscape, and figure painting in oil, etc.," instruction not differing much, we apprehend, from that given at the Cooper Union in this city. So much depends on the teachers that we are not disposed to criticise the course laid down in this programme, nor do we mean to say that it is faulty. We hope, however, we shall not be accused of unfriendliness if we say that we have been somewhat amused by the catalogue of the "art studies" of the school, at least by the description of the casts, and the typographical and historical errors contained in them. The Apollo Belvedere, for instance, is said to have been found at Rettuno, near Rome, where Porto d'Anzo should be read; and a knowledge of some recent important discoveries concerning this statue might have prevented the quoting of high-flown laudation, such as Winckelmann set the example of. One has only to know that the Belvedere is a feeble copy of a Greek original, the head of which has probably been found, and, although mutilated, far surpasses the head of the complete statue, to place a proper value on Sir R. Westmacott's dictum, p. 22: "The head of the Apollo conveys more instruction than any other in existence; and he who is fully acquainted with and capable of producing an exact imitation of the head (and the same may be said of the feet), may say he is thoroughly grounded in the grammar of his art." And in the next catalogue we hope it will be pointed out that the left fore-arm is a wholly mistaken restoration, and that instead of walking in one direction, looking in another, and shooting in a third, the god is holding a Medusa-head (ægis) above the hosts whom he is called to smite, as on the plains on Troy, or at Delphi, when the Gauls under Brennus were routed with great portents of thunder and lightning and the falling of rocks.

—We would contribute something towards furnishing Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, with a copy of Professor Domenico Berti's "Vita di Giordano Bruno da Nola," an historical character whose acquaintance the archbishop first made when driven to the encyclopædia by Rev. Mr. Vickers in their late controversy. We owe this valuable work to Professor Berti's sagacious inference from a letter discovered by Ranke, that unknown documents probably existed in the dei Frari archives at Venice. Thither accordingly he went in 1858, and in January, 1862, succeeded in obtaining a copy of the entire proceedings against Bruno, valuable not so much for the light thrown on the inquisitorial trial as for contemporary testimony concerning the previous life of the accused, and his own narrative or autobiography. The author has thus been enabled to correct many dates and fill many gaps in Bruno's history as hitherto written, particularly supplying the date of his birth (1548), which was before obscure, and an account never before given of the thirteen years between 1563 and 1576, embracing his novitiate and entrance into the priesthood, in both of which stages it now appears that his heretical tendencies subjected him to investigations; and the second was so serious that it occasioned his flight from Naples to Rome, the beginning of those restless wanderings which were to end in the latter city at the stake. It was there also that he resumed his baptismal name of Filippo. At Geneva he corrected proof for a living. At Toulouse he obtained the doctorate which entitled him to teach in all the universities of Europe, according to the custom of that time—another fact of which his biographers have been ignorant. Professor Berti also reveals the cause of Bruno's quitting Würtemberg, which was the death of the Elector Augustus and the predominance of the Calvinists in that city. Finally, how Bruno was induced to leave Frankfort for Venice is clearly explained, and the infamy of his betrayal fixed upon Giovanni Mocenigo, who had invited him to become his teacher, then accused him before the Inquisition, and even arrested him in advance of orders in his own house. All his books and writings on hand were seized, including two works, one on the "Predicaments of God," the other on the "Seven Liberal Arts," which Berti suspects to be in the archives of Rome. Sentence of extradition was pronounced upon him January 7, 1593. His execution was delayed for seven years (February 17, 1600). Professor Berti purposes treating in a separate work of the philosophy of Bruno.

—The life of another great Italian, Giovanni Battista Vico, has been rewritten, and better than by any previous biographer, by Professor Carlo Cantoni (Turin, 1867). Vico may be justly regarded as the father of modern philology, since he first pointed out the service which the study of language would afford to the understanding of history, and made practical application of his theory. He anticipated Wolf, Niebuhr, and Mommsen (in Roman history, particularly as to the struggles between patricians and plebeians), and Müller in mythology, and his rank as an original thinker is constantly rising the more his works are read. The poverty under which he labored, and the sacrifices which he made in getting his writings published, render his life a sadly interesting one.

—An Austrian statistician, with an Italian-looking name, Brachelli, has written a work on the various peoples of Austria, and in it he gives the proportion which the races bear to each other. The table, for which, of course, we cannot vouch, illustrates the heterogeneous composition of the empire very well. In every thousand, then, 254 are Germans, 186 Cechs and Slovacks, 154 (perhaps too little?) Magyars, 85 Ruthenians, 83 Croats and Serbs, 82 Wallachs, 68 Poles, 34 Slovens, 32 Israelites, 16 Italians, and 6 not classified.

—About's theory in regard to desiccation, as laid down in his curious and amusing story, "The Man with the Broken Ear," is now being illustrated by the experiments of a Mr. Bert, of whom we know only the name, and that he made the following experiment: He dried a rat's tail under the bell of an air-pump, and in immediate proximity to concentrated sulphuric acid, so as to deprive it gradually of all moisture. Then, for what reason is not stated, he put it into a hermetically-sealed glass tube, in which it remained four or five days. Next, he put it into a stove, where he subjected it for some hours to a temperature of 98° centigrade, and subsequently sealed it up a second time in the tube. "Four days more having elapsed," says the Medical and Surgical Reporter, "he united this tail by its cut extremity to the freshly cut stump of a living healthy rat and quietly awaited the result." The tail soon—we are not told how soon—began to expand and perform all "the natural duties of a tail"—and one other, we may add; namely, that of supporting the doctrine that what we call life is function. Three months afterwards the unfortunate rat was compelled to assist at a second amputation, and Mr. Bert proved conclusively that the once desiccated tail was furnished with all proper vessels, and was a living part of the second rat.

MR. T. H. KEY'S PHILOLOGICAL ESSAYS.*

ENGLISH philologists have in time past been very ready to acknowledge their inferiority to the Germans in the details of erudition, being content to claim for themselves—and with good right—that their own scholarship was at any rate more elegant, and exempt from pedantic trifling. So each school possessed its own points of superiority. Of late, however, each has been encroaching somewhat on the other's domains. The Germans, under the lead of Boeckh and Ottfried Müller, have learned to impart a genuine vitality to their ponderous and precise erudition, and the best of them fall noways behind the English in practical and appreciative treatment of scholastic subjects. The English, too, have entered the field of minute investigation—in which, indeed, the memory of the great Bentley would forbid them to feel themselves intruders—and men like Donaldson and Key are rapidly giving their countrymen a wider reputation for exact scholarship.

It must be confessed that the task of the Germans is easier than that of the English. The patient fidelity in the smallest details which is characteristic of the German school, is the only possible preparation for a broad and generous comprehension of great truths. But the mind which has become habituated to general principles alone, and the elegancies rather than the accuracies of scholarship, is impatient of the dry and tedious labor its new undertaking demands of it, and is prone to hasty generalizations and inconclusive reasonings. Again, the English scholars lack the peculiar advantage of the division of labor which the Germans enjoy. The work of philological inquiry is, on the Continent, so thoroughly systematized, every step taken is so exactly appreciated and noted, and the whole army of inquirers is so thoroughly imbued with one spirit, and so used to a practical co-operation with one another at every step, that there is in the long run no labor wasted, because every one knows just what has been already done and especially what needs to be done next. The English scholar, on the other hand, is half the time working in the dark, doing over again what has already been done before, and often announces at last, as the results of his own investigation, points that were long ago admitted—or, it may be, rejected—on the Continent, or even in England. Thus Mr. Key, in the present volume, p. 151, gravely announces, as the fruit of his own reasoning and reading, that atque properly means "and what is more"—a definition which he might have found in nearly the same words in the very first lesson of so common a school text-book as Arnold's "Latin Prose Composition."

There is much, therefore, in these essays which is neither new nor important, especially many of Mr. Key's ingenious derivations seem as farfetched as any of those he criticises in Bopp and his followers. As most of these are points of the most recondite nature, we will pass over all the preliminary essays to the closing one: "Quæritur. The Sanskrit Language as the Basis of Linguistic Science; and the Labors of the German School in that Field—are they not overvalued?" Here is a fundamental and vital discussion touching the whole science of linguistics. Unfortunately Mr. Key, although Professor of Comparative Grammar, confesses himself wholly ignorant of Sanskrit; so that, however well argued his case may be, it is impossible it should receive full credit—even perhaps all that belongs to it.

In the first part of this article are contained doubts in regard to the etymologies derived from primitive roots by the critical method of philological analysis. The writer objects to the "excessive generality" with which words are derived by Bopp from roots of various forms, but with the one meaning "to go." And in the postscript, after reading an article in the North American Review (October, 1867), which he ascribes "to a distinguished professor of Yale College," he says, p. 310, "I rise with the satisfactory feeling that my inquiry into the doings of German Sanskritists has not been in vain." This feeling would perhaps have somewhat abated if Mr. Key had read the following passage from Professor Whitney's eleventh lecture on linguistic science, p. 398, in which the principle of Bopp's derivations is stated in the most decided terms:

> "We have seen that the final perfection of the noblest languages has been the result of a slow and gradual development, under the impulse of tendencies, and through the instrumentality of processes, which are even yet active in every living tongue; that all this wealth has grown by long accumulation out of an original poverty; and that the actual germs of language were a scanty list of formless roots, representing a few of the most obvious sensible acts and phenomena appearing in ourselves, our fellow-creatures, and the nature by which we are surrounded."

In Part II. Mr. Key denounces the title "Schrift- und Laut-System" of the opening chapter in Bopp's "Vergleichende Grammatik," as unphilosophical, viz., "the precedence given to writing over sound." Mr. Key seems to forget that Bopp had to deal with languages which, by the means of "writing" only, have come down to our time, and that the writing, the "Schrift" in which the "sound" is embodied, must be precedent to the sound. The written symbols must be the starting point of the linguist. And we believe that Prof. Czermak's apparatus, to show the action of the chordæ vocales, sustain Bopp's theory of the original vowels (Urvocale, a, i, u), and no etymologist will differ from Bopp's proposition.

Mr. Key says, p. 277, that Bopp's "definition of the Semitic family as one having dissyllabic roots is at variance with the doctrine, now maintained by many of the first Hebrew scholars, that these apparent roots are, in truth, secondary forms." This assertion shows that the author of "Quæritur" is not acquainted with the state of the question concerning the triliteral (dissyllabic) Hebrew roots. No Hebrew scholar can deny that there actually exist triliteral Hebrew roots, and Ewald rightly observed that etymologies, to reduce the triliteral roots to biliteral, must go back beyond the historical age of Semitic forms (see "Whitney's Lectures," p. 301). During the seventeenth century the reduction of the triliteral Hebrew roots to biliteral ones was proposed for the first time, and afterwards the heads of the critical Hebrew school, Gesenius and Ewald, hinted that by succeeding in this reduction we could, perhaps, find some radical affinity between Hebrew and Sanskrit. Klaproth made the attempt, but did not succeed (1828). Nor did E. Meyer, in his "Hebräisches Wurzel-Wörterbuch" (1845), succeed in solving that great problem of reducing the triliteral Hebrew roots to biliteral. In 1838 and 1840 two masters of the Hebrew tongue, Fürst, of Leipzig (himself a Jew), and Delitzsch, of Halle, endeavored to break down the wall of partition between the Japhetic and Semitic languages. But overlooking the facts of Egyptian philology, revealed by Champollion's grammar and Dr. Lepsius's Coptic researches, they did not come to any convincing result. The link between the Japhetic and Semitic languages has been found in the Egyptian (Coptic) language. Though comparative philology leads irresistibly to the assumption that the Semitic languages started from biliteral roots, and the Egyptian monuments prove that the triliteral form is only the consequence of a comparatively late and peculiar organic development, there exist triliteral forms which cannot be reduced to a biliteral root. It may be here mentioned that on the Behistun inscription there have been found over twenty triliteral roots of the ancient Chaldee. According to such a state of the question, Bopp's definition of the Semitic family as one having dissyllabic roots is perfectly right. Compare Bunsen's "Philosophy of Universal History, Applied to Language and Religion," vol. i., p. 172, et seq.

In the distribution of languages into classes, Bopp called the Chinese language monosyllabic. Mr. Key, pp. 276 and 277, says: "The author appears to have been led astray by the consideration of written language. No doubt the Chinese is to the eye monosyllabic. To the ear not so; for it is well known to those who have learnt to speak the language in China itself, that it abounds in dissyllabic and polysyllabic words, whose unity, as with us, is denoted by the possession of a single accent. Thus Bopp is simply wrong in his statement of facts about the Chinese language." Here we must simply say of Mr. Key, "si tacuisset, philosophus mansisset." For by monosyllabic Bopp did not understand a language in which the speaker feels every syllable as a distinct sound, expressive of a distinct meaning, but only a language which by a very easy analysis can be reduced to monosyllabic elements. Compare W. D. Whitney's "Lectures on Language," Lect. VII., p. 257, where he says: "One tongue, the Chinese—as we shall see more particularly further on (in the ninth lecture)—has never advanced out of its primitive monosyllabic stage; its words remain even to the present day simple radical syllables, closely resembling the Indo-European roots, formless, not in themselves parts of speech, but made such only by their combination into sentences, where the connection and the evident requirements of the sense show in what signification and relation each is used."

There are some other points in which Mr. Key has exhibited a rash judgment, but it will be unnecessary to dwell upon them in order to show that he will be alone in his conviction, that his readers will not so readily give their assent to such propositions as the following: "Prof. Max Müller tells us (lectures, p. 147), that 'his (Bopp's) work will form for ever the safe and solid foundation of comparative philology.'" We would only add that it will be of little consequence whether or not Mr. Key and his readers acknowledge Max Müller's proposition, and that during reading the article "Quæritur" we were all the while reminded of Schiller's verse:

THE MAGAZINES FOR OCTOBER.

Putnam's for this month opens with two good articles; indeed, the scrap of poetry that comes between "Up and Down Mont Blanc, by a New York Merchant," and "Sainte-Beuve, the Critic," is not so bad that we might not say that the magazine begins with three good articles. The New York merchant, whoever he is, has reason to be proud of his literary success. So far as we know, nothing in the way of describing the ascent of Mont Blanc has ever been done nearly so well as his description. Aside from the pleasure that one gets from the vividness of the description, there is pleasure in noting how much of a New Yorker and a merchant the writer was even among the Alps, impressive as the Alps were to him. By a dozen touches he makes us know that while he was there Wall Street, or "the corner of Church and Leonard," was in Switzerland. "Sainte-Beuve as a Critic" is a careful article, which will be read with pleasure and profit. Sainte-Beuve, as a man, is not dealt with. Considering him in the only aspect in which it is worth while to regard him, the essay before us is not too eulogistic. For other articles Putnam's has a clever and readable discourse upon "Mine Oyster," of which the Crustaceous Tourist of Blackwood's of old need not have been ashamed; a pleasant piece of verse entitled "The Maple Tree;" an intelligent article on Puseyism and Ritualism —"The Protestant Protest against Protestantism;" a sensible talk about "University Life in Germany;" another, and we hope a final, instalment of "Too True: a Story of To-day;" half-a-dozen other pieces of more or less degrees of readability; two good book notices, and some very good "Table-Talk." Altogether, we have not heretofore seen a Putnam's that one might so well buy and read.

In Lippincott's, as usual, the best thing is the "Monthly Gossip," which always contains literary intelligence of interest. This month it is more varied and valuable than common. Thackeray is popularly believed to have been only second to Macaulay in knowledge of the Augustan—Anne-Augustan—age of English literature, and, according to Sidney Smith, Macaulay would find his proper hell after death in being compelled to sit silent while other condemned people loudly gave false dates for occurrences of the time of Queen Anne. But Lippincott's Monthly Gossipper says that a friend of his dining with Thackeray just after the "English Humorists" had appeared, asked him how in the world he could have written his dissertation on flogging without mention of Steele's paper in the Tatler on the same subject. Steele, like Thackeray, was a Charter-House boy. "By Jove," Thackeray said, "you don't mean to say that Steele has written on the subject? I would have given fifty pounds to have known it at the time." So Thackeray wrote about Sir Richard without making a careful study of his works—a circumstance of which Mr. Adams Hill, as next friend of Sterne, will, perhaps, not be sorry to hear. The Gossipper has a word to say, too, about the Lanterne. He was lucky enough to receive a copy of the first number that was issued after M. Rochefort's imprisonment. The sort of war that is waged by that young gentleman may be learned from this so-called epigram, which has nothing to recommend it but its possible truth and its extreme impudence. His Majesty and the Modern Diogenes are talking together:

"Emperor. Find you, O Lanterne bearer! let me ask
No one of my adherents honest—no man?
Rochefort. Alas! dread Dutchman, 'tis my harder task
In your mamma to find an honest woman!"

The coming General Council, the Gossipper learns "from a Catholic source, which he has generally found trustworthy," is going to occupy itself with four matters: first, with the reunion of the Eastern churches with the Holy See; secondly, with the improvement of the education of the clergy; thirdly, with the modernization of the religious orders, several of which will be merged into one body; fourthly, with the unsettled relations between the Church and civil governments, and with deciding what ecclesiastical claims are to be yielded and what insisted upon. All friends of Mr. Hanson and Eleazar Williams will be interested in reading a letter to the Gossipper from Dr. Samuel Jackson, who deposes and says that the late Jacob Snider—who was the executor of Mr. John Vaughan, whose brother Benjamin was a member of the English Parliament—did in 1855 show to him—Dr. Jackson—a letter written by Benjamin Vaughan at Basle, in Switzerland, in which it was said, "The little Capet is to be exchanged here in about ten days or a fortnight." It is apparent how easy it would have been to ship "the little Capet" down the river to Rotterdam, and from Rotterdam to America. It is not so apparent, however, how all this concerns the Rev. Mr. Williams.

"Dallas Galbraith" is concluded in this month's Lippincott's. We were going to say that it is, to our mind, Mrs. Davis's worst story yet. But, after all, good as they are in their way, they are all bad with the same badness, and one is not worse or better than another. "Tom, the Tinker" is a historical sketch of the "Whiskey Rebellion," which is better known by its name than its nature. The article is clumsy in style, but will be read with pleasure. Mr. Bristed writes the second and last of his papers on "The Dispute about Liberal Education," and makes remarks which, if not particularly new, are worth attention from their soundness. "Vox Populi" is of some value for its statistics of elections; and "January Searle" makes a readable article on "Woodcocks and the Killing of Them;" but, on the whole, Lippincott's for October we find neither so valuable nor so interesting as it ought to be.

In Harper's we always turn first to the "Easy Chair," having a reasonable ground of hope that the occupant of that piece of furniture will please us and instruct us. This month he talks about the unsafety—if there is such a word—of most of our theatres and public halls; about the folly of American and British Tories who are terrified at Democracy; and, finally, about the maxim that we are to say nothing of the dead unless what we are able to say is in their praise. It is a maxim, he would say, which was made in the interest of the newly dead, and which even in their case is to be obeyed only when we are in the presence of their friends. For the rest, if a man's life has been public property, so is his death also. The body of the magazine is made up of matter which, as usual, is very remarkably well adapted to the taste of the readers for whom it is designed. It is one of the wonders of journalism—the editorial management of Harper's. The number before us contains one hundred and forty-two pages. Of these about a third are taken up by four illustrated articles, the first being "Explorations in Lower California;" the second, "The Chinese Embassy to the Foreign Powers;" the third, an account—drawn from Mr. Smiles—of the labors of George and Robert Stephenson; and the fourth, several chapters of a love-story by Mrs. Craik. To give these titles is to show the skill with which the average American family's semi-literary appetite is catered for in this October number, and this number is a fair specimen of all. Following the illustrated papers there is an article on "Maximilian of Mexico;" an essay, worthy of Mr. John Burroughs, on "Our Neighbors the Birds;" an instalment of "The New Timothy," which is a novel decidedly worth reading; "The Day of My Death," which is an amusing spiritualistic sketch; "The Moonstone Mass," a well-told and better written story of the sort in which the narrator is an unconscious lunatic; a chapter out of Professor Draper's "History of the Civil War;" an account of a descent into a Pittsburg coal mine, and half a dozen other articles—altogether, a magazine that the average American family need not be ashamed to acknowledge as its own.

Mr. James Greenwood begins Hours at Home with a paper entitled "Enlisting for the British Army," in which he gives a lively sketch of Charles Street, where are the headquarters of the recruiting sergeants in London. Another lively article is concerning the katydid, an insect which seems to have very much disgusted General John A. Bolles. So also of the article on "Gift Enterprises," and that on M. Vattemare—they will be found pleasant reading; and Miss M. E. Atkinson makes some pretty verses. But we do not know that it was worth while to take "Current Poetical Coin" out of manuscript; and we are sure it would have been better to leave unprinted the laudatory notice of Randall's "Principles of Popular Education," and, indeed, all the other notices of books.

The anonymous author of "Cipher," a novel just begun in the Galaxy, is a better writer than most of our story-tellers who sign their names, but he bore on quite hard enough in marking out the figure of Mr. Gillies. The novel promises, however, to be a very good magazine novel, perhaps something more than that. "Beechdale," which is nothing more than that and is not a "healthy" story, is continued, and perhaps concluded, in this number. "John Lester Wallack" is a good eulogy of the favorite actor, but it is not to be called a discriminating criticism. Its biographical details, however, will make it welcome to theatre-goers, and most theatre-goers will not find fault with it in any respect. In fact, it is easy to pardon a little too much kindness when the criticism is of a man to whom more than to any other man of this generation, in this country at least, we owe it that such a person as the intelligent and cultivated theatre-goer is not an extinct being. Mr. Grant White is perfectly sound, let us trust, as a philologist; his "Words and Their Uses" lays down the law in a sufficiently peremptory manner. But certainly he is doing much good work. "Vittoria Colonna" is considerably better than the ordinary encyclopædia biographies of its heroine; it contains some tolerable translations of her poetry and of Michael Angelo's. The third of Dr. Hammond's series of papers on the nerves has some of the interest which a physician's talk is apt to have, but it seems to have been put together rather hastily. The Atlantic some time ago made the Convulsionists of Saint Medard familiar to all hack writers and readers of magazines; of Dr. Hammond, the greatest authority in this country, we suppose, something more might have been fairly expected than a mere statement of some of the phenomena of the case. The gentleman who writes in the Galaxy under the signature of three daggers, who wrote about Methodism, if we recollect, and afterwards about revivals, does not strike us as being a very valuable laborer in the literary field. "Is Labor a Curse?" is his theme of discourse this time. Mr. Philip Quilibet, in the "Driftwood," is entertaining and sensible, as he usually is; there is a good account of the late Mr. Elliott, the painter, and a good review of Mr. Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations" in the department of "Literature and Art," and the "Galaxy Miscellany" has three good brief articles out of four. We must not forget to mention with praise the musical little song by Mr. Weeks, which, however, seems a trifle over-subtle for singing. And there is a pestilent sadness in Mr. Weeks's poetry which we fain would see reformed—not altogether, but somewhat. On the whole, the Galaxy is light and agreeable.

The Catholic World is sometimes agreeable and sometimes light—in places—but generally it is neither, and it is never both at the same time. We think it has little or nothing in it this month that any of our readers need care to read. Yet there is a learned and not unjust review of White's "Massacre of Saint Bartholomew," and if any one wants to be disgusted with modern saints we can recommend "Maria von Mörl."

The Overland Monthly for October we have not received. The August number is the last that has come to hand, and is of a kind that will make us very willing to read its successors. Mr. F. B. Harte, apparently, is doing a good deal of the work upon the Overland, and what he does is pretty sure to be done well. To most of our readers he is probably known; to such as do not know him, we may say, that if they like Mr. Howells they will like Mr. Harte, who not at all infrequently will remind them of that charming writer. It is pleasant to see, too, that in all probability they will like him better and better the longer they know him, for he is improving. That is not a fate that usually overtakes writers who have figured in Mr. Carleton's comic library—which, perhaps, is because they are not industrious. The Overland is pervaded by a Far Western flavor which we, for our part, find very much to our taste. The most callous and blasé magazine reader will be very much pleased with "The Luck of Roaring Camp," which is one of the best magazine articles that we have read in many months, and the pathos and humor of which take it out of mere magazine writing and give it a place in literature. "In Nan-Kin" is an account, by a man who knew him, of the singular personage who was the soul of the Tai-ping rebellion, and who so nearly overthrew the Tartar supremacy in China; "The Story of an Unfortunate City" is a leaf of the strange history of our Pacific coast; "A Ride on the Texan Frontier" possesses the same kind of interest, and closes with a story fit to terrify and delight all the British tourists ever born. Imagine the "fearful joy" with which the intending book-maker, who had his fellow-islanders to astonish and his own skin to keep uninjured, would go through this experience. It should first be said that the travelling party, after shouting themselves hoarse in vain calls for the ferryman, had been obliged to ferry themselves across the Brazos River, and had barely escaped death from a capsizing of the boat:

"Whilst we were consulting what was to be done next, I chanced to look across the river, where I descried a man sitting upon the bank—I might almost say an apparition. It was certainly the most uncouth looking object I had ever laid eyes upon—a long, gaunt, sallow man, with long yellow hair, a red shirt, big boots with his breeches thrust in them, a long corn-cob pipe in his mouth, and a long rifle in his hand. His long face was so dreadfully cadaverous, and his form so long and lean, that he might well be the embodiment of the fevers and agues that are said to lurk in these river-bottoms. Seeing that we kept looking at him, he ceased puffing his pipe for a moment, and observed in a nasal tone, 'Gentlemen, I'll trouble you for your fare—just lay it thar on the bank; four bits for the wagon and two bits apiece for the men!'

"A modest request to make, when we were nearly drowned through his negligence.

"'Say, Guv'ner!' cried Col. Wash in a voice of suppressed passion, 'be you the ferry-man?'

"'I be!' replied the man giving another puff at his pipe.

"'And you want a dollar and a half for putting us over?' shouted Col. Wash.

"'I do!'

"'Well, then, just draw a check for it on your own bank!' roared Col. Wash in a perfect fury, 'and if it ain't paid by the time I get back I'll settle with you then."

"The gaunt ferry-man laid down his corn-cob pipe, opened himself up like a tall penknife, raised his rifle, examined the priming, set the hair-trigger, and then quietly observed:

"'Gentlemen, the first man that ondertakes to leave them premises without a payin' of his fare, I'll drap him sure!'

"There was no mistaking the sincerity of this threat. The tall ferryman was evidently not the kind of a person to be trifled with. There was a fixed look about him, and a deliberate coolness in his manner, that sufficiently indicated his determined character. Now, it was evident that our fire-arms were of no present value, being thoroughly saturated with water—a fact that probably was known to our friend across the river, for he gave himself no apparent concern about the matter. To say that Col. Wash raved would but faintly express his condition of mind in this mortifying emergency. I had not seen him in such a fine vein of profanity from the very beginning of our journey. All this time the ferry-man stood quietly watching us from the other side, manifesting neither impatience nor resentment at the duration or violence of the invectives bestowed upon him. For my part, I was quite willing to pay him. I felt convinced that he would kill me if I failed to do so, and considered my life worth more than two bits to the public, if not to myself; so I held up the money that he might see it and then deposited it on a chip, which I laid upon the bank.

"'That's all right, stranger,' said the gaunt ferry-man, 'you 're out! Jist step o' one side.'

"The Yankee trader had evidently indulged in the hope of escaping this tax, but seeing no alternative now, he deposited his money on the chip, and stood off according to order. Next followed the old doctor, who took it like a philosopher. Johnson seemed composed and powerless from the beginning. A hopeless melancholy was upon him. With a profound sigh he placed his two bits on the chip, remarking in a dejected tone, 'My God! if I only had my rifle!' and then passed over. Col. Wash was the last. He was perfectly convulsed with rage, and declared with many extraordinary oaths that he would have satisfaction for this outrage. But what was the use of talking? We were all shivering with cold, and the money must be paid. Col. Wash, with all his bloodthirsty propensities, was evidently no fool. That clause in the ferryman's address—'I'll drap him sure!' was wonderfully impressive. So Col. Wash put his money upon the chip, promising to settle matters on his return.

"'That 's all right, stranger,' said the gaunt ferryman. 'Gin'rally speakin', I'm on hand here.' With that he sat down and resumed his corncob pipe, apparently quite indifferent to our future movements, or to any projects of vengeance that might enter our heads."

"A Court Ball at the Palace of Mexico" is a description, by an eye-witness, of a festival evening of the unfortunate Maxmilian's prosperous days; "A Day with the Cow Column" is a vivid picture of the journey across the Plains, which the Pacific Railroad has already made obsolete; "Chinese in California" relates to the signboard literature of that very flowery nation; "Scalping as a Fine Art" is a humorist's comments on various forms of cheating which obtain in some parts of the earth; "A Californian Abroad" is a real Californian in Paris. These articles and half a dozen others—all the prose ones good, and the poetical ones far from bad—make a magazine that we are glad to have read.

In the Atlantic, Mr. Parton's "Inebriate Asylums, and a Visit to One" was certainly written by himself. It is in his best manner, and he appears in it to more advantage than has been common with him of late. He evidently did some hard work in collecting his materials; he is entirely equal to his subject; his earnestness, or rather his emphaticalness, seems justifiable; and there is little opportunity for him to go wrong in opinion. "Petroleum in Burmah" is agreeably written, and so of course is "The Man and Brother," by Mr. De Forest. Nobody else writes so well about the negroes. "Saint Michael's Night," which grows upon us as we read it, has turned out a story to be heartily praised; it is not saying too much to call it beautiful. "Edmund Brook" is a negro servant's account of the fortunes of his master's family during the war, and is either written by the "boy" himself or it is a miracle of character-painting. "Bacon" is begun upon by Mr. Whipple. "The Two Rabbis" is a fine tale finely told by Mr. Whittier; of the rest of the poetry it may be as well to say nothing, though "Love's Queen" is pretty, too, after a fashion.

Memoir and Letters of Jenny C. White del Bal. By her mother, Rhoda E. White. (Boston: Patrick Donahoe. 1868.)—The first few pages of this volume are occupied by a number of letters addressed by various persons to Mrs. White, requesting her to publish a memoir of her daughter, and giving reasons why they think the work should be undertaken. Father O'Reilley desires it "for the instruction of every succeeding generation of American youth," and for the further purpose of "leaving to every family in America a memorial of true womanly worth, and a model of all natural and supernatural grace and goodness." Another friend thinks that "so pure and lovely a life ought to be chronicled for the benefit of the thousands of women who only wait for pioneers to march before them in a path of duty." The Vicomte de Chabrol considers that the publication of Mrs. del Bal's letters must be beneficial to "the cause of our holy faith, which needs to be illustrated by such noble examples." It appears to him, also, that to translate the book into the French language would be to do a good service to French Catholics of the better classes, who, since they daily see their faith attacked on all sides, are losing confidence in themselves. "It is," he says, "a point of great usefulness to make known to us here in France the admirable virtues and characteristic features of our Catholic brethren in America." Unassisted by these letters, our own judgment would have been that the book was one which, if printed at all, should have been printed for private circulation only; and that, notwithstanding the undeniable excellence of Mrs. del Bal's life and character, neither the memoir written by her mother nor her own letters were likely to be valuable aids in the instruction of future generations.

Mrs. del Bal was, as many of our readers are aware, a daughter of the late Judge White, of this city. Her parents being Catholics, she was brought up in the usual observances of that faith, and being of a naturally religious disposition, and of a strongly emotional nature, grew into the kind of woman which the Church is apt to produce out of such material. Her life, both before and after her marriage, seems to us precisely like that of other pious Catholic girls whose minds and bodies are in too natural and healthy a condition to permit them to indulge in the morbid self-analysis and the outward mortifications which characterize the genuine saint.

In 1862, she married Don Bernardino del Bal, and the next year accompanied him to Santiago de Veraguez, in New Granada. At this time, in consequence of the rebellion which resulted in the dictatorship of Mosquera, society in Santiago was in a very disorganized state. The churches had been closed by Mosquera's orders, and the priests prohibited from performing any of their usual duties. As the Catholic priests in Santiago, and other towns on the Isthmus, were a notoriously dissolute and worthless set of men, it seems to the uncatholic mind as though their congregations did not lose much in being deprived of their ministrations. Mrs. del Bal, however, thought differently; and when we consider that, as Mrs. White naïvely remarks, "in the Catholic Church it is a consoling truth that the fountain's flow of grace cannot be impeded by the shortcomings of the priest by whom the sacraments are administered," it is not difficult to see why Mrs. del Bal should have devoted herself to the work of reopening the churches, recalling the priests, and in other ways promoting the interests of the faith. She tried various means to accomplish this end. For instance, she established an Altar Society, called the "Sisters of Mary," with the object of refurnishing the churches which had been robbed. She started also a Sacred Heart Society and a Sunday-school, in which the children were taught their catechism and their prayers, and rewarded for good behavior with "miraculous medals and pictures."

Her labors were not altogether of this character. She gave both time and money to the poor; she established a hospital, and her labors in it during the insurrections of 1865 were unremitting. She seems, however, to have attached as much importance to making artificial flowers to adorn an altar, or to suspending an "angel" by a wire over a statue of the Saviour, as to any other of her good works. An article printed in the Evening Post of this city, just after the news of her death had been received here, spoke of her as having "established schools" in Santiago. We find no trace of anything of the kind except the Sunday-school we have mentioned. Like most good Catholics, she probably recognized fully only two duties to her fellow-beings, and when she had alleviated their physical sufferings, and satisfied their hunger, and exhorted them to make confession and perform their other religious duties, rested content. One thing is certain, that she gained the love and admiration of all who knew her in her new home, as she had done in her old one, and when she died, last year, the whole town of Santiago went into mourning. She was, indeed, a very admirable woman—loving, self-sacrificing, and earnest in the performance of her duties.

John Ward's Governess: A Novel. By Annie L. Macgregor. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—John Ward, a young New Yorker of good birth, and of great wealth and culture, fell in love with an Italian actress, who, besides having another lover, Giovanni, whose passion she returned, was at least five years older than John. Being a mercenary young person, she hid her attachment to Giovanni and married John, very much against the wishes of John's sister, a maiden lady of thirty-five years, but apparently without causing Giovanni much uneasiness. John took her to Italy, where, in the course of the next few years, she bore him a daughter and a son, and then eloped with Giovanni. Upon this John returned, a soured and disappointed man, to his ancestral home on the banks of the Hudson, wildly abandoned himself to cattle-raising and cultivating prize vegetables for the county fairs, and found his children greatly in his way, as also in that of their aunt. He tried governesses, but found them bad failures—mostly ill-mannered and inconveniently disposed to fall in love with him. At last, under pressure from his sister, he went down to New York, answered in person an advertisement he found in the Herald, and hired a young creature of great beauty, and what he considered fine manners, to go back with him to his model farm. Apparently, Mr. Ward had acquired, during his residence in Italy, some peculiar notions of what constitutes good manners, for when Miss Lyle interrupts him in the middle of a remark, he decides, with inward exultation, that at last he has secured "a lady."

Miss Lyle's conduct presents some variations from the usual course pursued by governesses who are also heroines and installed in the families of rich widowers. Her manners subdue the servants and Miss Ward, as they have previously subdued John. The children become at once her willing slaves, models of good conduct and prodigies of intelligence. She also becomes intimate with the nearest neighbors—Livingstons of the purest Knickerbocker blood, of the finest New York manners, and of the most unlimited wealth, and drives John half-mad with jealousy by her undisguised flirtation with Ralph Livingston, his closest friend. John becomes more and more fascinated by her, and when, on the occasion of a small evening party, she appears in a pink silk gown, with diamonds of fabulous size and lustre, he yields, helplessly but gracefully, to the wondrous spell of her presence. She owns she loves him, but she "has a mystery," which she will unfold to no one but her husband. John holds back for awhile, having been once deceived by a woman, but finally succumbs to Miss Lyle's beauty and "style," marries her without enquiring her secret, and is rewarded by finding her to be Mrs. Livingston's niece and a great heiress.

We have not met Miss Macgregor's name before, and take her to be new to literature. We doubt, however, if her faults are such as will mend with time. Perhaps we ought to say that she dedicates her book to Dr. Holmes, with "admiration for his genius and many thanks for his kindness."

Medusa, and Other Tales. By Mrs. Adelaide (Kemble) Sartoris, author of "A Week in a French Country House." (Boston: Loring. 1868.)—This volume of sketches is to be praised, like its predecessor, "A Week in a French Country House," as giving in its fulness the pleasure which one gets from a perfectly easy, graceful, unaffected, and yet thoroughly artistic style. We do not know of more delightful light reading, and have found our enjoyment of them quite unimpaired by several re-perusals. The theme of nearly every one of these sketches is music—the well-known love of their author for that art, and her successes in it, furnishing her with material which is wonderfully well adapted to her peculiar literary talent. The little romance which gives its name to the volume, and which most nearly resembles an ordinary story—having in it a curious love episode, and two shadowy appearances which bear an odd resemblance to a hero and heroine—is quite the least successful of them all. Like the rest, it is of course full of charming writing; but the pleasure one gets from that is quite dissociated from any interest in the story itself. Mrs. Sartoris is neither a romancer nor a novelist; but we know of no one who excels her in the artistic use of language—in the faculty of so sketching persons and places that her presentation leaves in the reader's mind a clear and definite impression which he feels to be precisely that which he was intended to receive. There is, we think, not one page of either of her books from which we might not quote passages which would amply prove our case. We content ourselves, however, with advising every one who can take delight in the manner, without making too serious demands upon the matter, of books which he reads simply for amusement, to read them at once.

The Week.

There is a report, which we give for what it is worth, that Mr. Seymour believes that he has been "sold out" in this State, and that the chief object of the party—that for which he is to be sacrificed—is, first, the senatorship; next, control of some of the great metropolitan district and New York city "institutions." Democratic Presidential votes are to be traded off for Republican votes for assemblymen. The Senate, which holds over, is Republican, to be sure, but by only two majority; and the Democratic majority on joint ballot is now 22. At all events, it is certain that among all Republicans, whether betting men or not, confidence increases from week to week. Vermont, Maine, and Camilla, Ga., have one after the other given an impulse to the Republican cause. Since the Maine election the whole or nearly the whole Republican strength for canvassing has been laid out in Pennsylvania, according to an arrangement made long previously. We look to see nearly or quite 10,000 Republican majority in October and 20,000 in November. In Indiana the stumping goes on. The Democrats have had their monster mass-meeting at Indianapolis, and have had less success in calling out a monstrous crowd than the Republicans had when they made their great display. Ohio there is no doubt about. The canvass in North Carolina is as well conducted as anywhere, and put on its liveliest form at a time much earlier than was the case in any other of the States which do not vote before November. The list of white North Carolinians who are actually engaged in working for Grant and Colfax has a look that is decidedly cheering to any one who hopes for a restored South. The fact is, however, as we imagine, that a good deal of the white Republicanism of North Carolina is due to the hearty hatred which the old Whigs still bear to the old Democrats. There are still Whigs in North Carolina, strange as it may seem, and Mr. John Pool and Mr. Alfred Dockery found it tolerably easy to welcome the aid even of Yankees and negroes against their triumphant and detested enemies.

In the case of native-born citizens of the South, the state of things is as bad as need be, and disgraceful to the Southern people and the nineteenth century; but in the case of Northerners who have gone there, it is worse. Texas is in almost complete anarchy, and we have doubts if, outside of the German district, and perhaps in one or two of the large cities, there is the least safety for "carpet-baggers." Even United States garrisons are besieged. In Alabama this seems pretty well to illustrate the state of public opinion in regard to the obnoxious class: "Carpet-bagger Yordy, who has lately held the different offices of Registrar, Bureau Agent, and Senator from Sumter, sought lodging at Friend Palmer's hotel, in Eutaw, last week. Palmer kicked the scoundrel out of doors." The same paper from which we have just quoted adorns its columns with a cut of a tree on which are hanging a "carpet-bagger" and a "scallawag," and says: "We candidly believe that the picture given to our readers, as above, correctly represents the attitude and altitude of all foreign and domestic foes of our land who shall have the folly to remain 'down South' after the ides of March." And again, the same paper says: "Five notoriously bad negroes were found swinging by the neck to limbs in the woods of Colbert County, a few days since. They had been guilty of making threats against the whites." It is no wonder that Governor Smith and a delegation from the Legislature are in Washington, demanding that more Federal troops shall be sent into the State. The news from Georgia shows, as we expected, that the Camilla affair was a shocking massacre. The murders continued to be committed through the afternoon and night, the woods being scoured by hunters with dogs, and negroes shot without mercy. Their offence was Radicalism. Major Howard, of the Bureau, says: "I cannot restrain the people. . . . . I must protect my family, and let the contending parties fight it out. It is coming." The Legislature and the governor are quarrelling; and the former, which soon adjourns, has refused to ask for troops, and has decided that the militia shall not be organized. The Democrats need no organization; every white man has his gun, and the sheriffs make good commanding officers. In Arkansas assassination is rife. In Louisiana the governor has issued his proclamation urging citizens to stay at home and political clubs to make no public demonstrations. There is great anger against him for a very sensible veto of the Equality Bill, the most foolish act of the most foolish of the Southern legislatures. The message does Governor Warmoth credit. The Southern Opinion remarks: "But if Grant be chosen, and we do not misjudge him and his policy, then the disciplined cohorts of the South must be marshalled once more." Grant is sure to be chosen; and if we do not misjudge him and his policy, then the disciplined cohorts of the South will not be marshalled so much as they are now, and massacres by day and assassinations by night will be considerably less frequent.

Governor Orr, who has been for years in public life in South Carolina, holding office in her Legislature, representing his district in Congress, and since the war serving the State as governor and as judge, has recently announced his intention of taking refuge in Missouri. Governor Orr is a man of Irish descent, though his family has long been resident in South Carolina, of which State he is himself a native. But he is far from being what is called a South Carolina gentleman. He represents well the opinions and feelings of that class of his fellow-citizens who inhabit the northern part of the State, and between whom and the cotton and rice-planters of the coast there was never any love lost. Mr. Orr is a man of ability and energy, naturally kind-hearted and sensible, and perhaps with a little of the self-seeking ambition of the politician, and the willingness to make compromises which comes of a life-long habit of seeking offices and manipulating elections. But whatever his motives may have been, he was, on the whole, an able, sensible, moderate politician and public servant. He made the mistake of supposing that the South would continue for the future to show the spirit which she was showing when, in 1865, he was elected governor. But the school of politicians opposed to his ideas, and inclined to despise him and the "up-country people"—the B. F. Perry school, which is composed of the most insolent and most impracticable men in the whole world—have been too strong for him. He is not to be forgiven for being less rebellious than the Charleston Mercury, and, in sheer despair, has resolved to betake himself to a civilized, active, and growing community, where there will be comfort for himself and a career for his children. It is thus that anything that looks like new blood is driven out of the South.

Secretary Stanton has appeared in the political field, for the first time after a long silence, and made an excellent campaign speech at Steubenville, Ohio. The most interesting part of it is that relating to the bonds, in which he lays it down in plain terms that the representations of the Government agents, authorized to sell the bonds, that they would be paid in gold, were binding on the Government, both in law and morals. The great legal principle which governs the case, and which is found in the Roman law even more prominently than in ours, was plainly stated by the World, several months ago, when this question was first raised by Pendleton. In fact, the doubts which have been thrown on the matter will, ten years hence, be referred to as among the most singular incidents in American history.

Unfortunate Senator Ross has at last been called up for judgment by "Kansas," and received a crushing rebuke from the Republican Convention for his abominable behavior in voting for the President's acquittal. "D. T. Anthony, and others," of whom "Kansas" consists, gave him, as our readers may remember, a slight inkling of what was in store for him, immediately after the verdict, by transmitting to him an official telegram informing him that "his motives were greenbacks and Indian contracts," and that "Kansas" repudiated him, under a general rule excluding all "perjurers and skunks" from the favor of that body. He is, however, working hard for the Republican party, and, as he is a young man, may outlive the shame and disgrace of that awful day. He may take courage from the career of Messrs. Trumbull, Fessenden, and Henderson, who have paid no attention to the noisy pack who barked after them as they left Washington, and are doing their duty just as quietly and faithfully as if no Radical bonnet had ever contained a bee.

General Butler has got his nomination, as we always feared he would. Anybody who expects reforms to begin in caucuses is simpler than we are willing to confess ourselves to be. There remains still, however, to the electors the inalienable right of "scratching" or of running another candidate. We hold it to be better for the country, and vastly better for the fair fame of Massachusetts, that the Fifth District should return a Democrat than a Republican whose antecedents are as bad, and whose powers of mischief are twice as great, as those of any Democrat. He has delivered two speeches during the past week which it ought to be impossible for any Massachusetts Christian or honorable pagan to forgive or get over. In the first, he disposed of the representations of members of Congress, Secretaries of the Treasury, Government agents and editors of loyal newspapers, repeated incessantly during four long years, and never repudiated—that the bonds would be paid in gold—by saying: "To sell these bonds, Jay Cooke said they would be paid in gold." Of course, the impression which this is intended to produce on the public mind is, that nobody but Jay Cooke said so, and that he said it merely by way of pushing his private business as a broker.

In his second speech before the Convention, after receiving his nomination, General Butler gave the following account of his financial performances in Congress:

> "I stand on this matter with Senators Sherman and Morton, and on the only test question. When the matter came directly in issue, I voted with sixty-one Republican members of the House of Representatives, an absolute majority, that the taxes on the income of the bonds should be honestly collected, so that the bad men should not escape the taxation which good men pay willingly. Which of these men will go before the people and oppose my election as the advocate of the rascals escaping taxation and defrauding the revenue?"

This is even more characteristic, and has even more of the Old Bailey flavor about it, than the reference to Jay Cooke. Nobody has found much fault with him for advocating the deduction of the income-tax from the payments made on the coupons. The arrangement would certainly wear a doubtful complexion as regards foreign bondholders, but we are willing to let this pass. The head and front of his offending was, that on this same occasion he instigated and supported, and gleefully rubbed his hands and chuckled over, the introduction of a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report instanter a bill clapping a tax of ten per cent. on the Government bonds; or, in other words, arbitrarily, fraudulently, without notice, in contravention of the plighted faith of the nation, and in defiance of the Chicago platform, reducing the interest from six per cent. to five dollars and forty cents. The Committee of Ways and Means expressed in their report their opinion of that transaction, and we advise those who propose to vote for the general to look at it, and then ask themselves, What is the duty of an honest citizen towards a candidate who, having borne the leading part in that transaction, gets up three months later and coolly gives out that all he did was to "vote that the income on the bonds should be honestly taxed?"

We propose next week to go over once more the leading points in this remarkable case, because we regard it as an almost crucial test of the amount of reliance which can be placed on the religion and morality of the community as a barrier against the growing ascendency of unscrupulous politicians. If pure-blooded New Englanders, from the district which produced such men as Endicott and Higginson, are satisfied, in the year of grace 1868, with being represented by General Butler, there ought to be an end to all whimpering about the malign influence of foreign immigration on American politics. To give the reader an idea of the depths of moral perversity to which the Butler school of politicians are trying to drag the community, we may mention that one of their small organs, which still sings his praises, gravely, last week, pooh-poohed the movement against him for his financial heresies, on the ground that it is a "mere question of money," and therefore unworthy the attention of spiritual philanthropists and humanitarians. This is, of course, the reply which any fraudulent debtor or trustee or forger or embezzler might make to his accuser. Nearly every contract in civilized society is, after all, from one side, "a question of money;" but it is also—from the other side—a question of principle, which you cannot stir without stirring the moral order of the universe to its remotest bounds.

The English Government has extradition treaties with three powers, France, Denmark, and the United States. Owing to the great morality or want of enterprise of the Danes England has not been much troubled by Danish criminals, and Denmark is not, for various reasons both social and topographical, a favorite resort of English criminals, so that there has been very little trouble with Denmark. The number of demands which have to be made on the United States for the surrender of offenders is naturally very great; but here, owing to the similarity of the jurisprudence and procedure of the two countries, the treaty has worked tolerably well. But with France there has been endless trouble. French criminals love British soil and British law. The sensation of being treated as innocent, even while in custody, to which they are entitled under the common law, they revel in. But the French police are utterly disgusted with the preliminaries of a criminal prosecution as conducted in England—the tenderness for the criminal, the particularity about the proofs, and the extreme readiness to let him go which are displayed at every stage; so the history of the treaty, as far as France is concerned, has been one long grumble. A select parliamentary committee appointed to enquire and report on the matter of extradition, last session, have just brought in their report, in which they recommend that the list of crimes for which prisoners may be surrendered should be greatly extended, and that power be conferred on the Queen in council to make an arrangement with any country to surrender criminals accused of any of the specified offences, on the production of such proof as would justify their committal for trial in England, but giving them fifteen days in which to sue out a habeas corpus, in order to avoid such scandal and outrage as occurred in Canada in the Lamirande case. Political offences are, of course, excluded. The relations of all civilized states on this subject need revision. It is discreditable to civilization that a criminal should, in any country in this age of the world, be able, by crossing an imaginary line, to bid defiance to justice in default of express stipulation rendering him liable to extradition.

The signs of war in Europe continue to increase in number and magnitude. The impression that there is some secret arrangement between France and Russia continues to gain ground. The Prussians are constructing tremendous iron-clad forts or gun-boats for the protection of the Rhine. Marshal Niel is said to have always been in favor of a winter campaign, and this story seems to derive some confirmation from the fact that, around all the French fortresses on the German frontier, everything which could interfere with the range of the guns, except dwelling-houses, is being swept away—hedges, walls, summer-houses, and all other light and not absolutely necessary structures. The Prussians talk pacifically still, and have postponed their last levy of 120,000 men for three months.

The state of things between France and Prussia does not improve; but in the treatment of the question of peace or war the Prussian press is showing calm moderation and great good sense, which is more than can be said of the French press. The Berlin National Zeitung, in a recent article, says, and with some show of truth, that, if one might judge by the French newspapers, France has been "converted into a wilderness inhabited by bloodthirsty animals." It seems as if the possession of the left bank of the Rhine was the one thing necessary to French peace, happiness, and prosperity, and this, when between the first of last June and the 31st of August there were forty-one convictions in France for offences against the press laws, against fifty-eight persons, with sentences of fine and imprisonment, and when one department of the Government is largely occupied with the silly business of seeing that certain newspapers are not sold on the news-stands in the streets. The opinion is gaining ground on the Continent that it is Russia, after all, which will decide whether Europe is or is not to be plunged into hostilities, by her leaning to Prussia or to Austria, and that she will be guided in her policy by purely selfish considerations. At present, she seems to incline against Prussia, which is receiving a fair share of abuse from the Russian press.

Rumors of the approaching evacuation of the Papal States by the French are still afloat, but the Government papers contradict them, and the new French ambassador, who succeeds Count Sartiges, is a notorious and zealous Ultramontanist. The desertions from the Pontifical Zouaves continue to be very numerous. The Italian troops have been tolerably successful against the brigands, but the moral condition of Southern Italy, to which after all it is that brigandage is due, does not seem to improve. Assassination is fearfully common, though not half so common as in our Southern States; but it is committed more frequently for other than political causes. The "caucus" is about to be introduced into Italy by the assembling of the radical members of the Parliament at Naples to discuss various legislative measures, pending and prospective, and resolve on a definite line of action about them.

The mission of Minister Bancroft in Germany promises to be more fruitful of beneficial results than that of any of his predecessors. One after another of the traditional grievances from which our fellow-citizens of German birth have had to suffer so long without any hope of relief is being removed through his intelligent and energetic efforts. The ink of the treaties involving the recognition of the right of self-expatriation by the North German Confederacy and the independent States of Southern Germany was no sooner dry than he exerted himself, as we learn from recent German papers, to bring about the abrogation of the little better than barbarous laws still existing in several of the minor states, according to which no marriage contracted abroad by any of their subjects is valid without the previous authorization of the respective sovereigns. There are innumerable cases in which naturalized citizens of the United States have suffered great annoyance and injustice from the operation of these laws. In the first place, distance and the complicated formalities to be previously observed render it exceedingly difficult to obtain the prescribed authorization. Again, if a subject of Bavaria or Würtemberg has emigrated to this country without the permission of his former rulers he cannot obtain it at all. But, if he marries without it, his marriage is null and void under the laws in question. In the eyes of the home authorities, he lives simply in a state of concubinage. Neither his wife nor his children are treated as legitimate. They cannot inherit any property that may be left to him by his parents or other relations. These laws are a logical sequence of the old monarchical dogma "once a subject always a subject." But the latter having been virtually abandoned by the great and small rulers of Germany in the treaties concluded by Mr. Bancroft, the former should likewise fall to the ground. Mr. Bancroft demands the abrogation of the objectionable statutes in view of their inconsistency with the right of self-expatriation, now recognized in the states referred to. The liberal German papers do not hesitate to point out the humiliation implied in the fact that in this, as in other matters, the pressure of foreign influence is necessary to induce their own governments to act in accordance with the spirit of the age.

Our respect for our readers prevents our attempting to put any construction on the Cable telegrams from Spain. The only thing which one can infer from them with any approach to certainty is, that the insurrection is gaining ground; but it is safe to say that nearly all the stories sent over by telegraph, in so far as they pretend to be accounts of actual occurrences, are utterly worthless. Speaking of the Atlantic Cable, we cannot help asking the Associated Press for whose benefit it is that the long and elaborate account of the English horse-races, to which it so frequently treats us, are transmitted? What large class of the community is it—for it must surely be a large class—which is waiting so eagerly to know the "event" at Epsom, Ascot, Newmarket, Doncaster, and Liverpool that it becomes worth the while of the press to get the news at full length—horses, names, odds, results, and all—by the Cable? Where are these people found? Who knows ten men in any part of the country who bet regularly on the English races? If any of the daily papers will throw light on this question, we are sure they will relieve a good many puzzled readers.

Of perhaps more importance than the political news from abroad is the news from Scotland in regard to the new "road-steamers." A Mr. Thomson, a civil engineer of Edinburgh, was applied to by friends of his, who cultivate plantations in Java, to supply them with a road-engine for the purpose of conveying sugar from the country to the seaport of Tourabaga. There are several such engines in existence, but Mr. Thomson could find none which had not one of the two faults that hitherto have made them all of little or no service—in fact, failures. If the engine were light, the jolting and straining were so great that the machinery was constantly undergoing repairs, at a cost that made it useless. If, in order to obviate this difficulty, the engine had been made of great weight, it smashed the road so that travel became impossible. Mr. Thomson conceived the idea of fitting stout india-rubber tires to the wheels of the locomotive, as he had previously done in the case of the platform-trucks at railway-stations, and the result was a perfect solution of the problem. The steamer practically runs along on a self-laid tramway of india-rubber; neither the engine nor the road receive the slightest injury. The Java engine, of three-horse power, was made to cross a field of soft grass, to run through a field covered to a depth of two feet with loose earth, to travel over beds of broken flint, to drag a weight of thirteen tons up a steep incline—so excellent is the bite of the wheels. It is astonishing to hear that the beds of loose flints were undisturbed, that a potato and carrot placed in the path of the engine were passed over and left uncrushed, and that, no matter what the surface of the road, the tires received no permanent dent nor any incision. They seem to be nearly indestructible. Several other steamers have been built since the satisfactory performances of the Javanese one, and they prove equally satisfactory. One of them, built to draw fifteen tons—its own weight is eight tons, its horse-power ten tons, its tires fifteen inches broad and five inches thick—has drawn a train of colliery cars, whose total weight was forty tons, along a common road having inclines of one in sixteen. The train was ninety feet long, and looked like a freight-train escaped from a station. It went up and down hills, turned sharp corners, threaded its way between the cabs and carts and omnibuses with complete ease, certainty, and safety. This certainly looks as if we might have a revolution in our ordinary customs of locomotion. Why should not men keep their own locomotive and engineer, as men now keep horses and coachmen? We may soon be able to laugh at the railroad corporations and the expected velocipedestrians, especially if Ericsson succeeds in his scheme for turning the sun into fuel for steam-engines, and we are made independent of coal.

WHAT IS TO BE DECIDED AT THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION?

If we accepted the theory of the constitution of the human mind on which the New York Tribune seems to be conducted, we should, without hesitation, pronounce "A Yankee," the New York correspondent of the London Spectator, a "liar and a villain," because he has repeatedly taken views of men and events in which neither the Tribune nor the Nation concurs, and he has uttered several prophecies which we have exercised our "natural right" of disbelieving. It is impossible to deny, however, that his opinions exert considerable influence in England, and that he represents a large body of very intelligent and respectable men here; and although his dissent from the Tribune and from us may indicate that moral vileness which such dissent has only too truly revealed in so many other people, we propose, for the purposes of this discussion, while reserving all our rights, to treat him as an honest and cultivated man, and argue with him.

He has said in his correspondence with the Spectator: "What, then, is to be decided at the next general election? Simply this: the Republican party, as represented by the men who now control it, claims that while all State rights, including that of regulating the suffrage, must be preserved inviolate in those States the majority of whose people did not take part in the rebellion, in the others the control of suffrage and citizenship may and should be assumed by Congress, and that these States should be reconstructed for the purpose of giving the suffrage to negroes." This position, the writer says, is distinctly taken in the second article of the Republican platform. He says, further, "The Republicans also rest on the position that the negro must be a chattel or a citizen."

Now, it cannot be said with any truth that States "have been reconstructed for the purpose of giving the suffrage to negroes." Suffrage has been given to negroes that certain States might be reconstructed. There is no party which holds that it may be given to white or black by Congress, in the States wherein there is no place for reconstruction; though there may be many persons who think the action of Congress in this instance justified by their own private theories of "natural rights," which they would like to see applied in all the States. But the Republican party has not proclaimed any abstract theory about the right to vote. The majority of those who support the reconstruction measures approve of the extension of the franchise to the negroes on the ground of political expediency, in the conviction that the whites adhere still to the principle of secession, and that unless the freedmen form a large portion of the voters in the restored States, their liberty cannot be maintained under future State legislation. In reference to this conviction only has it been said that the negro, in those States, must be either "chattel or citizen." Certainly, the war "was not fought for universal negro suffrage" nor for any negro suffrage less than universal, and it was "fought for Union" on one side just so far as it was fought for disunion on the other. That truism, however, contains very little information material to forming an opinion on the question before the people in the election.

According to Democratic oracles, North and South, the war was not carried on to maintain any disputed dominion or sovereignty, but to coerce into union with the Northern States, according to the terms of a previous agreement, other States whose necessary existence, independent of any union, was always presupposed; and the Democratic conception of the present state of things is, apparently, that the communities which in war constituted the rebel enemy of the United States were, as soon as their armed forces were defeated, identified with those against whom they had rebelled and were constituent parts of the sovereignty which put down their rebellion. If this is the correct view, the Democratic party is fully justified in opposing not only the measures of Congress extending the elective franchise to the freedmen, but also the whole policy of reconstruction. If the war had no other object than this result, the Democratic opposition to it was true patriotism; "the people" are self-stultified in having attained "what they fought for;" every Democrat who supported the war was, above all others, either a fool or a knave; and "the people" can now do nothing better than repent of their madness and folly and humble themselves before their injured Southern brethren, which they may do by electing Seymour and Blair on the Democratic platform.

The war was not "fought for union" in the sense in which the Democracy understands those words. But it was fought for the Union; that is, by the United States for the United States; and, consequently, not to sustain and preserve, against their own frantic intention, the political authority of communities which were fighting against the United States. What the people "fought for in the war" was to sustain the dominion of those States which had not, by attempting secession, abjured that sovereignty which the States have, and ever have had, only by consenting to be the United States. The States which attempted secession, or refused to be united States, thereby renounced the only sovereignty they had had before. The other States, united, alone held the dominion of the Union. The people fought to maintain the dominion of these United States as against a belligerent de facto authority in places wherein no authority less universal than that of the Union had any lawful existence, after the State there existent had fully committed itself to the purpose of secession.

The people "are to vote for in this election what they fought for in the war," because they will by their vote, more or less distinctly, recognize the location of the sovereign authority which was vindicated by the suppression of the rebellion. The failure to do this hitherto has been the main source of our political embarrassments during the last three years, though this failure was in a sense unavoidable. The war had been carried on while it was still doubted by all parties whether the several States of the Southern Confederacy—that is, the people of each State in their political capacity—were to be held accountable for the acts of the rebel citizens of those States. Long after the fighting was over, we expected that those States should reappear in the body of "loyal" white citizens, who were supposed to have acted only under rebel usurped authority. If in 1865 the white citizens had appeared willing to accept the amended Constitution in good faith, and had not shown their intention to rule the freedmen as a servile class by "black codes," and to make all freedom of action dependent on local sentiment, it is probable that Congress would have acted on the idea that secession and rebellion could not interrupt the continuity of political existence in the State, or destroy its political capacity as one of the United States. The Republican party has been wanting to itself in not having accepted some definite position on this question of State existence. But, whatever phrases may have been in vogue during the last three years—whether we say the States have been "out of their practical relations to the Union," or speak of "conquered States," or insist on the "guarantee of a republican government," or accept the term "State suicide," or say that the seceded States became Territories of the United States, or imagine that a revolution has taken place or is taking place—it is clear that the action of Congress and the policy of the Republican party now practically declare the doctrine that, by the secession and civil war, the continuity of political existence was interrupted in those States; that they thereby lost their capacity to share, as members of the Union, the possession of sovereignty for all the purposes of State life—the local as well as the national sovereignty; and that to restore that capacity a new people of the State, a new body of electors, must be organized by Congress, and, as such, adopt a constitution and consent to assume the powers of a State in accordance with the existing Constitution of the United States. Congress determines the new body of voters without reference to the limitations set by the former public law of the State, which is now no longer referable to any existing political authority, and may, if thought expedient, call on those who once were slaves as well as on those who have been rebels to assume political citizenship in a State of the Union bearing an old name, but in fact as new a political organization as the last State admitted at the base of the Rocky Mountains.

The Democratic orators say that the Republican party cannot at this day take this position, because the Lincoln administration and the last two Congresses have repeatedly affirmed the continuous existence of the seceded States. This objection may be valid against the foresight of party leaders. But the question here is of the powers of the ultimate sovereign upon whose absolute will the Constitution itself is constantly depending for legal force and effect—of sovereign rights which cannot be compromised by the inconsistencies of parties. Democrats may say, further, that their theory of the nature of the Union, as being a confederation of sovereignties, has not been confined to the ranks of their party. Some theory which equally affirms the primary sovereignty of the States and denies the nationality of the Union, except as resulting from a compact between the several States, has been commonly received by many who identify themselves with the Republican party; and it may be asked how, with such views of the Constitution, can any accept the statement here given of the object of the war and of the issue involved in the election. The war has called all parties to bring their fundamental theories to its test. There are many at the North who cannot claim, with the followers of Calhoun, the virtue of logical consistency. Politicians of all parties have, at different times, for various partisan needs, professed essentially the same theory of State rights which the South pushed to its logical consequences in secession.

Secession called forth the force which made manifest some other ultimate sovereign dominion than was dreamt of in the philosophy of State-rights. But force alone—battle, victory, and defeat—is only a physical phenomenon. War cannot determine that which is determined by being understood. The people are now called upon to ascertain and to proclaim whose is the ultimate sovereign dominion thus manifested. The action of the Democracy, the language of their platform, the antecedents of their candidates, will give to each vote cast in this election the significance of a judgment on this great question; for by them the people are invited to put in power a party whose only political principle is the denial of that authority which the people fought to maintain, which recognizes no national existence or any sovereignty above that which has been manifested in unsuccessful rebellion and civil war.

THE IMMEDIATE EFFECT OF GOOD CROPS.

We readily acquit the New York Times of all intention to reflect upon the fairness and disinterestedness of the Nation's articles on political economy, although in its issue of Sept. 22 it applies to them this somewhat insidious remark (the italics being its own):

"Our weekly contemporary, the Nation, has the rare merit, in its financial articles, of discussing questions of political economy with thoughtfulness and impartiality. Its views may have been generally somewhat too bearish or depressed in relation to our financial future, but the warnings have often been timely and wise."

If the tone of our financial articles has been gloomy or depressed, it is because the facts upon which they are based do not honestly admit of a more cheerful interpretation. We have been sharply criticised for our recent remarks on the terrible impoverishment of the whole country; our facts have been called in question and our arguments controverted. But every day brings fresh proof of the correctness of our assertions and the soundness of our deductions. Papers of the very same date as that of the Times above quoted give the official returns of the total valuation for the present year of all property in the State of Illinois (one of the States selected by us as an example), and these returns show a decrease in the value of property in that State of no less than eight per cent. as compared with the same time last year. Such facts cannot be stated in cheerful language, nor can any very encouraging deductions in relation to our financial future be derived from them. They are in truth eminently saddening and discouraging facts, and all the more saddening and discouraging because the press of the whole country seems bent on disguising them, and seems to have agreed to impugn the motives and question the patriotism of whoever calls public attention to them. During the depression of the war or during the reaction of the first years of peace, there might have been a reasonable excuse for over-sanguine views of our condition. There can be none now. The time for smoothing over difficulties by rose-colored representation of the future is past. The people demand to know the truth in order that they may guide their actions by it. When the conclusions of scientific investigation are endorsed in so striking a manner by the official records, it is worse than folly to disguise or attempt to qualify them. As long as the people are led to believe that the whole country is rapidly increasing in prosperity, just so long will every one be encouraged to persevere in his own extravagant practices. When every one learns and understands that the whole country has been growing poorer, some may pause and, examining their own condition, find wisdom in returning to their old ways of economy.

It is precisely the same with regard to the crops. As long as it is daily dinned into everybody's ears that our magnificent crops are about to give a fresh stimulus to enterprise of every kind, to increase our national revenues, pay off our foreign indebtedness, and add to every one's prosperity, just so long will all attempts at national or individual retrenchment be deferred, and the day of reckoning put off, until it comes upon us unawares and most inopportunely. In a recent number of the Nation we pointed out the fallacy of the common belief that good crops are a source of immediately increased prosperity, and warned our readers not to expect a brilliant fall trade as the result of the prospectively brilliant crops. The New York Times, one of the ablest and most persistent expounders of the doctrine that our resources are inexhaustible, that our prosperity is increasing daily, and that our liberal crops cannot fail to hasten a further increase of business and general prosperity, takes us to task for these "dreadful views," and with considerable ability pretends to refute our arguments. But it is evident that the Times is defending its own old heresies for consistency's sake only, and that in reality it fully agrees with us, for it furnishes, in the article quoted from, a series of most striking arguments in favor of the position assumed by us. We maintained that the first effect of abundant harvests is to reduce the price of the article harvested, not only for the new crop, but for all that may be on hand of the old crop; not only for all the old crop in its raw state, but for all the articles manufactured from it, and not only from the time when the new crop is actually harvested and brought to market and manufactured, but from the moment that the probability of an abundant crop is well ascertained. In this way we asserted that all holders of any part of the old crop or of any stock manufactured from it suffered a loss by the decline in value consequent upon the abundance of the new crop, and that both dealers in and manufacturers of the raw material, and dealers in and consumers of the manufactured article, delayed or diminished their purchases and their manufacturing until the decline had in their opinion reached its limit. This delay or diminution of purchases or manufacturing again causes a loss to the producer, the dealer, the manufacturer, the factory hand, and all directly or indirectly dependent on these, and thus, we argued, the abundance of any given crop causes an actual and positive loss to all classes remotely or nearly connected with it, and diminishes to that extent their ability to consume the products of all other classes of the community. We had, as the Times correctly states,

"Taken for illustration a branch of trade and production in which the reserved stock of the community, and their consequent power of withholding purchase, is always greater than in any of the branches connected with food. In cotton, most families have something laid by, or can wait for lower prices before buying, if an abundant crop gives promise of a fall of price, and thus a full crop might temporarily cause a slackening of purchasing and manufacturing, and so an apparent diminution of prosperity."

It is evident that, so far as cotton is concerned, the Times agrees with us that an abundant crop might temporarily cause an apparent diminution of prosperity. That, however, this diminution of prosperity is not only possible and apparent but actual and real, is shown sooner than we could have expected by actual events. "At the present price of printing cloths," so the telegraph reports from Providence, Rhode Island, "the manufacturer loses money on every yard he manufactures. The Fall River Mills are running only four days in the week;" and the Financial Chronicle again reports: "Manufacturers complain that they are selling their goods at a loss, . . . and the expectation that the raw material will be still lower in price renders some anxious to realize at the best obtainable rates." The fact that any important class of the community is doing business at a loss, or that in any important branch of industry production is being, even if only temporarily, curtailed by one-third, owing to the abundant crop of any one article, is self-evident proof of the correctness of our assertion. But if at this early stage of the season such results are produced, when there is no degree of certainty about the abundance of the crop and when the raw material has not yet very materially declined, what will the result be should the crop prove to be an abundant one?

The Times admits the correctness of our argument as applied to cotton, asserting, at the same time, "With food, however, it is different," and gives as a reason, that a decline in the price of food reduces every one's expense of living, and enables every one to spend all the more for other articles, and thereby increases business and prosperity. It then cites an example:

"A clerk in New York has barely lived on a salary of $1,200, of which some $600 was spent for the food of his family. A plentiful harvest in the West enables him this coming year to purchase his food for 33 per cent. less, or $400. His purchasing power is now increased by $200, which he either uses to buy other commodities (thus adding to business) or he lays by in the savings-bank, where it goes into the production of the country."

Yes, always supposing that the clerk retain his situation, and that his salary be not reduced. But how if he happen to be the clerk of the grain dealer, or flour merchant, or wholesale grocer, who has lost money on every bushel of wheat and every barrel of flour bought or sold during the last two months? or of the miller, who has been steadily diminishing his production because he has been working at a loss for some time? Or suppose he is the clerk of the cotton manufacturer, or dealer, or jobber, who loses money every day, or of the Fall River mill-owner, who is working on two-thirds time. Is he likely to retain his situation with $1,200 salary? And if any number of clerks in these branches are thrown out and their salaries reduced, do we not know that the salaries of all clerks and all salaried people will be reduced in proportion? Does the Times suppose that any decline in bread and cotton goods at retail is to-day sufficient to compensate the Fall River mill-hands for the loss of one-third of their wages? And will not all the trades-people of Fall River see their business reduced in proportion? and will not the wages and salaries of all classes in Fall River and neighborhood be affected in a similar way?

The only difficulty that the Times has in fully and entirely supporting our views arises from its forgetting that a decline in the price of any given article, due to whatever cause, at once injuriously affects all holders or owners and producers of it, and benefits the consumers only gradually and after a lapse of time. The holders and owners, and producers or manufacturers, of all the principal articles of trade, are the capitalists, the employers. An injury to the employer means diminished power to employ—a diminished employment for labor, or a reduction of wages, or both. Hence, a decline in price in any given article means, almost inevitably, a decline in the wages of every one employed in connection with that article; and this decline in the wages takes place long before the decline in the article itself has time to reach the consumer, who, when the decline does reach him, has no longer the same power to purchase, on account of his diminished income. By the light of this irrefutable assertion we recognize double force in the admirable illustrations given by the Times of the manner in which abundant food-crops lower the prices of all articles:

"The shoemakers of Lynn, Mass., having a third less expense for food, make shoes cheaper; the mill-owners of New England, who feed their hands, at once find one heavy portion of their expenses diminished by one-third, and can thus manufacture cheaper woollens or cottons, or the operatives, competing closely for labor, and discovering that they can live much cheaper, accept lower wages; the machine manufacturers in New York, where labor is in excess, can lower wages with lower food [the italics are ours.—Ed. Nat.], and thus produce cheaper farm-machines; or if, owing to trades-unions and combinations of laborers, this did not take place at once, it would gradually. All the exchangers, forwarders, brokers, middlemen, and merchants, finding one portion of their expenses so much lessened, are enabled to lower their rates after a time, and are compelled to do so by competition."

We cannot improve upon the Times's illustration of the manner in which abundant grain crops lower not only the prices of food, but the prices of shoes, of cottons or woollens, of machinery, of labor, of transportation, in fact, of every article produced by man's labor and of every service that man can render to man. But the effect is precisely what we had indicated. The manufacturers of and dealers in shoes, woollens, and machinery know perfectly well that an abundant grain crop will reduce the price of their products; they are, therefore, just as we have seen that the cotton manufacturers are, anxious to sell off their present stocks as quickly as possible, even at a loss if necessary, and to reduce their production as low as they can; but neither lower prices nor reduced supplies can stimulate trade; buyers hold off for a further decline, and business remains dull and unprofitable. The indications of an approaching business depression can be followed to their source in many ways. Although the cotton receipts of the week amount to 30,000 bales, only 4,000 bales have been exported, shippers and manufacturers alike waiting for lower prices. The receipts of breadstuffs at the lake ports are increasing somewhat, but the movement to the sea-shore is less active, and falls even behind that of former less successful years; neither exporters nor Eastern millers are willing to buy at present prices. Money continues "a drug" in Wall Street, and financiers wonder why our enormous crops do not require more money to move them. It is simply because they are not moving. The great Western and Eastern railroad lines are not, with rare exceptions, materially increasing their traffic receipts over those of the same period of last year, and with only light exports the supplies of breadstuffs in this market are not much enlarged. Are these circumstances accidental? They are not. They are the first faint indications of the general depression and unprofitableness of business this fall and winter, consequent upon the generally anticipated decline in prices of almost all articles, as the natural and inevitable result of unusually abundant crops of many of our leading staples.

Years of war, destruction, poor crops, high prices, active business, seeming prosperity, and reckless extravagance have impoverished the country, and concentrated the diminished wealth of the nation in fewer hands, leaving the great mass of the people far poorer than they ever were before. This is the history of the past. Peace, reconstruction, good crops, low prices, dull business, acknowledged poverty, and consequent economy, will restore the country to wealth, and redistribute among the masses the injurious accumulations of property in the hands of the few. Such is the prospect of the future. To disguise or falsify these facts is to hinder the recognition of our national needs. We have had seven years of strife and riotous living. We are about to enter upon a compulsory accounting. When we fully recognize our position we shall, by economy, industry, and peace, seek to restore our wasted substance. But let no one delude himself with the belief that our good crops will render the accounting unnecessary, or will bridge over the gulf between substantial well-being and our present deceptive, hollow show of wealth.

MR. REVERDY JOHNSON'S INDISCRETIONS.

Harper's Weekly last week, in an article which Mr. Reverdy Johnson's friends would do well to send him and he to read—because we have little doubt it gives utterance to opinions widely prevalent at the North—commented upon that gentleman's conduct since his arrival in England, particularly his language at the Sheffield Cutlers' Banquet. The writer warns Mr. Johnson that his expressions of friendship for England, in so far as they are intended to represent the popular sentiment of this country, are exaggerated and extravagant; that, if accurate, the state of mind they describe would, after all that has happened, not be creditable to the country; and that, although nothing could be more calamitous than an outbreak of hostility between the two nations, no good is done by giving a false account of American feeling. The Weekly criticises, also, in strong terms, Mr. Johnson's mode of addressing Lord Wharncliffe, who was present at the dinner, and who during the war was one of the most active and energetic of the Confederate sympathizers; and it treats all that has occurred as a justification of the objections it made to Mr. Johnson's appointment, on the ground that his education, antecedents, and surroundings rendered him incapable of fully comprehending the nature and gravity of the change which has taken place in American polity, as the consequence of the war, and therefore made him unfit to represent the United States Government of to-day at the English court.

Now, we do not think Mr. Johnson has shown or is showing much discretion. Whatever his personal feelings may be, decency does require that he should hold aloof from the persons, small and great, who made themselves conspicuous during the last seven years in aiding and abetting in attempts to overthrow the United States Government. When he loads Lord Wharncliffe and Mr. Roebuck in public with expressions of personal esteem, he puts himself in a position more false than the French minister would put himself in if he appeared in public on terms of intimacy with Serjeant Kinglake, or than the Papal Nuncio, if he were to pass his evenings with Ernest Renan—that is to say, he offends not simply against the political feelings of the American people, but against the European standard of diplomatic propriety. It must be remembered, however, that probably Mr. Johnson is subjected just now to peculiar temptations. The Confederate sympathizers in England, unfortunately, include the foremost men and women in London society, of both parties—not the Tories only, but the Liberals; and if the American minister were to associate with nobody, or be civil to nobody who had not shared John Stuart Mill's or John Bright's feelings about the war, he would, perhaps, cut a very fine figure as an indignant patriot, but he would cut a very sorry figure as a diplomatist, and he would diminish his usefulness by about four-fifths. Now, being in this society—being, in fact, compelled by his position to be constantly in it—it is not unnatural to suppose that Mr. Johnson—having, like most other men, a weak side—succumbs to its fascinations; and that, meeting the Wharncliffes and Houghtons at dinner-tables and breakfast-tables and in country houses, he finds it more difficult to take high moral ground against them than we find it here in New York. We, who have in our time known some very good Northerners who had never, probably, trod slave soil in their lives to be overcome by the strong aroma of the peerage, and to leave "the rights of man" in their cab at the door of fine London houses, are not disposed to condemn Mr. Johnson too strongly till we know whether there is behind his fair words toward the enemies of the country any real concession to them on the subject of its rights.

Moreover, the Tory party are lavishing their attentions on him for the express purpose of securing a speedy settlement of the American difficulty, so as to have it a sa feather in their cap at the opening of Parliament, and be able to crow over the Gladstonians and compare Liberal bungling with Tory dexterity. Lastly, the Confederate sympathizers are doubtless not sorry to have an opportunity of covering a demonstration against the North under extreme politeness to an envoy born and bred in a Southern State; and men of all ranks and classes are sincerely desirous of testifying, by their welcome to the American minister, their eagerness to have all difficulties with America put at rest. It was hardly possible for the upper classes to show their real feeling in this way to Mr. Adams. Having a fair sense of humor, and a strong sense of decency, "London society" could hardly have prostrated itself, the minute the war was over, at the feet of the man who had represented the United States in the dark days of 1862-3-4. The thing was, in a social sense, impossible. In Mr. Johnson's case there is no such difficulty. We mention these things as illustrations of the kind of embarrassment in which he has probably found himself, and as a reason why he should be judged with caution.

There is one view, however, which Harper's Weekly seems to take, and on which, in fact, its criticism of Mr. Johnson seems to be based, to which we feel bound to except, and that is, that an ambassador is an envoy sent by the party in power in one country to treat with the party in power in another country. This is, no doubt, true in one sense. The party in power, in a constitutional country, is the Government of it, and has to select its foreign ministers and trace out its foreign policy. But on the correct theory of an ambassador's functions, he represents the nation as a whole, and has no right to make himself the exponent, further than accomplished facts will warrant him, of the peculiar political opinions on which the majority have risen to power. Much less has he the right to mix himself up in the political contests of the country to which he is accredited, and become a partisan in politics not his own. We insist on this all the more strenuously because as long as our ministers are looked on as party agents abroad, sent forth, as stump speakers are at home, to expound the party platform to the heathen, it is useless to hope for reform in the diplomatic service. This theory is the curse of that service now, as it is, indeed, the curse of the whole civil service. Of course we do not mean to say that a minister should not have convictions—he is sure to have them in spite of us; or that, coming from a democratic state, he should not be frankly and loyally a democrat, in the best sense of the word, or should ever shrink from speaking his opinions; but he should have as few of the feelings of a party politician as possible. Unfortunately, very nearly half the American people are not Republicans. Very slight things occurring can put one party out of power and the other party in; and as long as foreign ministers are taught to believe that their chief duty is to carry high the party standard, their tenure of office will be, as now, endangered at every election, and we shall never have a respectable, respected, highly-trained, and trustworthy diplomatic corps. It is not faithful Republicans we need abroad; these we can always have. What it is we do want, we endeavored to point out in a recent number of the Nation.

THE CRISIS IN SPAIN.

For the sixtieth time, perhaps, within the last sixty years, Spain is convulsed by insurrection. The throne of the Spanish Bourbons—the last Bourbons that have a throne to lose—is again shaken, perhaps to be overthrown for ever, perhaps soon to shine in fresh splendors of triumphantly restored absolutism. And this insurrection is not one of those ephemeral phenomena to which we have become so much accustomed in the Iberian peninsula, not one of those unexpected shocks which shake the ground for a second, but passing as rapidly as they came, leave almost all on it undisturbed; it is not an isolated pronunciamento, the result of a sudden ebullition in a town, in a province, or in the mind of an ambitious general; it is a movement of first-rate magnitude, preannounced by portentous signs, and foreseen by all who had eyes to see—a movement that will probably alter the face of the land, and cover it with ruins of fortunes and institutions; in one word, "ce n'est pas une émeute, c'est une révolution."

When the revolution shall be over, who is likely to appear on the scene and to reap its material fruits? Is it Isabella II., reinstated in all her rights, reinvested with all the power and pomp of the crown of her ancestors, surrounded by her much-tossed-about mother, her little-beloved but much-intriguing consort, her confessor, Father Claret, and her miracle-working Sister Patrocinio? Is it her son, Alfonso, a boy of eleven, who has as yet breathed no air but that of the palace, and received no instruction but from nurses, court-priests, and court-warriors? Is it Don Enrico, the brother of her consort, who now plays the liberal in exile? Is it her other brother-in-law, the Duke of Montpensier, lately banished for aspiring to found in Spain an Orleanistic branche cadette of the House of Bourbon, as his father, Louis Philippe, did in France, thirty-eight years ago? Is it her cousin, Don Carlos, junior, the successor to the claims of the man who for six years deluged Spain with blood while contesting her right—as female heir—to the throne of her father? Is it her liberal neighbor, Dom Luis of Portugal, who now, perhaps less sincerely than wisely, protests against any desire to reign over a united Iberia? Is it the old ex-Regent, Espartero, the "victorious" defender of her rights against the Carlists, but the constant enemy of her mother, and the time-honored chief of the Progressistas, who now rests on his many laurels in the shades of Logroño? Is it her former favorite, Marshal Serrano, who has by turns fought with and against Espartero, for and against the court, and is now arrayed in deadly warfare against the latter? Is it General Prim, the not more scrupulous, nor more constant, but more adventurous pronunciamento leader, the most reckless, if not the boldest, partisan of many parties who has figured of late? Is it Olozaga, the most devoted, the stanchest, but also the stiffest, and perhaps the least practical, of the old liberal parliamentary chiefs? Is it a democratic revolutionist of the younger generation whose history is not yet written? Can the men of the "historical" Moderado party, who have just lost their powerful leader, Narvaez, or those of the Liberal Union, who mourn their O'Donnell, still return to power, or is the contest now exclusively between the two extremes—absolutism and democracy? To answer these questions is far beyond our powers; we shall be satisfied with explaining how it comes that all these questions can be reasonably asked.

The geographical position and the history of Spain have combined to make its people the most homogeneous of nations. Located in an extreme corner of their continent, separated from their only neighbors, the French—for Portugal can be regarded as a detached part of Spain—by the mountain-wall of the Pyrenees, and from all other peoples by vast seas, the Spaniards—though descendants of Celts, Iberians, Romans, Goths, etc.—were moulded by an eight hundred years' warfare against "infidel" invaders, in which the bishop's staff and the sceptre aided each other, into a bigoted and throne-worshipping people of one creed and tongue, guided by monks, and proud of its chains. The discovery of America, which made it master over savages and endless wilds—the treasures of which bred adventurousness, conceit, and indolence; the Inquisition, which, at the same time that it exterminated Islamism, Judaism, and heresy, crushed all free movements of the mind and excluded all light from abroad; and the despotism of the monarchs on whose empire the sun never set, completed its intellectual isolation and degradation, which were soon followed by an unparalleled moral and material decay. At the beginning of this century Spain, with its rotten court, its corrupt administration, its ignorant nobility, its ragged army, its hungry office-seekers, its profligate priests and monks, its fighting smugglers, its pious highwaymen and proud beggars, was generally looked upon as the most irretrievably degraded of all the independent countries of Europe.

But light and life re-entered Spain—not developed by the slow workings of reform, refinement, or education, of reviving industry, commerce, and intercourse with foreigners, but carried thither by the torch of the invader. The Augean deposits of centuries of national stagnation and intellectual decomposition were stirred up and partly swept away by the Herculean torrent of Napoleonic conquest. And what is more, all the latent sparks of vitality and energy which still glimmered in the abuse-eaten Spanish people were fanned into new life by its national and fanatical exertion to turn back that torrent of invasion. A fire was kindled which was not only to destroy the assailant, but also gradually to burn out the elements of political and social disease which had threatened to consume the assailed. The deadly grapple of five years was an awful but purifying crisis. Victorious Spain was decaying Spain no more. Returning reaction, under Ferdinand "the Ungrateful," tried in vain to restore the past in all its hideousness. The Liberal movement which triumphed in 1812, and succumbed in 1814, was resumed in 1820, and, though again checked in 1823 by Bourbonic intervention from France, became victorious on the death of Ferdinand, in 1833, when his widow, the Regent Maria Christina, was compelled to look for liberal aid to save the throne of her little Isabella from the attacks of the monkish Don Carlos. When Maria Christina, after her sanguinary victory over Salic legitimacy, backed by Jesuitism, tried reaction in her own interest, Espartero saved the constitution and banished its betrayer.

But the portion of the nation which upheld Isabella against her uncle, and liberty against her mother, though strong by its intellectual and material resources, was far from being the majority of the people. And this advanced minority was itself deeply split. The Progressistas, the followers of the Exaltados of 1820, held the reins of power in their hand, but were combated and harassed by their rivals, the Moderados, who could easily find support in the vanquished Carlist absolutists. The strife of the parties became from day to day more envenomed, excesses of authority, baffled ambitions, conspiracies, and pronunciamentos, adding to the fuel. Opposed at the same time by reactionists and ultra-democrats, and finally fought against by his former companions-in-arms, Prim, Serrano, and Narvaez, Espartero succumbed, in 1843; Isabella, thirteen years old, was declared of age; her Progressista prime-minister, Olozaga, had to give way to the voluble and eloquent apostate, Gonzalez Bravo; her mother was recalled from France; the militia was disarmed, and a state of siege proclaimed. Narvaez, succeeding Bravo, completed the victory of the Moderados, stopped the ordered sales of church property, had the constitution of 1812, revised and adopted in 1837, re-revised, and vigorously quelled all attempted Progressista risings, but was compelled to yield to court intrigues. Serrano was for a time distinguished above all others by the young queen, who had married her unamiable cousin Don Francisco d'Assis. New court intrigues, however, soon reinstated Narvaez, who now began the most conspicuous part of his career, showing himself equally conciliatory and energetic. He restored order in the palace, removed Serrano, allowed Espartero to return, and, by promptly and vigorously crushing both democratic and Carlist insurrections, saved Spain from the stormy revulsions of 1848. His Moderado administration appeared liberal after his fall, in 1851, when reaction, envenomed by an almost successful attempt on the life of the queen, commenced sweeping all before it. The Progressistas had exhausted their strength in fruitless revolutionary attempts to recover power; half of the Moderados had turned absolutists; jealousies, apostasies, and desertions had loosened all organizations—the Camarilla alone was powerful. Shameful financial schemes augmented the ill-gotten treasures of Maria Christina; the wealth of the state was brought down to a lower ebb than before; forced loans were imposed; the voice of parliamentary opposition was suppressed by repeated prorogations of the Cortes; the press was gagged.

It was at that juncture of affairs, in June, 1854, that O'Donnell, formerly an eminent follower of Narvaez, suddenly raised the banner of military revolt in the capital, smashed the whole structure of reaction to pieces, reorganized the militia, and inaugurated the rule of the fusion party known under the name of the Liberal Union. Espartero formed a new cabinet, in which O'Donnell figured as minister of war. The queen-mother was again banished. Constituent Cortes were convoked to revise the constitution of 1837. But the new cabinet, composed of representative men of formerly hostile camps, was, after two years, rent asunder by jealousies and dissensions. O'Donnell formed another. The advanced Progressistas appealed to arms, but fought without their chief, and were defeated. O'Donnell, pressed back towards the ranks of his former Moderado associates, dissolved the constituent Cortes, left the constitution unpromulgated, and, the tide turning, had soon to make room for Narvaez, who composed a cabinet of men of the Moderado party, whose right wing, the Neo-Catholics, began verging more and more towards absolutism. But this as well as two other Moderado cabinets succumbed to opposition and intrigue, the Liberal Union, under O'Donnell, was restored to power, and for five years that statesman ruled Spain with unprecedented success, developing the material resources of the country, diverting the attention of the people from domestic affairs, and flattering its vanity, by warlike undertakings abroad—an expedition against Anam and the French, a brilliant campaign in Morocco, a "reincorporation" of St. Domingo, and a war with Mexico—quelling revolutionary movements with energy, and managing the court, ambitious rivals, elections, and assemblies with dexterity.

In the meanwhile the disintegration of parties and the subsoiling, so to say, of public opinion, no little promoted by O'Donnell's own activity, had been steadily going on for a number of years. The Liberal Union itself was nothing but a loose conglomeration of not entirely homogeneous fragments. Besides it there were, on one side, the historical Moderados, Neo-Catholics, and Carlists, and on the other Ultra-Progressistas, Iberian Unionists, Democrats, and even Socialists. Each fraction formed but a small minority; each was ready to fight, but none was able to govern. Every legal and constitutional basis, too, had in its turn been abandoned; every party had in its turn been rebellious; every leader had been a traitor. Every constitution had been conquered by an insurrection, every revision had been carried through by an assembly whose title could be contested. And every cabinet had violated its pledges, exceeded its authority, and made itself liable to the gravest accusations. Every leader, cabinet, and party was henceforward doomed to constant and violent attacks by hostile coalitions. The temptation and the peril of abusing the weapons of repression increased alike. And amid all these difficulties, shocks, and dangers, the financial distress grew apace.

The cabinet of O'Donnell, however, was wrecked chiefly in consequence of internal dissensions. The tide of reaction again set in, and, after some fluctuations, Narvaez was again at the helm. He began his administration with more liberal resolutions than ever, announced a reign of conciliation, unshackled the press, made peace with Peru, which had been gravely provoked, and abandoned St. Domingo; but, distrusted by the Liberals, and distrusting them, he was soon reentangled in the meshes of reaction, became embroiled in a new feud with the press, had to quell a students' insurrection in Madrid, and, meeting with too much hostility and little support, retired. Once more O'Donnell reappeared on the scene, with liberal intentions, but soon to be driven into violent reaction by a bloodless insurrection under Prim, and a sanguinary rising in Madrid, in January and June, 1866. This again paved the way for the return of Narvaez to power, who sternly carried repression to its extreme, crushed parliamentary opposition by a coup d'état, banished or incarcerated the most distinguished leaders of the opposition—and among them O'Donnell, who died in exile—stifled the voice of the press, suppressed a new insurrection, in which Prim failed to take the lead, and inaugurated a reign of terror which he, dying in April, 1868, left as a legacy to his successor, Gonzalez Bravo, with the certainty of a chaos following it.

Chaos has come. All elements of opposition to the actual order of things—if order it can be called—all repressed ambitions, all pent-up rancors, all liberal aspirations, are at once in motion for its overthrow. There is a waving and heaving on every side. There is concert in the work of destruction. But there is apparently not a single element, strong enough to make itself recognized by most others, to command harmony, and found a future. Can there be concert in reconstruction? Something will turn up uppermost, for reconstruction there must be. And as everything is equally improbable, everything is possible.

THE REVIVAL IN WATER STREET.

We have received a strong remonstrance from a promoter of the movement above-mentioned against our paragraph of last week, in reference to the proceedings at John Allen's "dance-house," and with it Dr. J. M. Ward's letter, recently addressed to the New York Times, which our correspondent assures us is a correct statement of the case, as far as it goes. He also requests us, as a matter of justice to the Howard Mission, to investigate the matter on the spot; and he energetically denies that any of the promoters of the movement have ever asserted or given out that Allen was a religious man, or have ever "sent him or allowed him to preach or pray in public." "It is to be hoped," says he, "that he may reform; but if he does n't, the Gospel is in his den."

Now, we did not intend to have it understood by what we said last week that any Christian, or body of Christians, had sent Allen out to preach or lecture. What we meant was that the leaders of the Water-Street movement had countenanced his going, or had led him by their treatment of him to believe that he was fit to go. If they can say that they have not by word or deed left on his mind the impression that he is a Christian man, or fit to instruct others, or have not furnished him with the notoriety which he needed, why, we have done them a gross injustice, and are sorry for it.

But we shall not go down to investigate the movement personally. We should, after never so diligent an investigation, be unable to say whether any impression had been produced on the denizens of the dance-houses, or whether any was likely to be produced; and we have in Dr. Ward's statement all the facts we need to know to come to a conclusion about the whole matter which is satisfactory to ourselves, and we believe will prove so to a majority of our readers. We should not accept the appearance of brothel-keepers or prostitutes at a prayer-meeting, or other religious meeting, or their participation with whatever appearance of devoutness in religious exercises, or their temporary abandonment of their callings in the presence and at the solicitation of a large number of religious people of the well-to-do classes, as proof of their reformation. To do so would be to disregard all experience of human nature and the best established rules of evidence. Such persons can offer only one proof of their desire to amend, and that is their leading good lives for a year or two at least, and supporting themselves during that period by honest industry. Anybody who asks us to accept from them anything less than this as proof of a change of heart, not only presumes upon our simplicity, but does, we firmly believe, one of the greatest injuries to religion that a professor of it can inflict on it, short of becoming himself a notorious evil-liver. When, therefore, we have been shown a prayer-meeting going on in John Allen's "den," or Tommy Hadden's "den," with their discharged harlots sitting round the table, we can draw no conclusion from it except that, for some unexplained reason, these people have for the present ceased to ply their trade.

Now, it is not denied that Allen closed his house because a sensational article in a magazine, with a misleading title, sent such crowds of sight-seers from the better classes of society to his premises as to make the prosecution of his business impossible. At this point the missionaries and others stepped in and procured the use of the house for a prayer-meeting, and after they had had it for this purpose several days, finding that Allen was being tempted to sell the lease to other people like himself, and was exposed to other temptations "from his own wicked heart," the premises were hired of him, to use Dr. Ward's language, "for religious services long enough to give opportunity for an expression of sympathy and co-operation of the Christian community in the effort that promised reformation to that portion of the city." We have no doubt Dr. Ward and his coadjutors believe that their securing Allen's house for the prayer-meeting was a lucky stroke, and promised a most favorable beginning for their work in that quarter of the city. But we beg most respectfully to differ with them. We think it one of the most unfortunate ideas that ever entered into their heads. The house and its owner had been raised into notoriety, and had, in fact, become one of the "sensations" of the day, and prurient curiosity was feeding eagerly upon them. Crowds were pouring down to see Allen because he was held up as the most degraded human being in this great city, and to see his house as the scene of the beastliest orgies that disgrace our civilization. To choose that house, therefore, as that house of prayer from which the religious influence should flow that would purify the district was to enter into the "sensation," to aggravate it, to crown it, to give it the final touch of piquancy, particularly when it was known that Allen and the prostitutes were to linger on the scene, he in the character of a "hopeful case" and they in that of "Magdalens."

But this was not all. In choosing the premises thus made notorious, they ignored the most powerful of the laws of human nature, that by which human character, whether for good or evil, is most deeply affected, which plays the most prominent part in all education, and particularly the education of the heart—the law of association. Any reformer or teacher who fails to use it goes far towards proving himself unfit for his work; but what shall we say of reformers who not only do not use it, but so order their doings that it shall work against them? This is, however, precisely what these Water-Street reformers have done. In their attempt to strike a great blow against sin, they have placed their whole reliance on theatrical contrast, being evidently of opinion that this is a more valuable agent in the work of moral regeneration than harmony; and they have accordingly chosen a place for their operations in which the influence of association shall deprive their singing, praying, and preaching of one-half their force. They select a room for their devotions for the simple reason that it has for many years been a brothel, and evidently regard as of no consequence the circumstance that everybody who enters it is likely to have his mind full of the remembrance that it was a brothel, his mind's eye full of the unclean images it calls up, and his ear full of the unclean staves and foul oaths with which the rafters have rung, and that every note of prayer and praise rises through tainted air. This may be fighting the devil, but it is giving him the choice of weapons, and letting him put his back to the sun.

It will not do to tell us that the efficacy of prayer does not depend on the place from which it ascends: that we admit; but for this very reason the Mission might have selected the place for their devotions in Water Street with reference solely to the influence of its associations on the audience. Our correspondent's remark that, no matter what Allen may be, "the Gospel is in his den," betrays, it seems to us, a somewhat hazy notion both of what the Gospel is and of the work it is intended to do. You might get the Gospel into every "den" in New York, and every den in Christendom, on the same terms on which you have got it into Allen's—that is, by paying for the use of the room; but after you had got in, the world would be no better off than ever. You would simply have driven a certain number of sinners to sin elsewhere. The problem you have to solve is not how to get the Gospel into certain rooms polluted by vice, but into hearts polluted by vice. And the important question for the public of New York is, after all, not in what apartment is this preaching and praying going on, but what number of persons have been affected by them; in other words, not, have you got Allen's "den?" but, what have you done for Allen?

The want of clear perception with which the work is being done is well illustrated by one remark in Dr. Ward's letter, which we cannot help quoting:

"Tommy Hadden's part in the Water-Street movement was similarly accidental, or rather providential. In one of the prayer-meetings at Allen's a converted sailor astonished the audience by declaring that John Allen was not the wickedest man in New York; that Tommy Hadden was a great deal the wickedest, and asked the congregation to pray for Tommy. That was the first time that any one interested in the movement ever heard of Tommy Hadden; but we soon found him; and, sitting down by his side, learned to our astonishment that God had gone before us and prepared the way; so that a quick response was given to a proposition to hold a prayer-meeting in his house. Since that time meetings have been held there twice during the week and on the Sabbath, without any charge for the use of his premises."

Here, we see a "converted sailor" is allowed to hold the balance in which Tommy Hadden and John Allen are weighed against each other, in their character of "wicked men;" and, under the guidance of this casuist, the reformers go in search of Tommy and speedily find him, and "learn to their astonishment that God had gone before them and prepared the way;

so that a quick response was given to a proposition to hold a prayer-meeting in his house." That it was God, and not the devil, who had gone before and prepared the way, is here deduced without hesitation from the circumstance that Tommy is willing to have prayer-meetings held in his house "without any charge for the use of his premises," nothing being said of the very material fact that Tommy is awaiting his trial for "shanghaeing" a sailor, and that his business has been seriously interfered with by the same causes which have broken up Allen's.

We now approach a more delicate part of the subject—because in touching it we seem to enter on the domain of theology proper. What we are about to say must, we fervently believe, be said often and emphatically by those who desire, as we desire, most earnestly to see the world won to Christianity, not on paper or in pious books and reports, but in truth and in deed. It is this: that at the bottom of much of the eagerness of the religious world to promote street-preaching, and the introduction of the Gospel into "dens," there is an almost superstitious reliance on the power of words—that is, on the spiritual efficacy of physical sounds entering through the physical ear, not unlike the importance attached by Roman Catholics to physical presence at the mass, though it be only presence in the neighborhood of the church door. That is, the work of evangelization is supposed to be going on when you utter certain phrases within the hearing of certain people, no matter what may be their character, their education, their antecedents, their bodily constitution; in other words, no matter what may be their want of fitness to receive the ideas of which the words are but the clothing. A preacher gets up in a "den" or at a street corner, and talks of God, of heaven, of truth, of love, of eternity, of holiness, of purity, of redemption, to poor wretches who have never known what even earthly love is; who hardly know the difference between truth and falsehood; into whose heads an abstract idea has never entered; to whom holiness is a synonym for stupidity, and who do not know what purity means; in whom years of physical misery and degradation have begotten such a brutish selfishness that the story of Christ's sacrifice, so far from exciting their admiration, excites their contempt. We do not deny that this literal, narrow, half-blind way of executing the command to "go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature" occasionally lifts people into a higher and better life. Now and then, no doubt, the phrases which to the mass are meaningless fall on ears prepared by memory or temperament to convey them to the understanding, and fill some poor devil with horror of his ways and the desire to amend. But, taken as a whole, this plan of "preaching the Gospel" without regard to the physical or mental condition of those to whom it is preached, has proved a miserable failure, and it is time that the Christian public of every country insisted on a more intelligent discharge of the duty.

It is eighteen hundred years since the Church was founded. At this moment the Christian religion, in the sense in which the Water-Street missionaries understand it, has taken hold of but a few hundred thousand persons in Europe and America. The great mass of the poor throughout the civilized world are to all intents and purposes as much idolaters as they were under the Roman Empire, the saints being substituted for the gods and goddesses, and their ideas about life and death and judgment not one whit more spiritual than those of a Greek peasant of the second century before Christ. The main body of the upper classes belong to the church for social and political reasons or from habit; and there has accumulated in the great cities, which are the distinctive feature of modern civilization, an enormous and growing population who are not even idolaters, who have not even imagination enough to be superstitious; to whom the fundamental social ideas are unknown, and who are only removed from the brutes by their greater ingenuity in the gratification of their animal desires. It is over a thousand years since Christianity has made any sensible impression on any considerable body of heathen, in spite of the large sums spent in missionary efforts; and we see at this moment one of the most devoted and heroic men who have labored in its service, Dr. Livingstone, risking life and health in the work of exploration, from the firm and avowed belief that civilization must precede and accompany the preaching of Christianity, if the dark places of the earth are ever to be lightened by it.

Of course the object aimed at in Water Street is the very highest that can engage the attention of Christian or philanthropist. The condition, physical and moral, of the poorer wards of this city is a disgrace to every denomination in it. Considering the wealth which is invested in the appliances of Christian worship in other parts of the city, vice ought to find it a great deal harder than it does now to maintain its footing anywhere. But whatever is done by way of reform must be based on a rational view of human nature, and of the facts of human life. Everything sensational should be rigidly excluded from it, both for the sake of the poor people whose salvation is sought and for the sake of that other great body of poor people who, amidst a thousand temptations and sufferings, are trying to keep their way straight, and look for no reward but God's approval. Christian men owe it to those who have never succumbed, and never sought help, not to set every human animal they rescue from the gutter of degradation on a pedestal and make a hero or a "curiosity" of him. To be sure, we are told that there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety-nine just men; but the joy is in heaven, where the secret workings of the heart are known. Here, where its workings are still the greatest of mysteries, we must, in the interest of human society, take it for granted that God values most highly not those who flinch in the struggle, but those who stand their ground and fight it out, for it is they who keep his very name and the knowledge of him from perishing from the earth. And no work of reform in the slums can hope to be successful in which praying and preaching is not accompanied by the removal of the victims as speedily as possible from all that may remind them of their sin and shame. A "den" is no more fit to be a "home for fallen women" than a house of worship. Human nature, and above all in its lowest state, must have a fair chance, and the aid of all good influences, if it is to rise. Moreover, the blame of the sensation in Water Street cannot be thrown, as the missionaries throw it, on the reporters of the daily papers. All their reports that we have seen struck us as temperate and well-written. But even supposing the reports have been sensational, religious reformers, undertaking a work like that going on in Water Street, must remember that the existence of the daily papers, and of their reporters, and the appetite of the public for sensations, are elements in the problem to be solved. Philanthropists have to deal with the world as it is, and not as it ought to be.

EXTRAORDINARY LETTER FROM "A THOUGHTFUL TEETOTALLER."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: You made some remarks some little time ago to "the thoughtful teetotaller" on the general subject of Grant's drunkenness, and gave also "the genesis of a rumor" which related to one particular instance of his inebriety. Permit me, as a teetotaller whom I hope you would call thoughtful, to give the genesis of another rumor of the same character as the one you exposed. I mean the one which first appeared in the Independent and Anti-Slavery Standard, and to which Mr. Phillips is again giving currency. General Grant was said to have been seen "drunk on the streets of Washington" one Sunday morning. A friend of mine—whose name I do not give because I have just now no means of communicating with him in order to get his leave to do so—long resident in Washington and respected there, a strong Republican and a person whose means of getting information are of the best kind, heard the story within not very many hours after it was first told. He at once asked the narrator of it for his authority, and the names of two ladies well known to him and known to be Radicals were given him. F Street, by the way, was, if I remember, the scene of the alleged exhibition. My friend immediately called on the ladies to enquire into the truth of the story. What they said to him was in substance this: They were walking down F Street on their way to church on the morning in question, and met General Grant, who was on the other side of the way, and was evidently going to General Dent's. They observed nothing peculiar in his look or walk or manner until he reached General Dent's door, and then he seemed very uncertain whether to go into the general's house or the next one, and for some seconds seemed to be pondering the question in his mind. Finally, he selected the right house. The ladies heard the next day that on the day before, Sheridan, who was then in the city for a day or two, had been invited to a breakfast, at which Grant was, of course, present, and that there had been a good deal of wine drunk. When this was told them they connected the fact of his dubiety as to the door with the fact of his having been at a wine breakfast, and said so, but did not base any charge of drunkenness on anything which they had seen, nor indeed make such a charge at all.

That, my friend said, was all the foundation he could ever find for the "drunk-in-the-streets-of-Washington" story, which, however, by the joint efforts of the "Wade men" and the World was for a time circulated very extensively, and apparently gave Mr. Phillips a genuine delight that "does equal honor to his head and heart," as the reporters say. The fact of the matter, my friend thought, was this: General Dent had on that Sunday morning been living in the house above-mentioned some four or five weeks. It is one of a block of four or five houses very much like each other. General Grant, it is probable, had been inside the house once or twice and no more since General Dent had taken it, and did not well know which bell to pull; so he stopped and looked; possibly read a door-plate or two. I might add my friend's testimony on Grant's general habits, but the country never was fooled by the stories which were told, and besides my letter is already too long. But it would be worth knowing how long men like Mr. Phillips can do this kind of thing and retain their own and other people's respect? I myself am getting rather tired of several of our orators. One's feelings are frightfully lacerated, and I find one seldom knows whether the lacerator is correct in his facts, and is often obliged to suspect that, to speak plainly, he cares very little whether he is correct or not.

LITERARY.

Mr. J. W. Bouton announces as ready for publication on the 10th of October a reproduction in fac-simile of the thirty-seven wood-cuts, by Albert Dürer, that constitute what is known as "The Little Passion." The work will be done by the new process patented by the New York Lithographing, Engraving, and Printing Company—which process seems to be the best one yet discovered for the purpose. The specimens of it that we have seen are certainly good reproductions. But Mr. Bouton, perhaps, hardly means to say that it may safely be affirmed that but for the texture of the paper it would be impossible to distinguish his wood-cuts from the existing impressions of the time of Dürer. Still, we shall see; it may be so.——Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. announce these works as in press: "Marcel on Language;" "Appletons' Illustrated Almanac;" "Home Stories, by Cousin Alice;" "How a Bride was Won, or A Chase Across the Pampas," by Frederic Gerstaecker, translated by F. Jordan; "The Schiller Gallery, a collection of fifty illustrations to Schiller's works, with descriptive text;" "The Poet and the Painter," an illustrated imperial octavo volume of four hundred pages, containing selections from the poets, illustrated by one hundred fine steel engravings printed on the page with the text; "Wood-side and Sea-side," an elegant quarto of ninety-six pages, very fully illustrated on wood with drawings by Birket Foster, Hows, and others, and containing some of the choicest rural poems in our language; "Travels in the East Indian Archipelago," by Albert S. Bickmore, M.A.; "Chaplet of Pearls, or The White and Black Ribaumont," by the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe," and the same author's "Cameos from English History;" "Juvenile Delinquents;" "Journal of a Sentimental Idler;" "Resources of the Pacific Slope, with a Sketch of the Settlement and Exploration of Lower California," by J. Ross Browne; "Home Pictures of English Poets, from Chaucer to Burns;" "A Historical Atlas," by Rev. W. L. Gage; "The Poetical Works of Fitz-Greene Halleck," and the "Life and Letters of Fitz-Greene Halleck," edited by James Grant Wilson; "Emperor Alexander and His Court," by Louisa Mühlbach, and the same author's "Great Elector" and "Story of a Millionaire;" "Appletons' Juvenile Annual for 1869;" "Little Rosy's Voyage of Discovery, undertaken in company with her Cousin Charley," illustrated with forty-eight full-page tinted engravings by Lorenz Frölich; "Ships and Sailors, Ancient and Modern, a sketch of the progress of naval art, with historical illustrations," by C. C. Cotterill, B.A., and E. D. Little, B.A.; "The Story of a Round Loaf," with thirty-two designs by E. Froment; "Our Boy's Holiday Book," with six full-page colored engravings and thirty-six other illustrations; "Jack the Conqueror," by the author of "Dick and His Donkey," with twelve full-page illustrations; "Animal Sagacity, a selection of remarkable incidents illustrative of the sagacity of animals," edited by Mrs. S. C. Hall, and illustrated after designs by Harrison Weir and others; "Our Dumb Companions, or Stories about Dogs, Horses, Cats, and Donkeys," with seventy engravings by Weir, Landseer, and others; "Our Children's Pets," illustrated with seventy-five designs by Birket Foster, Weir, and others; "The Children's Album of Pretty Pictures, with Short Stories by Uncle John." The same house announce these works in French: "Un Philosophe sous les Toits," by Émile Souvestre; "Corinne, ou l'Italie," by Mme. de Staël; "Aventures de Télémaque," by Fénelon; "Picciola," by X. B. Saintine; "Dictées Corrigées," and all of Racine's dramatic works. After Racine will come other standard authors. ——Mr. Loring announces "My Paris," a book of travel by Mr. Edward King.

—Our countryman, Mr. John P. Brown, of Constantinople, whose book on the Dervishes has received considerable attention during the past year from the American and English press, has now put forth a little volume entitled "Ancient and Modern Constantinople." Stevens Brothers, London, are the publishers. It is the translation of a work written thirty years ago by Constantius, a Patriarch of the Greek Church, on the antiquities and modern notabilities of the Græco-Turkish metropolis. There was a call, Mr. Brown thinks, for such a work, both as a means of informing the world in general respecting what was best worth seeing in the city and as a guide-book for the use of residents and visitors. For the latter purpose he has further adapted it by appending full notices of hotels, post service, routes and means of travel, and other like matters. To the body of the work itself he has been very sparing of additions and annotations, judging it better to leave the worthy old ecclesiastic to tell his own story without interference—even though the latter does not always look at his subjects from the point of view of a modern European investigator. The book is an interesting one, and likely to be useful to many. Its value would have been greatly enhanced by a map; but maps, doubtless, are harder to be obtained in an eastern than in a western capital.

—The Broadway is now so much of an English magazine that in reviewing the magazines of the month we do not notice it. But it is going to employ a certain number of American authors, and it will be published simultaneously in this country and England. During the year coming Henry Kingsley is to write for it a story entitled "Stretton;" Miss Annie Thomas is to write another; the Reverend Newman Hall has begun a series of articles on American matters which will meet with acceptance here and will do no harm abroad; and Mr. James Hannay, who is well able to do it, is to furnish a series of critical articles to be entitled "Studies of Thackeray." From Mr. Hannay's close acquaintance with Thackeray he might make his articles delightful, but we should say that they are going to be simply very good popular criticism of the friendly sort. In this first article Mr. Dickens and Mr. Anthony Trollope come in for raps over the knuckles, we see, and not wholly undeserved ones; but apparently the infliction on the former was done with some little temper. Mr. Walt Whitman gives us in this number one of his poems—"so-called," as they used to say in war-time; there is a tolerable sketch of Lord Napier of Magdala by a gentleman who has too much of the air of a subaltern writing about his superior officer; Mr. Towle (G. M.) writes of "Rouher" pretty well, and there is some other matter of no particular consequence. On the whole, the Broadway is readable. It is, by the way, enough of an American magazine to make it hardly justifiable for Every Saturday to borrow from it; unless, indeed, Messrs. George Routledge & Sons are content to look on the borrowing as so much advertising.

—English literature has recently lost an ornament in the death of the Very Rev. Henry Hart Milman, Dean of St. Paul's. He was a second or third-rate author in the first quarter of the century, and got good treatment from the reviewers when Byron and Scott were kings of the literary world, and Leigh Hunt and Hazlitt and Charles Lamb got nothing, or little, but contempt and abuse. Milman, an elegant Etonian and Oxford scholar—which is what he continued to be to the end of his life—was in those days the successful author of "Fazio," a play which still keeps its place on the stage, but which, off the stage, has now for a long time not been heard of. His "Samor, Lord of the Bright City: an Heroic Poem in twelve books," was, as some of our readers perhaps know, founded on legendary passages of British history, and was well spoken of by the critics. That poem also does not compel attention, and is dead. His best poetical writing is on the "Fall of Jerusalem," passages of which are still read and declaimed in schools; but this mainly because of the bad taste of the compilers of such books, as there are no very good passages in the poem. Other works of his are, "The Martyr of Antioch," "Belshazzar," and "Anne Boleyn." While these last four works were appearing he was a clergyman, having taken orders in 1817, when he was twenty-six years old, and having soon been made Vicar of Saint Mary's, Reading. His father, Sir Francis, having been physician to George Third, the son's connections were tolerably good and his rise in life tolerably sure. In 1827 appeared his "Sermons at the Bampton Lecture," which we cannot say that we have ever looked at, but which could hardly have been Milman's and not been clever enough, elegant enough, and not oppressively thoughtful. His best-known works and those best worth knowing are of later date. These are his "History of the Jews," "History of Christianity, from the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire," and his "History of Latin Christianity, including that of the Popes, to the Pontificate of Nicholas V." All these works—each of which is complete in itself—have been republished in this country, and have been, as they deserved to be, widely read; the author was a man of liberal mind, disposed to be kind and just, and, if not of great weight as an authority, is a safe guide for the general reader. But he takes rank among the third-rate historians, being neither very erudite nor very acute. In 1849, twenty years after the "History of the Jews" was issued, nine years before the "Latin Christianity," and nine years after the "Roman Christianity," he edited a sumptuous edition of "Horace." He also edited a "Gibbon," which he annotated with care and skill, for the avowed purpose of vindicating Christianity against Gibbon's supposed attacks; he was a pretty regular contributor to the Quarterly Review, and must be considered a voluminous, laborious, and highly respectable author. In 1821 he was elected Professor of Poetry at Oxford, and in 1849 was made Dean of Saint Paul's, which latter post he occupied at the time of his death. A "History of Saint Paul's" is the latest work from his hands. In religion, or rather in Church politics, he was a Liberal, and will be little mourned by the Ritualistic party and its affiliated branches. The Broad Church will perhaps regret him most. On the whole, his life was blessed with prosperity, and was useful to his fellow-creatures, but does not call for more than subdued grief.

—Faithful to his mission of arousing the English public to a better appreciation of the value and interest belonging to the historical study of language, Professor Max Müller has lately published, under the name "On the Stratification of Language," a linguistic lecture delivered by him in Cambridge in May last. It is less pointed in its aim than the fanciful title chosen for it would give reason to suppose, being rather a general disquisition, eloquent and geistreich, as everything of Müller's is, but in a more wordy and discursive style than his best productions. He furnishes some new and ingenious extensions of the parallels so often drawn between the subjects of linguistic science and geology, but little beside that is novel. Were the pamphlet likely to find extensive circulation on this side the ocean, we should feel inclined to call attention to certain weak points in it—especially to the serious mistake the author makes in assuming that the Indo-European and Semitic tongues are striking exceptions in the general history of language, are "monstra" even, by reason of their having been somehow arrested in their natural growth and petrified. Müller has advanced the same idea elsewhere, but we have not seen him try to establish it, and suspect that he would find it hard to establish.

—Of all the living students of Indian antiquity, Professor Weber, of the Berlin University, stands in many respects at the head. He has been a pioneer in various departments, a most penetrating, laborious, and productive investigator in all. What he writes is more for the learned and for special students than for the general public, his results being seldom worked out into such a shape as to be assimilable by the minds of the laity; indeed, he often gathers together from his immense reading the materials of study upon a given subject, and throws them, after only a first process of grouping, before the minds of his fellow-Indianists. Besides his numerous larger works, his own journal, the Indische Studien, of which ten volumes have been published at Berlin, is chiefly filled with his more elaborate and abstruse productions. A collection of his lighter and more popular articles, entitled "Indische Skizzen," appeared a few years since, and has been translated from the German, we believe, into more than one other language. He has now just put forth another collection of his scattered essays, under the name of "Indische Streifen." It is not precisely holiday reading, but its contents are highly important, and many a student of the Orient will rejoice at finding them in this more accessible and carefully revised form.

—Mr. MacGregor, captain and crew of the renowned Rob Roy, and type of the amphibious or aquatic variety of the muscular Christian, may congratulate himself on having been the great apostle, if not the founder, of a new British athletic sport, and the chief of the authors of "canoe literature." In virtue of his voluminousness and of the impression that he has made on the popular mind, we call him the chief of these authors. So far as concerns our own liking, we should put the writer of "The Log of the Water Lily" a good deal higher than any of the rest of his kind. Indeed, his little book we put on the shelf near Mr. Howells's "Venetian Life," and "Italian Journeys," and Mr. Reach's "Claret and Olives," as being one of half a dozen of the books of travel of the last dozen or fifteen years that we find thoroughly pleasant reading. And the log of the Water Lily's rowing voyage down the Rhine and the Danube appeared some years before Mr. Macgregor's first book, if we know his first book. But Mr. Macgregor has, we believe, had the success of making his favorite amusement a popular pastime, and been influential in the establishment of a club whose wanderings over Europe in their canoes compare favorably with the doings of the famous Alpine Club, though the latter offers its votaries the charm—almost irresistible to morbidly healthy Young England—of hard work and of peril frequently desperate. One of Mr. MacGregor's disciples we suppose it is who has been creating great astonishment among his hereditary foes in France. Some workmen, we read, were upon a certain day laboring on the new bridge of Juillé, when one of them happening to raise his head cried out: "Hah! a wild man!" His companions stared at the object that had called forth this cry. They beheld a man, very thinly clad, wearing an extraordinary head-dress—a wisp of a handkerchief?—and rowing a very long, narrow boat. "A dog was his only companion." There was a dam near the bridge which seemed to present an obstacle insurmountable by this hardy and singular navigator. But no; "he jumped into the water with his dog, got over the barrier of timbers, and, pulling his boat over also, he continued his voyage." He had accomplished this feat when, at that moment, the workmen observed to approach, as from Alençon, a fashionable coupé, in which sat a young and beautiful lady. With her the wild man exchanged salutations which showed that they were old acquaintances. Then he departed, going towards the Loire, having come to Juillé down the Garthe. It is believed by the French journals that the name of this extraordinary person is "Sir Wallace," and we dare say if his sanity is affected that Mr. Macgregor is largely responsible.

—It is now some three years ago since the Pall Mall Gazette was founded. The name was assumed with some boldness; it is the name chosen as a proper one for a periodical that one of Thackeray's characters projects—a paper or magazine that should be written by gentlemen for gentlemen. The gentlemen of the club-rooms were meant. But the Pall Mall Gazette has justified its courage, and is what its name challenged it to be. It is, aside from its news, a daily Saturday Review, conducted with more ability, if anything, than its famous exemplar, and impressing the reader as having a little better "style"—in the social, not the literary sense of the word—a simpler manner, with less of the slightly labored assumption of a certain tone. Still, both papers are written by and for the same general class of men, and faithfully reflect the opinions and feelings of the higher circles of English society, so far as these are intellectual at all. The Pall Mall is to be read, we think, with rather more pleasure than any other English paper; much as we respect the candid and able Spectator, which, however, is somewhat distastefully Episcopalian. Still, the Spectator's character is of the very highest, and to read it is morally sanitary. Many things in the Pall Mall Gazette are eminently satisfactory. Some of its leading articles on church affairs, on the woman question, and on various matters of mixed politico-legal character contain, to our mind, the ablest writing in contemporary periodical literature. It rather surprises an American to learn that they are the work of a lawyer in large practice and high standing in his profession, who writes them, many of them, at four or five o'clock in the morning. Americans work hard, but we have no leading lawyers who rise before light for the sake of influencing public opinion by means of the newspapers. Another pleasant feature of this journal is its correspondence. One man it has, if we are not mistaken, whom it maintains in service for the purpose of putting on many disguises and appearing as many letter-writers. It may have been the late Mr. Higgins. If not, the gentleman who followed up Miss Braddon, who made an innocent request concerning his rights in case a certain clergyman should call on him, and who has done many other similar things, is a successor not unworthy of the lighter mantle of the great letter-writer. The Pall Mall's literary matter is often of the highest degree of excellence, and its "Occasional Notes" make one of the most readable newspaper pages printed in English; the notes being perfectly fearless comments, often witty and always well written, on English topics of current interest and on Continental matters, which latter are perhaps oftenest treated of in a humorous and semi-satirical manner. As to American affairs, the Pall Mall is, we think, best informed of all the English journals except the Daily News. But this is not to be said as to its insight into the state of public opinion here; it is true only of its knowledge of the superficial facts. When it comes to drawing inferences from what it sees more plainly than other journals, an anti-republican feeling makes it, on the whole, less trustworthy than the Spectator, which is opinionated and without the exactest information, but whose sympathies are thoroughly with what it deems the American Liberals. It is amusing to see how the Spectator refuses to defer to its clever correspondent, "A Yankee," who, indeed, is a little wrong-headed, and whom we think not perfectly reliable as a political essayist. He is, for example, as wrong as wrong can be in his latest vaticinations, which the Spectator, with commendable courage, declines to accept. The Pall Mall, in a somewhat similar case, when a distinguished novelist—a notorious negro-despiser, by the way—and a well-known historian—if our guess is correct—both wrote American letters, of which Mr. Trollope's were colored to an absurd extent by his feelings, and the historian's were just and sound,—the Pall Mall let itself be led astray by Mr. Trollope, who found a Poland in twelve millions of people, crushed by a frightful standing army of about thirty-odd thousand effective men of all arms! But make what exceptions are possible as to the aristocratic tone of the paper, and its frank semi-cynicism, and its want of sympathy with our own country, it is still an admirable paper that we should be glad to see read by very many people in this country. We have spoken of it at length because an opportunity to do so is soon to be offered to Americans. The Pall Mall Budget is to be a weekly Pall Mall Gazette, and is to contain all the original articles that have been printed during the week in the daily paper, together with a well-digested summary of news. We may add that the Pall Mall Gazette is the handsomest daily paper to be seen anywhere, and the Budget will be as handsome.

—Lord Romilly's name as Master of the Rolls is better known than that of any former incumbent of his office, and ought to be, for no former incumbent has ever discharged the duties of the office with so much efficiency. He began the work of calendaring the records, and has brought to light so many and so important state documents as to make a new history of England a matter of necessity. But much remains to be done before such a history could be exhaustive: many historical papers of the highest interest and importance are not to be found by the most careful searcher. "The reason is," says the Daily News, "that in former times secretaries of state, when they resigned the seals, were in the habit of carrying off the papers written during their tenure of power." Fears of impeachment in those days of factious impeachments and dubious allegiances which make up so much of English history, were natural enough; and a secretary who wished to keep his head on his shoulders was wise if he burnt or removed to safe places of deposit the writings in which a new administration would have found evidences of treason, or which they could have easily wrested to his destruction. The great families in whose possession many of these records are now are, of course, from feelings of family pride, unwilling to part with the evidences of ancestral greatness; and the public treasure-house suffers. Besides papers in the hands of private families, the British Museum contains many that ought to be in the Record Office. For some reason of the kind that seem to the official mind to be of great force, and to the outside world to wear a character of the most ridiculous absurdity, the partition of documents between the two offices has been carried to such a length as that "one-half of a celebrated statesman's despatch is in the Record Office and the other half in the Museum Library." To be sure, this is an exceptional case; but plainly, a revision of the system of storage is necessary. Our Philadelphia Library, which not long since restored to the Master of the Rolls several volumes of manuscripts, furnished an example that the families above referred to would do well, the News thinks, to emulate. And it seems as if they might be induced to do so, if rewarded as the Philadelphians were for their act of courtesy. The Master of the Rolls sent them a full collection of the works which have been published under his auspices. That would at all events be enough to secure copies if not the originals of many, if not of most, of the desired papers. There are some, we suppose, which would be withheld, because affecting injuriously the reputation of men whose goodness or greatness is a part of the present family possessions; but the number of such would not be great. As for the incompleteness resulting from the division of records between the national institutions, it seems as if a little legislation ought to easily dispose of that. And it is to be hoped that Lord Romilly's zeal will increase rather than abate, and that his successor may be of like mind with himself.

—Most of the "internal evidence" relied upon by the gentlemen who would make out that Shakespeare was a lawyer or a mad doctor or an apothecary, or of some other profession, is valueless for this reason, that by equally good internal evidence he can be as conclusively shown to have been one as the other; but all he could not have been. "Was Shakespeare ever a soldier?" is the question now propounded by Mr. W. J. Thoms, a very well known antiquarian. Mr. Thoms puts little or no reliance on external evidence, but rests his case on these facts: Soon after February, 1585, Shakespeare, newly married and newly a father, seems to have hastily left Stratford. The next fact known of him is of the date of 1589, four years afterward, when he was one of Lord Leicester's company of players. Four years of his life are thus left unaccounted for. In December, 1585, the Earl of Leicester went to take command in the Low Countries, taking with him five hundred men, "procured in great part from Warwickshire, and especially from the neighborhood of his domain of Kenilworth." Among these men were two Ardens (Shakespeare's mother was an Arden) and one Miles Combe. Of this body of recruits Shakespeare may have been one, as Ben Jonson was of another, and as Gascoyne, Churchyard, and other literary men of the time were of others. It was December, 1586, when Leicester returned from the Netherlands. In March of that year Sir Philip Sidney thus writes to Secretary Walsingham, from Utrecht: "I wrote you a letter by Will, my Lord of Lester's jesting player, and I never had answer thereof. I since find that the knave delivered the letter." Sir Philip might well enough have called John Shakespeare's son, who had not then, being but twenty years old, shown himself much more than his father's son, a "knave"—a word which had not in that time lost its original good meaning. In the third place, there is in Mrs. Greer's "Calendar of State Papers, 1603, 1610," a list of the trained soldiers within the hundred of Barlichway, in which the name occurs of William Shakespeare, of Rowington. Barlichway is the hundred in which Stratford-on-Avon is situated, and Shakespeare held at the time of his death "one copyhold tenement, being parcel or holden of the manor of Rowington" in Stratford. This last evidence is of value. As for Sidney's letter, it was written in 1586, a year or so after Shakespeare's leaving Stratford—it is certain that he was there in the end of 1584, and not certain that he was not there during more than half of '85. In this short interval he had become known, it seems, to Leicester, Walsingham, and Sidney as a player. Being thus in Leicester's service, it is as likely that, being already a player, he was made a messenger between the earl abroad and his friends at home, as that, being a soldier, he suddenly became an actor, and was, while a soldier of brief standing, known as such. Researches at the Hague may throw light on this interesting subject.

—We have received the prospectus of the Chaucer Society, lately founded in England. Its object is to print all the good manuscripts of the poet's works, and nothing else, except illustrative and closely pertinent matter. One obvious advantage of such an enterprise is to render it possible to make a standard edition of Chaucer "on an enduring basis," as has been said; and it would also enable scholars in this and other countries to suggest the true text with confidence and with a title to respect such as English editors alone can at present presume upon. The society proposes to begin with the "Canterbury Tales," selecting the six best manuscripts and printing them in parallel columns (royal quarto). Six other of the next best will follow, provided the membership of the society shall reach three hundred. This parallelism will compel the order of the tales to be made uniform—as to which, by the way, it were to be wished that Mr. Bradshaw's studies in the University at Cambridge, to determine the authenticity of Chaucer's texts and the right order of the tales, were completed and published; but they are likely to be postponed by the kindred labors of the society, which will probably republish each MS. separately in its proper order. Some of the illustrative works are already announced, one being "Guillaume de Machault's 'Dit du Lyon,' the possible original of Chaucer's lost 'Book of the Leo,'" to be edited from the MSS. for the first time by M. Paul Meyer. The society went into operation January 1, 1868. The yearly subscription is two guineas, payable every first of January. Professor Child, of Harvard University, has kindly consented to be honorary secretary for America, for the purpose of saving subscribers importers' commissions. In London the indefatigable Mr. F. J. Furnivall, who is to edit the text, appears as secretary, his address being 3 Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, W. C.

—Mr. Furnivall also invites to another enterprise, for which a Ballad Society has been formed. The prospectus sets forth the undeniable aid afforded by old ballads in understanding the manners, customs, and society of former times, and then makes the rather startling announcement that the society intends to print the whole of the Pepys, Roxburghe, and a dozen other collections, printed and manuscript, together with their accompanying wood-cuts. This, it is stated, is a natural sequence of the successful publication of the Percy MS. But that collection having been made with discrimination, there were reasons for reproducing it entire which, it seems to us, do not exist in the case of the collections just alluded to. So far as we are familiar with them, a very large part of them consists of raw-head-and-bloody-bones ballads, of which a sample might be preserved and would certainly suffice, while to be encumbered with the mass of them would be almost discouraging. Nevertheless, such is the prospect. "The books will be printed in demy octavo, like those of the Early English Text Society, and the Percy folio (but on toned paper, for the sake of the [rather valueless] wood-cuts), and also in large medium octavo, on Whatman's eighty-shilling ribbed paper," at one guinea and three guineas a year respectively. Subscriptions to date from January 1, 1868, and to be paid in at once, as considerable expense has already been incurred.

VON BISMARCK.*

OTTO VON BISMARCK has inserted his name in the book of history by a few bold and telling strokes, and nothing but time can ever erase it. Were his achievements to perish, his name would survive them. Had Frederic the Great fallen at Hochkirch or Kunersdorf, and Austria retaken more than her Silesia, Frederic would, nevertheless, be grandly historical. The Gracchi, Rienzi, Wallenstein, and a host of others have made themselves immortal by attempting great things, though perishing in the attempt. Italy may become redivided and broken up into fragments, and yet Cavour will live and shine in the annals of mankind among the founders of empires and the great of all nations. He certainly has done his work, though, like everything human, it may be fragile. Even the father of history and his Solon would allow us to rank Cavour among the happy, for he has finished his career and is beyond the sphere of vicissitudes. His rival, Bismarck, may still end his career ingloriously, he may leave the scene both execrated and baffled, but his fame is even more indelible than that of Cavour, for his Bohemian Solferino has not shaped the history of only one nation. Its direct consequences were the destruction of the Germanic Confederation, the foundation of the North-German Union, the enlargement and consolidation of Italy, and a remodelled Austria. And no new complication, no new war, can undo all this. No tide will force back the new current of history simultaneously along the banks of the Spree, the Main, the Mincio, and the Danube. The stream that began at Königgrätz "was parted . . . into four heads," each of "which compasseth" a "whole land."

What a pity that the man who has so immortalized himself lacks, in his public character, moral greatness! That his public character is already historically established—though he may be far from having acted his last scenes—nobody will doubt who will devote a few hours to the perusal of Louis Bamberger's sketch of the man and his political career—a brief and concise sketch, equally remarkable for lucidity, impartiality, and soundness of judgment. The picture is the more trustworthy the less it is, and is meant to be, original. Neither does it require peculiar powers of observation and analyzation, or a specially close approach to the subject, to study and paint Von Bismarck. He is no sphinx-like character, though it is not always easy to discover his immediate or ulterior aims. He is skilful in hiding and shuffling his cards; but he never tries to disguise himself. He covers his hands, but wears no mask. He is cynically frank in deceiving, and often deceives by frankness. He feigns no political virtues, courts no immediate approbation, and often exaggerates his own contempt for dogmas and public opinion. There is no saintliness or mean hypocrisy about him; he never sneaks from camp to camp; he impudently mocks at creeds and consistency, and upholds apostasy and desertion with derision and insolence. His ambition is lofty and almost noble, but he makes no secret of it that he knows no moral restraints in the selection of his means. A German Richelieu of the nineteenth century, he has shown himself able—without even an attempt to reconcile his actions—with one hand to stifle all constitutional opposition in his own country and in the other to carry the flag of parliamentary liberty for Germany, just as his French prototype subsidized the champions of Protestantism in the Empire, while strangling it in the dominions of his king.

The public career of Bismarck can be divided into three periods. In the first he appears as the representative of his class, the nobility, or of its interests, at the Prussian diets of 1847–1850, and at the Erfurt Parliament, assembled under the auspices of Prussia in the last-mentioned year. He is then the most recklessly outspoken and defiant adversary of everything revolutionary, democratic, or only liberal. He assails the ideas of the time with cutting, insolent, and almost brutal wit and sarcasm; boasts of his mediæval notions, his Junkerthum, and his exclusive Prussianism; opposes the attempts of Frederic William IV. to unite Northern Germany, and applauds his humiliating surrender to Austria by the agreement of Olmütz. In the following period, which embraces eleven years of ambassadorial service at Frankfort, St. Petersburg, and at Paris—where he exchanged ideas with Napoleon—his external policy undergoes an extraordinary metamorphosis. The former admirer of Austria becomes her most decided enemy; he advises the Regent William to profit by her perils and prostration in 1859 for the aggrandizement of his kingdom; and, shortly after his accession to the throne, while meeting him at Baden and Coblenz, actually brings him over to an aggressive line of policy which is to resume the work of Frederic the Great a hundred years after the termination of that monarch's great struggle with Austria. Made minister-president in September, 1862, he begins the third period, which is the principal theme of the publication before us, with a series of encroachments on the constitution and the rights of the national representatives, each of which would have sufficed to kindle a revolution among a people less enduring than the German. The heart of the King, the conviction that no violent opposition to any enterprise is to be apprehended on the part of the people, and the material means for the execution of his schemes, are thus gained by Bismarck, who at the same time commences bullying Austria, coquetting with the party of national unity, and intriguing everywhere. What follows: Francis Joseph's Frankfort fiasco, in August, 1863; the reopening of the Schleswig-Holstein question on the death of Frederic VII. of Denmark; the Prusso-Austrian alliance and intervention without and against the Bund, which the cabinet of Vienna was led thus to desert and to betray, and in defiance of the London treaty of 1852, into which Prussia had been dragged by her rival; the temporary division of the prey, in a way which must end in Prussia taking the lion's share; the treaty of Gastein, which left Austria no less entangled than humbled; the continued wranglings by which the final arbitrament of the sword was provoked; the Prusso-Italian alliance, which secured the grand triumph of 1866; the secret and public treaties which secured its fruits; the foundation of the North-German Union on a national basis; the return to constitutionalism in Prussia, and Bismarck's reconciliation with the liberals and the people, after a fierce hostility which nearly cost him his life—all this together forms a grand political drama, of which the Prussian statesman is the hero, towering far above all other personages, but a hero who excites our admiration without our sympathy. Besides, we feel it, the drama is unfinished. Is the same man to be the hero of the act or acts that are still wanting? Will his character at the end appear nobler and more truly deserving of applause than in the earlier parts? Concerning this question our author, who is little inclined to prophesy, says in concluding:

"How far will it be granted to this man to develop the modern germs in himself as well as in the governmental circle which he rules by his personality? Nothing leads us to think that he has spoken his last word. Many a time, during the last two years, has he shown that he feels the necessity of leaning upon progress, in order to make front against incorrigible reaction, already lurking to overthrow him. On the other hand, he has exacted considerable sacrifices from the liberal party, in order to disarm the hostile influences that besiege the throne. . . . Everything is a matter of compromise in this Janus-faced policy, and exactly like it is the ruling personality. In spite of the elasticity of his mind, Von Bismarck will confound all those who will ever indulge the hope of finding in him anything but an aristocrat who turns progress to his advantage, prompted not by his liberal but by his political instinct."

Among the Arabs: A Narrative of Adventures in Algeria. By G. Naphegyi, M.D., A.M., author of "The Album of Language," "History of Hungary," "La Cueva del Diablo," etc. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—The finest part of this little book is, we believe, the picture of "the author among the Arabs," prefixed to the title-page. It shows him in Arabian costume, possessed of distinctly Abrahamitic features, and therefore—prima facie—peculiarly entitled to mingle with, and to talk of, the sons of Ishmael. Besides, being "a native of a country of whose inhabitants it is said that every one is born a horseman"—the name of the country is nowhere stated, but we can easily guess it if we know that Naphegyi is the Hungarian equivalent for Sonnenberg—our author must have been in his younger years a fit companion for roving Kabyls. We say in his younger years, for he went through his now historical course of Algerian adventures in the year "184–." We think we commit no offensive act of indiscretion by divulging, what a critical analysis of the narrative has taught us, that the mysterious-looking dash stands for 9. So we need not be afraid that the colored descriptions we now receive of scenes and customs might be the reflections of long-faded images and fancies. On the contrary, everything is described and rendered as if seen and heard yesterday. Then the author, as he assures us, occasionally "took copious notes," such as fortunately enable him now to reproduce, among others, a narrative of the length of forty-three pages, received from the lips of "a fair companion" on an adventurous ride. And fortunately, too, the numerous adventures are not only rendered in lively colors, but also with a minuteness of detail which leaves us no choice but to consider them either as products of a wonderfully retentive memory or of wilful invention. Now, in a book, what is not vero ought to be bene trovato, and Mr. Naphegyi's Algerian stories are decidedly too poor and clumsy to be published as fictions. Besides, there is an index added which shows that the book is written for instruction, and not for amusement only. The elaborate character of that alphabetic key to the treasures of information presented to us is almost surprising. Thus, while the whole is exceedingly brief, we have references to an Oran mosque under "Mosques," under "Closed Mosques," and under "Oran, Closed Mosque at;" to a story narrated on pp. 20–31, we have references under "Adventure in a Cave," under "Cave, Adventure in a Subterranean," and under "Bona, Adventure in a Cave near;" and to a few lines on p. 70, we have references under "Religious Toleration in Algiers," under "Toleration, Religious, in Algiers," and under "Algiers, Religious Toleration in." We must, however, confess that we can admire our author's accuracy and retentiveness of memory only in things remote, romantically hidden, and by us inscrutable. Wherever we can follow him on trodden paths—and in his numerous digressions he rambles far away from the caverns, deserts, and awful monkeys of Africa—both his accuracy and memory fail him amazingly. His orthography becomes corrupt, his geography mixed up, his fancy ungovernable, his history muddy, and even his arithmetic defective. He Russianizes his Polish names, Gallicizes his Arabic names, and Germanizes all his Hebrew. He magnifies little Podgorze, near Cracow, into "a city" (p. 140), makes Galician Biala a town of Silesia (p. 90), and the Danube to flow as far south as the Dardanelles (p. 83), speaks of "a Sanhedrim, composed of three rabbis" (p. 109), identifies "rabbi" with "high-priest" (p. 154), compares the Jewess of Russia with the Jewess of Spain (p. 13)—who has still to be produced—converts the Jewish wedding-ring into "thirteen gold pieces," and translates the Hebrew ritual words meaning "Be thou hallowed to me by this ring," into "I hereby buy thee with this coin;" talks most absurd stuff of Polish Jews and Carpathian Slovacks, especially Slovacks residing in the "Liptauen Comitat," which, if corrected, would be the German for the Hungarian county of Liptó; tells a long romantic story about the "Archduke Albert, brother of the late Emperor Ferdinand of Austria" (p. 141), who "was once travelling in Upper Austria by post," driven by a female postilion, whom he afterwards married, a story which—mutatis mutandis—is true of Archduke John, the late renowned Germanic Reichsverweser and uncle of the Emperor Ferdinand, who never had a brother Albert, the Archduke of that name being his cousin—things which a former subject of Ferdinand perhaps ought to have known; makes "seven German miles equal to about twenty-seven English" (p. 144), and "eight silver golden" (sic throughout) to "seven francs" (pp. 6–7)—which credat Judæus! After all these observations, it is highly consoling to know that the next literary production of the author of "The Album of Language," "History of Hungary," "La Cueva del Diablo," etc., is not to be on things with which he and we ought to be familiar, but that he hopes, "dear reader, . . . to have your company in the Great Desert of Sahara."

Excelsior; or, Essays on Politeness, Education, and the Means of Attaining Success in Life. Part I., for Young Gentlemen. By T. E. Howard, A.M. Part II., for Young Ladies. By a Lady (R. V. R.) (Baltimore: Kelly & Piet. 1868.)—This book, as the "result of a reflecting and analyzing experience of more than a quarter of a century," is offered to the public by its authors with a "certain confidence that it will qualify young gentlemen and ladies to move with becoming decorum and propriety in the best circles of American society." We do not ourselves share this confidence, and though we have been greatly amused with the results of Mr. Howard's long reflection and analysis, we doubt if the laugh he would have over it would quite repay any reader for the cost of the book. That would be a cheerful school in which the pupils should be required to learn by rote, as Mr. Howard suggests, either his prose remarks or his verses. "Never," he says to boys, "do anything which may deprive you of your senses; for if you do, you will be certain to act in some way of which you will be ashamed when you recover." Another astute remark is to the effect that "we must remember that a well-developed body is not simply a fat one. A man may be fleshy, and he is not to be blamed for that if he cannot help it; but he must take no credit to himself for his useless burden of fat." We give, also, a specimen or two of the verses, a few of which, their author thinks, it would be profitable for young people to commit daily to memory. The worst thing about them is, we find, that it is so difficult to forget them:

"The use of spoons we all suppose That every human being knows."

"Refuse not soup, but nicely sip
From the spoon's side and not its tip."

"Bread, nuts, and fruit, dear sir and madam, Eat in the mode of Eve and Adam."

Some of his most characteristic sayings, however, have a startling directness and simplicity which puts them outside of quotable limits. Altogether the book is the most singularly ill-adapted to the work it professedly undertakes of any of the recent educational works we have seen.

IMPORTANT PUBLISHED WORKS OF ART AT GOUPIL'S.

A VERY FINE CHROMO.

THE skilful workmen who are working at chromo-lithography in France are doing wonderful things with their art. And not in France only, for the most extraordinary chromo we have yet seen comes now from Düsseldorf. As a general thing, however, French work has been the best, and we do not know that the present case is really an exception. The print to which we allude is the fruit-piece after a painting by Preyer, of Düsseldorf, a chromo which is published here by Mr. Knoedler and sold generally at the same price as that asked for wretched affairs of home manufacture, a fact which must be taken into the general account as an important item. If chromo-lithography as perfect as this, and involving such constant and long-continued care, can be done at that price—well, the Arundel societies of the future will be the better for it, and the skill requisite to multiply and make salable such merchantable pictures as this of Preyer's—which is art of commerce—will be applied to teaching the people what real art is.

The picture in question is a little fruit-piece—just grapes and nuts and the like, with vine leaves, as of a vine of the Rhine vineyards, curled up with autumn suns, and, with them, a glass of still wine, which may be Johannisberger, or any other of the kind one pleases. Indeed, the whole work is as German as possible, and speaks of a Rhine town, and of the wine which, while and we cannot accept anything French in connection with the subject or treatment.

"Ihn bringt das Vaterland aus seiner Fülle,"

"——wächst nicht überall im deutschen Reiche,"

Far be it from us to say a word in favor of Düsseldorf art in its general tendencies, or a word to give to Preyer any artistic rank beyond that earned by great dexterity and patience. It is a low class of pictures that his works belong to; having little of that beauty of color and delicate perfection of handling which alone can make fruit-pieces any longer endurable to a world which has had too much of painted dessert. But the very absence of glow and mystery of color has made perfect reproduction by chromo-lithography more nearly possible, and has enabled us to say, as we do, that for all purposes, except that of display and ostentation, the chromo is as good as the original, or as good as any Preyer we ever expect to see. It is a wonderful piece of work, and, for those persons who still care for fruit-pieces other than William Hunt's, well worth buying. It is, of course, kept free from the absurd disfigurement of a stamped roughening like threads of canvas all over it—a vile thing which at once would take our American chromos out of the domain of art and make cheap furniture of them, though they were ten times as good as they are. And for those who are interested in the art of chromo-lithography we recommend a study of the folio M. Knoedler has by him, in which are contained prints illustrating the different steps toward completion of this excellent print. More than thirty stones were used in its preparation—and the different functions of these, singly and in combination, are set forth in this interesting collection.

THE ENGRAVING OF CHRIST IN THE TEMPLE.

This is a tolerably large line engraving of the important picture by William Holman Hunt of the "Finding of Christ in the Temple." The painting was on exhibition in London as long ago as the spring of 1860; and ever since that time it has been constantly shown in the cities of England, always alone, always at a shilling a head and no season tickets, and always attracting numerous visitors. In fact, its great popularity as a show has been almost wholly inexplicable. Let it be admitted that the attractiveness, to the Low Church and Dissenting public, of the biblical subject accounts for a part of the crowd of visitors, this cannot explain the fact that it has proved so continuously attractive. For it cannot be said to have given enjoyment to many persons. It is probably more abused than praised—more sneered at than enjoyed, as a work of art.

The object of such special exhibitions of single pictures is nearly always the procuring of subscriptions to engravings of them. In the Bond Street Exhibition room, nine years ago, the subscription book was open, and the visitor was assured that, if he would subscribe to the engraving, no money would be wanted until the engraving should be ready for delivery. It would be interesting to know how many of the subscribers of the first year are now ready to receive and pay for their copies. For it is this month of September, 1868, that sees the first artists' proof of the engraving brought to New York; and the prints are not yet ready for delivery.

We shall not now enter into an account or a criticism of the picture; there is some hope that it may be brought to this country before long, and it will be an event in the art history of New York when its exhibition is opened. But the exquisite proof which hangs in Mr. Knoedler's store is worthy of especial mention for its own sake—as an independent and admirable work of art; and that the more because few, if any, important English paintings have been well engraved in line. Nearly all the best known pictures, whether Landseer animal pieces, Pre-Raphaelite pictures of sentiment and imagination, or popular bits of genre, have been engraved in stipple or mezzotint. The "Light of the World," Holman Hunt's best known and very valuable and celebrated religious picture, was engraved in mezzotint with great skill and success—the expression of the face especially well preserved. Afterward it was engraved in pure line, and on a smaller scale, for Messrs. Gambart & Co., with less satisfactory result. This is one of the very few cases in which a modern English picture has been rendered by pure line engraving. The present work has been executed by a Frenchman, M. Auguste Blanchard; it is an engraving of the first class of modern engravings, of good tone, and renders the picture in most respects exceedingly well. Farther criticism we willingly defer until it can be compared immediately with the picture.

"CARBON" PHOTOGRAPHS FROM DRAWINGS BY THE OLD MASTERS.

The especial advantage of the carbon process in photography is the imperishable nature of the prints produced; and these prints, when of landscapes and other out-of-door subjects, are often so deep in tone and exaggerated in shadow as to be very undesirable as pictures, in spite of this permanence and of great minuteness of detail. But the copies made by this process of drawings in the great collections at Florence and Vienna are in every way admirable. The importation of these copies seems to us an event of great importance. The press announces the exhibition in New York of a newly-imported French painting, and that is right enough. The picture may contain much instruction for both artists and public, and may show a skill which will be of use when the painters have learned to design. But these drawings of the old masters contain instruction of a higher sort than most modern work, and bring the student into communion with art that was really great, and is immortal. The drawings which they reproduce are, of course, the studies and sketches of their artists. No attempt is made to copy works in color, and the most elaborate works of art rendered by any of their copies are heads from cartoons for fresco.

Every European traveller remembers the frames of drawings which hang in the lower rooms and inner rooms of the great galleries. Studies in chalk, and in pen-and-ink, and with the brush; heads and half-length figures and groups, all in pen-and-ink, and on a small scale, by Raphael; elaborate chalk drawings of drapery by Da Vinci, and the like. These we have reproduced—fac-similed, indeed, in many cases—by the carbon process. Three little drawings of Raphael, mounted on one board, are the originals themselves in color of paper, color of the faded ink, stains, and spots; a life-size head in red chalk, by Greuze, and one in black, by Fra Bartolomeo, are exact in color and in the crumbly touch of the soft crayon; a study of Michael Angelo's for his "Plague of the Fiery Serpents;" an elaborate composition by Rubens for the scene of Herodias's triumph; a vigorous head from the hand of Dürer—all are as if the originals had been stolen from their portfolios or frames, and brought hither. It is not meant to say that it would be difficult in many cases to distinguish copy from original; but for all purposes of study and enjoyment the reproduction is without fault, and far surpasses any previous achievement in multiplying works of art.

The Week.

BEFORE this time next week the people who practically decide the Presidential contest will have voted in the three great central States, and the citizens of these will, we are confident, have voted for the Republicans by a popular majority of not less than fifty thousand. But there is every reason to fear that their own citizens will not do all the voting that will be done in Ohio, Indiana, and especially in Pennsylvania. Mr. George Wilkes, who is an authority of some weight in such matters, asserts that the Wormald and O'Baldwin prize-fight, postponed from the 13th to the 15th of the month, is postponed in pursuance of a bargain between Democratic managers, who paid the men $200 in order that some hundred or two of the most reliable "repeaters" should not be drawn out of Philadelphia on the day of election. This is a story that might be disregarded; but the other day a thief was arrested in the street, and on his person were twelve duly certified naturalization papers with seal and signature all complete, except that a blank was left to be filled in with the name of any New York or Baltimore rough who should go on or be sent to Pennsylvania to vote. Judge Sharswood has ordered an investigation, which will determine the guilt or innocence of the prothonotary, but the Republicans are ignorant whether or not these blanks are out by the thousand, and fear the loss of the city, to say nothing of the State. They are now vigilant, however, and have been so for a week, and will undoubtedly watch the polls well. By right, the counties east of the Alleghanies being about equally divided between the two parties, and the western part of the State being decidedly Republican, Pennsylvania ought to be carried by more than ten thousand.

In Indiana there is much talk of the importation of voters from Kentucky into the southern counties, and we have no doubt much of it is true. Keeping within the letter of the law, the Indiana Democrats, if they had the money and chose to spend it so, might have put several thousands of Kentuckians into Southern Indiana. But we fear it is true that their Republican opponents are not much behind them, and if the Democrats are not watchful it is likely enough that the Republicans may go out of Indianapolis with more than five thousand majority. Ohio is safe, although there doubtless will be some false voting. Vallandigham, it is well enough known, has "colonized" his District, and there will be some cheating in the river counties. But the State will undoubtedly be carried by the Republicans, with a possible loss of two Congressmen. The Democrats may be expected to gain a Congressman or two in Indiana, as well as one or two in Pennsylvania, but both those States, as well as Ohio, we still consider safe for the Republicans on the 13th. Getting two of them is sure victory in November; to get them all is to have no fight in November.

The South will, we trust, see reason before the month is out to tranquillize itself a little; but meantime there is plenty of disorder, and the accounts received from private sources of the condition of things there are worse, although we are in the hottest of the campaign, than those which are printed in the party papers. In Georgia, a few days after Camilla, another sheriff and party of citizens rode out to meet another Republican procession, and warned it not to enter Warrenton, as "the citizens" would not permit Radical speech-making. The procession thereupon betook itself to a negro church outside the town limits, and by-and-by getting word that they were to be attacked they broke up and fled, receiving a shot or two at parting. One correspondent goes systematically over the State and apportions murders to the various Congressional Districts thus: "In the Third District, of which Columbus is the most important town, there have been several freedmen killed, and there is a good deal of insecurity. In the Fourth District, three influtial Radicals have been killed, and the Democracy is very intolerant." The Fifth District is that in which the Warrenton affair occurred, and there "Ku-klux are numerous." The Georgia white Unionists are said to be loud in denunciation of General Meade, for having, by his bad management, "botched reconstruction," and talk of making an exhibit of their case now and at the time of the election, as soon as Congress meets. Possibly General Meade has had no great relish for his duties since he went down there; and there is about him a certain Philadelphia tone, which people know about who know Philadelphia, which might make it easy to complain of him; but we see no definite charges made against him, and have no doubt of his having been a well-meaning, if not, perhaps, a particularly effective and willing officer. From Louisiana, news comes of a second and worse Camilla, at Opelousas. A Republican newspaper office has been gutted, the editor probably lynched, a schoolmaster whipped, and scores of negroes murdered. The negroes had turned out with arms to protect the schoolmaster, but had gone home quietly at his request. Then the whites assembled, disarmed the negroes, and began killing. Radicalism is done in Saint Landry Parish, the Democrats say, for this Presidential election any how. A colored man, Mr. J. Wills Menard, has, we see, offered himself as a candidate for Congress. The Forty-first Congress, he says, "must have more backbone" than the Fortieth, and that the colored people of Louisiana ought to be represented by their own color. There is a time for all things, however; and Mr. Menard has little sense, or he would not take just this moment to come forward.

From Arkansas we hear nothing; but we hear of 4,000 stand of arms which are lying on the levee at Memphis, and which, it is supposed, are going to Arkansas for distribution among the negroes. No steamboat captain, it is said, will touch them. Almost every steamboat captain on the lower Mississippi is from conviction a hater of the negroes, and such as are not will, for business reasons, leave the guns where they lie, and Arkansas must for a while longer let most of the shooting be done by the Klan. The Alabama Legislature has been so slow in providing a registry law that now there is not time, it is said, to register the voters, and thus there will be no Presidential electors in that State. We are not sure that the majority are not wise to manage in this way what looked like a very ugly matter. In Mississippi everything seems quiet enough; but Mississippi is "a long way from any place," and news comes slowly at the best, and generally does not come; but a person who should ride through the back-country districts might pick up items, we dare say. In the back-country of Texas things happen like this: A civil agent of the Bureau, being in charge of a detachment of soldiers, fired on a mob which he was trying to disperse, was arrested by the civil authorities, tried, and would have been hanged if, while he was lying in jail, a party of United States cavalry had not accidentally heard that the soldiers were in jail, and, riding there, released him and his companions. Texas is the worst, to be sure. Tennessee, the loyal part of it, is much agitated over the prospect of having General Gordon Granger in command, instead of Thomas, who is to go to Washington. He has been a military-politician now for years, and Mr. Johnson may mean no more harm in giving him Thomas's place than to reward him for his presidency of the White-Boys-in-Blue Convention at Cleveland two years ago. North Carolina continues to be, as she has been almost constantly since the war, the one white spot on the Southern map.

General Sherman wrote a letter last week to the Boys in Blue assembled at the Philadelphia demonstration, in which he enclosed one from General Grant, both treating of the position of army officers with regard to political agitation, and their relations to political parties. Both generals agree that inasmuch as military officers have to serve under different administrations—that is, are now what we hope to see all public functionaries become, servants of the nation at large, and not of any particular portion of it—they "ought to keep out of political assemblages, conventions, and controversies altogether" (Sherman); "and should not make themselves obnoxious to any party likely to come into power" (Grant). This is not only excellent doctrine, but it will cover more ground than its authors intended it to cover. It is, to our mind, perfectly applicable to the diplomatic agents of the Government. They too ought to be able to serve different administrations, holding different opinions on questions of home policy, and therefore ought not to be called upon to be party apostles in foreign parts. Of course, it may be said: "But then the creed of our party is so noble, so elevating; an ambassador ought to be only too proud to uphold it," etc. We being perfectly familiar, however, with the arguments against all reform which may be drawn from considerations of present convenience, adhere to the position which we took last week apropos of Mr. Reverdy Johnson. As we expected, the London correspondents of the Radical papers are now after him in full cry; are accusing him of a deliberate attempt to betray his Government in the negotiation of the Alabama difficulty. We venture to say that not one of them has a particle of knowledge of what is going on on this subject, of what Mr. Johnson is doing or going to do, or has a single reason even for suspecting him of treachery or weakness, except his over-civil language to Mr. Roebuck and others. Those who imagine that the correspondents accompany the American minister in his visits to the Foreign Office are mistaken.

---

General McClellan was invited to preside at the Democratic mass meeting in this city on Monday, but declined in a letter which showed that he thought well of the Republican candidate, but disapproved of the reconstruction policy of Congress. His allusion to the national credit was also an implied disapproval of the Democratic doctrine on this subject. He announces his intention to take no further part in politics—an exceedingly wise resolution, which, if adopted before writing the Harrison's Landing letter, would have furnished him with a very different reputation from the one he now enjoys. The principal "standard-bearer" of the meeting was Mr. A. Oakey Hall—the celebrated district-attorney of this city—and the proceedings were generally of a noisy but melancholy character. The procession was, however, imposing as regards size and the number of "curiosities" it contained, including effigies of "carpet-baggers" and "scallawags."

---

There appears to be some doubt as to whether Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, will be renominated for the next Congress, or whether, if nominated, he will accept. We sincerely trust that if there be any hesitation in the matter on the part of his constituents or himself, they will speedily put an end to it. Men like Mr. Jenckes are rare enough in Congress to make his retirement from public life a public calamity, even if he were not already charged with the conduct of a reform—the Civil Service Bill—on the success of which, we verily believe, the continuation of this government in its present shape depends. He has fully mastered the measure, is identified with it in the public mind, and has faith in it, and is, in our opinion, solemnly bound to carry it through. Moreover, we cannot help hoping that we are entering on an era in politics in which men of his stamp will have a chance of playing a part in American politics they have not played for a long while. Unless we are greatly mistaken, the reign of the unscrupulous and ignorant brawlers and "war-horses" is drawing to a close, and we shall have a season, at least, of men who believe, and show that they believe, that the Almighty intended nations to be governed by human reason and human experience.

---

We shall soon feel compelled to "turn away with loathing," as they say in Mobile, from the low-lived scoundrel who favors negro suffrage. Things are in a frightful state in Virginia; so different from what they were before Pierpoint's treachery! The World says:

> "A late visitor to the Eastern Shore of Virginia says the negroes there are degenerating into absolute barbarians; that they peer out from the bushes at travellers like wild beasts, and then scamper away on being discovered."

Well may the World add: "Nice 'progress,' this is." We would simply ask any candid Republican if he would like his daughter to marry one of these beings? It is supposed, we believe, that they have taken to the woods to escape the tyranny of the carpet-baggers, and that they are rapidly learning that their truest friend is the Southern gentleman. A party of the citizens are scouring the woods with dogs.

The Butler troubles in Massachusetts have been marked during the past week by an amusing episode. The general produced a telegram from Mr. Samuel Ward, who figured in the impeachment "investigation," addressed to Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Boston, deploring the rumored refusal of Mr. Dana to accept the nomination for the Essex District, and concluding with a poetical but highly repulsive description of the general's lineaments. The object of the production of the telegram was, of course, to connect the Dana movement with the gold-gambling anti-impeachers, and thus bring into play the only argument that is now ever used in Butler's defence—that the Copperheads hate him. Of course Mr. Atkinson had the ready reply that he knew Mr. Ward only very slightly, and that, to put himself in possession of the telegram, General Butler must either have concocted the sending of it with Mr. Ward, or have bribed the operator to reveal it, or have stolen it from Mr. Atkinson's office. The general replies, with much abuse, that he received a copy of the telegram in a private letter from a stranger who had seen it. He also accuses Mr. Atkinson of having defrauded a savings-bank, by paying off in greenbacks a debt contracted in gold; suppressing the material fact—he hates material facts—that Mr. Atkinson paid the debt as the officer of a corporation, and had no alternative as to the kind of currency. The correspondence has closed with a violent outburst of billingsgate from the general, who offers five hundred dollars reward to anybody who will reveal the dishonest tricks of his opponents, and insinuates that "the devil will get hold" of Mr. Atkinson both in his official capacity and as a private individual.

Of course all this is shocking as well as amusing. But we must not blame the general too severely for it. His moral perceptions never were particularly acute, and his sojourn in the Republican party has done nothing to sharpen them. In fact, he has hardly one bad tendency which the party has not done something to encourage. It exposed him to terrible temptations of all kinds when it sent him to the South as a proconsul. By putting him amongst the impeachment managers it gave him an opportunity of displaying on a great scale and before the civilized world the qualities which have won him his bad eminence at the bar. Finally, by giving him "full powers" to try and break down the characters of its most eminent and able men, such as Grimes, Fessenden, and Trumbull—men who have played the leading part in building it up, and have been its boast and glory, and who have twenty-five or thirty years of honored and honorable public and private life behind them, and whose corruption would prove American society rotten to the core; by allowing him to take evidence in secret and produce as much or as little of it as he pleased, and to put what construction on it he pleased; to convert a nominally judicial report into a vehicle for the vilification of judges who had decided against him in a case in which he was counsel, and on the winning of which his political fortunes largely depended, it did all it could to convince him that it cared neither for truth nor decency. Under all the circumstances, we confess we are astonished at his moderation. But the Hartford Post has hit the nail on the head in saying that the Republican party cannot afford to bear the burden of him any longer, and the Essex District Republicans will render the party the highest service by relegating him to private life.

Shortly after the news of the earthquakes in South America arrived, one of our contemporaries called loudly for a scientific enquiry into the origin of these convulsions, evidently with a view to the prevention of them, or, at all events, to the discovery of some means of foretelling their occurrence. It would certainly be most desirable if they could be regulated at least, or their operation confined to "wild lands" and other uninhabited areas, because there is little doubt that their frequent recurrence in any peopled region must be a serious obstacle to the material or moral progress of the inhabitants, to say nothing of the damage done by them to property. The expectation of them must destroy the habit of looking to and working for distant results, which is, after all, at the bottom of all that is really valuable in character, whether national or individual. A man who counts on having his house knocked down about his ears every ten years is pretty sure to cease counting on much else. The London Daily News, by way of consolation, calls attention to the good results of earthquakes; the part they have played, according to Lyell and Huxley, in keeping the dry land above water, and in preparing coal-beds, and directing the Gulf Stream, and otherwise rendering the globe a comfortable abode for civilized men. But it warns those who now read of earthquakes as distant calamities, only to be feared in partibus infidelium, that there is reason to believe that they shift in the course of ages from one part of the globe to the other, and that it is fair to suppose that the turn of the highly civilized portion of the globe, which now enjoys almost complete immunity from them, may yet come, and nobody knows how soon. The danger which has so often been spoken of, that a body of water may find its way into one of the great fissures and generate steam enough, by contact with the great central fires, to blow the world up, would be a profitable subject of reflection if any precaution was possible, but there is none within our reach.

There is only one subject in European politics now exciting much attention, and that is the relations of France and Prussia, and in these there has been no perceptible change since last week. The papers are full of conflicting rumors, and take diametrically opposite views of the construction to be put on the various sayings and doings of the two monarchs. The King of Prussia's recent declaration, that Prussia desired and expected peace, but would know how to defend herself if attacked, is considered by the Prussian press as increasing the chances of peace. The French and Austrian papers, on the other hand, treat it as a sign of war; but the action of the Government in leaving the last draft of 120,000 men in their homes strengthens the view taken by the former. The fact that Bismarck is still an invalid and is said to be about to spend a considerable portion of the autumn at an English watering-place—the climate being considered likely to soothe his nerves—is perhaps, however, a still stronger guarantee of Prussia's good behavior than the failure to call in the recruits.

As regards France, the question of war or peace seems to turn entirely on the state of domestic politics. The general belief is that if hard-pressed at home the Emperor will fight; that if not, he won't. But the state of domestic politics does not improve, from the Imperialist point of view. Public life continues to revive, to use the language of the opposition; or the spirit of discontent grows, to use the language of the Bonapartists. The Government has avoided a second electoral defeat in the country districts, but by a diminished majority; and the uneasiness of all classes of the population plainly increases. The story of the coup d'état, which was supposed to have lost all interest for Frenchmen, and which nobody but Kinglake ever undertook to tell in detail, has just been revived, as we mentioned a week or two ago, by a M Ténot, who has published two volumes, one describing what occurred in Paris and the other what occurred in the provinces, and they are having an enormous sale—having run through three editions in about a month. It is a horrible story, and well told—a story, in the main, of men butchered by the dozen simply for having resisted an attempt to overthrow an established popular government. The worst of it is that the Imperialists cannot suppress it, because they have constantly maintained that the coup d'état was one of the most glorious events in French history. M. de Mazade tells a story of Louis Napoleon having at a state reception asked the Duc de Broglie, in 1852, whether he did not place it in the same rank with the Dixhuit Brumaire, and of the duke's replying "that history would judge."

---

It ought to be mentioned that the King of Prussia's speech produced a fall on the exchange both in London and Paris, and the French ministers felt it necessary to send an explanatory message to the Commissary of the Bourse showing that the King meant no harm, an incident which has greatly annoyed the Emperor. The feeling of mingled disgust and anxiety in European commercial circles is said to be intense. The mere refusal of the Emperor to make a short address to the generals on leaving the camp at Châlons, lest his words might be misconstrued, is declared by the Daily News, in its money article, "to have caused a depreciation of millions sterling in the market value of European investments."

The Spanish insurrection has ended, as was anticipated, in the dethronement and exile of the Queen, almost without a struggle. She is now in France, living in the Castle of Pau, in which the founder of the royal house of Bourbon, of which she was a few days ago the last reigning monarch was born. The provisional government which has been installed in her stead is composed mainly of generals, with Marshal Serrano for president. Whether there are any politicians among them remains to be seen; but experience justifies one in fearing the worst. Three or four "war-horses," from our House of Representatives, probably possess more political wisdom, and would set up a better government in a week, than the whole body of Spanish "statesmen" will contrive in a year. Marshal Serrano is seventy-six years old, which is a bad thing to begin with. There is some talk of a republic, but not much that is weighty; the mass of the people are not ready for it, being ignorant, as yet, of their "natural rights." The natural successor of the Queen is the Duc de Montpensier, but he is an Orleanist, and it is supposed the selection of him would lead to French interference. The catastrophe, however, can hardly fail to have a highly injurious effect on the Imperial régime in France. Examples of this kind are contagious; and the government which would follow the Emperor's death, if he were to die now, would be very like the one which has just been overthrown in Madrid, a fact of which the French public becomes every day more conscious. The Queen's offering to hold Rome for the Pope, a few weeks before her deposition, is one of the most striking illustrations to be found in Bourbon history of the blindness by which the race has been ruined. Long-established dynasties seem to lose not only all sympathy with the nation, but all perception of popular feeling, a proof of the moral as well as ceremonial isolation of royal personages.

Italy, for the first time, reports a surplus, but as the news comes by telegraph it is perhaps as well not to be too confident about it. The official treasury statement of August 31 sets the revenue down at $391,320,041, and the expenditure at $370,201,864. The Florence official press contradicts the rumor that a demand had been made on the French by the Italian Government for the evacuation of the Papal territory, on the ground that no such demand is necessary, as the French Government knows well that in keeping its troops in Italy under present circumstances it is violating a solemn engagement. The late "unpleasantness" with Prussia is being smoothed over by the extraordinary attentions paid both there and in Austria to General Pianelli, whose bold disobedience of orders at Custozza prevented the defeat from becoming a rout.

THE FINANCIAL CONTROVERSY.

A VERY animated and somewhat acrimonious discussion is at present going on in the press and on the rostrum concerning the actual and prospective receipts and expenditures of the National Government. The immediate cause of the discussion is to be found in two letters from two bureau heads in the Treasury Department, speaking each with apparent authority, but showing a wide divergence in their statements and assertions. The remote and more potent cause of the discussion, and especially of its having assumed so angry a tone, must, however, be sought in the fact that each of the two writers is supposed and believed to be in close sympathy and intimate relations with one of the two opposing political parties, and that their statements are hence taken to be inspired by party motives, colored by party desires, if not actually manufactured to suit party purposes.

It is not easy to imagine a circumstance more damaging to the reputation of Mr. McCulloch as a statesman or public administrator, than that for weeks past the public mind should have been knocked to and fro like a shuttlecock between the battledores of opposing officials, one proving national bankruptcy inevitable, the other showing a certain surplus of income over outgo. The law, indeed, does not require the Secretary of the Treasury to step forth and settle every disputed question concerning the finances, but it does seem to us that if the Secretary cannot prevent his subordinates from publishing semi-official, but absolutely contradictory, statements of facts which do not come within the range of their special duties, he ought certainly himself to furnish to an excited public some official indication as to which of his subordinates is entitled to belief. It is neither just to the subordinates themselves nor right towards the people to leave them to their own conclusions on such a question. Still less is it possible for the great mass of even well-informed persons to arrive at a decision as to the trustworthiness of the officials from an examination of the facts themselves. The latter are not always readily accessible. They are presented, even in their official form of reports to Congress, in such a shape that few people can unravel their meaning. They are at all times complicated and difficult to understand, and they have, during the present discussion, been so thoroughly covered over with all sorts of ridiculous assertions, counter-assertions, estimates, and sensational calculations that the public is fairly bewildered. We cannot well understand how a public officer in Mr. McCulloch's position can allow such confusion to exist, without giving his own simple statement of the facts, and at once restoring the public confidence.

The practice of public letter-writing on the part of subordinate Government officials at all times, but more especially in times of political excitement, is open to objection. Mr. Spinner's, Mr. Wells's, and Mr. Delmar's communications are all alike headed "Treasury Department," and in the eyes of the public have like official weight. But what confidence can the public have in any statement issuing from the "Treasury Department," when one of its officials states to-day that the estimated and appropriated expenses of the Government for the coming year are less than two hundred and ninety millions, and another official states to-morrow that the same expenses exceed four hundred and eighty millions? or when another official states that during the past year the receipts have exceeded the expenditures by thirty-five millions, while the Secretary himself states that receipts and expenditures have been about equal? The great mass of the people are not professional book-keepers, who can trace an error or a slight misstatement through all its mysterious phases of development into full-blown deception; they do not understand the delicate differences between appropriations and estimates, between deferred, or outstanding, or special, or deficiency appropriations; they want to know what official of the Treasury Department is charged with the duty of informing the people of the progress of the national receipts and expenditures—not solely at the time stated by law, by means of a report to Congress, but at all times, whenever from any reason whatsoever the people may demand that information. It is not likely that every month in the year or every day in the week, such a demand would be made upon the Treasury, but no official can fail to acknowledge that times will arise when circumstances will create such a demand, or fail to recognize that at the present moment that demand is of the most urgent character. It is precisely on this account that we condemn the use of official position for the publication of unauthorized or unofficial communications. The public uneasiness has been created by the contradictory statements of Treasury officials, neither of whom, for aught the public can tell, has authority to speak for the Department, and each of whom is more or less connected with opposing party organizations, while the Secretary sits idly by and allows the public to believe as much as it pleases of the conflicting statements of his subordinates.

For ourselves, we have no hesitation in selecting between the two authorities. Mr. Alexander Delmar, director of the Bureau of Statistics, has already on previous occasions distinguished himself by the characteristic self-sufficiency of his semi-official utterances; he is an official so unpopular with the reigning party that a recent law abolishing his office is said to have been chiefly passed from mere dislike to the incumbent; he is naturally desirous of showing the Republican finance management in its worst light, and his statements have been greedily seized upon by the Democratic press as an official endorsement of the worst charges made by their writers and speakers against the Republican party. In a letter to several distinguished merchants of this city Mr. Delmar states, in substance, that if all the money is spent which there is any authority for spending, the expenditures of the current year will exceed the income by one hundred and sixty millions of dollars. If the figures from which this result is derived are correct, the result would be apparently very serious. But even supposing the figures to be correct, the actual result may not be as serious as the apparent one. The Treasury had, to begin with, one hundred and thirty-one millions on hand at the beginning of the fiscal year, which are not included in the receipts. This cash balance alone would reduce the deficit to the comparatively slight sum of twenty-nine millions. Besides this, the Treasury would, according to Mr. Delmar's own showing, have about sixty-five millions of gold to sell, the premium on which would scarcely fall short of twenty millions, further reducing the deficit to the sum of only nine millions. If thus the utmost extravagance that the law allows be indulged in in all quarters, the United States will, according to Mr. Delmar's showing, have to borrow about nine millions of dollars between now and the 1st of July, 1869, to make both ends meet. Not such a very dreadful prospect, after all.

Mr. David A. Wells, Special Commissioner of the Revenue, a public officer alike respected for his integrity, ability, and industry, in a letter to a member of Congress, gives similar figures to those of Mr. Delmar from which it results that the expenditures of the current year will be nearly two hundred millions less than the amount given by his colleague of the Statistical Bureau, and that if the income of the Treasury continues in the same ratio as last year, allowing for diminished taxation, the receipts will, nevertheless, exceed the expenditures by nearly twenty millions, and will leave the existing cash balance in the Treasury entirely untouched. A very cheerful prospect.

Between statements so wide apart it is no wonder that the public mind is unsettled, nor is it easy from the figures to form a decided estimate as to the value of either.

What creates any difficulty there may be in the public mind in accepting Mr. Wells's statements as final, is the fact that they are freely used as campaign documents, and are frequently composed for this purpose. This, of course, brings them under the suspicion which attaches to the whole of this species of literature, and gives them, moreover, a sanguine, rose-colored hue which, in such statements, is, to say the least, inappropriate. For instance, Mr. Wells's letter to Congressman Allison, which is circulated as a campaign document in answer to the question, What have been the national receipts and expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1868? says: "Receipts, $406,000,000; expenditures, $371,000,000—leaving an estimated surplus of receipts over expenditures of $35,000,000"—while the official Treasury debt statement shows that the surplus is almost thirty millions less than this. We know precisely the cause of the discrepancy, but the reader of campaign documents does not, and he is accordingly bewildered.

It is not our present purpose to examine all these figures in detail. While we cannot help condemning the issue of campaign documents from the Treasury, and though our own view of the financial future is not as sanguine as Mr. Wells's, in that we think he underrates expenses, we have no doubt that, with economy and good management, there will be an amply sufficient revenue to meet our regular expenses and maintain our credit unimpaired.

THE EUROPEAN UNEASINESS.

THERE are few public men of this or any other century who can boast of a life, on the whole, happier and more successful than M. Guizot's. He has entered on no field of labor in which he has not attained to the highest distinction. In his youth he made himself famous as a philosophic historian, and was the first to throw real light on the most obscure period of modern history—that in which the foundations of modern society were laid. He had the good luck, too, to win these laurels just as the political arena was opened, for the first time in French history, to scholars and philosophers, and found himself before long at the head of the only government France has ever had which can be fairly said to have used its power to cultivate in the French the love of peace, industry, and liberty. Advancing years, and a cold temper and somewhat low Calvinistic views of human nature, made him over-conservative, and his resistance to change did much to cause the overthrow of the Orleanist fabric which he had played so large a part in building up. For a while afterwards he was under a cloud. During the first ten brilliant years of the Napoleonic régime Louis Philippe and his ministers cut rather a sorry figure; but time has justified them. There are few Frenchmen now who do not acknowledge that the eighteen years that have just elapsed wear a dismal look beside the eighteen dull and inglorious years which closed in 1848; that Louis Philippe's government was after all teaching Frenchmen the art of governing themselves, while Louis Napoleon's government has simply been breaking them to the yoke of soldiers and priests and women—in other words, to the régime which has just perished in Spain.

M. Guizot's old age has formed a fit sequel to his active public life. For the last twenty years he has lived in retirement, in Normandy, in a pleasant country-house, surrounded by his children and grandchildren, his mind still occupied incessantly with the problems which had occupied it in its busier years—taking a keen, though of course philosophic rather than partisan, interest in all the great political and religious movements of the day, and communicating his opinions upon them to the public through the press, and enjoying in the respectful attention with which he is listened to the sweetest and noblest triumph an old man can have. He has now reached his eightieth year in full possession of his faculties, and his friends of three different generations rarely pass near Val-Riccher without stopping to hear him talk of government, of morals, of religion, of society. Whatever anybody may think of the basis on which his theories are built, the richness and variety of his experience make even his errors instructive. Every now and then he addresses, through the Revue des Deux Mondes, an audience such as can be reached through no other channel. We are proud, and justly proud, of the extent of the area over which the English tongue has spread, and of the size and energy of the host who speak it. But, great as are the triumphs of English, and great as may be the future which awaits it, French is still the language in which the greatest number of cultivated men and women may be reached. Richer stores of learning and thought may be found in the German, and more poetry and eloquence in the English; but the man who writes in French and puts his article in the Revue has the satisfaction of knowing that he is using the very best means of access to the educated public of the civilized world.

M. Guizot's last article is an attempt to account for the fear of war by which the European imagination is now haunted, and by which European industry is ravaged. He divides the blame nominally between France and Prussia equally, but in reality imposes the weight of the burden on France, and, by implication, on the Emperor, and not on the nation. He speaks, it is true, very harshly of the mode in which the late extension of the Prussian frontier was accomplished, pronounces M. de Bismarck "the most ambitious and audacious man in Europe," and scoffs at the idea of the movement which culminated in Sadowa being entitled to be considered a movement for the unification of Germany. He says it was simply the resumption of the process of Prussian aggrandizement which was begun by Frederic the Great, and which probably will not end till Prussia includes the whole of Germany. But the reason he gives for holding this opinion seems to us singularly inconclusive.

What is most interesting in the article, however, is what he says about France and the Emperor, as he is plainly much more at home in dealing with this branch of the subject than with the origin or aims of Prussian policy. The French people he considers desirous of peace. The warlike spirit, he says, did not survive the First Empire, and the love of peace and industry has been growing ever since. In accounting for the wars in which the French have been engaged during the present reign, he bears very hard on the Emperor, who, he says, sacrificed to his "étoile aventureuse et guerrière," and denies that the French people had any part or lot in exciting or carrying them on. He says, in other words, that they were undertaken in the interest of the dynasty, but that the result of all three has been such as to make it very unlikely that the Emperor will ever, except under pressure of the sternest necessity, undertake another war. In two of them he narrowly escaped disaster, and labored from first to last under an enormous pressure of care and anxiety. In the last, disaster came and gave the dynasty a blow from which it has not yet recovered and may never recover. "Moreover," says M. Guizot, "age is coming over him, and with age come interests less purely personal, and other preoccupations than the phantasies of the imagination or the combinations of solitary thought." In other words, the Emperor is already old, and feels that shrinking from enterprises involving a great strain on the nervous system which all old men feel in a greater or less degree. If he embarks in a great conflict now—such as that with Prussia would be—it will be rather as a last chance of safety than with the hope of winning fresh laurels. Nothing can give a better idea of the hideousness, from a moral point of view, of despotic government than the fact that it was generally expected in France, only three weeks ago, that the defeat of the Government candidate in the Var would be followed by a declaration of war against Prussia. That is, that the discontent of the people with the mode in which the government was conducted, legitimately expressed in the constitutional way at the polls, would lead not to reform, but to the commencement of a sanguinary struggle with a foreign power, in which probably half a million of men would perish, and the public debt be increased by one-third. M. Guizot therefore advises that the best means of putting an end to that dread expectation by which Europe is just now paralyzed—in fact, the only means of restoring confidence, words clearly passing for nothing—is the reduction of the French army to the footing of peace. This is the only proof that the Emperor not only does not desire war, but does not expect it, that the world will accept.

There is not much likelihood, however, that M. Guizot's advice will be taken. The Emperor finds himself now in one of those dreadful passes which come in the evening of life to nearly every man who has lived from hand to mouth, and let each day provide for itself. His reign has been a series of temporary expedients, of which the renovation of Paris is a fair illustration. A huge army of workmen has been collected there for the last fourteen years, engaged in pulling down and building up. Far more work, however, of this kind has been done already than the city can afford, but it is now impossible to stop without exciting discontent, the successful manifestation or the suppression of which by force would be equally dangerous. Therefore the building goes on. Foreign war, engaged in for the purpose of influencing domestic politics, is of necessity a powerful stimulant. It is, however, of necessity temporary in its effects. To suppose that it can be anything else, is to overlook the change which the last fifty years have wrought in modern society. The habit of discussion, and the publication of budgets, is fatal to the political influence of military glory. There has not been a single war of this century, not strictly defensive, which is not now condemned by the leading actors in it, and the public judgment every year follows more and more rapidly on the event, because the people in every country, as we pointed out a fortnight ago, are every year less and less influenced by enthusiasm. Yet Louis Napoleon's main instruments for the consolidation of his dynasty have been three foreign wars about matters in which France had merely a speculative interest. A contest with Prussia would be the most serious of all. Should it result in disaster, as it probably would, and the downfall of the Napoleonic dynasty, we should witness the failure of the last attempt that will ever be made in Europe to establish personal government.

BUTLER AND DANA.

Those Republicans of the Fifth Massachusetts District who are dissatisfied with General Butler's nomination have, we are glad to say, nominated an opposition candidate in the person of Mr. R. H. Dana, Jr., and there is every reason to believe that they will succeed in electing him. The matter is one of really national interest, because, as we pointed out last week, General Butler, in offering himself as a candidate for a Massachusetts district, after all that has happened, raises what may fairly be called a test case. Considering what the Republican party pretends to be, and considering what the charges are which are made against General Butler and believed by men of all parties, and which he has never attempted to refute, and considering what his course with regard to the national finances has been, his election by a New England Republican constituency would really cast over much of the Republican professions of purity and honesty an air of something very like humbug.

We have not the smallest desire to take from him any of the credit which belongs to him for his administration at New Orleans. In fact, we entertain towards him a feeling very like personal gratitude for the spectacle which his rule there offered. But that has nothing to do with his qualifications for Congress. Men are not chosen, or at least ought not to be chosen, for legislators, any more than for admirals or bank presidents, from gratitude for having done well in some widely different field. It would be ridiculous to set Sheridan to make a digest of the United States Statutes at Large, as a reward for his cavalry operations on the Appomattox. General Butler proved one thing, and only one thing, during the war, and that is, that he would fill the post of a revolutionary chief or of a platz-commandant in a conquered city admirably. Whenever we have another revolution we shall support his claims to a high place in the most disturbed district with all our might, and labor earnestly to have the first conquered city committed to his charge. But our firm belief is that in times like the present there is no public office for which he is exactly fitted; and even if one were to offer, we think he ought to be compelled to stand a court of enquiry before getting it.

He was one of the very first to raise the banner of repudiation. On the 3d of September, 1867, he promulgated the doctrine that the United States bonds were payable in greenbacks, and at the same time endeavored to show that, supposing there was any doubt in the matter, the bondholders were not entitled to the benefit of it, or, in fact, to any consideration whatever, inasmuch as the foreign bondholders lent their money as a pure business transaction, "and not with the view of aiding us in our great struggle," and the native holders bought them at a tremendous discount, and also "with an eye to the proceeds." Mr. William Endicott, Jr., of Boston, hereupon got into a controversy with him, in which he, Mr. Endicott, appealed to the national conscience, evidently believing the moral aspect of the case to be one which would impress a Christian community; but the General denied that there was such a thing as a national conscience, or that, if there was, it would exercise any influence on the decision of a question in which so much money was at stake. Following up his game, he drew an imaginary line, which, as well as we could make out, was coincident with the 80th degree of west longitude, on the east side of which, he said, the bonds were all, or nearly all, held, and the people on the west side would, therefore, refuse to be taxed for the payment of them, unless the bondholders abandoned their exorbitant pretensions.

It is but just to him to say that he was not alone in holding this theory of the position of the public creditor, but he was the foremost and most audacious in his avowal of it. Just at that time, the terms of reconstruction having been fairly settled, the minds of professional politicians began to be occupied with the consideration of what was most likely to come up next for discussion, and they naturally bethought them of the public debt. The burden of it seemed heavy, and the terms on which it was contracted seemed hard; but instead of taking it for granted that the people would behave honestly about it, instead of trying to encourage them to act nobly, by taking it for granted that they would act nobly, several politicians forthwith began to regulate their conduct by the assumption that the base and dishonest thing was the thing they would be sure to do, and that moral considerations or considerations of merely remote or prospective advantage would have no weight with them whatever. Under this disgraceful lead, the cry of "down with the bondholders" naturally spread. The Democrats took it up and made it their battle-cry, and large numbers of respectable Republicans were panic-stricken, and joined with the knaves of the party in re-echoing it. For some weeks disregard of the national obligations was preached unblushingly all over the country; we were told every day that no matter what the people promised to do, they would only do what was most convenient for them to do, and a feeling of real alarm with regard to the national credit began to gain ground among even the most sanguine.

A portion of the Republican press, however, did its duty manfully. It played the part a good regiment is often called on to play in stricken fields—let the rush of demoralized fugitives go by and then closed up its ranks and checked the enemy's onset. Discussion did the work it may always be relied on to do in a free and intelligent community. The true nature of the greenback swindle became apparent, and when the Chicago Convention met the repudiationists were easily beaten.

This result was a real disappointment to General Butler and his confederates. "His bark was still there, but the waters were gone," and how to float himself off became to him the great question of the hour. He was, when he received the blow, busily occupied in investigating the "corruption" of the seven senators, and what he must have suffered as he rummaged amongst the evidences of their venality only the pure in heart can imagine. As soon as this painful duty had been discharged he turned his attention once more to the finances, and as there was no immediate prospect of getting the debt paid off in greenbacks, there being no greenbacks for the purpose, and the debt not being due, he did the next best thing—that is, the thing most likely to injure the public credit and gratify those who had satisfied themselves that those who were induced to trust United States' promises were amongst its worst enemies. So he put forward Mr. Cobb, with a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to tax the bonds ten per cent.—that is, to reduce the rate of interest by that amount—and with the aid of the Copperheads (whose abuse of himself, by-the-by, he constantly produces as his great title to Republican esteem) he carried the resolution against the best men of the party, and the session closed on his shameful triumph, leaving the task of funding the public debt at a reduced rate of interest, of course, harder than ever. In the course of the discussion he asserted that he was only doing what the British did to their creditors—a statement which had not a particle of foundation; but that he knew it had no foundation no "friend of mankind" will for one moment imagine.

He now came home covered, as he thought, with glory, to visit his constituents, but found to his surprise that their souls were troubled by his performances. But not being of a timorous disposition or a man who looks mournfully into the past, he occupied himself with preparations to manipulate the Worcester Convention. The result of this enterprise we chronicled two weeks ago. He has now been nominated by the regular convention, and produced at the close of the proceedings a very creditable batch of resolutions, repeating almost verbatim the utterances of the Chicago Convention on the subject of the national finances, and many journals treat this as an abandonment of his heresies. But this is a singular display of credulity on their part. He has always acknowledged himself bound by the Chicago Platform, but then he reserves to himself the right of interpreting it in his own way, and under this interpretation he holds himself at liberty either to substitute non-interest-bearing promissory notes for interest-bearing bonds, or to reduce the interest without disguise. The value of these new resolutions as restraints on his conscience may, therefore, be imagined, particularly as he in his late speeches, professing to quote the Chicago Platform, substituted "possibly" for "honestly," suggested that the promises of the Government agents to pay the bonds in gold were made by Jay Cooke simply as a means of pushing his business, and quietly ignored his own attack on the interest.

To understand the real gravity of the approaching contest in his district, we must remember that he does not come with his "record" to John Morrissey's district, or Fernando Wood's, or to a Copperhead district, or an evenly balanced district, or a district where there are no common schools, or where they do not take the Weekly Tribune or the Atlantic Monthly. He comes to the very fountain-head of Puritanism, to an overwhelming Republican majority belonging to the best educated and most intelligent and pure-blooded community in the United States. He comes, too, not as an old free-soiler or old philanthropist, but as an old Democrat, who tried to nominate Jefferson Davis for the Presidency, and abandoned him only when the war broke out, quarrelled through the war with both superiors and inferiors, and left the army under a load of the foulest aspersions, which he has never taken the least pains to remove. He comes, too, as a party man who has virtually repudiated the party platform, and this not in obedience to personal scruples, but avowedly because he thought the majority were likely to agree with him. If, under these circumstances, he succeeds, we have no hesitation in saying that it will be the most alarming manifestation ever given in this country of popular indifference to the character of public men, and it will show, taken in connection with the treatment of the seven senators, that the yoke of party discipline is intended only for the necks of the scrupulous, that the unscrupulous may shake it off when they please, and with impunity.

The election of Mr. Dana would serve the purpose of sending to Congress at a most important crisis a man possessing a singular combination of the qualities, both natural and acquired, which a legislator needs; a man who was a free-soiler, like scores of enthusiasts, when to be a free-soiler was to be a martyr, but who to depth of conviction adds the mental training, and the legal and political knowledge, and the capacity for looking both before and after, in which our enthusiasts are so lamentably wanting, and who in any body of legislators in the world would sit in the front rank. In fact, the nation would have reason to be under lasting obligations to those who chose him. It would, moreover, serve the purpose of reading a useful lesson to those who base their political action on the theory that men in masses are always base and selfish, and who resolutely refuse to give human nature a chance of showing its best side, by assuming that it will show it, and would teach balky and "fractious" members of Congress, who have no principle to guide them, to be very sure they know what the people want before they begin to kick out of the party traces.

CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES IN RUSSIA.

From the earliest times the Slavic race has possessed a communal system which extended in some form to nearly all the relations of life. Every one is acquainted with the mir or commune of the peasants, to which the lands belonged in common, and by the authority of which these were distributed at stated times to the individual members. Among the Cossacks of the Ural, who present now a picture of primitive Russia, everything is held in common, and even the fisheries are regulated on this plan. In that long, narrow district there are no poor. Every man is well off. But there is an institution widely spread throughout Russia, and of a distant, unknown antiquity, which is in a certain sense the prototype of all the co-operative associations which have of late years sprung up in Western Europe. This is the artel (perhaps artêlh would better indicate the pronunciation). An artel is a society of artisans, porters, drivers, clerks, village workmen, etc., formed for the purpose of maintaining a common treasury, and generally of keeping a common table and lodging, very often for common work, or at least to receive work, through the common guaranty of the whole society for the honesty of each individual member. That such an institution should have immemorially existed in Russia shows, on one hand, the simple conditions of life in that country and the comparatively limited wants of its people, and, on the other, the practical mind of that people, which in the very earliest times succeeded in finding the true remedy, which the workmen of the West have been so many years vainly seeking, against accidents of trade, and the true method of developing the working class. Each member is called an artelstchik.

The most usual and best known of these artels are those in the large cities, the members of which serve in the custom-houses, the banks, and mercantile counting-rooms. The custom-houses always give the surveillance of the goods in store to an artel. The merchants take as messengers, collectors, etc., artelstchiks, who are appointed to the place by the artel itself, to which the artelstchik is liable for any damage which he causes his master. In such cases the artelstchik is proceeded against criminally; the process for the recovery of funds misapplied, or for damage, is a civil one by the merchant against the artel. These artelstchiks are often trusted with very large sums of money, and a breach of confidence is of exceedingly rare occurrence. The artel watches carefully over the conduct of each of its members, and as on joining the artel each person pays a large sum as caution-money—in the case of the custom-house artels 2,000 rubles—the artelstchik has always in mind the certainty of losing his advances by wrongdoing. Sometimes the artelstchiks, while retaining their connection with the artel, receive board and lodging from their masters. In large commercial towns there are special artels for special classes of business. Often large houses engaged in foreign trade unite to form an artel of workmen, who are under the surveillance of persons appointed by them. In these cases the guaranty is often moral rather than material. This class of artelstchiks is principally employed in the lading and unlading of goods, the object being to prevent frauds in lading and packing, especially through corruption on the part of the receiver.

But the chief end of the artel is a common lodging and table, and in this it differs greatly from a trade or labor union. Here each member on entering receives an individual advantage, in the shape of supplying his needs, and of enabling him to pass safely forced periods of want of work. The artel chooses one of its number as a starosta (lit. elder) or head, who has the care of supplying the common table and lodging out of the funds of the artel. The bed and board are usually of the simplest possible sort, the life of artelstchiks in the great towns being the exception and not the rule. The artels usually work together, especially in the country and in manufactories. Wherever workmen are brought together in large numbers they form an artel, if one does not already exist there. The starosta often finds and regulates work for the artel, and persons wishing workmen, especially on a sudden emergency, go to these starostas and arrange with them for the work, the pay, etc.

The majority of artels are much more simple in their condition than those which assist the trade of the large cities. No caution-money is required from the members of the artels of workmen, only their contributions to the common treasury. The bond which joins the members is very slight. The Russian peasant feels the need of a chief; he works better with one; and in the artel he has his starosta. This is not a consequence of serfdom, for the village commune and its starosta existed before the institution of serfdom. The Russian is essentially a wanderer; he dislikes agriculture, likes to come to the cities and engage in an easier work, which will give him the means of life with more leisure. He likes to change his master, his occupation, and his surroundings. His attachment is not to his home, to one spot, but to the persons of his family and associates. Under serfdom his wanderings were restricted by the will of his master, though even then, on payment of his yearly rent, he was allowed a certain freedom of action. But now that he can go where he pleases, he avails himself of his privilege, and enjoys and shows the use of the artel. With a crust of bread in his pocket, the villager arrives in the city, finds the place where the trade which he chooses congregates, makes acquaintances, offers his services to some master-workman, and is immediately received into an artel, and his wants are all supplied. With the bonhomie so characteristic of all Russians, especially of the lower class, his associates instruct him in all the branches of the trade, and set apart for him wages proportionate to his industry and skill. He easily learns his work, and often in twelve hours can attend a cotton-weaving machine without supervision. He does not become a master-workman so easily, because he is too apt to change his trade, sure of finding easily a new artel and the same support and encouragement.

The tendency to community sometimes causes whole villages to have the same occupation. In the government of Yaroslav there are villages all the men of which are tailors or carpenters; in some villages of Tver only shoemakers live, and in some districts of the government of Vladimir you find only locksmiths or blacksmiths. In the summer they either go about the neighborhood offering their services, or work in the village together and then dispose of their manufactures. Here, also, the head of the artel is the director of the work. Among the carpenters and joiners, for instance, he receives orders, assigns work, distributes workmen, or sends out and puts up what is made. In the winter there is great activity on the affluents of the large rivers in the construction of barges, which, on being floated down with their loads, are broken up at their port of destination, often in a treeless region, and the materials used for other purposes. The demand for barges is thus constant every year, and gives employment in the forests to large numbers of artels. Usually about 10 families work together on a barge about 220 feet long and 60 to 70 feet wide. With the approach of spring there is a change of the working population. Very many go down the streams on the barges, and during the voyage act as sailors. Leaving the barge, they take any work offered them and enter into the nearest artel or form a new one of the companions they fall in with.

The system of artels has taken a very wide development in the army. There is in every company a soldiers' artel treasury, which receives a certain fixed proportion of the soldier's pay and of the money which he privately earns, and the subsistence money from the government. By means of this treasury the soldier is fed, his minor wants provided for, and a horse and cart are kept to carry the provisions of the company. On leaving the company he receives his share from the treasury, which often amounts to a considerable sum. This treasury is kept by a starosta elected by the soldiers from their number. The artels in the army are recognized by the government as a valuable assistance in the work of provisioning the army, and are regulated by law.

The frequency of these associations, which were founded first for necessity, and afterwards entered on the phase of labor associations, is doubtless injurious to the quality of Russian work. The workmen find it too easy to change their trade, and the number of Russian master-workmen, especially in the more complicated kinds of labor, is really small. Those places are in great measure occupied by foreigners, chiefly Germans. Russian workmanship is often complained of, though the aptitude of the Russian workman is always praised. There are not the permanent divisions of labor as in other countries.

But certainly these artels are a most valuable institution among the laboring classes of the country. They contain the germs of the education and the future well-being of the workmen, and are a guaranty that the great distress, the confusion, that distract the labor of other countries will never prevail to the same extent in Russia. In the artels in Riga each member pays into the common chest 15 per cent. of his earnings, which goes to form a fund for the relief of the sick members, and for their widows and children. It would be well if this practice became more general in other societies, for in that case the workman would hesitate longer about leaving from mere caprice the artel with which he was connected, thus losing his interest in the accumulated savings of others. With the extension of the facilities of popular education in Russia the artels, beginning with the higher grades, will doubtless occupy themselves with the mental and moral education of their members. That work could be begun and greatly assisted by the initiative of the government or of the masters. But manufacturing has, as yet, hardly made sufficient progress for the masters to perceive that the educated workman is more profitable than the ignorant.

AMERICAN LITERARY DIPLOMATISTS.

The Pall Mall Gazette has recently been reminded by a contemporary that men of letters have been employed by the United States in the diplomatic service far more than has been the practice in the Old World. To American readers the names of Irving, Prescott, Motley, Bancroft, Hawthorne, Marsh, Bigelow, Howells, and we dare say others, will readily occur as illustrations of this truth. "Nevertheless," says the Gazette, "the fact ought not to be forgotten that a devotion to politics and a devotion to literature or science are practically incompatible; for the simple reason that the achievement of really great literary or scientific works demands the whole, or nearly the whole, of a man's time and energies."

We are not inclined to say no to this proposition, but it does not apply quite perfectly to the case of American literary men who have gone to Europe in the public service. Take those whom we have mentioned, and the rule seems to be that their diplomatic positions have been given them at least as much in the interest of their future literary reputation as on account of any such reputation previously acquired. Mr. Motley, for example, would hardly have been our minister at Vienna if it had not been that while performing his ambassadorial duties he could study on the spot the documents on which he bases the works which he has written and is yet to write. It was because he wished to do this that he went, and it was not less because he wished to do this that the Government sent him. So, too, of Washington Irving. Mr. Alexander Everett, who, in Irving's time, was our minister in Spain, made his friend, then a student of Spanish literature, a sort of detached secretary, for the reason that under the auspices of the American embassy he could with greater ease prosecute the researches among the Spanish archives which resulted in the "Life of Columbus," the "Spanish Legends," and the other works of Irving's which relate to the Peninsula. In one of these cases the political labors of the author holding office were nothing, or next to nothing; Irving was secretary because he was author, but the secretaryship was entirely subservient to the authorship. As regards Mr. Motley the thing is, of course, somewhat different; but we are mistaken if, with certain obvious qualifications which the recollection of his services will readily suggest, essentially the same thing is not to be said of him. Hawthorne would have been sent out to Liverpool whether he had been a man of letters or not. President Pierce, his class-mate and room-mate, or "chum," in college, would have made him consul for the sake of the affection there was between them, and this takes his case out of the number of those contemplated by the Gazette. But for whatever reason sent, Hawthorne's consulship did not conflict with his literary projects and labors. As to Mr. Howells again, our late consul at Venice, whither he went—if we are not mistaken: we have no exact information—at the instance of a distinguished public man, it was not intended, and apparently it did not happen, that his consular duties should interfere with his pursuits in literature. Mr Bigelow was a journalist rather than a literary man pure and simple, and moreover, the first place in the embassy to France fell to him by the death of Mr. Dayton, his chief, and was not originally given him. But his principal literary work was done in consequence of an opportunity which presented itself to him in Paris and could not have presented itself here. His edition of the "Autobiography of Franklin" was the fruits of his service abroad, and neither that nor any other literary work he has done was the cause of his entering the service. Mr. Bancroft's appointment to his first post was doubtless due as much to his "copious and philosophical treatise" as to his having become a prominent Massachusetts Democrat. It was then the fashion to esteem his works somewhat more highly than they are now esteemed, and in the days of James K. Polk, we may suppose that to have written some of the volumes of the "History of the United States" was considered ground sufficient for sending the writer anywhere. But even in this case, whether or not a man can reconcile diplomacy and history-writing, it is certain that Mr. Bancroft's sojourn in England was of indispensable service to him as a historian. He was a busier diplomatist, too, than most of ours have to be; or rather, than, as a rule, most of ours have had to be. He could not have done so well in the volumes since the third if he had not been able to visit Paris and to examine the archives of that city, and this work, as well as the examination of private libraries, he certainly could not have done so well, and perhaps not at all, if his character as ambassador had not made doors open easily to him. Mr. Marsh's appointment is, perhaps, a better example of the supposed American system of giving foreign posts to our literary men as literary men, who then, by having them, are made less efficient workers, or less productive workers in literature than they were before. We do not know that Mr. Marsh's residence in Italy is of peculiar service to him, and we do not know that it is not of the greatest service to him, as a man of letters. But as regards the other authors named above, it seems pretty plain that the theory of the Pall Mall is hardly applicable.

The fact is that our diplomatists were never a very hard-worked body of men; not much beyond gentlemanly manners was required of them—and there is a little talk about the demeanor of a gentleman being too hard work for some of our ministers—and as in the lower so in the higher branches of the civil service, and abroad as well as at home, places were given men rather for their own advantage than for that of the country. That was our general rule. And even in the case of efficient public servants—and we believe we have mentioned not one who was not such—even in the case of men like Wheaton, who made his country's name honorable wherever he went, and certainly labored faithfully in his place, it was always more than likely that the balance was in their favor, and that all their diplomatic work was not incompatible with any of their other work. Of course, if we trained our diplomatists and demanded of them the devotion to their pursuit which it has long been customary for European governments to demand, the thing would be quite different. But that we have not done yet, and are not likely to do till the body of the people become awake to the fact—for it is a fact—that the utter worthlessness of the home civil service is the gravest danger that now threatens republican government. Then we shall probably lay the axe to the root of the tree, and bring down everything—bad branches and good. But meantime we shall probably continue as of old, and as a general thing kindly despatch on our public errands gentlemen who have an errand of their own in the direction in which we send them.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, September 21, 1868.

THE canvass for the approaching election is going on actively in all parts of the country. The Liberal party is conducting its share of the campaign with great energy, and the results will be an ample Liberal majority in the House of Commons, the fall of the present administration, and the establishment of Mr. Gladstone in the unquestioned leadership of the party. No Liberal candidate has much chance now who does not profess himself his follower, and Mr. Gladstone will stand at the head of a compact and flexible majority, and in a position of such personal power and responsibility as has been attained by no minister since Peel. It is a fortunate thing that a man of Mr. Gladstone's high character should not only be at the head of the Liberal party, but also exceedingly popular with the working-classes at this moment, when England is to all appearance on the slide of a revolution. Although there are traits of weakness and inconsistency in his character, he is a man capable of inspiration and of great moral effort. He is not always a far-sighted statesman, but he is a man of such openness of nature that he may be trusted to keep in sympathy with new ideas, and to appreciate the force of prevailing political currents.

The composition of the new Parliament will, in the main, be very similar to that of the old. The new electors do not yet know their strength, and have forborne to exercise control in the selection of candidates. Doubtless this is partly due to the want of political habit, but I fear still more to political timidity and indifference. Mr. John Morley, the editor of the Fortnightly Review, is very gloomy over this condition of affairs. He says the election of 1868 "promises to be the most corrupt and dishonorable in our annals, and to give us for rulers some of the richest and stupidest men that ever entered the Chamber." But other men, not less trustworthy and well-informed than Mr. Morley, think that the election promises to be distinguished rather by its purity than the opposite, while it is certain that there will be a large infusion of new talent and power into the House. The mere wealth of the country will, undoubtedly, be represented out of all proportion to the political claims (though not out of proportion to the actual social weight) of the plutocracy.

A few extreme radicals will obtain seats, but their entrance into Parliament will be less important than that of a number of young men of aristocratic birth and position, but thoroughly imbued with the popular spirit of modern liberalism. They will enter the House with strong convictions of the necessity of great and rapid changes in the social order, if England is to be saved from the catastrophe of a violent revolution, and they will come to the discussion of political questions with minds trained by the study of Mill and of Maine, and disciplined in that school of thought which has of late years made Oxford the centre of the best liberalism, and of which Mr. Goldwin Smith has been the most eminent representative at the University. The Standard, a Tory paper, gave, the other day, a list of some of these young men, charging them with being branded with the stamp of Goldwin Smith, and, so far as concerns the general acceptance of the principles of public policy of which Mr. Goldwin Smith has been the chief advocate, the charge is not without good foundation. Among these young men two are, at this moment, especially conspicuous from the circumstances of their canvass. In Berkshire, one of the dark agricultural counties, Mr. Auberon Herbert, the brother of Lord Carnarvon, and a convert from high Toryism, is carrying on a vigorous campaign, and working hard to rouse a dull and indifferent constituency to a sense of their political duties and rights. The farmers are addressed as they never were before, and whether Mr. Herbert is elected or not he will have been successful in promoting political education in England. His chances of election are said to be good, and his canvass is watched with interest.

At Woodstock, in Oxfordshire, the quiet little historic town which lies under the walls of Blenheim, and has for some time been a pocket borough of the Duke of Marlborough, Mr. G. C. Brodrick, son of Lord Middleton, has undertaken to make fight against the ducal influence. The contest has had a special animation given to it by a correspondence between Mr. Brodrick and the Duke which appeared a few days since, and which afforded a striking illustration of ducal manners and political morality. The pith of it was that the duke virtually refused not to exercise his influence over the constituency to prevent them from voting freely. The "influence" of a duke is not always purely moral.

The social distinction conferred by a seat in Parliament and the opportunity to take part in the actual government of such an empire as that of England are inducements felt by a very large number of men, who, however, are restrained from coming forward as candidates by want of means, occasion, or ability. Doubtless there are many who nourish a secret belief that nothing but the want of knowledge of them by some enlightened constituency prevents them from at once gaining the object of their ambition. It is said that some men are willing to pay largely for the privilege of putting themselves forward as candidates without hope of election, but for the sake of the small distinction of having been a candidate. Few men, however, are as open as a Mr. W. Ray Smee, whose address appeared in the papers a day or two since, headed "To the Electors of any Borough who desire to change their Representative."

"Gentlemen," says Mr. Smee, "I beg leave to solicit your votes at the ensuing election. . . . Throughout my life I have advocated and created measures of progress, and am the author of two schemes of national importance. . . . I have written upon finance, and am profoundly convinced much remains to be done to enable every one to obtain pure and wholesome drinks." "Thoughtless and wasteful expenditure can never be justified, but an unwise economy is productive of irreparable loss." . .

"I am an ardent advocate for maintaining in the fullest force that inestimable privilege, the right of petition.

"I have resided a considerable time on the Continent, and the knowledge obtained may prove valuable.

"I should prefer being sent to the House of Commons unfettered by party ties."

This is intended seriously, and it is hardly fuller of unconscious humor or more devoid of any indication of its author's possessing qualifications for a seat in such a political assembly as the House of Commons, than many of the addresses issued by actual candidates with good chance of election. It is the general political inefficiency and incompetency of members of Parliament that make the leadership so important. It is a body which follows a leader, and requires one as much as a flock of sheep. A useful and striking paper might be written on the differences between Parliament and Congress. This would be one of them: Congress would be better often were it more led; Parliament were it less so.

The intellectual leadership of political liberalism in England—in distinction from the strictly party leaders—is at present shared by Mr. Mill and Mr. Goldwin Smith, and the latter gentleman is taking a very active and prominent part in the present canvass. His political prescience has so frequently been convincingly manifested during the last six or eight years that his influence has increased rapidly, and no one is doing more than he to arouse a nobler political mood than that into which England has sunk under Palmerston and Disraeli, and to create a keener sense of the absolute connection between national honor and greatness and political morality.

The canvass is, on the whole, conducted as if the point at issue were the fall of one ministry and the rise of another, and as if the real questions involved in this fall and rise were simply the existence of the Irish Church, economy in public expenditure, and such like matters. A few able men—such, for example, as Mr. Grant Duff and Sir John Acton—indicate in their addresses the existence of more vital interests than these; but in general the candidates and their supporters confine themselves to the discussion of purely party questions, and of topics which seem trivial in comparison with the real questions of the times—questions which few politicians like to touch. But the activity and animation with which the Liberals carry on the canvass have the good effect of rousing the political curiosity—one hardly ventures to say interest—of the common people. In the northern counties there is, indeed, far more political intelligence among the lower trading and laboring classes than in the midland and southern counties; but even where there is most intelligence the poor stand greatly in need of enlightenment. The Liberals are doing their work generally in a legitimate way, but the Tories seem to be relying on the old arts by which political life in England has been long debased. They are holding few public meetings, and are leaving the public field undisputed to the Liberals, but they are privately plying every engine of corruption and coercion. It is one of their last opportunities to exercise such tyranny, and they mean to make good use of it. Every day some new incident is revealed which illustrates the disposition of the aristocratic land-owners to regard the votes of their tenantry as the property of the landlord, to be disposed of at will. The letters of Tory magnates, from Mr. Drax up to the Duke of Marlborough, which have appeared on this topic in the course of the campaign, would be worth collecting and preserving as a specimen of one of the latest exhibitions of the pretensions engendered in a class society in which the spirit of feudalism is still exceedingly strong, in spite of the French Revolution and the war in America.

Even if nothing more comes of this practice of intimidation, the ballot will be pretty sure to result from it. It is announced within the last two or three days that Mr. Gladstone has consented to consider the question. Mr. Mill and Mr. Tom Hughes are, so far as I am aware, the only public men of much weight who oppose the ballot, and Mr. Hughes's objections seem to be of a sentimental rather than a practical sort. The Spectator also opposes it on grounds of principle; but the Spectator has more respect from its readers than influence over them, and is, I believe, the only decidedly Liberal journal which sees harm in the introduction of a safeguard of purity of election which has the advantage of being of such a nature that it will be disused, except as a convenience, the moment its protection is not required.

The introduction of the ballot would have one very advantageous indirect effect in its tendency to break down the prevalent system of a personal canvass of the individual electors by the candidate. It is a system which has nothing to recommend it. It is at its best a thoroughly unsatisfactory mode of communication between the two parties, and at its worst it is degrading to both. The candidate, however honest, is exposed to the risk, for the sake of making himself agreeable, of saying things which are not in accordance with his convictions, and the voter, if affected by the pleasant manners or the solicitation and flattery of the candidate, is affected by motives of the lowest order in the exercise of the franchise. The evil consequences and the displeasing features of the personal canvass, whether in town or country, can hardly be justly estimated without an observation of them, or without consideration of the immense social gulf between the candidate and the mass of the voters whom he solicits. The system must be broken up before there can be any genuine sense in the lower classes of the meaning and worth of a vote. There are many superstitions lingering in the minds of English conventional Liberals, and among them none is deeper rooted, and none has less foundation in truth, than the cherished notion that every Briton is free-born, and remains through his life a courageous and independent individual.

CRETAN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE TURK AND HIS SUBJECT RACES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The Nation in a recent number (June 25) asks a most puzzling and leading question, viz., Why the Turks in parliament appeal only to our risibles? The direct answer is easily found, because the dullest wit will see that they have no capacity for what civilization knows as government as opposed to mere despotic sway; but the wherefore of this lies deeper, and will only be satisfactorily answered by some one who knows the details of Turkish administration out of Constantinople, as well as the diplomatic mysteries of that Dead Sea city. (No disparagement of Sodom and Gomorrah intended.) The diplomatic mysteries one may pick out of blue-books more or less when he only understands how blue-books lie by suppression, but for the former you must come into personal and official contact with Muchirdom and Mudirdom—high pashas and humble effendis, governors and sub-governors.

Who answers the question will build a noble testimonial to republican government and legislating man. I have no such pretension, but here goes my stone in contribution. And when I say that I have seen the modus operandi of some of the cleverest (no, ablest is the word, for there is nothing clever in a Turk) and most reputed men in the Turkish body politic, I shall be admitted to have ground for judgment.

The organic default of the Moslem is that he belongs to a "governing race"—that is, a race which ipso facto holds in its hands the prosperity, property, liberty, and lives of other races; which admits no responsibility or obligation toward its subjects—slaves, we may say simply; an aristocratic, favored, born-to-sway people, in whose eyes subject races have no rights the masters are bound to respect—one of the long line of illustrious antitypes of our late Southern Confederacy.

It is no exaggeration of the general state of Turkey to say that there is no law. There are laws prescribed by the Koran and held as religious precepts, but they have no force for the Ghiaour, and very little for the faithful, unless backed by something more tangible than right. The will of the pasha is the law of his province, and the only agency that exercises any control on him is the consular corps or hostile intrigues at Stamboul. The Turk being born to govern, naturally aspires to a place, and once in it begins to exercise his functions for his own personal benefit; be he cadi, mudir, kaïmakam, or pasha, he makes it the principal end of his administration to enrich himself or his friends, or to gratify his or their personal resentments and pleasures. There are a few exceptions, and very few they are. As a general rule, a suit at law is an auction for the decision; or, if it varies from that by cause of honesty (comparative) in the cadi (these cases never rise higher), it is settled by the Koran.

What the governors are as a class the Porte is as a whole—a huge machine for expressing the juices of prosperity from the empire, and the amount of pressure is the utmost it can endure and live, the expenditure all that can be extracted, and its object to satisfy the whims of those who exercise supreme power—the sultan, if capable; his ministers, if he should happen to be an imbecile.

This utter irresponsibility of the governing race, in itself a sufficient cause of final decay in any state, as destructive of all co-operation between its head and its members, is curiously fostered by a combination of noxious influences, amongst which the chief is the protection of the Great Powers, and the guarantee of the status quo by which Turkey is preserved from the otherwise inevitable consequences of its misrule, such as revolution, conquest, or dissolution, which lie in wait on misgoverned kingdoms. The empire may rot, but it will be kept in form; each individual component may revolt under intolerable oppression, but the integrity must be maintained; and the Turk adds to his contempt for the industrious Frank the consciousness that Europe must maintain him as he is. What government guaranteed against the consequences of its errors would not take the devil for prime minister at last?

The profound ignorance in which the Koran maintains the Turk must come in for its share of the raisons d'être of the "decrepitude." It has got to be a general delusion that, because an A'ali and a Fuad stand at the head of the Turkish Government to-day, the Turk likes educated men; but not only are A'ali and Fuad only two, but they are imposed on the Porte by Europe, and are really no more representatives of Turkish statesmen than Turkey is an independent empire. The old traditional Turk, with all his bigotry and contempt of learning in any but a mollah's head, is always uppermost in the nation, and Mehmet Ruchdi is more like him than A'ali, and would be Grand Vizier to-morrow if Europe could be resisted with the sword.

The vices of the Turk do not seem to me inherent, but rather the fruit slavery bears to the enslaver, with perhaps something to pay from the nihilation of women in the Mohammedan system.

I opine that if any of our misguided and disappointed Southern brethren want to know what the fate of their would-be empire would have been, they may see pretty clearly from an examination into the state of the Turkish empire, for, barring what small difference there might be between the Koran and a pro-slavery Bible, the general conditions of existence and power appear much the same; and if any man of the North who would be classed with the mud-sills wants to see what the triumph of secession would have brought his class to, he should study the state of the subject races at Constantinople, for I imagine that slavery bears pretty much the same kind of fruit, no matter what the soil. If the Turk has so far preserved any degree of dignity in the world's opinion, it must be only by the contrast between his bold, open injustice and contempt of all human rights—the pirate's virtues—and the inconceivable degradation of the slavish mass of men of mixed races who constitute his subjects, especially the Armenian and the Byzantine Greek, and, not less in degree of corruption, the hybrid known as the "Levantine," but who, generally claiming, by virtue of some remote ancestor, a European protection, claims a consideration from the Turk which no "rayah" ever gets. This class furnishes the dragomans, the most unmitigated plagues and corrupters of communications in the East; men who, without exception, if one may believe the concurrent testimony of foreigners resident at Constantinople, live and grow rich by deceiving their chiefs and governments and being the advocates and apologists for Turkish oppression and misgovernment.

All these races, and, so far as my experience goes, all the races of the Levant, are unblushing liars, most of them unhesitating thieves—the Armenian in general both, and, beside, the most servile of slaves; but after him the Turk is the greatest liar. In fact, so insensible is he to the claims of truth, that he not only never tells it except in a matter of indifference, but never expects to be believed, nor ever believes any one else. Make the most solemn declaration you may, word of honor or formal oath, to the Turk, you are still a liar, and he believes just the contrary of what you say.

The Cretan is by habit a liar also, but he invariably respects a written declaration, and rarely makes a false one; an oath he will never take except under compulsion, or on state occasions, and the same, I should say, from limited acquaintance, is true of the Hellene, or free Greek. As compared with the Turk, they are both angels of light and purity. Add to this the vices against nature mentioned in the Scriptures, but not in polite society, from which the Greek, Cretan or Hellenic, is free, and to which the Turk is addicted to the last degree, and you have not only some justification for Philhellenism, but an inkling of some of the causes of the "decrepitude."

The Cretan insurrection is still flourishing, and now seems likely to maintain a bold front another season, at least. Every olive crop brings a crisis, at which the saving of the crop is weighed against the chances of liberty. The crop this year is the best known in this generation, and the temptation was correspondingly great. So, at the council held last week at Askyfo, at which 3,600 Cretans were present, the question of submission was again discussed, and the immense majority decided to go on, but gave those who were disposed to make their submission an opportunity to do so. One hundred and twenty, one of thirty, decided to go down and submit, and the rest renewed the oath to fight it out, unless England should intervene and guarantee them satisfactory terms, for they will no longer treat with Constantinople. Almost simultaneously the Ennosis arrived with a full cargo and supply of money, and we hear now that hostilities have been renewed in the central and eastern provinces. There will be no peace until bread and powder fail, and the last news from Greece makes it probable that the supply will be kept up, and perhaps a new element introduced into the insurrection ere long, in the shape of organized bands fitted for offensive movements. The unanimity with which the Cretans prepare to pass another winter under arms will increase the sympathy felt for them.

CANÉA, Sept. 7, 1868.

[Our correspondent only removes the difficulty one degree further back. The German races and the Hungarians occupied at the outset the same position towards the population of the countries they overran as the Turks have occupied and now occupy towards the rayahs, but they improved steadily. If our correspondent has found the Greeks angels compared to the Turks in the matter of truth, his experience has been both singular and fortunate.—ED. NATION.]

ANOTHER VIEW OF GENERAL BUTLER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If the vox populi is not the vox Dei, there is an instinct which, in times of national peril, guides the people in spite of the expostulations and croakings of would-be leaders, and guides them safely. It moved them to place the almost unknown Colonel Washington in command of the continental armies; it moved them to set aside the half-dozen expectant candidates, of gubernatorial and legislative experience, and to draw forth the comparatively obscure, uncouth Abraham Lincoln to pray and watch for them while they fought to prevent their land from becoming the devil's hunting-ground; it moves them to-day to appeal to General Grant to preserve for them the blessings he and they struggled to secure. They rely on him, because in their hearts they believe in the beatitudes, because they believe in the meek, the pure in heart, the merciful, the peace-maker; in him who fears not those who can kill the body, but only those who can destroy the soul. It seems a strange inconsistency in the people who select such a leader, to welcome with shouts and honor with office a man like General Butler; a very disheartening fact that the Fifth District of Massachusetts, which cherishes the memory of the Puritans Endicott and Higginson and Hugh Peters, who gave so much and endured so much for conscience and freedom's sake, whose Revolutionary annals are adorned with the names of Parsons and Cabot and Lowell and Dane among its statesmen, of Glover and Pickering as soldiers—the district of Story and Bowditch and a host of men eminent, scattered through its history and along its shores—can find no descendant, no native, but must rush eagerly to accept a new-comer of the antecedents of General Butler to misrepresent her. Puritan Massachusetts represented by a man whose professional and military character is so tarnished; Massachusetts, which refuses to be comforted for the loss of Governor Andrew, represented by one who insulted, annoyed, and obstructed him by arts unpractised by honorable men, used only by those whose greatest talent is unscrupulousness; Massachusetts, which honors Grant, and which sent so many true heroes to stamp out rebellion, represented by one whose military career was marked by insubordination to those above and insolent oppression of those below him: General Phelps, Secretary Stanton, General Gillmore, Admiral Porter, General Grant, each in their turn abused and reviled and charged with his defeats and blunders; Chaplain Hudson and a score of subalterns subjected to punishments unknown to the military code, to gratify his vindictiveness; Republican Massachusetts represented by a Democrat who encouraged the rebels and urged them on till the booming of guns at the South and the muttering thunder at the North converted him at the eleventh hour; Massachusetts, which pays its debts, principal and interest, in gold, represented by one who sophistically pleads for repudiation and resorts to cunning manœuvres to have his sophistries adopted, and thereby sink his country's credit beyond redemption!

If the electors of the Fifth District of Massachusetts are satisfied with General Butler's record as a warrior; if he reflects truly their opinions as to payment of the bonds, their sentiments concerning General Grant; if he represents their refinement and intelligence, they should at least demand of him what he has so often demanded of others, a court of enquiry to investigate and dispose of the damning reports of fortunes made by and under him on his expedition to, and during his administration at, New Orleans and Norfolk; to ascertain whether he seized fifty thousand dollars of private property, whether he falsely stated it had been paid to troops, whether, when this falsehood was exposed, he still retained it nearly three years, whether this seizure was made in violation of his proclamation and without authority of law or not—if not, why it was returned at last upon the eve of a lawsuit. The entire refutation of these most injurious reports is demanded by self-respect and a decent regard to the opinions of mankind; something more than a verdict of not proven should be required of one charged with the grave responsibilities of a law-maker, accused of infamous deeds.

But even this acquittal will hardly instate him with those who have watched his course—with the members of the bar, with his brother soldiers of the Army of the James—though it may entitle him to an invitation to their next meeting, or at least prevent their hissing whenever his name is mentioned, nor will it constitute him a fitting representative of the ancient State of Massachusetts. "Now, I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which you have learned, and avoid them. For they that are such, serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple."

THE CONQUESTS OF CHRISTIANITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

In your excellent article on "The Revival in Water Street," in the Nation of Oct. 1, this sentence occurs: "It is over a thousand years since Christianity has made any sensible impression on any considerable body of heathen." Such statements are too common to be worth criticising, were it not that the correction involves a singularly clear proof of the truth of your main position. As to the fact, it is sufficient to compare the world of 868 and 1868. Such a comparison, however, shows at once that the conquests and the losses of Christianity in the interval have been also the conquests and the losses of civilization—the conquests enormously over-balancing the losses. The members of Christian churches in India are said to number some hundreds of thousands, and beyond all doubt Christianity has made a very "sensible impression" far beyond that number; but all this has been accomplished pari passu with the advance of Christian civilization. Again, Christianity and civilization, hand in hand, have plainly begun to make a decided impression on China, not to speak of the more embryonic work in Japan. Madagascar has been more than once convulsed by influences springing from the same sources. The heathenism of the Sandwich Islands, however deplorable may be some of the evils still existing there, of the Fiji Islands, and, to a large extent, of Australasia, has yielded to the same joint influence. Africa may be less favorable soil; but the withdrawal of even so much of civilization and Christianity as has been already planted there would make a most sensible difference in the well-being of the southern and western confines of that continent. And whatever has been done for the elevation of the millions of the blacks in our own country—and it is by no means little if they be compared with their ancestors—has been accomplished, under great disadvantages, by the same joint action.

Logically, the same thing is equally clear. Modern civilization is an acknowledged product of Christianity. Hence, as, on the one side, that civilization cannot appear and will not endure without a Christian basis on which to rest; so, on the other, Christianity cannot be expected to flourish where its legitimate product is hindered from development. It has required many centuries for this product to reach its present condition among ourselves; we cannot expect it to be produced very speedily elsewhere by the sole operation of the same original force. But the product and the producing force may be introduced together, and then, while civilization is furnished with a sure basis, Christianity is allowed a fair field. Reason joins with experience in recommending for the improvement of the world these joint influences. They have already, during the last thousand years accomplished an enormous work, and that work is now going on apparently with accelerating velocity and power.

MIDDLETOWN, Conn., Oct. 3.

[We spoke of Christianity as a religious organization, rather than as an influence. We think our correspondent greatly exaggerates the number of converts in India. By whom are the members of churches in India "said to number some hundreds of thousands?" Suppose they number 100,000, which we do not believe, does that constitute "a sensible impression" on 100,000,000?—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

A sort of periodical to be called "The Plymouth Pulpit" is to be issued weekly by Messrs. J. B. Ford & Co. Each number is to contain one of Mr. H. W. Beecher's sermons, reported with Mr. Beecher's permission by Mr. T. J. Ellinwood, who has been reporting the sermons in Plymouth Church for about ten years. It is intended that the numbers shall be put on the market in a form fit for binding, and, to judge by the single specimen we have seen, we should say that this will be done, although the price is but six cents.——D. Van Nostrand & Co. announce that on the 1st of January they will issue a new magazine, to be called Van Nostrand's Eclectic Engineering Magazine. As its title indicates, it will consist of matter taken from the periodical works relating to engineering which are published in Europe and America. The editor is to be Mr. A. L. Holley.—The Messrs. Church, as editors of the Galaxy, have had the good fortune to agree with Mr. Charles Reade for the advance sheets of a novel which he is now writing, and the first chapters of which will appear simultaneously in the Galaxy and some English magazine, probably the Cornhill. The 1st of January is the time now set for the beginning of the story. Perhaps hardly another author who writes in English understands so well as Mr. Reade the conduct of a magazine novel as distinguished from a novel which comes upon the reader all at once. This, of course, is not said to disparage him in his capacity of perfectly regular novelist; our liking and admiration for him being great—though we have not read "Foul Play."——The Little Corporal is hereafter to appear in the form of a magazine. Its publisher claims for it a larger circulation than that of any other juvenile magazine in the world. How large that would be we do not know, for he has not informed us.——We have spoken in commendation of the Detective's Manual, a new periodical containing, we said, many things of interest to the general reader as well as to the officers of the police force. A look at the second number inclines us to retract something of this praise. It smacks a little of the disgusting tone of the "flash" "police" journals, which have always been common and never decent, and which we hoped this new periodical would partly displace. It is true, however, that "the force" will find it of some value.——Some time ago we announced as in the press of Mr. Joel Munsell "The Pre-Columbian Discovery of America by the Norsemen, illustrated by translations from the Icelandic Sagas," with introduction and notes by the Rev. Mr. B. F. De Costa. The work has been slow in getting issued, but we are informed that it will now appear very soon.——There is announced a new edition, by Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., of Dr. G. W. Samson's "Elements of Art Criticism"—a work against which we took occasion to warn our readers some months ago, and which we are sorry to see going into any one's hands who desires to learn anything of art. It is now to be abridged and set before students in schools and colleges. The same house has nearly ready "A Few Friends, and How they Enjoyed Themselves," by Mrs. Mary E. Dodge, of this city, who, under the form of a story, instructs her readers in the mysteries of twenty pastimes and games suitable for in-door diversion, and also describes a fancy dress party. One other book of Messrs. Lippincott & Co.'s we have not before mentioned—"The School History of Pennsylvania, from the First Settlements on the Delaware to the Present Time," by Mr. J. R. Sypher.——G. P. Putnam & Son have in press "No Love Lost: A Poem," by W. D. Howells, and "Unconquerable Powers," a novel from the German of Hermann Grimm.——Robert Carter & Brothers will issue "The Works of John Howe," in two volumes, a new edition of "The Life of Dr. William Marsh," and a compilation called "Scotia's Bards."——Lee & Shepard, among many juveniles, announce two new ones by "Sophie May"—which it is safe to praise beforehand—Mr. Ruskin's "King of the Golden River," and Mr. C. C. Cranch's "Last of the Huggermuggers," and "Kobbletozo." The same house will also publish, for older readers, "The Philosophy of Domestic Life," by Dr. W. H. Byford; "The Pampas and the Andes: A Thousand-Mile Walk," by N. H. Bishop; and "Gloverson and his Silent Partners," by Ralph Keeler.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt announce "File No. 13," from the French of Gaborian, and "The Habermeister," from the German of Hermann Schmid.——G. W. Carleton announces "The Acts of the Kings," a satirical Biblical narrative of the doings of the present government of Virginia, and a book entitled "Friendly Counsel for Girls."——Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger will publish "Southland Writers," which is biographical and critical sketches of living female writers of the South, by Miss Ida Raymond.——Murphy & Co., of Baltimore, announce "A New History of the Church," a school-book, translated by Rev. M. T. Noethen from the French of L'Hommond.

—In their desire to give variety to each number of their magazine, the conductors of the American Naturalist seem to us somewhat too much inclined to divide articles which a very little forbearance on the part of their readers would permit to be printed entire. Such, we say under correction, is Professor Wyman's interesting contribution to the October number—"On the Fresh-Water Shell-Heaps of the St. John's River, East Florida." In a former number of the Naturalist the same admirable observer described similar heaps on the New England coast, the results of both explorations going to enrich the Peabody Museum of American Archæology, of which Professor Wyman is curator. Mr. Brigham's series of "Notes on Tropical Fruits" is one which bears dividing very well, and in this instalment we have some novel and useful statements concerning pines and bananas. At the South, by the way, a distinction is made between plaintains and bananas, according as the fruit has red skins or yellow; but Mr. Brigham says the names are used almost indiscriminately, but "those varieties which are coarser and usually eaten cooked" are commonly called plaintains. "The amount of nourishment is very great, and Humboldt's statement is often quoted that the same extent of land which produces one thousand pounds of potatoes bears forty-four thousand pounds of bananas; a surface bearing wheat enough to feed one man will, when planted with bananas, feed twenty-five." The third article which deserves mention is Dr. G. A. Perkins's account of the "Cucuyo, or West Indian Fire Beetle."

—Among new works issued and to be issued in England we notice these: Messrs. Longmans & Co. have in press a Life of Schubert, translated from the German of Von Hellborn, by A. D. Coleridge. The same house will issue a continuation of our countryman Mr. Perkins's work on "Italian Sculptors," being a history of sculpture in Northern, Southern, and Eastern Italy. There is to be a new cheap edition of a number of copyrighted works by American authors. Messrs. Low & Co. have it in hand, and we see that Dr. Holmes's "Guardian Angel," and "Haunted Hearts," by the author of "The Lamplighter," are among the books set down for publication. Mr. Arthur Sketchley—that is to say, Mr. George Rose—has, of course, written his book on America. He calls it the "Great Country," and it is to be published by Tinsley Brothers. A book, in the prospectus of which there is as curious a bit of euphemism as will be seen for a long time to come, is Messrs. Cassell, Petter & Galpin's "Child's Bible," which, being expurgated, is described as having "omitted such portions as a judicious parent might hesitate to select as suitable for a child." Surely that writer is in his natural clime in a country which is actually said to have bought four millions of copies of "Hymns, Ancient and Modern." There is talk of somebody's reprinting Thomas Warton's "Milton's Minor Poems." This work, which, by reason of the editor's very wide and curious reading, is better annotated than any other Milton, has never been through more than two editions. Some of our American publishers looking out for a pretty, valuable, and not too dear gift book for people with more taste than money—and people of good taste never have money enough—ought to act on this suggestion and republish Warton's Milton for Christmas. Mr. T. H. Morell can supply them with two or three little-known portraits of the poet for photographic illustrations.

—The rich historical literature of our times is receiving some valuable additions in the form of what may be termed the posthumous works of the most eminent modern historian of Germany, the late Professor Häusser, of Heidelberg. This gifted teacher of history possessed, among his other accomplishments, the rare talent of successful improvisation to an extraordinary degree. His extemporized lectures, that never failed to draw crowds of enthusiastic hearers, were even superior to the printed productions of his great mind. As he did not take the trouble of writing them out, they would have probably been lost to the public at large but for the industry of one of his colleagues and hearers, Professor Oncken, an accomplished short-hand writer, who carefully took down the most meritorious among them. Last fall he published the celebrated lectures of the lamented professor upon the first French Revolution, comprising the period of 1789–99, and now he has brought out another volume containing the equally famous lectures upon the Age of Reformation. The subjects treated of in the latter are the Reformation in Germany, Calvinism and the religious struggles in France, the Thirty Years' War, the rising of the Netherlands, and the Cromwellian era in England. In preserving these spoken essays, than which no more at once profound and attractive expositions of the causes and results of those momentous episodes of human history have ever been produced, Professor Oncken has rendered a signal service not only to German literature but to historical students in general.

—The Russian Ministry of Marine has just published a work on the "Military Sanitary Establishment of the United States of America during the late War," by Dr. J. Haurowitz, the Chief Medical Inspector of the Russian fleet. Dr. Haurowitz came to this country in 1865 in order to inspect the sanitary arrangements of the army, and travelled extensively here. His book is an octavo of 294 pages, about one-half of which is devoted to a full and clear account of the medical organization of the army, including the Sanitary Commission, and the other half to notes on his travels, including sketches of the President, the principal generals, and accounts of the principal cities he saw, West Point, etc. The chapter on New York gives, among other things, very full statistics of the charitable institutions and of the public schools.

—Prof. Robert von Schlagintweit, of the University of Giessen, one of the celebrated explorers of India, especially of the Himalaya region, is soon to arrive in this country under an engagement for a series of lectures at the Lowell Institute, of Boston, "On the Results of a Scientific Mission to India and Upper Asia." Under the auspices of Alexander von Humboldt, the King of Prussia, and the East India Company of England, the Schlagintweits, three brothers eminently qualified for the work before them, set out on their exploring expedition in 1854. From Madras they went in 1855 to the Himalaya Mountains, and reached on the Ibi Gamin, in Thibet, the highest altitude ever attained by travellers, 20,886 feet. After exploring a great part of Upper Asia in every direction, two of the brothers returned safely to Europe in 1857; the third one, left behind for another season, was pursued, captured, and decapitated, near Kaschgar, in Central Asia. The voluminous material gathered on this expedition is being worked up by the surviving brothers, and published in splendid style in English, in nine volumes text, and an atlas of one hundred and twenty plates in folio, partly in excellent chromo-lithographs. As a lecturer, both in the English and German languages, Robert von Schlagintweit has earned already a high and well-deserved reputation and his lectures will no doubt range amongst the most interesting of the coming season in this country. He proposes, after the delivery of his course in Boston, to visit the principal cities of the Union.

—We find some interesting scraps of foreign literary news in the journals lately received. A certain M. Delprat, a man of letters in Paris, has recently been involved in a dispute with MM. Charpentier, the publishers, which at last he carried into the courts, who have now pronounced upon it. It is decided that in France the publisher of a periodical cannot, without the consent of his contributors, take upon himself to strike out or alter passages in articles which are afterwards published under the contributor's signature. This is equitable enough, we suppose, though it strikes one as being an additional reason for abolishing the signature system, which, after all, has at its foundation the sentiment of vanity—together with other and better things, of course. It was further decided that, where the editor has taken the liberty above referred to, the contributor has a right to require that a letter shall be published to inform his readers that what he wrote was modified after it left his hands. The London Publishers' Circular thinks that the first part of the decision corresponds with a judgment rendered in an English court. The dispute on that side of the Channel having been between a writer for a cyclopædia and its publishers, who wished to prune his article, the former succeeded in getting an injunction. This, the Circular says, is not generally known. As there was no statute law in the case, and as a similar dispute in this country—where also there is no statute law touching it—would also have to be decided by application of the principles of equity, doubtless it is safe to say that a similar quarrel here would have a similar termination if taken before the judges. Another item of some interest—as showing that it is not only American publishers who practise at the same time an enlightened self-interest and a beneficent generosity—is to the effect that MM. Hachette & Co., in imitation of Messrs. A. S. Barnes & Co. and Messrs. Appleton & Co., have recently placed at the disposal of the Minister of Instruction more than 100,000 volumes, which are to be placed in the school libraries of the people. They consist of light reading and instructive works, and have, of course, been accepted.

—The Saxon is so willing to hear himself talked about that you may even talk in dispraise. Even here in America, where, notwithstanding the influx of fresh blood from the old Saxon homes, "the sub-cutaneous adipose cushion and tissues which mark the race" disappear, where his women grow angular, flat, and sallow, and his children's teeth decay quickly, he will be pleased to hear what Dr. Knox, a British ethnologist, has to say about him and his brothers in Australia, Britain, Holland, and North Germany. To begin with, then, he is of all people "the most outrageously boasting; arrogant, self-sufficient beyond endurance, holding in utter contempt all other races of men." This, we fear, is true, even of the Saxon with most Geist. It was as easy for Coleridge as for any Chaw-bacon to thank God that he was an Englishman; and De Quincey would not have consented to be a Portuguese, say, any sooner than the sailor who scorns Portugee niggers with undoubting confidence. The Saxon is a born democrat and utilitarian, says Dr. Knox. He despises "doctrinaires;" he will not discuss ultimate principles in philosophy; it is in commerce only that he is speculative; for in reasoning he is inductive, in philosophy objective; he is a gambler at heart—"always self-reliant, he is ever ready 'to chance it.'" He is narrow and mechanical in thought, and loves routine, expediency without method; men of science he hates. Genius he hates too, but for another reason, namely, because he knows his race is without it, is immeasurably behind the Gothic or the Slavonian in respect of genius, and he dislikes to hear of it. This last is an absurd assertion, though it is true that it is with the Saxon that the rather queer definition of genius obtains which declares it to be patient application. Still, it would be a very queer definition of genius which would deny it to the people that has produced Shakespeare, to say nothing of the German branches of the family. The Saxon is given to jobbery, to intemperance, to hypocrisy, to unscrupulous rapacity, to selfishness. "No nation, however, exceeds them in an abstract sense of justice and a love of fair play, but only to Saxons." This also may be so, hard as it is. The old story is too true which talks of a certain Saxon as bricklayer. To him and his fellows, according to the legend, approaches a person who is asked, "'Oo goes there?" "A stranger," he answers. Whereupon the questioner says, "Stranger? 'eave 'arf a brick at 'un." The Saxon is not, says Dr. Knox, fond of princes or hereditary chiefs. He does not love soldiering, but is a good sailor, and a very good pirate and buccaneer. England has been the tyrant of the sea, and if she ceases to be such it will be because the United States will take that position from her. On the other hand, the Saxons are not without their good qualities. "They are the only race in the world that can understand and can safely be trusted with political and constitutional liberty. They only have sound ideas on this point." The Saxon is eminently obedient and law-abiding, if the law is made by himself. Parental and filial love is not so much developed in him but that he early betakes himself, with his large torso and his spatula fingers, to remote lands, which he conquers and then colonizes better than the people of any other race. In cold climates he, as a rule, exterminates the race he conquers; in tropical climates he cannot conveniently do without it, so there, as in India, for example, he is a ruler who is, on the whole, just and merciful. But this is only if the subject race is submissive; to all mutineers not of his own blood he is of all masters the most terribly severe. Colonies of his own he cannot keep; as they increase in numbers and wealth, they grow insolent and cast off allegiance: witness America; and Australia is nearly ready. As for us Americans, with our narrowing jaws and the failure of our adipose tissues, we are to become, as a Saxon race, extinct. "A real native, permanent American or Australian race of pure Saxon blood is a dream," Dr. Knox declares; but this is talk merely; at any rate, it is not proved. The doctor, by the way, says his say in a manner that makes him a fine illustration of the race's character, as it is according to his theory. Since Hengst and Horsa there has not been any much more domineering, self-asserting talker.

THE ANTE-NICENE FATHERS.*

The Council of Nice answers in church history to the outlining of the continents in dynamical geology; the theological thought of the first three centuries—sometimes a fragmentary and scattered "drift," sometimes fomented by the heats of controversy, sometimes a vapory mass of speculation, and again compacted into system by the pressure of opposing forces—was then consolidated into a creed of positive declarations and well-defined boundaries, which has since served as a basis of belief for the vast majority of Christendom. In the new movements of our day toward an organic Christian unity it is urged that adhesion to the Nicene Creed should be made the one test of communion in the Church Catholic, the earlier theology being regarded as crude and inchoate, the later as superfluous or sectarian. But why make the year 325 the starting-point of a positive Christian theology, and the place of rest to which, after every cycle of apparent progress, it must again return? Some are influenced by the illusion that a creed formed fifteen centuries ago lay very near the time of the Apostles; forgetting that the Council of Nice was almost as remote from Paul as we are from Luther, and that great changes in the intellectual and social, as well as in the political, life of the Roman world had marked the interval. Others imagine that the unanimity of the Council of Nice represented a culmination of the development of Christian doctrine; forgetting how far that Council was from being truly œcumenical, and how much its apparent unity was due to the political coercion of the emperor.

But just as in the structure of the earth treasures and materials now most serviceable to man are traced to the remains of a palæontological period that preceded the existing order of things, so we may find gems of Christian thought and potent influences for religious life and opinion in the fragmentary remains of the Ante-Nicene period, in the apologies, the controversies, the pious meditations, the philosophical speculations of the Fathers, from Clement of Rome to Cyprian of Carthage. While the Nicene Creed served as a formative to Christian theology, the roots of that theology should be sought in the two preceding centuries. We there come into fresher contact with Christianity in its influence upon life and thought both in the East and the West, and can trace also the reflex influence of manners and opinions upon the Christian faith. We look more upon men than upon systems, upon men in their individuality than upon schools and orders.

The writings of the Ante-Nicene Fathers, some of which had already appeared in an English dress in the Oxford "Library of the Fathers," and in the independent translations of Chevallier, Giles, Cureton, Kaye, and others—are now made fully accessible to the laity in this comely edition. As these volumes are likely to introduce the earlier Fathers for the first time to many of our readers, we offer a few suggestions touching their value as a contribution to Christian literature and theology. While the scholar does not look to these writings for either a classic purity of style or a philosophical method of discussion, he nevertheless finds in them the simplicity, earnestness, vigor, and enthusiasm that mark a creative era in the world of thought—as, for instance, in Tertullian, of whom it has been said that he "conquered for Christianity a literature out of the Punic Latin;" and though one's taste and judgment are offended by certain crudities of the Apostolic Fathers, and by the extravagant fancies of Origen, he traces in Justin and others the influence of the Grecian philosophy and of a general culture in the heathen literature. It happened to the early literature of the Church, as to early Christian art, that for a time the practical assertion of the new truths was made more important than their artistic forms, and art was even slighted as tending to idolatry and impiety, until at length the new spirit felt itself strong enough to mould the highest forms of art to its own pure and noble uses; only the transition came much sooner in literature than in art.

Leaving out of view the question of inspiration or of a divine suggestion in the canonical writers of the New Testament, the great falling off from the simplicity and dignity of their style, and the depth and purity of their thought, to the tameness and leanness of the earlier Fathers, is one of the most curious psychological phenomena in the history of literature. The Fathers espoused the same faith with the Apostles, were of the same spirit, and engaged in the same work of propagating Christianity, yet how meagre were their contributions to the argument of the Christian system! The epistles of Polycarp, Clement, and Ignatius are chiefly made up of citations from the Apostolic letters, with a running commentary and exhortation, and the contrast of style is very apparent. Later on we find conceits and puerilities which would at once have discredited the New Testament writings had they been found in these. Take, for instance, the elaborate ornateness of Cyprian, in his letter to the Confessors upon the experiences of a whole year of persecution:

"The winter has passed through the vicissitudes of the months; but you, shut up in prison, were undergoing, instead of the inclemencies of winter, the winter of persecution. To the winter succeeded the mildness of spring, rejoicing with roses and crowned with flowers; but to you were present roses and flowers from the delights of Paradise, and celestial garlands wreathed your brows. Behold, the summer is fruitful with the fertility of harvest, and the threshing-floor is filled with grain; but you who have sown glory reap the fruit of glory, and, placed in the Lord's threshing-floor, behold the chaff burnt up with unquenchable fire; you yourselves as grains of wheat, winnowed and precious corn, now purged and garnered, regard the dwelling-place of a prison as your granary. Nor is there wanting to the autumn spiritual grace for discharging the duties of the season. The vintage is pressed out of doors, and the grape which shall hereafter glow into the cup is trodden in the presses. You, rich bunches out of the Lord's vineyard, and branches with fruit already ripe, trodden by the tribulation of worldly pressure, fill your wine-press in the torturing prison, and shed your blood instead of wine; brave to bear suffering, you willingly drink the cup of martyrdom. Thus the year rolls on with the Lord's servants—thus is celebrated the vicissitude of the seasons with spiritual deserts and with celestial rewards."

Compare this with the addresses of James and Peter to their brethren in tribulation, or with the magnificent but never unrestrained imagery of John in the Apocalypse. Or again, in another vein, compare the rough, coarse way in which Tertullian deals with a theological opponent as contrasted with the dignified courtesy of Paul toward those whose errors he condemned. Here is his famous philippic against Marcion. After portraying the dismal climate of the Pontus, and the savage and disgusting traits of its inhabitants, he proceeds to say:

"Nothing, however, in Pontus is so barbarous and sad as the fact that Marcion was born there, fouler than any Scythian, more roving than the Sarmatian, more inhuman than the Massagete, more audacious than an Amazon, darker than the cloud, colder than its winter, more brittle than its ice, more deceitful than the Ister, more craggy than the Caucasus. Nay, more, the true Prometheus, Almighty God, is mangled by Marcion's blasphemies. Marcion is more savage than even the beasts of that barbarous region. For what beaver was ever a greater emasculator than he who has abolished the nuptial bond? What Pontic mouse ever had such gnawing powers as he who has gnawed the Gospels to pieces?"

This tirade may well have served as a model for the Memphis Avalanche in its description of a Republican candidate for Congress:

"Thomas A. Hamilton, the sugar thief, the white-livered perjurer, and the apostate to the Confederate cause, has returned to the unfortunate city which he curses by his loathsome habitation. He is more pestiferous than the lice and locusts of Egypt, than siroccos, tempests, hurricanes, and whirlwinds. Small-pox, yellow-fever, phthisic, rheumatism, and gout are all bad enough, but they are blessings in comparison with the leprous scourge called Hamilton. As no grass ever grew where the feet of the renowned Huns trod the earth, so does the rich carpet that sods the green fields wither and crisp under the blighting tread of Hamilton's cloven hoofs. When he enters a garden the full-blown flowers all turn to touch-me-nots, and hang their heads in modest blushes of shame. The birds hush their matin songs at his approach, and fly away as if some evil genius had poisoned their fragrant bowers. The dogs bark at him with a kind of melancholy howl, and when he approaches a barn-yard the chickens crow in a long, mournful drawl."

But though we may not look to the early Fathers for classic elegance of style or the perfection of rhetorical art, one is charmed with their simple fervor, with their earnestness of purpose, with their unflinching devotion to the cause they had espoused; and something of roughness, even of violence, may be pardoned to men who lived in stormy times, and spoke and wrote in view of the torture, the block, the arena. We owe to them a living picture of Christianity as a working power in human thought and society at the beginning of its triumphs. The writings of the Ante-Nicene Fathers are remarkable for their deference to the teaching of the Scriptures. Their doctrines and exhortations are based upon the New Testament, and fortified by citations from the Gospels and Epistles. This peculiarity aids one in determining how far the New Testament was regarded as of divine authority, and what approach had then been made toward the settlement of the canon.

The Ante-Nicene Fathers agree in their testimony to the reformation wrought by Christianity in private morals and in public manners. Thus, Tertullian, in his apology, boldly challenges the enemies of Christians to point out any evil in their lives that can be fairly ascribed to their religion, and refers with exultation to their domestic purity, their integrity in business, their sobriety and order, and their abounding charities, as fruits of the Gospel.

Nor are there wanting in the Ante-Nicene Fathers traces of that spirit of philosophy and of erudition which in their successors shaped the doctrinal germs of the New Testament into elaborate systems of theology, varying according to the influence of Plato and of Aristotle upon the thought of the age, though in general one finds in that period rather the elementary and practical truths that belong to an age of missionary zeal.

To trace in detail the hints upon the polity and doctrines of the early Church scattered through these writings, is hardly within the province of this journal. But if theologians of every school and churchmen of every degree were more familiar with this period, they would be less forward to claim for their favorite systems the exclusive warrant of antiquity. We commend to their devout reading the Library of the Ante-Nicene Fathers.

EDUCATION BY BUMPS.*

HERE we have a book in which the complex and difficult subject of education is treated with that comfortable and gratifying precision hitherto looked for in mathemetical and physical discussions alone. Here all the crooked paths are made straight, and the hilly places reduced to a dead level. Henceforth, the art of education is a mere matter of bumps, temperaments, and religious excitement; we have only to handle the first, scrutinize the second, and undergo the third, in order to become in every way competent instructors. Teachers may now cut short or wholly abandon the long and intricate preparatory course which it has hitherto been thought desirable or needful for them to traverse; for a royal road has been opened. A careful study of Gall, Spurzheim, and Mr. Hecker, with perhaps some practice under Messrs. Fowler & Wells, and an assiduous attendance upon revival meetings, will in future ensure their success.

The reader will, perhaps, desire some information as to how all this is to be accomplished, and as to what may be the respective functions of soi-disant "science and religion" in the process. In the first place, then, one is to study Gall, Spurzheim, and especially Mr. Hecker, in order to learn how the problem of education is, for all practical purposes, to be reduced from a psychological to a temperamental and cranioscopic problem. Mr. Hecker gratifies and startles us by the information that there are four leading temperaments—the nervous, sanguine, bilious, and lymphatic—in which the functions of the nervous system, the lungs, the liver, and the stomach respectively predominate. His profound physiological researches have also taught him that the nervous temperament is apt to have the hair brown and silky, while the sanguine has it ruddy, the bilious coarse and dark, and the lymphatic dull and flaxen. The nervous temperaments also learn quickly and forget quickly, while the bilious learn slowly and remember tenaciously; nervous people are apt to be thin, and lymphatic people fat; the latter like to sit still, while the sanguine people prefer to be moving about in the open air, and the bilious people court seclusion. And so forth; all of which, in point of scientific value, reminds us of the old woman's meteorologic aphorism,

> "Open and shet, > Sign of more wet."

Mr. Hecker, however, as is natural, thinks more highly of the results of his labors. He devotes much space to a description of these novel phenomena of temperament and has adorned his volume with four villanous-looking colored lithographs, as a means of illustrating his discoveries concretely.

Having learned, then, how to detect the signs of the different temperaments, which the intelligent teacher will find but a short task, the next thing is to classify the children accordingly. Here they will need help. "At the outset the experiment would necessarily involve and require special explanation and aid from some person who, like myself, has made the subject one of special study." The nervous children are so forgetful that they must review, review, and toujours review; the bilious children are slow, and must have everything minutely explained to them, but they need n't review so much. "These sanguine, ruddy-faced boys by the window are not the ones to sit where they can look out of doors; everything they see in the street, while under instruction, will distract their attention. Put them there by the door, and let the full-faced, watery, lymphatic boys, now sitting by the door, go over by the window" (p. 13). This classification of pupils having been accomplished, now let the teachers be assigned to the different classes "in such a manner that the temperament of the teacher and the class would harmonize."

Who can doubt that these discoveries, once consistently applied, would be likely to revolutionize our whole system of education? Lest it should appear incredible that one man could achieve so much, Mr. Hecker is careful to let us know that it is through "the assistance of Almighty God" that he has been enabled to acquire this rare knowledge, which he will be glad to impart "to those whose mission it may be to give it a practical and useful application for the benefit of mankind" (p. 17).

This knowledge, acquired by such unusual methods, includes, of course, craniology, popularly supposed to be the science of the convolutions upon the surface of the cerebral hemispheres, but in reality the pseudo-science of the elevations and depressions on the outside of the skull, with which the cerebral convolutions sometimes coincide and sometimes do not. For the better illustration of Mr. Hecker's contributions to this department of science, the monotony of his printed pages is alleviated by the occasional insertion of a portrait, which, on a superficial glance, we took to be that of a Sioux Indian carrying a sieve on his head, but which, upon closer scrutiny, turns out to be the outline of an eidolon or bust of George Washington contained in the author's library. This bust, it appears, "is modelled from the mask taken from the living head; and the contour of the upper and back part of the head is modelled according to the mental character which he manifested in actual life" (p. 18). Just so; it is in this way, we presume, that our phrenological journalists contrive to embellish their pages with outline portraits of Nero, Caligula, Peter the Great, Genghis Khan, and other well-known personages, whose bumps, especially on the crown, occiput, and near the nape of the neck, are always so carefully and distinctly indicated. This also accounts for the superfluously American type of our national hero's cranium, as seen by examining the plate facing page 76; its pitch-roof contour being due to the necessity of giving sufficient prominence to the "organ" of godliness. In this also are corrected the errors or deficiencies which are noticeable in every portrait or bust of the Father of his Country—"such as . . . the failure to represent aright the top and back of the head, in which are embodied the most commanding elements of character." The artists who painted Washington's head, being all "deficient in the scientific knowledge of the mind," could hardly be expected to arrive at results edifying to the dealer in craniologic wares.

In the commonplaces of phrenology, as set afloat by Gall and Spurzheim, Mr. Hecker deals but little, and in that little achieves the usual amount of success. Believing the cerebellum (p. 65) to be the seat of "amativeness," he informs us that it is not developed until the age of puberty. So Gall said, some time ago; he thought it ought to be so, and accordingly declared that it was so. And people believed him until M. Lélut showed by experiment that the cerebellum attains its maximum relative development in children four or five years old; not a strange circumstance, when we recollect that this lesser brain has no more to do with "amativeness" than with Niagara Falls, but is the co-ordinator of the muscular movements.

Sat verbum sapientibus. Our author, as has been seen, is not a mere pedler of other men's discoveries. In phrenology his characteristic originality reveals itself. He will not rest content with the results attained by Dr. Spurzheim, who "did not properly recognize the new birth" (p. 195) It is his aim to apply craniology to the analysis of the phenomena of "depravity," the "new birth," and "the influence of the Holy Ghost" (p. 34). He talks a great deal about the way in which temperaments and "organic" proclivities are modified by Divine influence. He has "resorted [pp. 19, 197] to the Holy Bible" for a nomenclature which shall be more appropriate than that of his German predecessors. And, on page 189, he thus gives us some evangelical aspects of the science of bumps:

> "When Peter began to remonstrate with him for his willingness to go to Jerusalem to suffer death for men, he rebuked the disciple in whom thus the social affections were asserting predominance over Brotherly-kindness and Steadfastness, saying: 'Thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men.' And calling the people together, he said to them: 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself;' adding that those who should be ashamed of him and his words in that evil generation, should be rejected in the judgment. The fear and shame of which He thus warned them result from the predominance of the higher faculties of the propensities—Cautiousness and Approbativeness—over Godliness and its associated faculties in the spiritual group."

This extract will, we trust, suffice as a specimen of a book which a sensible man, moderately careful of his reputation, would doubtless have burned in the manuscript.

Faraday as a Discoverer. By John Tyndall. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1868.)—This is an interesting and instructive memoir of the man whom Prof. Tyndall considers the greatest experimental philosopher that ever lived, and whom all will admit to have been very great indeed. Certainly the summary of his achievements on pp. 145–147 is enough to quite dazzle those who have not before paused to marshal in their memories the array of discoveries which will for ever be associated with the name of Michael Faraday. About his grand discovery of magneto-electric induction are grouped his researches on the extra current; on the polar and other conditions of diamagnetic bodies; on the definite character and distribution of lines of magnetic force; on "the employment of the induced magneto-electric current as a measure and test of magnetic action;" and on "the revulsive phenomena of the magnetic field." Secondly, we owe to him the important law of definite electro-chemical decomposition; the final overthrow of Volta's contact theory, and the discovery of the chemical origin of voltaic electricity. His third great discovery was that of the magnetization of light; and his fourth, that of diamagnetism, accompanied with his immensely significant enquiries on magno-crystallic action, and on "atmospheric magnetism in its relations to the annual and diurnal variation of the needle." These are his grandest achievements; yet even without these, as Prof. Tyndall observes, his researches on the liquefaction of gases, on the gymnotus, on frictional electricity, and his discovery of benzole, would have sufficed to ensure him a permanent reputation. The due consideration of these facts will perhaps lead us to agree with the enthusiastic biographer, that no other man has solved single-handed so many diverse problems by way of inductive experiment. Yet in spite of all this he is not, we think, entitled to be placed in the very front rank of discoverers. In spite of his dislike of the modern name "physicist"(p. 5), it describes him much more accurately than the title which he preferred, of "philosopher." He enunciated no general law of the relations of force and matter which should give to the science of physics the grandeur and dimensions of the science of astronomy. The discovery of such a law has been the life-work of half-a-dozen able men—Grove, Helmholtz, Mayer, Joule, Tyndall, and Carpenter—fellow-laborers with Mr. Faraday; and its general philosophic implications have been for the first time announced by Herbert Spencer. Could Faraday have achieved all this by himself, it would, perhaps, have entitled him to a place by the side of Newton, although even then he would have had nothing with which to offset the latter's fluxions.

* "The Scientific Basis of Education; demonstrated by an Analysis of the Temperaments and of Phrenological Facts, in Connection with Mental Phenomena and the Office of the Holy Spirit in the Processes of the Mind; in a Series of Letters to the Department of Public Instruction in the City of New York." Second edition. By John Hecker. New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1868.

When a man has performed such great deeds in this world, it is sometimes well enough to make up one's mind accurately in what niche of honor to place him, and that is our reason for making the above remarks, otherwise superfluous. If Mr. Faraday did not work out the entire doctrine of the correlation and persistence of force, it was not from an initial lack of insight; for as long ago as 1840 he overwhelmed the voltaic theory by showing that it postulated a creation of force out of nothing. "In no case," said he, "not even in those of the gymnotus and torpedo, is there a pure creation or a production of power without a corresponding exhaustion of something to supply it" (p. 64). These, as Prof. Tyndall points out, were remarkable words to have been uttered two years before Joule first announced his wonderful discovery of the mechanical value of heat. Yet so confident was Faraday of the validity of his argument that he "never cared to experiment further on the source of electricity in the voltaic pile."

We cannot attach so high an estimate to Mr. Faraday's reasonings on the atomic constitution of matter, drawn from considerations on the conducting power of space. But though they may have glanced aside of the target at which they were originally aimed, we wonder that Prof. Tyndall does not notice how hopelessly they demolish the metaphysical doctrine of an intermolecular ether, which he, at least verbally, continues to accept as a means of rendering comprehensible the conveyance of heat. Let us apply Faraday's argument to this hypothesis, and see what becomes of it. Take first a non-conductor of electricity, such as shell-lac, with its molecules, and intermolecular ether diffused through the mass. In this case ether must be an insulator; "for, if it were a conductor, it would resemble a fine metallic web, penetrating the lac in every direction. But the fact is that it resembles the wax of black sealing-wax, which surrounds and insulates the particle or conducting carbon, interspersed throughout its mass." Consequently, in the case of shell-lac, the ether is an insulator. Take next a conducting metal. "Here we have, as before, the swathing of" ether "round every atom. If" ether "be an insulator, there can be no transmission of electricity from atom to atom. But there is transmission; hence the" ether "is a conductor." (See p. 122.)

Minus added to plus makes zero; and such must be the fate of that much-quoted ether which, according to arguments derived from Faraday himself, is thus seen to be at once a conductor and a non-conductor of electricity.

"Je suis ce que je suis,
Mais je ne suis pas ce que je suis;
Si je serais ce que je suis,
Je ne serais pas ce que je suis."

The investigations of Faraday are described in Prof. Tyndall's best manner. The biographical notices and the anecdotes scattered through the volume are most entertaining, and one can only wish there were more of them.

Short Stories for Spare Moments. Selected from Lippincott's Magazine. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1869.)—There are fourteen short stories, by different writers, in this collection, the list of authors including Annie Thomas, Mrs. Spofford, Leonard Kip, Maria Pool, and other more or less well-known magazine writers. The stories are all up to the ordinary magazine standard, which is, we may say, not a very exalted one, and none of them is beyond it. In various ways they are rather pleasant and slightly interesting—things which can be read and forgotten without effort. Mr. Leonard Kip's ghost story is, perhaps, the most agreeable of them.

Adèle Dubois: A Story of the Lovely Miramichi Valley, in New Brunswick. (Boston: Loring. 1868.)—This novel was issued by the same publisher some three years ago, under the title of "Miramichi," and as the story is not sufficiently interesting to make it probable that a second edition has been called for, and the present issue makes no mention of the former one, the unsold copies have probably been rechristened and put in a cheaper form upon the market. Like all of the Loring Railway Library that we have examined, it is rather above the average of light reading, its moral tone being healthy and its style direct and simple; perhaps a trifle too simple. The wildness of the Miramichi region is a little over-stated, but in other matters the author has kept a level at least as prosaic as truthful.

The Week.

ELECTION returns are but meagre as we go to press, although we doubt if there ever was in America an election in which the returns were more anxiously awaited. But the Republicans in Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Nebraska seem to have been too busy rejoicing, as well they might, to despatch telegrams. The party has come out of the contest with a perfect certainty of success in the Presidential contest. The Democracy have now nothing whatever to hope for except within the limits of this city; even Mr. Hoffman's defeat, it would seem, is secured by the decisive victory in Pennsylvania, and that no selling out of Mr. Seymour can now give the State to Tammany. If only there could be shown here in New York the same courage, energy, and systematized vigilance which alone prevented the overwhelming defeat of the Republicans in the city of Philadelphia, there would be very little talk of a Democratic municipal majority of ninety thousand—or of eighty or seventy-five or seventy thousand. All four of the States are, beyond a doubt, carried by the Republicans, and as in November there can be not nearly as much cheating as the Republicans have had to contend against this month, and as October always converts, or "perverts," the wavering, the popular majority for Grant and Colfax may be expected to be enormous. It cannot be too large, for the South still refuses, or up to this morning has been refusing, to believe that the North certainly meant what it has been saying. As regards Congressmen, there is quite as great a success as could have been anticipated or, indeed, desired. Apparently, the Democrats have made no gains of districts, and the delegations will stand nearly as before. Vallandigham—who is not badly described by the name which his neighbors pleasantly give him, the Ten Cent Martyr, who is a man of slender abilities, and of political opinions and practices to be reprobated—is certainly beaten by General Schenck, a man to be respected for his talents as well as his perhaps rather violent courage; and we are particularly glad to have him in the House again, because, if Butler is going back, General Schenck will be peculiarly useful on occasion. Mr. Ashley has probably lost his district; but this we do not allow to interfere with our joy. Garfield, of course, is elected, and by the immense majority of 13,000. His is the old Giddings district, in part of which, in Giddings's own town, people are so much "advanced" that negroes, it is said, are allowed to vote, though the law of the State forbids it. The influence of their votes would, of course, be but slight, and would not affect the general result in the district. Mr. Garfield's election is also a case in which Ohio has done honor to herself and service to the country. In the Indiana Districts affairs seem to be unchanged, so far as the two parties are concerned; but this, in part, is due to the recent "gerrymandering" of the State—a performance which really throws some of the blame of the shameless Democratic "colonizing" of the river counties upon the Republicans, who set them an example of sharp practice.

"The Pudding Gang, from the Swamp, deserted their haunts, most of them having left on an early train. They have round bullet heads, their hair being cut moderately short and combed behind their ears. They wear long black coats, especially just before the fall elections, low-quarter, stub-toed shoes, and are very partial to cheap pomade, which they use in large quantities. In physique they are thin and wiry, and of nervous temperament." This is the account which a Tribune reporter gives of the contribution of one hundred or one hundred and fifty voters which the Fourth Ward of this city sent out to Philadelphia on Monday. He goes with the same minuteness into descriptions of the Emigrant Runners of the First Ward—many of whom "are Germans who have been for a long time in this city and are quite hardened in crime;" of the "Sheeneys" of the Third Ward; of the West Broadway Rangers; of the Dead Rabbits from the Five Points, Mulberry Street, and the Sixth Ward—all bound for Philadelphia to do "repeating." The description is of a kind to fling doubt over the charges which the reporter makes against the Democrats, but, for all that, we suppose it is as true as anything can be, that thieves, pimps, roughs, and bullies, to the number of thousands, were for some days before the election arriving in Philadelphia on the trains from Baltimore and New York. And it is entirely beyond a doubt that fraudulent naturalization papers to the number of thousands have been issued by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court.

The Republican judges—the whole case, by the way, is a beautiful illustration of the system of electing the judiciary—finding that their Democratic brethren on the bench would do nothing to prevent the frauds which the newspaper reporters had made public, addressed a letter to the community at large, from which it appears that a couple of Democratic tipstaves have been making citizens of the United States, at the rate of hundreds a day, for many days. More than seven thousand people have been naturalized during the month of September, and most of them were naturalized fraudulently. The evidence of some of the new citizens arrested shows beyond doubt that the Democratic Committee made the most systematic and extensive arrangements for swamping the Republican majority in the State by dishonestly swamping that in Philadelphia. Mr. William Wallace, the chairman, is certainly a man to be cheered whenever he enters a Democratic convention.

---

The Republicans took fright, however, a fortnight before the day of election, and as the disgraceful business was fully ventilated, the Democrats lost most of their money and labor. All this is nearly as bad as bad can be. It might be worse, of course, for the Republicans might be engaged in the business as extensively as their opponents—a thing which some men say, but no man believes. It is beyond a doubt, we suppose, that before the winter is over some Republican in Congress will afford proof of the desire of the party generally for honest elections by bringing in a bill—which Democrats will surely vote against—to take the business of naturalization out of the hands of the State courts and give it to the United States judges—a body of men not surpassed for official integrity by any similar body in the world; and that is a thing that nobody would think of saying of our elected justices.

Judge Sharswood's course in the matter is such as will cause him to be looked on with some suspicion by honorable men who have heretofore respected him. He owes his election—official investigation into the Luzerne District Congressional election proves it—to votes fraudulently cast, and it almost seems as if some of his actions had been dictated by a grateful remembrance of this fact. Charges having been made by the press and by his fellow-judges that the prothonotary of the court had illegally issued blank naturalization papers; that voters had been made by constables in the absence of judge and prothonotary; that seven hundred had been made in one day, which is at the rate of about two a minute for every minute of the working day—Judge Sharswood reluctantly ordered an examination into the prothonotary's conduct, and the testimony fully sustained the allegations. But when he gave his decision, exonerating the prothonotary—as may have been right—he admitted the probability of frauds; in fact, he pronounced fraudulent certain naturalization blanks that he held in his hand, and wrote the word "fraudulent" on the back of each of them; but he gave no advice as to the duty of the inspectors of elections, except that he emphatically laid down the law that the prothonotary's seal was prima facie evidence that the paper bearing it was to be accepted as genuine. Having delivered this decision, at once, before the Attorney-General or anybody else could open his mouth, the judge declared the court adjourned sine die. This may be susceptible of explanation; but it has a very bad look, and ought to make every man in Philadelphia overhaul his opinions on the subject of elective judges—the great danger from whom, after all, is that they are tempted to bend to the will of the appointing power, if that power chooses to bring its will to bear, and that it is a thousand times more likely to bring its will to bear if it is a popular majority instead of a State governor.

The leading Democratic agitators at the South seem possessed with a kind of barbaric faith in symbolism, and are trying hard to help the cause by the use of tableaux vivants. The first experiment with this sort of machinery was made at the Philadelphia Convention, when General Couch and Governor Orr marched up the middle aisle arm-in-arm, as the personification of South Carolina and Massachusetts. That proved a great failure; but the operators have not been discouraged, and are now anxious to try the effect of "John Quincy Adams Talking of Union and Fraternal Relations on the Soil of South Carolina." So Wade Hampton and others have addressed a gushing letter to Mr. Adams, the Democratic candidate for the Massachusetts governorship, asking him to go to Columbia and take part in this pleasing and pretty representation, in the expectation that it would send "an electric thrill from one end of the country to the other." Mr. Adams replies in an exceedingly sensible letter, the like of which, coming from a Democratic "standard-bearer," it has never been our privilege to peruse, inasmuch as it is modest, straightforward, and devoid of the blubber with which the "views" of "standard-bearers" are usually encumbered. He warns them that, as a tableau, his appearance in South Carolina will produce no good effect whatever; that he represents nothing in Massachusetts except "a comparatively small and very unpopular minority," and that his going down is likely to be attributed to bad motives. He then informs them in good set terms that the policy of the North towards the South is dictated by distrust, and not by revenge or bitterness; that this distrust has been partially justified by the injudicious legislation of several Southern States—referring to the black codes passed in 1865. He says, and says truly, that time alone, and "a patient and enduring persistence on their part in well-doing, can effectually remove the cause of their ills." He might have added, that a cessation of wild talk on their part is almost as essential as well-doing. The Northern public does not always see what Southerners are doing, but it hears all they say, and their foolish speeches probably do as much as anything else to aggravate the evils of their condition. Mr. Adams has delivered his speech in South Carolina, and it is much in the same vein as his letter. He condemns the Congressional policy of reconstruction, but gives the South plenty of good advice. The telegraphic summary of the speech forwarded to the papers here was, if the full report since published in the World be correct, a piece of gross misrepresentation.

Talking of General Butler's constituency a fortnight ago, we said that "if pure-blooded New Englanders, from a district which produced such men as Endicott and Higginson, are satisfied in the year of grace 1868 with being represented by General Butler, there ought to be an end to all whimpering about the malign influence of foreign immigration on American politics." Returning to the subject last week, by way of illustrating the general's audacity in offering himself for re-election we spoke of his district as the "fountain-head of Puritanism," and "as the best educated and most intelligent and pure-blooded community in the United States." Commenting on this, the New York Tribune says: "We knew that 'pure-blooded' has a meaning in Europe, but this is the first time we have seen it given one in America. The expression strikes us as being eminently snobbish." The italics in the above are ours, but any expression of opinion about this remarkable bit of criticism would be disrespectful to our readers. What do the opponents of compulsory education say to this case?

The monument to Major-General Sedgwick, at West Point, is to be dedicated on Wednesday next, Mr. George W. Curtis delivering the address. Sedgwick was one of the bravest and ablest of the swarm of brave and able men who fell between Washington and Richmond during the war, and how large a place he filled in the popular confidence and respect those know who remember the gloom which fell upon the public all over the country the night the news of his death arrived, following as it did on the terrible days of the Wilderness. The Sixth Corps became under his lead literally a corps d'élite, one of those famous bodies of men who, in every war, attain the dangerous honor of being counted on to turn the scale when the fortunes of great fields are trembling in the balance. Those who admired him, and who believe that memories like his are a valuable national possession, will do well to join those who served under him in witnessing the dedication of his monument, which, by-the-by, has been cast from captured guns.

Mr. Dana's speech to the Convention which nominated him at Salem, on Monday week, had not reached us before our last issue, except in a brief summary. He commented very severely on the devices to which General Butler had been resorting in the canvass, such as the purloining of Mr. Atkinson's telegram, the offering of a reward to anybody who would furnish him with charges against the private character of his opponents, and his denunciation of them as rebels and traitors; pointed out the offence against the well-settled principles of the American political system, as well as against decency, committed by the general, in treating the attempt of the electors to substitute somebody else for him to represent them in Congress, on the expiration of his term, as an outrage on him personally. In touching on the general's assaults on the public credit Mr. Dana rose at times into real eloquence, and made a most powerful and happy use of the contrast between Mr. Sumner's utterances on this subject in the Senate and those of the great Censor Morum whom Massachusetts sent to disgrace her in the House. One of the striking incidents of the occasion was the "laughter," and "great laughter" with which the report tells us Mr. Dana's allusions to the general's "moral sense" were received. When a gentleman finds that the mention of his "moral sense" produces much the same effect on public assemblies of his neighbors or constituents as the mention of the "Woolly Horse" or "Joyce Heth" might be expected to produce, some decided action on his part is certainly called for, though what it ought to be in this case we confess we are unable to advise. We print elsewhere a partial defence of the general from one of his admirers, which leaves him, on the main points, just where he stood.

There seems to be some probability that Mr. George Francis Train will be nominated in opposition to the Honorable John Morrissey, on some kind of platform in which the Fenians and unlimited greenbacks will occupy a prominent place. The movement in Mr. Train's favor is said to be a strong one, and he will probably give Mr. Morrissey some trouble. Mr. John Allen, of Water Street, also talks of entering on a political career, but being of a modest disposition, and rather rusty in his political economy, he proposes to serve one term in the New York Legislature preparatory to a wider field of usefulness in Washington. In fact, owing to the apparent general abandonment by all parties of the old-fashioned feudal theory that the moral character of a public man is of any consequence, there is an amount of aspiration after political honors amongst the criminal population of this city which is gratifying to witness. It being now at last acknowledged, even by "moral reformers," that "soundness on the main question" and a "strong will" are the only things needed to entitle a man to the political confidence of his fellow-citizens, the dance-houses, gambling-houses, and station-houses are all throbbing with the pulses of a noble ambition.

The electric telegraph, the increased rapidity of postal communication caused by the railroads, and the abundance and goodness of local newspapers, have made the practice which many of the daily papers keep up of maintaining "correspondents" in the other large cities entirely unnecessary, as far as regards the supply of information. In fact, we doubt if any better reason could or would be given for it in the majority of cases than that it is a tradition of the olden time when the mails travelled seven miles an hour and the newspapers appeared weekly. Washington is the only city which really needs a correspondent or has local news which its newspapers cannot produce or diffuse rapidly enough. The Boston or Philadelphia correspondent of the New York papers, or the New York correspondent of the Boston or Philadelphia papers, has rarely anything to say that everybody who cares to know does not know before he puts pen to paper, and we must do him the justice to add that he appears to be fully conscious of this fact himself, and accordingly rarely confines himself to the dry work of a chronicler of, or even of a commentator upon, the events of the day. His letters, and especially the letters of the great lights of the profession, are apt to be a column or so of cackle about persons possessing some local celebrity, and whose appearance he describes regularly once a year, and tells such "items" about their history and habits as he can pick up in newspaper offices or restaurants, or as he can conveniently invent himself. Failing personal cackle, he discusses the last new book or the last issue of the local magazine, or gives his "views" on national affairs; but in nine cases out of ten there is nothing in the letter to justify its being written in one city or State more than another. "Our New York Letter" might nearly always have been composed in Chicago, or "Our Boston Letter" in Pittsburg. The sore straits in which he frequently finds himself for material naturally drive him frequently into the invention and circulation of unpleasant stories about persons whom he thinks are likely to be the objects of public interest or curiosity. Two of the fraternity were brought to justice in this city two or three years ago for a monstrous and cruel fiction about the domestic life of a wealthy New Yorker which they sent to a Western paper, and for which there was not the slightest excuse except that it made their letter "lively"—"liveliness" and "spiciness" being the two highest objects of the earthly ambition of this class of writers. One member of it has within the last week or two been perpetrating one of their worst outrages on the well-known George Prentice, of the Louisville Journal, whose age ought to have protected him, and probably would have protected him against any species of marauder but an "item-monger." It was given to the world that he was old and poor and broken-down and an incurable drunkard, and had been deserted by his friends and "dismissed" from the paper of which he was the founder. So the poor man has been subjected to the pain and humiliation of contradicting the story in a card.

The canvass for the general election in England is being conducted with extraordinary acrimony, some of the expedients resorted to being of a class that would, we imagine, be new and startling even to Brick Pomeroy. Some weeks ago the Tories got out a "catechism" about Gladstone, consisting of such questions as these: "Who was closeted four hours with the Pope?" All going to show that Gladstone has entered into a secret covenant with the Pope to overthrow the Protestant Church in England and Ireland. The Liberals have now retorted by other "catechisms" many degrees worse, of which the following questions and answers, taken from one circulated against a Jewish candidate for the borough of Sandwich, are specimens: "Who sacrificed our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ?" "The Jew." "Who continues to deny him?" "The Jew." The Jews have now themselves appeared on the scene in their political character, as they are doing so prominently in this country, and are strenuously opposing Mr. Samuda, the Liberal candidate for the Tower Hamlets, one of the London boroughs, because he is a convert from Judaism. Speaking of him, the Jewish Chronicle lays down the startling doctrine that "no Jew who is not an inmate of a lunatic asylum, or of a refuge for idiots, can suppose that any man born, bred, reared, and educated as a Jew can possibly become a Christian from conviction." To which Mr. Schwartz, the "President of the Hebrew-Christian Alliance," replies very pertinently by asking whether Christianity does not rest altogether on the testimony of converted Jews, and whether the three thousand who formed the nucleus of the Christian Church were not Jews.

The female suffrage controversy is also exciting a good deal of acrimonious feeling. The Revising Barristers, whose duty it is to see that the lists have been properly made up by the parish overseers, form a large body of gentlemen of varied tastes and temperament, and many of them have very set ideas against the meddling of women in politics, and treat female claims to be registered in the light, flippant way which the women's rights missionaries are so familiar with, and find so provoking. One of them, a Mr. T. C. Foster, not only refused a lady's application to be registered, but treated it as frivolous, and condemned her to pay ten shillings cost, an outrageous abuse of power, against which she has appealed. He added insult to injury, too, by suggesting a jocose picture of "the Chancellor of the Exchequer suckling a baby," which has greatly excited the wrath of Mr. Sydney Smith, of the Liberal Registration Association, who administers a crushing rebuke and refutation in one to the light-minded Foster, by asking him whether "the chief magistrate of the realm, who has governed us better than any of her male predecessors, had never suckled a baby?" A powerful reinforcement has been supplied to the ladies by Gordon's "Antiquities of Parliament," which shows that in the seventh century English abbesses sat in ecclesiastical councils; that in Henry the Third's and Edward the First's time four abbesses were summoned to Parliament; and that in the thirty-fifth year of Edward the Third ten peeresses were summoned to appear by proxy.

The effect of the revolution in Spain and the probable course of the French Emperor with regard to it form the most prominent topics in the European news. Of course the event is help to the opposition, for the reasons we mentioned last week, but its unpleasantness for the Emperor is still further aggravated by the fact that the Duchess of Montpensier is talked of as the probable successor of Isabella, and the duke is an Orleans, and therefore a member of the one family that Louis Napoleon can be said to hate. Moreover, her accession would fulfil the dream which Louis Philippe had when he and Guizot contracted the famous Spanish marriages, which, twenty-five years ago, were the great question of European politics, and broke up the Anglo-French entente cordiale. In fact, taken for all in all, the Spanish revolution is one of the most disagreeable events of the Emperor's reign, and comes as the last of a whole battalion of sorrows. In other quarters of the Continent there is nothing new. The Italian churchmen and politicians are occupied with the question whether the Pope will live to see the Œcumenical Council, and whether, if he does not, the Council will not, to use a worldly saying, "let loose the devil."

Affairs in Spain look exceedingly promising. The Junta, or Provisional Government, has entered on a series of reforms which, although in reality they will, if carried out, simply place Spain alongside France or Italy in liberality of internal policy, are an enormous advance. The establishment of religious liberty, for instance, which is one of these reforms, is for Spain a great step forward. But the danger is that in Spain, as in France—in Spain far more than in France—the peasantry lagging a long way behind the inhabitants of the towns in intelligence, the Liberals will find it impossible, the fever of the revolution once over, to carry out their plans. Moreover, the difficulties of their work are likely to be seriously increased by the scarcity with which the inhabitants of several provinces are threatened. The crops are a failure, and they have no other commodities to purchase with elsewhere. If the new régime can outlive the difficulties of the next six months, it will be safe to say that Spain has seen her worst days. The Papacy has now lost the last government which supported it from conviction.

NEGRO TACTICS AT THE SOUTH.

The appeal of the colored members who have been expelled from the Georgia Legislature to Congress for redress, the legal aspect of which we shall discuss at another time, suggests some considerations touching the political and social future of the colored population at the South which they and their friends everywhere would do well to meditate. Nobody, we feel sure, thinks the election of General Grant more important than we think it. We feel satisfied that the preservation of order and security—that is, of the very basis on which civil society rests—depends upon it; the maintenance of the public credit depends upon it, and the extinction of the revolutionary hopes and passions bred by the war depends upon it. But it will not do to count too much on it. It will do much, as much as the lawless habits of the Southern population will permit, to protect the negro from open violence. We hope and believe that we shall not, after Grant's election, see, as we have seen lately, sheriffs heading mobs of "citizens" to break up Radical meetings, or United States military officers condemned to death for putting down riots, by judges and juries composed of the rioters. But Grant's election will not protect the colored population from fraud and chicane; from the partiality of judges, the laxity or supineness of sheriffs or policemen, or the indifference or contempt of legislators about interests which happen to be in a greater degree those of the black man than those of the white man. For these things the American political system furnishes only one remedy, and that is the ballot. It is folly to suppose that hereafter, when the social and political machine at the South has resumed its regular working, it will do for the negroes to run to Congress for assistance in rectifying defects in State legislation or the administration of the State governments, or to hope that Congress will interfere. The period of possible Congressional interference is rapidly passing away. In another year the chances are that Congress will be able to do nothing at the South which it could not do in New York or Ohio. The whole Union will once more have fallen under the common rule, and any class at the South which finds the local government oppressive or indifferent to its interests—as local governments can always be in a hundred ways without violating any provision of the State or Federal Constitution—will have to seek relief as any class here which thinks itself oppressed seeks it—the Germans, for instance, under the Excise law—by the use of its votes. That it was the intention of Congress and of the Republican party that this should be the ultimate resource of the Southern negroes there is no sort of doubt. What Congress meant to say to them when it established the Freedmen's Bureau and admitted the colored population to the franchise was, that whatever was special and peculiar in this legislation was intended to assist the freedmen during the four or five years of transition from slavery to freedom; but, their rights once firmly established, and a fair knowledge of them and of their duties once acquired, they were to have nothing to look to for protection but what poor men have to look to everywhere else—the ballot.

Now, the ballot, as has been often said, is not a panacea; nor is it a magic sword, like Excalibur. Its value as a political weapon depends largely, like the musket, on the skill of the man who uses it. To accomplish anything with it in politics, men have to think and talk and organize and combine and compromise and wait, and it is in this thinking and talking and organizing and combining and compromising preparatory to voting, and not in the physical act of depositing the ballot in the box, that the political training of the franchise consists. And no one need think us too rudimentary in saying this, for there are numbers of good people who need to have it said to them several times yet. A dog or a horse might go to the polls and drop a piece of paper into a round hole; but to drop a piece of paper into the hole with a well-understood object agreed upon beforehand with others, and with a distinct perception of the possible results, is the act of a man; and until the main body of the negroes are able to do this the ballot will only be a very imperfect protection against such oppression as Congress can do nothing to prevent. Take, for instance, the recent act of the Georgia Legislature obliging all parties to use voting tickets of uniform size and color. The negroes who cannot read, or read only imperfectly, have hitherto been guided in their voting by tickets of a peculiar color, or bearing some easily understood device. The object of this enactment, therefore, clearly is to confuse them and facilitate frauds upon them, and that it will facilitate frauds upon them there is not a particle of doubt. But it is not unconstitutional; it applies alike to all. There is no remedy for it except education, which is a slow one, or the defeat at the polls of such candidates or parties as show themselves ready to join in schemes of this sort for the oppression, direct or indirect, of one class of the population. This last is the only punishment known here for legislative sins; and there will soon be none other possible at the South.

It must be remembered, too, that in this game of chicane the whites will long, if not always, have the upper hand, even if the number of the two races were more nearly equal. The negroes must not forget that, in spite of the intelligence which large numbers of them are showing, and which we hope the great body of them will show before long, and in spite of the progress they are making in education, they are matched, in any strife they may carry on with their white neighbors, against the shrewdest, wariest, most energetic race on earth, that which has carried the political art to the highest perfection, and which is most skilful in its use, whether for offence or defence.

Now, the negroes are certainly in every State but three in a minority, and for all practical political purposes in a small minority. It is safe to say they can never hope to win a victory at the polls in any Southern State, after the next year or two, by the negro vote alone. Not only are they in a minority too, but they are a minority composed of a detested and despised race; and they are poor, uninfluential, and without political experience. With the whole body of the whites, or even a large proportion of the whites, arrayed against them, their position is probably more unfortunate than that of any class of persons in any civilized state in the world—a great deal more unfortunate, we have no hesitation in saying, than that of the Turkish rayahs, over whose condition all Europe is constantly lamenting. We know very well that there is a school of politicians, of which Wendell Phillips might with some modification be taken as the type, which believes that by some tremendous crushing process all this white hate and prejudice against the blacks could be ground out; but these gentlemen are readier with vituperation than with plans, and they have never yet given to the world their scheme in detail. Suffice it to say, that to make the negro safe and comfortable by force alone would require an army of 300,000 men, the complete suspension of his political education, and the substitution of military for civil government over one-half the continent for an indefinite period. The expediency or possibility of this we shall not discuss, although we would have heartily welcomed such a prolongation of the existing military rule as would have helped to break up the Southern habits of violence and the habit of looking on the negro as a wild animal.

It is plain, therefore, that for the negro to make the ballot of much use to him, to make it instrumental in protecting himself against legislative chicane and maladministration directed against his race, he must in some way divide the whites so as to throw the balance into his hands, and make it an object of some considerable body of the whites to court the negro vote. We do not pretend, in saying this, to be propounding any grand original discovery. The danger to the blacks of a union of the whites against them, or, in other words, of a color division of political parties at the South, has long been apparent. The blacks have been frequently warned against it by Northern Democrats and conservative Republicans; but these warnings have produced no effect, because they were uttered in deprecation of resistance to intolerable oppression. There are limits to the price which the negroes can afford to pay even for a division in the ranks of their oppressors. Much as one may value a man's co-operation or sympathy, there are few of us who would submit to be kicked down stairs or garroted in order to secure it. The negroes have had to stand and show fight, stand as a race—that is, as negroes against whites—until they got the ballot, because the sole political question at the South during the period of reconstruction was whether the negroes should be allowed anything but the right to follow the lowest and most laborious callings; and on this question there was for a black man no room for compromise. He could compromise about a claim to property or to political privileges; but about a white man's claim to murder him or burn the house over his head with impunity, unless another white man saw and was willing to testify against the criminal, or about a negro's right to choose his own calling and follow it, there was no room for compromise. There are certain things about which men ought to be willing to kill or be killed instead of talking, and the civil rights which the Southern legislators denied the freedmen after the war were among the number.

But that period has now passed away. The black man has the ballot, but finds himself in a minority, and finds the forms of law still used for his oppression, and must win over to his side, if not through sympathy or humanity, then through interest, enough of the whites to give him, at great crises at least, the opportunity of influencing the government. The way to do this is to refrain as far as possible from stimulating white prejudices and arousing white passions, to avoid every step or measure that is likely to unite the whites as whites against the blacks. This may be done now without sacrificing anything of real value, without diminishing by one iota the black man's material comforts or means of moral or intellectual progress—by simply keeping quiet, and working hard in the accumulation of property and the diffusion of education; or, in other words, in the attainment of the two things which, in our day, make men respectable, and in which the blacks are, of course, still fearfully wanting. Their right to free speech, and to protection for person and property, they must, of course, assert; but their asserting it temperately and firmly will not only not alienate, but will, in the long run, win the sympathy of the best portion of the white population all over the Union. Such measures as the Social Equality bill, however, which Governor Warmouth has just vetoed in Louisiana, in which an attempt is made to secure by legislation things which lose their whole value in being made the result of legislation, and the attempt to enforce which exasperates the whites, and unites them politically as whites, really wear the air either of having been concocted by the enemies of the blacks for the purpose of rendering the ballot worthless to them, and making the question of White versus Black the only question of Southern politics for all coming time, or of having been devised by some political wild-ass in an outburst of animal spirits. It will be a great and noble thing to see the white children of the South sent to the same schools as the black, owing to the indifference of their parents to color distinctions. That will be a great triumph of civilization and Christianity. It will be also most gratifying to the statesman and philanthropist to see a colored man's admission to hotels, the dress circle at the opera, and "good society" anywhere, dependent solely on his ability to pay his way, his decent behavior, and on his manners and education. But the spectacle which the Louisiana Radicals want to furnish us, of white children forced to go to the same schools with colored children, leaving their fathers at home loading their pistols and whetting their knives for the slaughter of "niggers," curses on their lips and bitterness in their hearts, and of blacks making their way into hotels under the protection of the police, well knowing that every white man in the house wants to kick them out, and because of their appearance hates the black race worse than ever, is a spectacle which nobody who desires a peaceful settlement of Southern troubles could look at without dismay, and which nobody who has not a strong infusion of the devil's love of mischief in his composition can see with pleasure.

CROPS, RAILROADS REAL ESTATE, AND SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The question raised by us in regard to the first effect of good crops upon business continues to be discussed by the press, here and elsewhere, with considerable animation, many of our Western exchanges following the lead of the New York Times and World in vigorously demolishing our arguments and setting up arguments of their own. The question is of such direct practical importance to every business man that we follow it up into some of the ramifications not heretofore indicated by us. Our assertion is, that an abundant crop of any given article produces a decline in value of all the stock on hand of that article, and of all goods manufactured from that article; that it produces a loss, or at least a diminished profit, to every one engaged in dealing in or manufacturing that article, and thus directly tends to a diminished dealing and a diminished manufacturing, with consequent loss of employment or diminished wages to all laborers engaged directly or indirectly upon the article in question, and consequent increased depression in all connected branches of business. This direct, simple, and easily comprehended part of our original assertion is not denied even by our most vigorous opponents, the New York Times and the Cincinnati Gazette. All parties seem willing to admit that it is more or less true, especially when applied to cotton, while all unite in declaring that to assert the same of breadstuffs is a total and absurd fallacy, and that, on the contrary, an abundant crop of breadstuffs far more than offsets in its immediate and ultimate advantages any disadvantages that could momentarily result to certain "dealers, speculators, and forestallers," as the Times loves to call them, from a decline in the market value of the stock on hand.

Now, we fail to comprehend the logic which accepts a distinction between the effects of a loss made upon a decline in breadstuffs and a loss made upon a decline in cotton; but we do comprehend why it should be less easy to see the force of our assertion when applied to breadstuffs than when applied to cotton In speaking of a decline in price of any given article, every one thinks of a decline in price in the great markets, such as New York, and thinks only of the effects of the decline on people in New York, or on such people as come into contact with the article after it leaves New York. Every one's mind readily recurs to the various classes engaged in changing a bale of raw cotton from the steamer's wharf in this city into a gingham dress on a farmer's daughter in Iowa or Illinois; every one admits that all these classes, the farmer's daughter alone excepted, suffer a loss or have a diminished profit from a decline in the price of cotton. As the number of people employed directly or indirectly in turning a bale of cotton into Merrimac prints, and distributing those prints over the whole country for the people's use, constitutes nine-tenths of the whole number of people in any way interested in cotton, it is easy to see why every one admits that all parties, except the consumer, interested in cotton suffer by the decline. It is different with breadstuffs. The number of people engaged in turning a bushel of wheat from the hold of a canal-boat into a hundred loaves of bread, and leaving these at the doors of a hundred families, forms an insignificantly small proportion of the total number of persons connected with breadstuffs. That these suffer by the decline every one admits; but they are so few, comparatively, that their loss claims no attention; and it is boldly set down that the loss by a decline in breadstuffs is confined to a few speculators, millers, and bakers. But of all the persons directly or indirectly connected with breadstuffs these forms only an insignificant percentage; the great bulk of the persons interested in breadstuffs, besides the producers, are those who handle them before they reach the great market. How these suffer by the decline is not so readily seen, but the following extracts, taken almost at haphazard from the market reports of the daily papers, throw some light upon the subject:

. . . "The heavy stocks of wheat at Chicago and Milwaukee show that there is no scarcity, and although the receipts have been far lighter than for the same time last year, they have exceeded the demand; stocks have increased and prices have steadily fallen." . . . "Prices have now declined 40*a*45 cents since the crop began to move, but Eastern buyers are discouraged, and there is no increase of shipments, as prices in New York continue to decline more rapidly than at the Western Lake ports." . . . "There is considerable call for money at Chicago from grain commission men, who are carrying wheat in the hopes of reaction in price." . . . . "The bankers are paying out but little money for wheat shipped East, although scarcely four weeks remain in which shipments can be made with certainty of getting through before the canals are closed." . . . . "The leading railroad lines are fairly employed in carrying Westward freight, but the Eastward freight is unusually light for the season of the year, and the competition for it promises to be unexampled. The Erie and the New York Central roads began the war some days ago by a material reduction of rates, and now the Pennsylvania Central road has followed suit." . . . "The average traffic receipts of seven of the leading Western roads for September, as far as published, show a decline of nearly five per cent. from the receipts per mile of the same roads at this time last year, and the average is a steadily declining one." . . . "Wholesale merchants complain that their collections do not come in from the country as promptly as they should. Their debtors write that the recent decline in wheat has checked the marketing of that grain at the country towns. The crop movement being thus retarded at its fountain-head, every other class of business feels the effect. The movement of grain Eastward is also in a depressed condition."

Need we explain further how interests of the utmost magnitude, the whole shipping of the Western lakes and canals, the entire railway system of the country, to say nothing of the forwarders, bankers, and commission men, suffer immediate and direct loss or diminished profit through the abundance of the crops, and the consequent decline in price, and retarding and diminution of business, long before the benefit of the decline can be fairly said to have affected the consuming class in the slightest degree? Nothing but a failure to look at these facts—facts not yet accomplished when we first wrote—can induce a thoughtful business man to accept our assertion as applied to cotton and reject it as applied to breadstuffs. It is as true of breadstuffs as it is of cotton, that the first and most immediate effect of abundant crops is an unfavorable one to all classes engaged directly or indirectly in dealing in them.

The question raised by us is not the one propounded by an able correspondent in the following note:

"Not exactly agreeing with you in recent articles of the Nation on the effect of a large crop, I would like to offer a suggestion, which I hope may prove the text for another expression of your argument. Suppose last year we raised just enough wheat, for instance, for our own home consumption, say 50,000,000 bushels, and sold it here for $100,000,000, and this year raise 75,000,000 bushels and sell for the same gross amount, $100,000,000; now, 50,000,000 being sufficient for our own consumption, we sell 25,000,000 bushels abroad, netting us, say, $33,000,000. Hasn't our wealth increased just that amount?" G.

"Springfield, O., Sept., 1868."

Of course it has. But this is, with all respect to our correspondent, precisely the kind of argument which we innocently enough characterized on a former occasion, much to the wrath of some of our opponents, as rule-of-three logic. If we have produced more wheat than we have consumed or will consume, our wealth in wheat, or in whatever that wheat will buy, has certainly increased; we never asserted anything to the contrary; but it is just possible that our gain in wheat may cause a loss, even if a temporary one only, in other things. Our correspondent assumes, to begin with, that an increase of last year's crop by one-half would reduce the price by one-third only, while it is quite probable that it would reduce it more. In the second place, even at our correspondent's figures, the farmers who produce the 75,000,000 bushels would not receive as much for them as for the 50,000,000 bushels. According to the best authority in the grain trade, the average present cost of marketing every bushel of wheat grown in the United States is about fifty cents; deducting this cost of marketing, the farmers, the producers, would receive just twelve millions of dollars less for the larger crop than for the smaller. Did our correspondent ever burn corn in the ear for fuel, because it was cheaper than coal, and did not pay to send it to market, as thousands of farmers in this country have done? Far be it from us to maintain the absurd theory that too much can be produced for the ultimate good of the community. But it is undoubtedly possible to produce more of any given article than the producer can dispose of with profit to himself. Now, the ability of the farmer to buy the products of all other classes of the people does not depend upon the number of bushels of wheat that he produces, but upon the number of bushels of wheat that he can sell at a profit on their cost. A great many people seem to think that nature does all the work in raising corn, which is very far from being the case; on the contrary, farmers, like other producers, have to invest capital in their farms and cattle and implements and manure and labor, and every farmer's grain costs him a certain cash price by the time it is harvested, and if he has to sell it for less than that price he is a loser, just as much as the Fall River manufacturer who has to sell his prints below cost. For the last few years agriculture has been so wonderfully profitable that we have almost forgotten that farmers can fail. But such things have been, and may be again. It was in 1858, we think, that the Illinois Central Railroad Company had to extend the time of the interest payment on almost all the farms along the line mortgaged to the company for part of the purchase money. Yet 1857 produced good crops. In fact, if memory does not deceive us, 1857 and 1861, the two most disastrous business years of this generation, were marked by extraordinary harvests. Not that this proves anything, for the business depression of those two years may be attributable to many causes, but the coincidence is noteworthy. What we desire to emphasize is, that the prosperity of the farmer depends upon the profit that he makes on his crops, and that he may be, and indeed, as we all know positively, frequently is, a loser by his abundant crops.

The principal railroad leading into Chicago is the Chicago and Northwestern, which drains probably the largest grain-growing region in the world. Its capital stock exceeds thirty millions of dollars. On the 10th of October its traffic receipts for the week were published, showing a decrease as compared with last year of about one per cent. In a few hours the stock declined one per cent. likewise, involving a loss to the holders in the aggregate of precisely three hundred thousand dollars. Of course it will not do to draw many conclusions from events happening in Wall Street; but it is very evident that if the receipts of the railroads continue to decline as they have done for some weeks past, not only the dividends from them will be less, but the value of the stocks themselves will decline, and holders of them will see their capital materially impaired. The value of all the roads in the United States is popularly estimated at 2,000,000,000 of dollars. A decline of a few per cent. in this value, or a reduction of the income from it, would be a very severe loss to the holders. But the decline in railroad receipts is a fixed fact. We fail to hear it attributed to any cause beyond the delay in forwarding the crops, owing to the steady decline in price consequent upon their abundance. Surely this result of abundant crops, a reduction, even if temporary only, in the value of the total railroad property of the United States, is not productive of general prosperity.

Our most violent opponents agree that the decline in the price of breadstuffs consequent upon the abundant crops will tend to reduce wages. Near where we write four entire blocks of new houses have just been roofed in; they will be completed for occupancy next May. They are or will be for sale. They have been built at the prevailing high rates of wages. If breadstuffs continue to decline, wages will be much lower next spring, and those same houses can be built next summer for five, ten, fifteen per cent. less than they now cost. Who will buy a house in May for fifteen thousand dollars when he can have a similar one built by September for twelve or thirteen? and will not the builder of those houses have to sell them at a loss or without a profit if he sell them at all? and is not every house in this neighborhood held by its owner, and by every one else, as worth all that it would cost to build? and if each house could be replaced next year for less, will not each house be worth less? Will not the value of all real estate decline with the decline in wages consequent upon abundant crops? And if you have to sell a house costing twelve thousand dollars for ten thousand, losing one-sixth of your capital, will you feel reconciled on finding that your baker's and butcher's bills are one-sixth less and your tax bill one-sixth more? In fact, turn in which direction we will, we find that the first and immediate effect of abundant crops is a general decline in all values, not only in the crops themselves and in all articles manufactured from them, but also in railway stocks and manufacturing stocks, and banking shares, and real estate, and capital in every form.

Now, will this diminished prosperity affect our national finances and our progress towards specie payments? The national revenues, especially the income-tax and the customs duties, will unquestionably decline, and may fall off to a point involving the necessity of some slight addition to our national debt, or possibly an increase of taxation, and may to that extent affect injuriously our national credit. But this evil will be offset by a probable large fall in the price of gold. For two years past the latter, nominally the measure of our national credit, has, in reality, been sustained above par exclusively by the export demand for it, based upon a certain condition of our foreign trade which had no direct relation whatsoever to the national faith in the nation's responsibility. To all intents and purposes, we were ready to resume specie payments two years ago. The confidence in the national solvency was not less absolute two years ago than it is now. What prevented a return to specie payments then was the knowledge of our inability to settle our yearly trade accounts with Europe without sending away the supply of coin which we would need in order to maintain specie payments after once resuming. This inability to settle our yearly trade accounts with Europe was due to a succession of poor crops, and to large importations of merchandise from abroad. A depressed condition of trade throughout the winter and coming spring, together with heavy losses on all this fall's late importations, will induce our merchants to import lightly, and will make our commercial debt next summer very small, while the very same depressed condition of trade and consequent light domestic consumption, together with abundant crops, will enable us to export largely and pay off our accumulated balances without being compelled to ship away the specie reserve which we need for resumption. Our annual coin production is about seventy-five millions. If we retain in the country only one full year's product, we can, with a very moderate accession from the cumbersome accumulations on the Pacific coast, resume specie payments next fall without fear of again abandoning them. It is barely possible, but highly improbable, that we may export a moderate amount of specie this winter, but with that exception, if our crops are as good as represented, and General Grant is elected in November, we do not expect to see any further important specie exports for a year to come; but we do expect, after a coming year of severe commercial and industrial distress, to see the finances of the United States once more re-established on a sound, substantial basis, and the nation resume its interrupted career of industry, economy, prosperity, and peace.

THE RUSSIANS AND THE ENGLISH IN CENTRAL ASIA.

Whenever the story of the Russian advance in Central Asia comes to be written in detail—which will probably not be in our time, for Russian archives are hard to get at, and Russian military men are forced to be discreet and reticent, and the process is not yet complete—it will probably be found to be one of the most exciting and romantic episodes in the history of war. There are in the history of British India and of Spanish America, perhaps, a greater number of displays of courage and fortitude on the part of officers and men; and there are in Roman military history, taking into account how little science did for Roman armies, as fine examples of organization and enterprise in the work of distant conquest; but the Russian performances surpass those of any other age or country in the combination of careful planning and skilful execution with persistence.

It must be taken into account, in judging the Russian exploits in Central Asia, that the capture of Samarcand, of which we heard the other day, might be called the crowning of a scheme nearly two centuries old, and the execution of it has, ever since its conception, been pursued night and day, summer and winter, with a patience, a perseverance, and single-mindedness which, considering the state of Russian civilization, has been truly remarkable, and suggests some strange and startling reflections as to the future of the empire. The British conquests in India, the Spanish conquests in America, and even the colonization of this country, were in a great measure the results of a series of accidents. The mightiness of the work was not foreseen by those who engaged in it, and no preconcerted plan was followed in its performance. It is quite certain, however, that the Russian idea of connecting St. Petersburg with the Himalayas by water, a distance of nearly 2,000 miles, through one of the wildest and least known regions of the world, and the extension of the Imperial frontier to the foot of the mountains, was conceived at least a century and a half ago, and that it has been pursued ever since with sleepless energy, and that we are now witnessing its consummation.

If the reader will follow the Volga on a map down to the Caspian Sea, he will see that it offers, by the aid of canals, communication between the Caspian and the Baltic. The conquest of the Caucasus on the eastern shore of the Caspian, a work of sixty years, was accomplished three or four years ago, giving the Russians complete control of that body of water. Now the modern Amoo Daria, the Oxus of the ancients, rises near the Hindoo Koosh—a spur of the Himalayas, and forming the northeastern boundary of the British possessions in India—and flows, navigable through the greater portion of its length, into the Sea of Aral. The Oxus used to flow into the Caspian, and the old bed still remains; and it is believed that a very moderate amount of labor would divert not only it, but the Syr Daria—another river still further to the east—into the old channel; and this done, steamers of light draught might run without interruption from the foot of the Himalayas to the Czar's capital, and Russia would become the great entrepôt of Eastern products. In fact, the Oxus was in ancient times the great highway through which Asiatic merchandise found its way to Europe, until the diversion of the current into the Sea of Aral, three hundred miles from the old mouth, and the fierceness and fanaticism infused into the Turkoman tribes by the advent of Mohammedanism, put an end to the traffic, and put an end almost to all knowledge of Turkestan—the name given to the vast region, partly fertile and partly desert lying between the Caspian, the Himalayas, the Chinese frontier, and Siberia, from which the Tartars issued during several centuries for raids into Hungary, Poland, and Northern Russia. The Eastern trade then fell into the hands of the English and Dutch, and was carried on by them by sea, round the Cape of Good Hope. What Russia seeks now is to restore it, or at least a part of it, to the ancient channel, and at the same time to gratify a long-standing and deeply-cherished national aspiration to share the dominion of the East with the English.

It was not till 1839 that Russia found herself fully prepared to commence operations against Turkestan and push her troops up the banks of the Amoo; but she had previously been for years accumulating stores at Orenburg, in Russian Tartary. In that year the English invasion of Afghanistan roused her into activity, and an army under General Perouski was launched into the desert for an attempt against Khiva; it perished, however, in large part, in the sands. The direction of the attack was then changed; and the eastern Khanat of Koland and the corner of Turkestan bordering on the Chinese frontier—which only three Europeans had ever visited, Marco Polo, the Jesuit Goez, and M. Schlagintweit, who was killed at Kaschgar, and the approaching visit of whose brother to this country we spoke of last week—were made the objective point of the operations. Forts were accordingly erected at the mouth of the Syr Daria, on the Sea of Aral; the communications with the base at Orenburg were strengthened; ships were launched on the lake itself, including an iron steamer brought from Sweden in pieces and put together on the spot; and anthracite coal was carried from the Don, costing in transportation, by the time it reached the depot at Fort Aralsk, as much as $60 a ton.

In 1852, all was ready for a second advance, and one stronghold of the natives after another was carried, one desert after another was passed, one bloody battle after another fought—defeat for the invaders in these regions would have involved utter destruction—and one fort after another built, till the Russians had reduced all the important places in Eastern Turkestan, and touched the Chinese frontier. After the capture of Khokan, in 1864, they turned their faces southward towards the Hindoo Koosh, or, in other words, the British frontier, and, more ominously still, gave the name of Turkestan to their new acquisitions, that is, called the portion they had conquered by the name of the whole. This created great stir in London, and Prince Gortschakoff issued a circular, in which he said that Russia was going to confine herself to the right bank of the Syr Daria, having reached "the limits which interest and reason prescribed" for Russian territory. But the Turkomans, of course, though conquered, were not subdued; the most powerful potentate of that region, the Emir of Bokhara, was still undamaged. Quarrels kept occurring. The Russians, like the English in India, were forced into taking the offensive for defensive purposes, and what with fighting, negotiating, and using one tribe against the other, they have at last overthrown the great Emir, and taken Bokhara and Samarcand. It does not appear that they have been able to garrison and retain them, but reinforcements will speedily arrive, and, whether they formally hold these places or not, Turkestan is, for all practical purposes, now in Russian hands, and nothing stands between the Russian armies and the British territory but the Himalayas.

The advance of the Russians has for fully twenty years caused more or less anxiety to the Anglo-Indians, but the majority have, on the whole, been disposed to scoff at it, believing the great Khivan desert and the enormous distances to be an insurmountable obstacle to the approach of anything more than flying columns. They comforted themselves, too, with the reflection that if the Russians did reach the Himalayas, it would be with a small force, leaving fifteen hundred miles of enemy's country in the rear, and that it would find itself then on the frontier of a populous empire, defended by a highly disciplined and faithful army of 300,000 men. This confidence was, however, rudely shaken by the mutiny, and it has never been restored. Moreover, the Russian advance has had nothing temporary or evanescent in its character; no more solid work of conquest has ever been seen. They have lined the whole march with forts, stations, and depots, and are preparing to connect themselves, with the Caspian by a chain of agricultural and manufacturing colonies. Once fairly over the Khivan desert, they have found themselves, in the valleys of the Amoo and Syr, in a region of extraordinary fertility, and possessing, as they approach the mountains, every variety of climate. Its cotton alone, of which they secured the monopoly for the Russian market, was a source of great profit during the late war. Moreover, they have drawn into their net a hardy and warlike population, which their experience in dealing with Eastern nations will probably enable them to turn to good account for military purposes.

What effect all this will have on British rule is now the great subject of speculation in India. It does not seem as if the English had anything to fear from it ultimately. There is nothing to tempt the Russians to cross the mountains, and the presence of a civilized power on the northern slope, supposing their relations with it were peaceful, could hardly fail to render the position of the Anglo-Indians more secure. In the meantime, however, the Russian success is causing a commotion amongst the hill tribes in the northeastern corner of Lahore, as it, combined with the successful seizure of Herat and the crown of Afghanistan by Shere Ali, an old Russian partisan, is spreading a belief, it is feared, amongst the Afghans and Sikhs that a crisis of some kind in British affairs is at hand. There have already been actual outbreaks amongst some of the smaller tribes, and either the anxiety or ardor of the Anglo-Indians has been revealed by the size of the force which has been hurried up to the scene of the disturbances—for it is nothing less than an army equipped for the field, a portion of it armed with the Snider rifle and eager to try it.

The public in England is looking on in the meantime with a good deal of trouble, and this for reasons that do not appear on the surface. Though India is an English dependency, andi s nominally governed from London, the Anglo-Indian officials form a vast bureaucracy, with ideas, ambition, and prejudices of their own; their distance from home, combined with their special knowledge and the discretion in dealing with sudden emergencies which must be accorded to a few thousand men charged with the rule of 200,000,000, make them, and not the home authorities, the real governors of the country and real moulders of Indian policy, especially as regards the relations of the empire with the independent native states. One of their passions, begot in part by the feeling of insecurity inseparable from their position, and in part by the love of movement and adventure bred by the tedium of their lives, is that of annexation. A great war is to the mass of civil servants and military men a positive godsend, and no doubt of its issue ever enters their heads. The news of the Russian successes has, it is believed, filled the mind of this class with the belief that there is no safety now for the British possessions but in the annexation of Afghanistan, the creation of a series of strongholds between the Hindoo Koosh and the great Khorassanese desert, the conversion of Herat and Kandahar into great fortresses, and the removal of the turbulent and warlike Afghan population from the reach of Russian intrigues. The more cautious lookers-on in England believe that this is really the ulterior object of the force which is being concentrated at Lahore, and that the reduction of the troublesome hill tribes will be made the excuse for a coup de main directed against Herat. What renders the danger all the greater is that Sir John Lawrence, perhaps the greatest of that great breed of proconsuls extinct everywhere in the modern world except amongst the Anglo-Indians, a man whose services to the empire both in the field and at the council-board have been of incalculable value, is coming home to well-won repose, and the Earl of Mayo, a light-headed and rather weak young man whom the Tories have forced prematurely into positions of responsibility, is going out to take his place, and going out in perfect ignorance of Indian affairs. He will consequently be guided completely by the advisers he finds on the spot. Whatever may be the final termination of the imbroglio, we have seen the last of the great "Asian mystery." With European danglers and flirts picnicking in the Vale of Cashmere, English beer-bottles strewing the streets of Herat, and members of the Holy Orthodox Church swarming in Samarcand and Kaschgar, the great Oriental spell by which the imagination of the Western world has so long been bound is broken.

JOHN STUART MILL ON NATIONAL FAITH.

THE following letter was recently addressed by Mr. Mill to a private friend in England:

DEAR MR. ——: You ask me what I think of the controversy now going on in the United States respecting the rightfulness of paying off a portion of the national debt, contracted in cash, in a depreciated paper currency, and of taxing, in violation of an express compact, the interest of the national bonds. It is painful even to have to answer such a question. It is already a great calamity that two such proposals should have been inscribed in the electoral programme of a great political party, and not unanimously rejected even by its opponents. The success of either proposal would, in my estimation, be one of the heaviest blows that could be given to the reputation of popular governments, and to the morality and civilization of the human race.

This is one of those vital questions which send us back to the first principles of social existence, and compel us to ask ourselves what are the conditions which enable mankind to dwell together in nations and communities, to work together in joint undertakings, and exchange the privations of the savage for the blessings of civilized life. The very first and most essential of these conditions is, that they should be able to trust one another's engagements. Even savage life could not be carried on unless the savages frequently helped one another; in civilized life, every human being depends for comfort, for security, often for life itself, upon things done for him by other people. If he could not rely upon other people for doing what they undertake; if his experience taught him that a man who makes a promise does so with the intention of only keeping the promise if it happens to be quite convenient, he would have to look to himself alone for all protection, and for the supply of all his wants. He would be below the condition of most savages. If we cannot trust each other's word (was the saying of an eminent man), we may as well go back to the woods.

But if there is one case more than another in which it is indispensable that men should keep their promises—should do what they pledge themselves to do—it is the case of money contracts. All the complex fabric of our civilization rests upon the paying and receiving of money; every one's plans of life, and almost every one's assurance of living at all, are built upon the expectation of receiving at the appointed time the money, or money's worth, due to him from others. If any one buys a thing and then does not pay for it, or sells a thing and then does not deliver it; if any one hires services and does not pay the wages agreed on, or receives wages and does not perform the service; if any one borrows money or money's worth, and, though able, does not repay it at the time agreed on, or withholds the equivalent which he had bargained to give for its use, the defaulter not only proves himself a dishonorable and dishonest man, he not only inflicts an injury, which may be serious, which may be even irreparable, upon the individual who has trusted him, but he does what lies in him to dissolve and put an end to that trust in one another without which there would be no exchange of commodities, no separation of employments, and no man would have any satisfaction for his wants except what his own labor or craft could directly provide. The impossibility of carrying on human society, even in an almost rudimentary state, without holding men to the fulfilment of their engagements, has always been so obvious, that there is not a single known community, past or present, in which provision has not been made for enforcing those engagements, by laws and tribunals, supported either by a public force set apart for the purpose, or, in ruder societies, by the collective strength of the community.

Can any reason be given why the obligation of good faith, which holds between one man and another, is not equally binding between the entire community and any person who has trusted them? Is a promise made by the whole people through their authorized agents less sacred than a promise made by a private person, which also may have been made through his agents? Ought the fact that there is a tribunal which can compel individuals to keep their contracts, and no tribunal which can coerce a nation; ought the fact that the debt of a nation is a debt of honor; ought the fact that a nation can be a swindler and knave if it chooses—ought this to make any civilized people think that it can dispense in its own favor with the duty which its own tribunals enforce against its citizens? Unless it be a sufficient license for committing a crime, that it can be committed without any immediate penalty except the disgrace, there is no other difference between the two cases but such as makes the criminality greater of a nation which robs its creditors than of an individual. For, in the first place, a nation always can pay its creditors if it chooses, which cannot always be said of an individual; and, in the next place, a breach of faith by a whole people involves everybody in the guilt, except such as with their whole heart and strength denounce and protest against it. It is an example of fraud displayed in the sight of mankind, and penetrating into every family in the country. It is a direct sanction of the like dishonesty to every citizen in his private transactions. Let any one be really persuaded that a whole people may break its word, and refuse to pay in full the money it has borrowed, is he likely to think that he himself is culpable for doing the same in his own private affairs, if he can manage to evade the legal punishment which is the only real distinction between the two cases?

The detractors of democratic government on this side of the Atlantic have been accustomed to say that, however specious may be the arguments for it, in its actual working it would turn out to be a retrogradation towards barbarism. Until now, the example of the great American Republic, notwithstanding the dishonorable conduct of several of the States (mostly—would that I could say always—among those which had been demoralized by slavery), has generally been deemed a practical refutation of these sinister prophecies. But the charge against democracy of being a return to barbarism would be made out, if its effect were to be the public repudiation of pecuniary engagements. It is a remarkable fact that what the people of the United States are now urged to do with respect to the five-twenty bonds—urged by the programme of a political party (happily, not by every member even of that party)—bears an almost exact likeness to some of the most disgraceful misdeeds of the European despots in the Middle Ages. Read the history of the most profligate kings of France and other European countries, not excepting England, and see who were those whose conduct excited the greatest public indignation during their lives, and left the deepest stain on their memory when dead. They were those who debased the coin. What was their motive for debasing it? To put off their creditors with the same nominal sum of money, but a less quantity of the precious metal. Even the despots were so conscious and so much afraid of the infamy of this fraud that they generally endeavored to commit it secretly and in silence. They made it a capital offence to betray the secret. Would they have been less guilty if they had impudently brazened it out? Living in a rude age, the only means at their disposal for committing the fraud was the coarse expedient of altering the coin. Their ingenuity had not reached the contrivance of putting forth pieces of paper which pretended to be money and were not, inducing people to take them by a promise printed on the paper to give for it on demand real money of the same nominal value, and then breaking that promise and issuing them in such numbers as to be only worth half the money which they purported to represent. But this roundabout way and the direct way have the self-same purpose: to get rid of debts by paying, instead of what one has engaged to pay, what is called the same sum of money, but is really a much smaller sum. And this example, set by the despots of barbarous ages, the people of the United States, in the ninety-second year of their national freedom, are invited by many of their active politicians to imitate!

Observe, too, that none of the apologies, poor and weak as they are, which have been suggested to the nations of Europe by the same sort of bad advisers, have any applicability to the case of the United States. The democracy of European countries have sometimes been told that they are not bound to pay their national debts, because the money was borrowed by kings and aristocracies who did not represent the people, and was expended in keeping the people in subjection, or in carrying on foreign wars which the people had not authorized. None of these lame excuses can be alleged by the American repudiators. The most audacious pleader for dishonesty cannot deny that the money was borrowed by a Congress and a President elected by, and fully responsible to, the people—borrowed for the service of the American Republic in its utmost need, for a war which was emphatically a war of the people, and in which the stake involved was the preservation of their collective existence as a nation. The only persons in whose mouths any other doctrine can possibly be sincere are the ex-rebels and their favorers. To all but them it is impossible even to conceive a case in which the obligation to pay the debt, principal and interest, to the full extent of the contract, could be more binding.

A plea which imposes upon some people who would shrink from anything which they themselves regarded as repudiation, is this: Greenbacks, however they may be depreciated, are legal tender, are the lawful currency of the United States; other persons are obliged to receive this currency in payment of all their dues, and why should the public creditor be an exception? This seems to have been the argument which prevailed with the upright, but not always clear-sighted or discerning, mind of the late Thaddeus Stevens. But the answers to it are manifold. The first is, that almost all persons except the public creditor have the remedy in their own hands. Those who have goods to sell can and do demand a higher price; those who sell their services can and do require a higher remuneration. Even in loan transactions that are yet to come, the lenders know the chances they are exposed to; are aware that the medium they are to be paid in is of uncertain value, and can and will require a rate of interest sufficient in their estimation to cover their risks. To all these persons the uncertainty of the measure of value is a source of great inconvenience, but to none of them is it an injustice. Injustice is done to those who had lent their money, or had otherwise become entitled to fixed annual incomes, before specie payments were suspended.

Among these are the old creditors of many of the States. All persons thus situated are grievously injured by being paid their interest in depreciated greenbacks, and would be still further defrauded if the principal were repaid to them in a similar medium. But, at least the nation collectively had incurred no obligation to those persons, beyond the general obligation of good government. It had not specifically pledged the national honor to them. Even the separate States never, I believe, pledged their faith to their creditors that they should not suffer this particular injury; however binding the obligation ought to have been felt, in honor and conscience. That pledge has been given to the creditors of the United States. I make no distinction between payment of the interest and repayment of the principal. The bonds themselves, it is not denied, stipulate expressly that the interest shall be paid in cash, but are silent as to the principal. That the obligation, however, applied to principal as well as interest, was universally understood; was expressly declared by the authorized agents of the nation whenever the question was asked; was not then gainsaid by any of those who are now attempting to shake off the obligation; and was only not declared in express terms because nobody thought that such a declaration was necessary, or could add any strength to the pledge. In consequence of this understanding, the loans were obtained at rates of interest very low under the circumstances, far lower than would otherwise have been possible. Governments which pay their creditors in inconvertible paper, always borrow, if able to borrow at all, on much more onerous terms than other governments. If those who lent their savings to the United States had been told, at the time, that every thousand dollars they lent should be repaid to them in greenbacks, which might then be worth not more than a thousand cents (the depreciation of the French assignats amounted to that and more), nobody, unless he could afford to make the nation a present of his money, would have parted with it unless at a rate of interest sufficient to ensure him against the extreme risk. The United States obtained these great sums of money, in their extreme necessity, at an interest (all things considered) not very much exceeding what the high value of capital in a new country compels them to pay in ordinary times; and after having reaped the benefit, having by that indispensable help saved their national existence, they are now exhorted to withhold the price, at the cost of the national honor.

The same reasons of justice and good faith apply still more obviously to the conditions expressly stipulated by the lenders, that the interest on the bonds should not be subject to direct taxation. Some people imagine that the breach of this stipulation would not be robbery, provided that the bonds are not taxed at a higher rate than other property. But if exemption from all direct taxation were a condition of the contract, and expressly stipulated for, it is not an unjust advantage conceded to the bondholders over other people, since for every advantage so obtained value has been given by those who enjoy it in the shape of a diminished interest. The only difference in respect of taxation between them and the rest of the public is, that they have paid down their taxes in advance, while other people wait for the visit of the tax-gatherer. To make them pay over again, under pretence that they had not already paid, would be one of the most flagrant forms of the iniquity of breaking a contract and keeping the pecuniary consideration received for it.

But there is little danger that these immoral counsels will prevail. It has been shown by many examples, in the recent history of the United States, that an agitation for something wrong and mischievous may go on for a certain length of time without visibly stirring up the good sense and honesty of the country to resist it; and many such agitations commence, culminate, and decay without disturbing public tranquillity or leaving any permanent traces of their existence; but that, when one of these agitations attains a sufficient height to begin to be dangerous, a mass of opinion which ordinarily remains quiescent rouses itself into activity, puts down the wrong thing with a vigorous hand, and peremptorily demands the right thing instead. So, I doubt not, it will be with this pernicious and discreditable, but, as I firmly believe, chiefly factitious movement, set up by political adventurers for the chance of gaining the few stray votes which, in the present state of parties, might suffice to turn the balance of many an election.

I am, dear Mr.———, very sincerely yours,

J. S. Mill.

THE RELIGIOUS CONVENTIONS.

The Episcopal and Unitarian Conventions which have been sitting in this city during the past week, besides transacting their regular business, have furnished the outside world, by their discussions, with the means of judging of the nature of the difficulties with which the organizations which they respectively represent have to contend, and as the two bodies stand for the two opposing religious tendencies of the day, their difficulties are worth the attention even of those who do not feel them. The troubles of the Episcopal Church in America are substantially the same as those of the mother Church in England, barring the connection of the latter with the state. Or, rather, there is only one radical trouble in either, of which all the others are offshoots—and that is, the official character of the clergy. The question which lies at the root of all the questions by which the Anglican Church is agitated is, Is the minister a priest, or only a teacher or pastor? If he is a priest, endowed with supernatural gifts and graces, and his work be the offering of sacrifice, there is nothing to blame in Ritualism, or in the gradual retreat from communion or sympathy with the other Protestant denominations, and in the tendency to assimilation to the Church of Rome both in doctrine and discipline, which the Anglican Church has been displaying for the last forty years. As it is impossible to set limits to the pomps and ceremonies of worship which consists in the offering up of so tremendous a sacrifice as the Eucharist is believed to be, many priests and many worshippers will naturally, after they have exhausted their taste and ingenuity in the devising of dresses and decorations and music, feel that all they have done is still unworthy of the occasion, and a very imperfect expression of the sentiments with which it inspires them. Anybody who considers attentively what Ritualists, or even High Churchmen, mean when they speak of a "Christian priest," and what the nature of "a priest's" functions are, must feel that it would be improper, if not impossible, to attempt to define or regulate his manner of expressing the awe with which he regards his own character and duties.

If, too, the Anglican clergy are priests and their work be sacrifice, there is, of course, impropriety in their officiating in the churches of other denominations, or in their associating on terms of equality with the clergy of other denominations. To acknowledge the validity, or even the value, of any other ordination than their own is to throw a doubt over the nature of their own. So that the Church which in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was a portion of the body of European Protestantism has, as the sacerdotal theory has gained ground in it, been withdrawing from fellowship even with the Protestant churches of the Continent, whom it cannot call Dissenters, and the High Churchmen now repudiate all connection with them, and have been seeking communion with the Greek Church, the more advanced members of the school being nearly ready to seek communion with Rome. The Greek Church has, however, given them plainly to understand that the "fusion" is not possible, and that nothing in its eyes, any more than in those of the Roman Church, will supply the place of a continuous and unbroken descent from the Apostolic age.

The trouble is not so serious as yet in America as in England, where social influences aggravate it; but it is growing, and finds expression in various ways. The present controversy about the effect of the Twelfth Canon is but one of its many symptoms. It is coloring the language and tone of thought of a great many of the clergy, and, as might be expected, is laying firm hold of the theological students. The office of "priest" is, of course, more dignified and important than that of teacher, and is therefore a great deal more attractive; but whether there is any place in Protestantism for priests still remains, as far as the laity are concerned, to be proved. The sacerdotal theory is literally driving out of the English Church the great body of the worshippers who have really any deep religious feeling, and threatens before long to bring about a forcible and sudden disruption between church and state. The laity will not swallow the new doctrine, and will not see in the clergyman anything better than the old-fashioned "parson," whose business it is to marry and christen and teach and console and bury, and about whom there is nothing mystic or supernatural. The effect of pushing it too hard in America has yet to be seen, but it will undoubtedly prevent accessions to the Church from that large body of persons to whom it already owes so much—and large it will always be—for whom the Liturgy has a perennial charm, who dislike theological speculation, and into whose composition taste enters so largely that they love even to worship "decently and in order." Bishop Lee, of Delaware, touched the tender spot in the situation in his opening sermon at Trinity Church, and touched it with no gentle hand—to the great confusion, if we are rightly informed, of many of his clerical hearers; and one sees the influence of the sore on the debates in the Convention, even on points of trifling importance.

The Unitarian difficulty is a somewhat singular one. At every one of their conventions now an attempt is made by the moderates to secure the adoption of a creed or list of fundamental principles, and the attempt is invariably defeated by the radicals, who refuse to be bound; not because there is nothing that they consider fundamental, but because they wish to preserve their intellectual freedom. All, however, wish to keep up the denominational organization and to see it flourish, and even to give it an aggressive character. They send out missionaries, subscribe for colleges, keep two or three periodicals going, and at this last meeting determined to establish a denominational review. The denomination, nevertheless, is not flourishing. In fact, if closely examined, it would be found that it was declining. Particular churches flourish, owing to the character and ability of particular ministers, but every kind of denominational work languishes. The denominational spirit is one of the feeblest things of the kind in existence—so feeble, in fact, that one would hardly be surprised to hear any day that it was extinct.

Now, the reason of this is not far to seek. The deduction, both from experience and principles of human nature, that you cannot have a flourishing and aggressive religious organization without a creed, is simple and impregnable. Whether creeds are good or bad things for the individual man may be a subject of doubt; but that they are to religious denominations the breath of life there can be no doubt whatever. At present the Unitarian body, or rather the radical wing of it, is founded on a negation, and a negation may serve as a basis for a religious organization, if supported by something in the shape of persecution; but as soon as the majority becomes tolerant, and there is no mixture of sacrifice and suffering in holding to the negation, the organization has to begin to construct, or it is lost. What aggravates the difficulty in the case before us is, that not only do the Unitarians not agree in affirming anything, but they do not agree in denying anything. Now, a negation which is of universal acceptance is, as we have said, not very useful, but a negation in which there is no general concurrence is worthless. Mere intellectual sympathy, or sympathy of any kind, is too subtle a thing to hold a religious organization together. You may found a school of philosophy or a society of speculative enquirers on it, but you cannot found a church, and, above all, a church militant, a growing and aggressive church. A French bishop spoke the other day of the phrase, "I believe," as a "grand cri de guerre," and so it has proved in all ages; but hosts were never led to battle with the cry, "I deny," or "I do n't believe." Protestantism at the Reformation took good care not to content itself with a simple repudiation of Romish doctrines. It denied nothing without supplying an affirmation. It substituted justification by faith for justification by works, and the reading of the Scriptures by the individual believer for oral instruction by the priest. Mr. Collier said, the other day, at the convention, in opposing the adoption of a creed, that "after having taken his neck out of the collar of one dogmatic church, he was not disposed to insert it in the collar of another"—a sentiment which elicited loud applause. But then the value of this proposition depends on the nature of Mr. Collier's aims. If he wishes simply to be a wild horse, and disport himself in the green pastures of speculative enquiry, of course he need wear no yoke; but if he wishes to form part of a team that is to move anything, the insertion of his neck in the collar is essential. Against anybody's unwillingness to subscribe to a creed we have nothing to say; but the belief which many people seem to entertain that a permanent religious organization can be based on this unwillingness alone, and needs no substructure of affirmation, always reminds us of the old Scotch judge's account of society in the Highlands, which, he said, was based on "the grand foondamental principle o' want o' breeks."

There is one other cause which is increasing the difficulties of Unitarianism considered as a denomination—we are discussing it, it must be remembered, simply as a social phenomenon—and that is, that the application of what is called "the scientific spirit" to religious enquiry is not helping the radicals. We know they are of a different opinion, but we think they are mistaken. The scientific spirit, as preached and spread by Tyndall and Huxley, and the now large school to which they belong, treats all speculation based on hypotheses which there is not now, and never will be, any means of verifying, as idle work. Hypotheses such as those which form the ground-work of nearly all radical reasonings on religious subjects must always remain mere conjectures; and the modern scientific spirit, therefore, simply passes them by as researches in the region of the "unknowable," useful enough, perhaps, for sharpening the wits, but bearing no other fruit. This renders it doubtful whether Unitarianism, as a denomination, is ever likely to make much greater advances than it has made already amongst that large class of educated men whom the scientific spirit is taking hold of, and it cannot hope to make much more impression on those who accept revelation or ecclesiastical tradition. Its prospects amongst the masses do not seem much brighter, for there the love of believing is growing, instead of declining. Of this the Spiritualist movement is a striking illustration. The members of the Spiritualist body—and their numbers are growing every day—are displaying a capacity for stifling doubts and disregarding scientific methods which would astonish the Bollandist fathers, and such as the Catholic Church in her palmiest days never had at command.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, Sept. 25, 1868.

I DO not know whether September or any other month in New York answers in any degree to September in London; but if it does, you must be in a position to sympathize with me. With the exception of about two millions of my fellow-creatures, nobody is in town, and nothing except their everyday affairs is going on. The Times itself is reduced to publishing this morning in five and a half columns an account given by an occasional correspondent—who, I hope, will not be a frequent one—of his three weeks' tour in Switzerland and the north of Italy. I think the most interesting points in it are, that it cost him £26, and that when the carriage stopped at Baveno (on the Lago Maggiore), he got out to stretch his legs. We sometimes hear odd things of American journalism, but I doubt whether you ever fall much below that level, at all events. You must not suppose, however, that when we are reduced to extremities in this country our last gasps are always quite as flat as this. On the contrary, the present month and its immediate neighbors are usually devoted to very poor discussions on wide subjects. The Times has been publishing cartloads of letters about the state of religion in England and the prospects of the Established Church. In the Daily News of to-day I saw No. 8, I think, of a series of letters by Mr. Maurice on "Church and State." When I read, somewhere about the middle, the phrase, "A growing sense of this double contradiction," etc., etc., I read no further. No man in England is entitled to more esteem and admiration than Mr. Maurice, or receives more of it from a wide circle of friends and disciples; but his gift of sympathizing with all sorts of states of mind, and of dissecting the roots of double, treble, and quadruple contradictions, makes all his writings so difficult to me that for many years past I have contented myself with admiring him somewhat at a distance. If I come too near I feel as if I should be beset with a continually growing sense of manifold contradictions, till at length I could hardly—to use an expression which, for your own sakes, I hope you have preserved in America—tell t'other from which. The Church-in-danger discussion in the Times is a much more trenchant affair, as you may suppose. The chief writer in it is "S. G. O.," or Lord Sydney Godolphin Osborne, who tells us all in every possible variety of form of speech that the Church of England is dying of Ritualism because nobody has power to put it down. He went so far the other day as to say that it is "virtually disestablished." I have heard the word "virtually" pretty often in different connections, and, except that it means "not really," I have always found it very difficult to attach much of a meaning to it. I think myself that we are still a very long way off from any sort of disestablishment of the Church of England which will imperil mitre or alter the position of any bishop, priest, or deacon who belongs to it. All this fuss about Ritualism is a case of much ado about not quite nothing, but about very little indeed. To disestablish the Church would alter the whole face of English society. There is not a town or village throughout the length and breadth of the land of which the aspect would not be materially and irrevocably changed by such a measure; and as the Church is much liked by a great many people, and cordially disliked by exceedingly few, my own opinion is that it will continue to go on much as it is for a very long time to come. The clergy have baptized and married a large majority of us, and I suspect that they will have the pleasure of burying most of us more majorum. They may, however, get a pretty smart jerk of the lay curb, just to remind them of its existence, if they, or rather a rising minority of them, do not mend their manners a little.

Talking of the Church of England, I have just read in the Pall Mall Gazette of this evening that Dean Milman is dead. He was a very remarkable man. I should doubt whether any English clergyman had so high a standing socially and in the literary world as he. He was nearly 78, and for many years past had been intimate with almost every person of note in the country. He has been Dean of St. Paul's for the last nineteen years, and before that was a canon of Westminster. He was a most remarkable looking man. He had been much bent for many years by old age, yet his face, and in particular his eyes, had an astonishing degree of energy and fire. When he was talking upon any subject that interested him, he would look up and speak with a degree of vivacity and animation which gave one the idea that he must, in his earlier days, have been a splendid looking man. He had a wonderful amount of knowledge on every sort of subject, and you could hardly mention any one of whom he had not some anecdote from his own knowledge. He will be a great loss to the nation in more ways than one. His death gives the Government another slice of patronage to dispose of. If Mr. Disraeli were capable of such conduct, one might really suspect him of having done something to somebody, in consideration of being allowed for a season to distribute high places amongst his supporters. What he can have given or to whom, are questions which I cannot pretend to solve.

The only political business stirring just at present is the preparation for the general election. We are full of addresses and canvassing, and here and there (in Ireland in particular) there is just a little beating of heads. The registration, moreover, is going on at the same time with the canvass, and is attracting more or less attention when there is so little stirring. Perhaps I ought not to give your readers credit for knowing what we mean by registration. It is simply the formation of the register of electors, which is performed every year by a number of revising barristers, as they are called, who hold courts for a fortnight or three weeks, in which they determine upon the various claims put forward by those who have or wish for votes. The great question on the present revision is whether women are by law entitled to votes. It arose rather absurdly in the following way: In old times, as you very probably know, English acts of Parliament used to be drawn in the most long-winded manner possible. Amongst other things, the draughtsmen had a laudable practice of always inserting "he or she" in every clause in which they meant to forbid or command any human being to do or leave undone any particular thing. For instance, "if any person shall commit murder, he or she shall be hanged;" for it occurred to their scrupulous minds that if the word "he" alone were used, "she" might commit murder with impunity. Some years ago it occurred to a more enlightened age that this was a little absurd, and accordingly an act of Parliament was passed providing that masculine words should include the feminine gender, unless the contrary appeared to be the true meaning of the legislature. In the last Reform Bill the word "man" was used in the clause granting the vote, and the question which now exercises the revising barristers' minds is whether "man" includes "woman." The best argument I have seen to prove that it does is, that when Milton wrote "of man's first disobedience," etc., he certainly did not mean to exclude Eve. Generally speaking, however, the revising barristers have resisted the fascinations brought to bear upon them, and I suspect that the ladies will not succeed in getting votes by a legal quibble, after failing to get them by direct means.

A DEFENSE OF GENERAL BUTLER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of the 8th inst. a correspondent, signing himself "A Massachusetts Republican," occupies a column of your space in an endeavor to injure General Butler in his Congressional district, and to accomplish this object makes charges against the general's private, professional, and military character which are either designedly or ignorantly false.

After an exordium in which the voice of the people and that of their Creator; "Colonel Washington;" "uncouth Abraham Lincoln;" "the devil's hunting-ground;" "General Grant;" "the beatitudes" of the New Testament, and even the divine utterances of our Saviour, are jumbled together in a manner as lugubrious as irreverent, for no other apparent motive than to give dramatic effect to the writer's patronizing effort to coddle and flatter the "Old Essex District" by the mention of names distinguished in its history, he proceeds to accuse General Butler of "insubordination" to those above and "insolent oppression of those below him" (including the following noted victims to these two unlovely traits: "General Phelps," "Secretary Stanton," "General Gillmore," "Admiral Porter," "General Grant," "Chaplain Hudson," and "a score of subalterns"); of "having encouraged rebels and urged them on till the booming of guns at the South and the muttering thunder at the North converted him at the eleventh hour;" of falsehood, in saying that he had used the fifty thousand dollars in gold, seized from Samuel Smith & Co., to pay his soldiers; and, finally, your correspondent says, by implication, that General Butler's name was received with hisses at the late reunion of the Army of the James. As I know all of these accusations to be unfounded in fact, I presume that you will be as willing that I should show their untruth as you have been to admit them to your paper. To the charge of insubordination, I have only to say that I challenge its author to point to a single instance on record, while, if necessary, I can show that his whole military career was an illustration of that prompt and cheerful obedience to his military superiors which he rigorously exacted from his subordinates—how rigorously exacted, I imagine, "A Massachusetts Republican" has learned by bitter experience. General Butler's "abuse" of General Phelps was marked by a delicate consideration for the feelings and a warm appreciation of the courage and enthusiasm of that eccentric but brave soldier and devoted humanitarian, actually chivalric. Mr. Parton, in his admirable history of the capture of New Orleans, has related all the particulars of General Butler's friendly controversy with General Phelps with an exactness which, from my participation in the affair, I can attest. Their policy and hopes for justice to the negro were identical, but General Butler's more practical mind was willing to wait a little for their surer fruition.

The "abuse" of General Gillmore was simply a commanding general's expression of disapprobation of a subordinate's inefficiency and lack of zeal —a disapprobation endorsed by officers whose services to their country, and intimate association with General Gillmore in the Army of the James and previously in the Army of the South, entitle their opinions to respect.

The case of Chaplain Hudson is hardly worth comment, and would never have attracted attention but for his having belonged to a profession to which is customarily accorded the traditional "odor of sanctity," and which alone invested him with the distinction of a martyr over hundreds of less culpable and less fortunate offenders. His offence was the most flagrant insubordination and defiance of the authority of the general commanding the army, committed in a manner that violated all recognized rules of honor and truthfulness. He was placed in close arrest, assigned to a tent at headquarters precisely similar in size and quality to those occupied by the officers of the staff, and was never subjected to any severer punishment than a temporary deprivation of his liberty.

The charge that General Butler "urged on the rebels" until the "booming" and "muttering" business (good figures I admit, though not so sparklingly fresh to the voters of Essex as to confusingly exhilarate their political faculties) "converted" him, when taken in connection with the fact that Daniel S. Dickinson, General Sickles, General Cochrane, and a great number of other ardent Democrats and sincere patriots were equally with General Butler "converted" by the first act of rebellion, I should entirely pass, but that it affords me opportunity to add to the mass of testimony to the general's long-before-declared hostility to secession a statement made to me in 1863 by Colonel John S. Keyes, United States Marshal in Massachusetts during Mr. Lincoln's first term of the Presidency. Col. Keyes told me that several years before, when General Butler was colonel of a regiment of Massachusetts militia, he expressed his surprise to the general that with so large a law practice he could spare time for the mere diversion of militia training. General Butler answered, with the impressiveness of that sagacity that borders on prescience, "No, colonel, the ill-feeling which exists between the two great sections of our land will surely, if not speedily, culminate in open conflict, and when that time arrives I wish to be prepared to lead my fellow-citizens to the support of the Government, and this, which now seems mere recreation, will then be seen to have had its use." The services of the Massachusetts militia, under the command of General Butler, during the first doubtful days of civil war, render further comment on General Butler's "conversion" unnecessary.

The most important portion of "A Massachusetts Republican's" communication is that which refers to the malicious lies regarding General Butler's seizures of private property, and particularly the seizure of fifty thousand dollars in gold from Messrs. Samuel Smith & Co., of New Orleans, which rebels North and South have so industriously circulated and repeated that many of that class of "Conservative Republicans," who take all their opinions second-hand, from whichever side on any question, asserts itself by the noisest and most persistent iteration, have accepted as facts. Your Boston correspondent is so clearly an attentive reader of the newspapers, that he cannot have failed to see that General Butler has repeatedly, both in his seat in Congress and through the press, asked for the most searching investigation into his administration of his various commands during the war, and especially the seizure of the New Orleans gold; but his detractors are too shrewd to adopt a course that would rob them of the larger share of their political capital not only against General Butler but against the entire Republican party. Your correspondent states positively that General Butler's assertion, that he used the fifty thousand dollars in question to pay off troops to whom the Government was eight months in arrears, "is a falsehood, and as such has been exposed." Having been on the ground, and cognizant of the facts in this case, I unqualifiedly assert that not only is General Butler's story true, but that, further than this, the general borrowed, on his personal credit, every dollar obtainable, and applied it to the same purpose in part, and in part as a loan to Admiral Farragut, to be used (I think) for payment of arrears to his sailors. All this can be proved by the testimony of such witnesses as Mr. James Denégre, cashier Citizens' Bank of New Orleans; Mr. Jacob Barker, of the Bank of Commerce of the same city; and Mr. A. S. Blake, of the Adams Express Company, through all of whom the loans were effected, and also by Admiral Farragut and his fleet paymaster, Mr. Davis.

The whole transaction pertaining to this gold was as open as the most ordinary public act. At the request of the Messrs. Smith a board of investigation was appointed, composed of Mr. W. Newton Mercer, president of the Bank of Louisiana, Mr. Thomas J. Durant, the leading member of the New Orleans bar, and one officer of the United States troops, General G. F. Shepley. On their unanimous recommendation the money was held, and the Government at Washington was repeatedly appealed to to take the gold and assume the responsibility its possession involved. The Government declining to take the responsibility, though it had no objection to adding the fifty thousand dollars to the millions which the general paid into the national Treasury, General Butler was left with two alternatives —to hand over the money to the Treasury without recourse, trusting to the very doubtful chance of a bill of relief from Congress in the event of his being obliged to reimburse the Smiths, and defray the expenses of defence as a result of a probable suit at law, or, on the other hand, to hold the money until, by his muster out of the service, he would no longer be a representative of the Government, and his return of the gold would not be a tacit admission that the seizure was improper or unjustifiable.

If your Boston correspondent will examine the court reports published in all the New York papers of the 30th of April, 1866, he will find the whole subject of the gold seizure thoroughly ventilated, and the following letter and receipt from Mr. Edwards Pierrepont, the distinguished counsel for Smith & Co., which would convince any person but one of abnormally developed stupidity, or a "Massachusetts Republican," of the propriety of the seizure and the disinterestedness of the return:

"MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER:

"DEAR SIR: The facts and circumstances which you communicated at my office, yesterday, should satisfy any reasonable man that abundant probable cause appeared at the time to justify you as a public officer in the original taking of the fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) in gold from Samuel Smith & Co.

"Fully accepting your assurance that the gold has been kept ready to be handed over to whomsoever might appear to be entitled to it, I propose to receive the same for my clients and thus to end a controversy which an earlier meeting between us would have relieved of a good deal of misunderstanding. Very respectfully, yours,

"EDWARDS PIERREPONT,
"Counsel for Samuel Smith & Co.

"NEW YORK, January 20, 1866."

THE RECEIPT.

"NEW YORK COMMON PLEAS.

"Samuel Smith and Andrew W. Smith against Benjamin F. Butler.

"In consideration of the sum of fifty thousand dollars in gold received by the undersigned, the attorney and counsel for the plaintiffs, the above suit is settled in full and to be dismissed without costs to either party. The defendant, as part of this settlement, is to settle with the sheriff for his legal fees in this case, and a release from the plaintiffs is also to be obtained and delivered to the defendant by the undersigned.

"EDWARDS PIERREPONT,
"Attorney and Counsel of Plaintiffs."

"January 31, 1866.

"JOHN K. HACKETT,
"Attorney and Counsel for Defendant,
"Per JAS. T. BRADY."

To the contemptible insinuation which closes the letter from your Boston correspondent, it is unnecessary to say more than that the reports in the reliable newspapers of Boston of the "applause and cheers" which the mention of General Butler's name elicited at the recent banquet of the Army of the James, will be more generally accepted than the unmanly inuendo of a concealed foe.

LITERARY.

THE "Villa on the Rhine" is the new novel by Berthold Auerbach, of which we spoke some time ago. Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, who have been for some time in communication with the author, now announce it, and have, we believe, made arrangements with a competent translator. The first Tauchnitz edition of the former novel of Auerbach's, "On the Heights," was not a good one, and there is now a revised edition which is considerably better. For the "Villa on the Rhine" Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt have engaged Mr. Bayard Taylor to write a preface, giving a biographical sketch of the author. This will be, then, an excellent edition of a book which, if we may judge it by its predecessor, will be a novel which it will be very well worth while to own, for "On the Heights" is certainly a novel to be read more than once, and worthy of a place on the lower shelves.——Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers announce a novel—"Fair Play"—by Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth; another, by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, entitled "Mabel's Mistake;" another, by Mrs. Henry Wood, entitled "The Red Court Farm;" and, finally—fit ending to this list—a novel with a title worth its weight in gold, and by an author of great fame, namely, Pierce Egan's "Blue-Eyed Witch; or, Not a Friend in the World." The same firm will make "La Beata" the next in their series of Adolphus Trollope's books.——E. P. Dutton & Co. announce "Music for the Church Service: Responses, Chants, and Tunes for Congregations and Choirs." Mr. C. A. Dorr selects and arranges the pieces. They intend publishing also Bishop Kip's "Christmas Holidays in Rome."——T. A. Carter & Sons, who are to Boston Swedenborgians what E. P. Dutton & Co. are to Boston Episcopalians, issue a pamphlet that may interest some of our readers—"The Pythonism of the Present Day." Pythonism means Spiritualism.

—We have had plenty of American orators whose speeches have been put into print, and perhaps not one such collection has not had its readers. It is the fate of editors and possible stump-speakers to be obliged to acquaint themselves with this fossil eloquence in order that bits of it may be used to demolish the political structures of the orator's surviving partisans, or to patch up one's own political structure. But we may call it true that though Robert Rantoul's speeches may be known to some editors in the Fifth Massachusetts District, and S. S. Prentiss's to a few aspiring students of the law considered as a road to political activity, yet we suppose Webster's speeches—some of them—are the only American oratory of the past generation which will live, or, indeed, can be said to be alive now. The best known of them, being masterly statements of that theory of the Constitution which is held by the Northern people—and, in fact, of the principles that would still underlie the Government if we were to change our present Constitution almost beyond recognition—must long be read and will continue to be well known, we may be sure, after our present disputes about State sovereignty have ceased. But who hears now the eloquent voices of Mr. Wirt, and Mr. Clay, and Mr. Fisher Ames, and Mr. Daniel S. Dickinson, and Mr. Hayne, and Mr. John Randolph, and Mr. Douglas, and Mr. Everett, and the "Hundred Boston Orators?" Nobody at all, we imagine. Even our orators of to-day apparently have no audience except that which they are at the moment addressing, and that which in the course of the next three days reads in the newspapers what was said in Faneuil Hall or the Cooper Institute or the Philadelphia Academy of Music. In England, the case is pretty much the same. We suppose that we Americans, who go through a vast number of "School Speakers" in the course of our adolescence, really know more about the oratorical powers, such as they were, of Peel and Canning and Macaulay and Shiel, and their parliamentary contemporaries, than the present generation of Englishmen knows. No English orator's works, says the Daily News, can be said to live as a part of English literature except Burke's; and Burke's speeches were disquisitions prepared in the closet, and are really philosophic treatises on government and politics. Mr. Bright is about to undergo this severe test, and it is possible that he may be able to come up to its requirements; but it is hardly probable; for Mr. Bright has never dealt with great topics—or, rather, great as the general issues have been that have been involved in some of his conflicts, and large a view as he may have taken of their importance, they have usually been concealed under some petty issue of the moment. Moreover, his speeches are to be given as stenographed, and will not be idealized by the corrections and filings to which so many speakers owe most of their posthumous fame. Still it is true that Mr. Bright's speeches in general are marked by "manly and simple English, penetrating common sense, rugged pathos—now broad, now delicate—indignant invective," and others of the best qualities of written as well as of spoken style. Moreover, Mr. Bright's words are going to carry great weight for some years with a constantly increasing class of voters, and his works will be things for friends and enemies alike to study. It is but a week or so, we may mention here, since the publishing-house of Barbera, in Florence, issued an edition in Italian of the parliamentary speeches of an orator very different from Mr. Bright, and perhaps surer of continued remembrance in mere literature—Count Cavour.

—Leigh Hunt, who is pretty well known here, is better known by his name, which constantly occurs in connection with that of Byron and Moore and Lamb, than by his works, which are too purely literary to be very much enjoyed by a people which is as yet not purely literary—and may never be; the world gets less purely literary in the sense in which we mean the term. Then there is undoubtedly a prejudice against him; and many persons, when his name occurs to them, think of a more or less dangerous infidel, a would-be subverter of sound morality, and a leveller in politics. That there should be such a belief is a proof of the power of names over the average mind. Hunt got all his obloquy at that wretched time in English history—gilded though it is with the triumphs of the national arms—when Castlereagh and Canning and Percival, partly from terror, partly for terrorism, and partly out of insolence, were shamefully oppressing the peasantry and mechanics. They were the days of Peterloo as well as of Waterloo. It was in those days of arbitrary arrests and persecuting prosecutions, and Tory billingsgate and riots by starving men suppressed by massacre, that Hunt did his best work and earned his reputation—his ill name and his good—as a consistent, honest, moderate, and sensible, though fearless, enemy of the faction which was then ruling England in the interests of repressive aristocracy. Mud enough was flung at him, of course, and some of it has stuck; but the best opinion about him to-day is that he was a perfectly honest man, of pure life morally, of a religious and even devout turn of mind, of a very warm heart, and of a cheerful and gay disposition which no misfortune could long depress, and who put all this and more into his writings. We do not speak of him at length in his character of poet, or critic, or humorist, or essayist, but as a man, and one who has been unjustly kept under a cloud on account of the alleged tendencies of his works. Really, he was a moderate constitutionalist in politics, a devout man in religion, and no more a materialist and a destructionist than Gladstone is. The Liberal of our time, however, was hooted as the Radical and Chartist of forty years ago, and no abuse was too vile to put upon him. We see that the English Liberals are now raising a fund to provide some memorial to him, and to beautify his neglected grave. The sum required is not a large one, but we dare say the committee who have it in charge would willingly receive American contributions.

—The life of that interesting character, Carlo Botta, has been written with great completeness by Carlo Dionisotti (Bocca: Turin and Florence, 1868). Sixty years ago Botta's name was better known in this country than it is now, through his "History of the American War," in the preparation of which he had access to the best materials, besides intimate acquaintance with Lafayette and other eminent actors in the Revolution. He was forced to sell half the original edition as so much paper, in order to maintain himself and his family. We presume the American translation of this history is now rarely to be met with outside of libraries. As an Italian historian, Botta is to be classed among the most industrious, to say the least, as is proved by his "Storia d'Italia (1796–1814)," and his connection of the national history of Guicciardini with his own. If not so prolific as is M. Cesare Cantù, he was undoubtedly a much more trustworthy historian, especially in American affairs; as a man of science and a practical legislator, he is also deserving of being remembered; and this new life, embracing some 500 pages, contains much hitherto unpublished matter.

—The Emperor Napoleon has so long enjoyed the privilege of Delphic sayings, which meant peace or war as others might determine, but which always meant "my policy" or "my dynasty" that his apology for not addressing his officers at Châlons is quite remarkable. He declined to speak to them because, as he declared, whatever he might say would be distorted by the daily papers, and construed into a threat of war. To that extent, therefore, the Emperor confessed himself constrained by the press, though really it is the contradiction in past years between the plain construction of his speeches and his hidden intent which now compels him to be careful of utterance. Apart from this, however, the Perseveranza thinks that the daily press both of France and Germany is censurable for the recklessness with which it does not lead nor enlighten, but reproduces public sentiment, in all its variety and contrasts, lending weight to what is trivial, and conspicuousness and permanence to what is obscure and transient, and by prolonging the paper contest indefinitely at last furnishes the motives for an armed collision. The party press, the same paper observes, is a hundredfold more violent than the men who represent the respective parties in Parliament; yet its responsibility is far less than theirs. Neither Napoleon nor Bismarck wishes to go to war; war can only be caused by the journals of both countries, by the spreading of such rumors and such criticisms of the Government as to involve ministers and rulers in a vortex of popular passion from which there is no escape. That this is in the main a correct picture of the European press and its capacity for mischief, we cannot doubt; but the Luxembourg difficulty showed that in France, at least, the war party in the press was not more fanatical—we were going to say—rampant, certainly, than the liberal deputies, who strove to gain favor with the people by seeming to bear up the honor of France when it was being neglected by the Emperor.

—As interesting a piece of advertising literature as we have seen for some time is to be found in a pamphlet written by a daughter of the too-famous Madame Rachel, and devoted to setting forth the virtues of a certain remarkable exudation from an African rock. We copy the passage below from the report of the trial of that lady, and the "laughter" is that of the bench and bar. The author, who was in the witness-box, apparently must have been in rather an embarrassing position:

"In the interior of Sahara, or the Great Desert, is a magnetic rock, from which water distils sparingly in the form of dew (laughter), which is possessed of extraordinary property. Whether a latent electricity be imparted by magnetism, or an additional quantity of oxygen enters into its composition, it is not easy to say. (More laughter.) But it appears to have the property of increasing the vital energies, as it restores the color of grey hair apparently by renewing the circulation in its capillary tubes (great laughter), the cessation of which occasions greyness; and it gives the appearance of youth to persons of considerable antiquity. (Great laughter.) This water is brought to Morocco on swift dromedaries for the use of the court, and its virtues are much extolled by their physicians. It might be called the antipodes of the Lethean Styx of ancient times. (Roars of laughter.)"

The reader will observe how "low in tone" it is, as the art critics say. For example, the writer conscientiously hesitates to pronounce emphatically on the question whether the extraordinary property of the exudation is owing to its containing more oxygen than common water or to the fact that some of the magnetic qualities of the rock itself are imparted to it; then, "the antipodes of the Lethean Styx"—it may not precisely be that, but it might be called that—is worthy of a full-feathered American Congressman at his utmost stretch of pinion. We were most struck, however, by the fact which we have often noticed before in our examinations of this kind of literature, that coloring is apt to be oriental. The "Sahara," the "swift dromedaries," and the "court of Morocco" lend quite an Eastern aspect to the passage above quoted. These wonderful remedies generally come from the East. It is a bold man who advertises that he has "discovered in one of our common pasture-weeds" growing near Roxbury, in Massachusetts, a cure for certain complaints. It must be that he felt the confidence of the innocent, and that his panacea for skin diseases is really of value. Generally it is from the cradle of the race that the magical herb or stone or gum is brought. We see, too, on the premises of astrologers and fortune-tellers something of this orientalism: it is usually a dwarf or an Afrite who ushers the visitor into the presence. Rachel, by the way, goes to jail for five years—a sentence which, when it had been announced to her, seemed to leave her thunderstruck. Mrs. Borradaile loses, let us hope, the money out of which the other one cheated her.

—A striking illustration of the freedom of the European public from the prejudice of color, which is still rooted so deeply in the American mind, is furnished by a recent act of the Academy of France. One of the most elevated duties of that famous body is the annual distribution, towards the close of the summer, of a number of pecuniary rewards or prizes, for intellectual and moral excellence, out of moneys placed at its disposal partly by the state and partly through the bequests of liberal-minded and benevolent private parties. Among these prizes are "les prix de vertu," founded by M. de Montyon, one of the noblest philanthropists France ever possessed, and amounting to 20,000 francs per annum, which sum is annually awarded, according to the terms of his testament, in amounts ranging from 3,000 to 1,000 francs, to "those inhabitants of France, in poor circumstances, that have performed the most virtuous action in the course of the year." To carry out the praiseworthy purpose of the testator in the strictest possible manner, the officers of the administrative branch of the Government throughout France are required to report, to the central authorities, all the meritorious deeds of persons of humble station in life that may come to their notice. Moreover, the public is regularly invited to bring appropriate cases to the attention of the Academy. The test of disinterestedness—the soul of true benevolence—is rigidly applied to all cases thus submitted to that high tribunal. No claim to any of the prizes is considered if made, directly or indirectly, by the person to be benefited. The competition takes place, indeed, without the knowledge of the parties interested. The result of this year's concours was the unanimous award by the judges, after a careful examination of many hundreds of cases, of the first prix de vertu to an old negress, an ex-slave, for self-sacrificing fidelity to her master. The prize has never been more worthily bestowed. The black recipient, a native of Guadeloupe, it appears, was brought to France nearly a generation ago, as the servant of a successful planter, who returned to his native land with a view to passing the remainder of his life in the quiet enjoyment of his fortune. But an ill turn of fate suddenly deprived him of the latter, and he found himself one day, in his old age, not only without any means of support of his own, but abandoned to starvation by faithless friends and relatives. But for one sympathizing soul he would have been obliged to seek refuge in an almshouse. It dwelt under the dark skin of Nymphe, his grey-headed servant. She proved more faithful even in adversity than in prosperity to him. In the day-time she waited upon him with the assiduity and tenderness of an own sister. At night she stole away from their lodgings and did all sorts of chores to earn the means necessary to sustain their modest ménage. With the proceeds of her nightly labors, and the charitable help of some benevolent citizens of Marseilles, which city was the scene of her touching devotion, she succeeded in saving her master from the pangs of want. This noble work she carried on unweariedly not for weeks and months, but for many years. With a refined delicacy, not often found among her betters, the devoted creature, in order not to humiliate her master, never told him how she passed her sleepless nights. But for the fact that the moving story was told just as we have related it, by the secretary of the Academy, at the public distribution of the prizes, and is fully authenticated by official evidence, the reality of this example of true heroism might be questioned. In honoring the black heroine, the Academy has certainly honored itself.

THE CONQUEST OF FLORIDA BY HERNANDO DE SOTO.*

This is a pleasing book. The author is Theodore Irving, a favorite nephew of Washington Irving. In the present youthful essay the writer shows that he possesses many of the merits, both in style and method, of his celebrated uncle. The same ease and elegance, the same clearness of thought and of expression, are perceptible throughout. Nor is the theme unworthy of a brilliant pen. The daring of Hernando de Soto and his followers in their contemplated conquest, the disasters which befell them, their first discovery of the mighty river, the death of Soto upon its banks, with his midnight burial beneath the turbid waters of the Mississippi, afford ample scope for the exhibition of historical genius. This production, therefore, invites the attention of the reading public, and will not only repay an attentive perusal, but ought to be rewarded with a place in every library stored with choice memoirs of the deeds done in early times in the States now constituting the far-spreading Republic. Not only is the subject interesting, but it is, moreover, the only volume in our language which presents the subject in a concise, intelligible shape. The narrative is simple, the matter is judiciously condensed, abounding in facts, overflowing with incidents, and leaving in the memory much food for fancy and reflection.

But how much of the material lies within the realm of history, and how much of it lies without, in the region of romance, are points not so readily determined. The author claims for it all the respect due to an authentic account, and is sincere in urging his suit for the consideration due to a historian. We are slow, however, in according to him that title, to the full extent in metes and bounds of his wishes. With all due reverence for the honored name he bears, some doubts must be dispelled before his pretensions can be satisfactorily established.

An introductory chapter is devoted to a short statement of the first expeditions to Florida under Ponce de Leon, Lucas Vasquez de Ayllon, to the ill-starred Pamphilo de Narvez, and others. It is supported by the highest authorities, it has never been contradicted in any quarter, and it is undoubtedly correct. The third chapter opens with the early life and subsequent adventures of Soto; and so long as the author is content to follow the same high authorities, no one will hesitate to bear him company and to believe in what is written. Soon, however, he strays from these safe guides, to join some disreputable chance associates whom he picks up by the wayside. One of them, it is true, has found a godfather in the Inca Garcilaso de la Vega; but it is to be feared that our young author, in his poverty of literary experience, has encountered a brace of reprobates, and made the acquaintance of two strange bedfellows of no reputable connections. But before sending these vagabonds to the treadmill, let us permit Mr. Irving to tell his own story of how and when and where he met with them:

"While studying the Spanish language, some few years since, at Madrid, an old chronicle was placed in my hands relating to the early discoveries and achievements of the Spaniards in America. It was denominated 'The Florida of the Inca, or the History of the Adelantado, Hernando de Soto, Governor and Captain-General of the Kingdom of Florida, and of other heroic cavaliers, Spaniards and Indians; written by the Inca Garcilaso de la Vega.' As I read, I became insensibly engrossed by the extraordinary enterprise therein narrated; I dwelt with intense interest upon the harebrained adventures and daring exploits of steel-clad warriors, and the no less valiant and chivalrous deeds of savage chieftains, which entitle this narrative to the high praise bestowed upon it by Mr. Southey, of being one of the most delightful works in the Spanish language.

"While thus employed, I had the good fortune to meet with a narrative on the same subject, written by a Portuguese soldier, who was present in the expedition. This led to further research and closer examination; and, finding that the striking events and perilous adventures in the chronicles of the Inca were borne out, in the main, by this narrative from another hand, and that various lights had been thrown by modern travellers upon the line of march said to have been taken by the adventurous band of De Soto, I was convinced that what I had before regarded almost as a work of fiction, was an authentic though, perhaps, occasionally exaggerated history.

"Deeming, therefore, that a full account of an expedition which throws such an air of romance over the early history of a portion of our country would possess interest in the eyes of my countrymen, I resolved, to the best of my abilities, to digest a work from the materials before me.

"The two main sources from which I have derived my facts are the narratives already mentioned, by the Inca Garcilaso de la Vega, and by the anonymous Portuguese adventurer. The former I have consulted in a folio edition, printed in Madrid, in 1723, and in the history of the Indias, by Herrera, in which it is incorporated almost at full length. The Portuguese narrative I have found in an English translation, published in London, in 1686, and in an abridgment in Purchas's Pilgrims.

"It has been the fashion, in later days, to distrust the narrative of the Inca, and to put more faith in that of the Portuguese. This has occasionally been done without due examination into their respective claims to credibility. Garcilaso de la Vega was a man of rank and honor. He was descended from an ancient Spanish stock by the father's side, while by the mother's he was of the lofty Peruvian line of the Incas. His narrative was originally taken down by himself, from the lips of a friend, a cavalier of worth and respectability, who had been an officer under De Soto, and for whose probity we have the word of the Inca as a guarantee. It was authenticated and enriched by the written journals or memorandums of two other soldiers, who had served in the expedition. He had the testimony, therefore, of three eye-witnesses.

"The Portuguese narrative, on the other hand, is the evidence of merely a single eye-witness, who gives himself out as a cavalier, or gentleman; but for this we have merely his own word, and he is anonymous. There is nothing intrinsic in his work that should entitle it to the exclusive belief that has been claimed for it."

Now, Herrera is a most respectable authority; none better can be found. He was the royal chronicler for the kingdom of Castile and for the Indies of the West, which were the exclusive patrimony of the sovereigns of Castile. He was ordered to compile a history of these possessions beyond the great ocean, from their first discovery, in 1492, down to the year 1554. For that purpose he had free access to the documents in the royal closet and to all archives, books, registers, and narratives in the department of the Indies. His work was completed and published in 1601 in five volumes in folio, and it remains extant and of indisputable verity to the present time. All modern writers bow to its acknowledged ability as a monument of historical labor, research, and integrity. What is therein stated is presumed to impart absolute truth. But it does not incorporate the Inca's statement; it does not even name that Indian potentate. What is therein published respecting Soto's expedition does not embrace more than a half-dozen pages interspersed in a half-dozen places. It also differs widely from the Inca's facts; it suppresses altogether his sketches, which no doubt are fanciful emanations of a teeming brain. Moreover, if all the truth be told by Herrera concerning Soto and his successor in the wilderness, Luis de Moscoso, why need the author of the "Conquest" resort to the chronicle of the Inca at all? Herrera stands pre-eminent for honesty and veracity; Garcilaso, unfortunately, stands upon a bad eminence for both. The narrative of the Portuguese, it is insinuated, is to be discredited because "he gives himself out" as a cavalier and gentleman; he is anonymous. Will the author tell us the cognomen of the Inca's belted buccaneer of Castile? He is equally unknown; the disinherited champion, when he first entered the lists of the tournament in the gentle passage of arms at Ashby-de-la-Zouche, was not more without a name. Incognitos on all sides are plentiful as dominos at a masquerade. Mr. Southey is quoted for his opinion that the Inca's account is one of the most delightful works in the Spanish language. The laureate is excellent authority on Peninsular literature, and his judgment in this instance may not be erroneous. Yet it must be remembered a greater British poet, Sir Walter Scott, bestowed as high compliment on the history of New York by one Diedrich Knickerbocker. But it does not appear that either the bard of Don Roderick or the troubadour of the Last Minstrel stood prepared to file an affidavit to sustain the credibility of the object of his particular admiration.

Having thus despatched the author's compurgators for the virtues of the Peruvian, it is next in order to dispose of that low fellow (as Mr. Irving evidently thinks him) styling himself, with visor down, "a cavalier" from Portugal. He seems to be a surly creature, coarse in his manners, curt in his speech, and perpetually blurting out unpleasant things which, if true, it would be well to keep to himself. While Garcilaso's friend is courtly, chivalrous, and constantly describing deeds of high em prise by warriors in bending plumes and plate armor, vaulting upon prancing steeds caparisoned with gilt and silk housings, or shining in the sun with close-fitting shirts of Milan steel, like golden humming-birds of the tropics, this Portuguese craven has nothing to tell about them. The only under-garment he speaks of is a very dirty shirt of linen, which, on a certain occasion, supplied the want of a better life-preserver to protect from perish ing a common soldier, when a bleak, cold, penetrating north wind was blowing. If his silence be taken for testimony, nothing worthy of the days of the Crusaders was exhibited in the campaign; and yet this conquest was a crusade against the infidel. Where the gentleman from Spain happens to contradict the unknown from Portugal, the Portuguese man of war is invariably cut adrift; Mr. Irving will none of him. But such is the perversity of taste among mankind that some readers will prefer his blunt recitals to the more graceful strains of the more accomplished partner of his tribulations.

Let one example suffice. When Hernando de Soto, with his resplendent cavalcade, was on his way to the scene of conquest, he landed in Cuba and sojourned for a short time at the city of Santiago. He there had the good fortune to fall in with Don Vasco Porcallo de Figueroa, who was upwards of fifty years of age. He was an ancient cavalier of a noble family; he had fought his way to fortune in Spain, in Italy, in the Indies, and he was now residing in opulence in Trinidad de Cuba. Don Vasco passed some days in Santiago, entranced by the splendor of the army, the equipments, and martial bearing of the men now displayed before him. His military spirit, like an old coal, was easily rekindled once more. He volunteered his services to Soto; they were accepted; and he accompanied the gallant band to the Bay of Espiritu Santo, in Florida. So far our friend Garcilaso. In a note the author adds that the Portuguese narrator drily asserts that Porcallo engaged in the expedition merely with a view to get slaves for his estate in Cuba; but his assertion is to be distrusted when he assigns motives to the Spanish leaders, for whom he seems to have entertained a national jealousy. Mr. Irving harbors some peculiar opinions about the object which these knights of the conquest had before their eyes. Perhaps he thinks that from motives of piety they constituted a religious brotherhood for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, and that they bore with them an invoice of Bibles, their kennel of bloodhounds serving only to protect the precious cargo. If such be his thought, he is slightly at variance with all Spanish narratives of that age. The acquisition of gold-dust, of silver, of pearls and slaves, was the disinterested temptation to these noble gentlemen; and while they were right willing, as true champions of the cross, to fight the natives, they were still more ready, as commercial agents, to barter with them. Running down the inhabitants with dogs and robbing graveyards for treasure were the daily avocations of these scions of chivalry.

When Don Luis de Moscoso and the small remnant of survivors left of Soto's expedition arrived with the brigantines in Mexico, they were in a most piteous condition. But they were hospitably received by their countrymen; the good Mendoza was viceroy. The first duty required of these wanderers was to give an account of themselves; for such was the usage of routine in all the realms of Castile. They must, consequently, have been brought before an official, where their statements on oath were taken down and transmitted to the Council of the Indies. Nor was this all; another tribunal took cognizance of the case of Don Luis de Moscoso. He was the leader still alive; he had been the Governor of Florida after the death of Soto. Now, all such high personages had to undergo a residencia; and a residencia was something in the nature of a court of enquiry before a single judge; something in the nature of a court-martial, where the single judge could find a verdict; and if he found a verdict of guilty, the culprit could be condemned, and the sentence practically enforced. Copies of these proceedings were also despatched to the supreme and royal council. These state trials furnish a rich source for historical facts; for none of the viceroys or governors in that century, and very few even in the present, escaped an official investigation. The residencia on Columbus was unfortunately lost at sea in the hurricane in which his judge, Bobadilla, went down. But those on Cortez, on Alvarado, and on many others, have not only been preserved, but recently published. And what sad work do they make of the glowing pictures upon which rests the popular opinion of these heroes!

The Spanish Government in the West, like the British in the East, was a government wherein all public transactions, even the most trivial, were reduced to record and sent to the mother country. The documentary histories in early times of Peru, of Mexico, of the Antilles, and of the other Audiencias, are therefore as full and complete as the reports furnished to the India Board from the Presidencies of Pondicherry, or Madras, or Mysore. These valuable archives relating to America still remain intact. They formed a part of the general repository at Simancas. But after the establishment of the Royal House of Trade at Seville, and the creation of the Council of the Indies, they were transferred to that city, to the House, through which all public and commercial business of the West, of whatever kind, was transacted. These manuscripts can now be consulted in the library of the lonja, or exchange, which building was formerly the Royal House. The British Government of late have availed themselves of the diplomatic correspondence of the sixteenth century on file in the documentary alcoves of Spain; our commonwealths bordering on the Mexican Gulf will soon follow the example of the British. In order to illustrate the reign of Elizabeth, Froude, in his "History of England," has rummaged the letters in Simancas; in order to authenticate the march of Hernando de Soto, Americans must gather and collate the papers at Seville.

With these abundant materials at command, wherefore should anonymous statements be relied upon? Mr. Irving is pleased to inform his readers that Garcilaso was of noble descent. This is true; but his father's conduct in Peru had thrown a cloud over his own fortunes, and over those of his son. The Inca Garcilaso entered the military service; he held a captain's commission in the war with the Moors; he served under Don John in the decisive sea-fight at Lepanto. He soon after left the army, and would fain have pressed a claim which he held against the crown, were it not that his father had lost caste, and, as he himself writes, he being too poor and too much in debt to appear at court, was forced to withdraw into an obscure solitude. But this solitude selected for his hermitage proved to be the charming city of Cordova. His poverty may be estimated when it is known he left a respectable amount by his will to purchase masses for his soul. While residing in Cordova he devoted himself to literary pursuits, producing several works, the most noted of which was his "Royal Commentaries on the Origin of the Incas." His situation, observes Mr. Prescott in the "Conquest of Peru," opened to him the very best sources of information, but the good fortune is more than counterbalanced by the defects in his own character as a historian, from his desire to magnify and mystify everything, and he is an indifferent authority. Yet Mr. Prescott further observes that his remarkable version has something in it so pleasing to the imagination that it has found favor with a majority of readers. The same author writes that his work is the source of most of the facts—and falsehoods—that have obtained circulation in respect to the ancient Peruvians. Dr. Robertson, in his "History of America," treats the "Royal Commentaries" with polite consideration and contempt. More recent commentators have been, if possible, less respectful. While, therefore, Mr. Irving may be permitted to admire Garcilaso as a writer, it is not as a writer of history. Fiction was his forte. There he may meet with many rivals, but with very few of greater or more questionable fame. The royal prefix of Inca to his name renders his romance attractive to all in search of the marvellous, but people who want facts must let him alone.

A Book about Boys. By A. R. Hope, author of "A Book about Dominies." (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1868.)—With the exception of the preface, which is in singularly bad taste, Mr. Hope's "Book about Boys" is cleverly written and very readable, and seems to us to teach sound doctrine on the subjects it discusses—the nature of boys, namely, and the proper treatment of them by their instructors. Mr. Hope himself, so far as he can be judged from the opinions he professes and the way in which he expresses them, is a very fair specimen of a boy—a boy who has grown old and acquired much classical lore, without losing the heartiness and simplicity and the fondness for wit of an obvious kind which pertain to his species in a more uncultivated and more youthful state. We find him always sensible and amusing, but the latter quality is perhaps most apparent when, in his character of literary critic, he reviews, from the boy's stand-point, certain recent novelists who have undertaken to delineate boys. Mrs. Henry Wood, whom he describes as a "manufacturer of sensation novels in a peculiar language based upon English," comes in for heavy denunciations and much scorn apropos of a novel called "Orville College Boys," to which he gives more importance than probably anybody else, except the more unintelligent frequenters of circulating libraries, accords to it. Thackeray he finds a very good "lay dabbler in boys," and Dickens and Bulwer Lytton receive some slight praise. George Eliot seems to him, however, the only writer who has done anything like justice to boys. "Would," he exclaims, "that 'George Eliot' had broken off the story called 'The Mill on the Floss,' beautiful though it is, in the first volume, sent the hero to a good school, after a little preparation by the Reverend Mr. Stelling, and earned the eternal gratitude of the world by the publication of 'Tom Tulliver's School Days.' To think of such talents being wasted on the desert air of circulating libraries!" "Boys," he says again, "are pearls not to be scattered promiscuously before——novel-reading young ladies."

The book might, it seems to us, be read with pleasure by most people, and with much profit by some of our own teachers who have lately taken to discussing the matter of education as though it were simply a question of how much and what kind of mental food shall be administered to young people.

Ticknor & Fields's and Appletons' Almanacs for Eighteen Hundred and Sixty-nine. (Boston and New York. 1868.)—The Atlantic Almanac for 1869 is out a quarter of a year ahead of date. There is much within its gorgeous covers that will bear reading now and reading again when the months shall have caught up with it. Is Mr. Lowell's sweet humor ever more delightfully manifested than when he talks about his feathered and foliaged favorites? We think not, and—confessing a consistent love for everything that Lowell has written these ten years past—do most ardently desire that he would write more about the country, take us more into his confidence concerning his strolls about Cambridge and its neighborhood. We would rather hear him discuss the question whether Boston and New York "measure-worms" are the same beast than wander with another naturalist through the Swiss Family Robinson's Island. And in the present article we read of White—Selborne White—and his studies, his tortoise, his naïveté and devotion; we read of the birds of Cambridge, the red-breasted, big thrush who pulls up earth-worms like roots out of the lawn, vexes drowsy heads on summer mornings with the very "earliest pipe of half-awakened birds"—earlier than the barnyard cock or the vigorous baby—and is misnamed robin; of blue-birds and blue jays, orioles and red squirrels; of the cat-bird, a delightful singer, who sometimes, though Mr. Lowell does n't mention the fact, miaus half the morning to prove his feline nature and claim his feline name; of the crow, "comical as a lover" trying "to soften his croak to the proper St. Preux standard," like "a Mississippi boatman quoting Tennyson."

In another place Mr. Lowell has said:

> "I don't like the cat'logue style (do you?)
> As if to sell all Nature by vendue."

But the catalogue style is good in catalogues. Mr. Thomas M. Brewer has been obliged to adopt it, not too exaggeratedly, in his paper on the song-birds of America. This is one of those essays, not too entertaining to the general and railroad reader, which are stuffed with information, if only one had time to digest it and make notes of it. We can promise, however, to forget no word about Sprague's skylark, of whom Mr. Brewer tells us more than we have learned from other sources. These two papers, with Mr. Sprague's plea for the common garden flowers, and the good talk about sheep in the editor's "Brookside," give the Almanac a flavor of the country which is good now in warm October days, and will be good by contrast when we begin to use the book as an almanac for 1869.

Mrs. Stowe endeavors to answer the question, "What pictures shall we hang on our walls?" but the result can hardly be called satisfactory. Her mode of judging pictures, as may be learned from the following quotation, is indeed one which, if sound, renders all criticism and all instruction to picture-viewers and picture-buyers unnecessary. The italics are ours:

"It takes very little artistic skill or sense to judge whether a stalk of blue gentian is faithfully painted, or the copy of a bundle of apple-blossoms is true to the model of its great original. A host of such simple, inexpensive ornaments are given by Prang in his lithography."

Dr. Holmes contributes a long article upon the human body and the care of it—interesting as such articles cannot help being. A clever lecturer and schoolmaster said to us once, apropos of lectures on geology, "It must be a poor creature who doesn't send away his audience half a foot taller—in feeling." And the human organization is at the least as awful and inspiring a theme as the geological non-organization of the earth. But we do not mean to deny to Dr. Holmes the credit of having written a valuable dissertation; the discussion of the weather-proof and ultra-hardy nature of women (pp. 53 and 56), as compared with the feeble sensitiveness of man, is worth by itself the price of the book, as it is fashionable to say.

The editor has several short articles, pleasantly chatty. Dr. Thompson has a good and sensible article on the disposition of young men to crowd into the city. Mr. Quincy rather statistically and in a tabular form displays the wealth of the great central region of our land. The poetry is by Mr.

George Cooper and Mr. C. P. Cranch. "The Summer Rain" of the former is in three four-lined stanzas, not without pleasant sequence of words and pleasant chime of syllables. Mr. Cranch's poem is of more importance, and seems to us—as much of Mr. Cranch's verse seems to us—possessed of some of the higher qualities of poetry. But we do not like

"Mysterious forces overawe,
Absorb, suspend the natural law."

For, in the first place, they do not overawe or absorb or suspend natural law; and, in the second place, the inaccurate statement is prosaically made.

The illustrations of the Almanac are excessively commonplace. It is refreshing to turn over and find among the advertisements Mr. Hennessy's thoughtful and well-designed picture, given as a sample of the forthcoming edition of "Locksley Hall."

Appletons' Almanac for 1869 is made up, more like almanacs in general, of pictures and short descriptions thereof. The pictures are taken, almost or quite all, from English designs. Their merit is a good way in advance of those in the Atlantic Almanac, and the pictures of game birds are especially spirited.

Plain Thoughts on the Art of Living. Designed for Young Men and Women. By Washington Gladden. (Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1868.)—Mr. Gladden discourses in a sufficiently commonplace manner on certain subjects which appear to make constant demands on the time and attention of many of the minor moralists, but which do not, so far as we are able to judge, yield very valuable returns to any one whatever. Least of all, we should say, did the readers of the Springfield Republican, who may be supposed to have profited by the counsels of Titcomb, and to whom the "Letters to the Joneses," and "Gold-Foil," and "Miss Gilbert's Career" must be tolerably familiar, need further enlightenment of the kind Mr. Gladden is competent to offer on "Work for Women," "Dress," "Mind Culture," and so on. On these topics no new ideas are presented, and the old ones, or some of them, are put before us in a style which cannot be spoken of as enlivening.

His lines are well balanced and read harmoniously. There are some passages worth remembering in each poem; and throughout the whole there is much freedom of expression, and a reflective tone that will favorably impress the lover of sensible verses; . . . . lines that seem like proverbs, full of sound sense, good feeling, and agreeable philosophy."

The Week.

THE official figures having not all come in, the exact majorities in the October elections cannot be given, but it is plain that the Republicans have carried Ohio by something like 17,000, Pennsylvania by about 10,000, Nebraska by about 2,000, and Indiana by a little less than 1,000. By rights, these majorities ought to read 22,000, 20,000, 2,000, and 8,000 or more. It is difficult for an outsider to form an idea of the struggle through which the Pennsylvania Republicans have had to pass. Seymour was to be elected in Pennsylvania, and all the resources of the Democracy of the Atlantic States were poured into Philadelphia, just as those of the Western and Southern Democracy were poured into Southern Indiana. It was intended that Philadelphia should give the Democrats a majority of 8,000 votes, and that, it was thought, would give the State to Seymour. This struggle, fortunately, leaves the Republicans in the State far better organized than it found them—indeed, than they ever were before. The victory gives them the United States senatorship, which Mr. Buckalew now holds. The lost Congressional districts will perhaps be regained, on account of the fraudulent votes cast. The two city districts, at all events, ought, we should think, to be recovered; and Mr. John Covode has announced his intention to contest the representation of the Twenty-first District. In Ohio, the senatorship was lost last year; this year three Congressional districts have been lost and one gained. But Mr. Ashley is as well out of Congress as in it; and it is a great comfort that the "working-man's candidate," Mr. S. F. Cary, whom the working-men graphically describe as "a fraud," gives up his seat to an honest Republican. General Morgan's victory over his Republican competitor in the Columbus District is a misfortune, both on account of the man it puts in and the man it keeps out. General Morgan is one of the sort of men—like Mr. James Brooks, Mr. S. S. Cox, Mr. Mungen, and other "leaders"—whose worthlessness in opposition has been as injurious to the Republican party as it has been discreditable to their own. Indiana will send a Republican senator to take Mr. Hendricks's place, so the prize for which he entered the contest, and for the gaining of which so much money was spent and so much cheating done, has eluded him. And there is hardly a doubt that Mr. Daniel Voorhees will be unseated. It was only by cheating that he was returned; and it is a shame that, after having been expelled the House for disloyalty, he should be able to go back and stay even long enough to be turned out for fraud. Wisconsin, also, will very soon consign Mr. Doolittle to private life; and, what with his substitute and Mr. Buckingham, from Connecticut, in place of Mr. Dixon, the party will console itself for Mr. Wade's retirement. Luckily, the Senate can "get along" with a smaller number of Democrats than the House ought to have, or it would almost seem as if Republicans there were going to be too numerous. Still, the next four years have much in store, and all the party has may be needed.

The South has lately been more obstreperous than ever, to judge by the news received within the week; and especially we have to notice more single assassinations of prominent Republicans than at any time since any Republicans have been there. In Saint Mary's Parish, Louisiana, the Sheriff was shot in his hotel on the night of Friday last. A patrol which was organized as soon as possible after the event went through the town, and in one of its streets found the body of the Parish Judge stretched out on the ground. Several persons were engaged in the killing, but there were no arrests. Both the murdered men were Republicans. "A bogus judge and sheriff killed in Louisiana," is the World's description of the affair. This is almost being an accessory after the fact. On the following night the office of the Register, a paper published at Attakapas, in the same parish, was sacked by a mob, and the editor and printers were obliged to take their leave for New Orleans. "The negroes," our Democratic friends will learn with regret—the Associated Press says so—"are making very bold threats," and they will probably have to have some more printing offices burned about their ears. The St. Landry massacre, by the way, seems to have resulted in the killing of more than one hundred negroes. While we are in this military district of our American Poland, it is as well to look for a moment at the case of a former satrap who has been trying to do business in Marion County, Texas. On the 11th of the month news came to Galveston of the murder of the Honorable G. W. Smith, a Republican delegate to the convention. He had been speaking to an audience of his constituents, and on leaving the meeting was fired upon. He appears to have returned the fire—which is the more likely as he was a Union captain during the war—and retreated to the quarters of a small detachment of United States troops. These the attacking party disarmed, their commander apparently being cowardly or most inefficient, and then Smith was literally riddled with bullets. Buchanan and Hancock together have made Texas a fine place of residence for men not rebels. The massacre at Millican, done in August last, is said to be as yet not reported upon by any United States officer.

On to-day week, at Pine Bluff, in Arkansas, the Deputy Sheriff of Drew County, a Republican, was tied to a negro and both were killed at one shot. "A carpet-bag deputy slain in Arkansas," the World says in reference to this case. The arms which we spoke of as being at Memphis, on their way to Arkansas, were the property of Governor Clayton and Senator McDonald, and were to have been sold to the State for the militia. A steamer was at last procured to take them from Memphis, but before she was far from the city she was captured by a tugboat load of masked men and the guns were thrown into the river. The innocence of the Associated Press reporter was almost too much for him when he transmitted this intelligence and news of the governor's action after the piracy. "Prominent officials," he says, say that they cannot quite comprehend the governor's telegram to Schofield, in which he says that he is satisfied armed resistance to the laws is contemplated in Arkansas. The officials "do not understand why he should entertain such fears, as he himself states that the arms were thrown overboard by the captors." It is hard to understand; especially as the gentlemen who took the Hesper are notoriously ignorant of the use of fire-arms and captured both her and the tugboat by moral suasion, in the employment of which agency the older residents of Arkansas have reached great excellence. The governor will nevertheless need troops. Many of the Republicans who are in office, or have otherwise made themselves conspicuous marks, are fleeing into Missouri.

In the Carolinas there are two partisan murders reported as having occurred within the week. On the afternoon of Friday, in broad daylight, a colored Senator standing on the platform of a railroad car, in Abbeville District, was killed by three men, who coolly rode up to the train and shot him. "The murderers were not recognized." In the same district a white member of the House of Representatives was killed by a disguised party, who shot him in his carriage as he was approaching his home. He was what is called a "scallawag"—being a native Southerner, and not Democratic in his political opinions. North Carolina has as yet had no murders; but the governor is apprehensive of violent outbreaks on the 3d of November, and has seen fit to issue his proclamation, in which he declares "that weapons of an extraordinary character"—repeating rifles—"are imported into the State by political organizations, and distributed in a secret manner among persons whose spokesmen deny the authority of the existing government, and who publicly declare that all government, to be authoritative and binding, must proceed alone from one race of our people." General Miles, the Vandal guard of Mr. Jefferson Davis at Fortress Monroe, is in command in North Carolina, and he has so disposed the too few troops under his orders that very likely Governor Holden's apprehensions will not be justified by any disturbances. Indeed, the bold tone of his proclamation, which, as a state document, does credit to his literary abilities, is confirmatory proof of the encouraging testimony concerning North Carolina affairs which we have borne on more than one occasion. Evidently, the governor has at his back a good many white men of like mind with himself; and we expect that there will be a tolerably easy Republican victory in North Carolina, and that in the whole State there will not be three such murders as have been done by the hundred in the rest of the South.

Mr. Motley delivered, on Tuesday evening, the opening lecture at the Fraternity Course in Boston, testifying, in his first words, the depth of his sympathy for the Republican cause, and his sense of responsibility as a citizen to do all in his power to lend it success. His address was a peculiarly able and eloquent presentation of the issues now at stake, and rich, as might have been expected, in historical illustrations. Especially admirable were his remarks on State sovereignty and centralization, and on the oppressiveness of reconstruction, while with great weight he set forth the arguments against repudiation in any shape. The summary of the character of General Grant, with which he closed, was full of feeling of a sort not generally found in campaign speeches, and such as Mr. Beecher is generally master of, though in this respect he disappointed his hearers at the Brooklyn Academy the other night. Mr. Motley's speech appears to have been printed, and we hope that it will have a very wide circulation.

What General Blair's programme is, if he should be elected, we were informed by his "manly but infelicitous" utterance in the Brodhead letter. The present governments in every Southern State were to be overthrown by violence, and the President was to be a passive witness of the new revolution, if not an active participator. He has recently made another equally manly and equally felicitous utterance in one of his numerous St. Louis speeches. This time he tells us what the Democratic party is going to do in case it does n't succeed. The Radical candidate, General Grant, is never to be allowed to leave the White House alive. We paid no attention to this threat when news of it came by telegraph, but it is now given by the St. Louis papers in their report of the speech. The Brodhead letter was written soberly, in cold blood, and, as we suppose, by a colder blooded man than General Blair; but we doubt if there is not more to be feared from the threatenings of the harangue. Southern hearts can be fired individually as well as collectively, and talk like this of Blair's is wickedly dangerous.

One of the most singular political movements ever set on foot in this country has during the week been suggested by the World. So far as is now apparent on the surface, the thought of changing the Democratic candidates was first conceived by Mr. "Wash. McLean" and some of the other Pendleton leaders in Ohio. It is entirely worthy of the gentlemen whom the Democratic party has latterly been obliged to accept as leaders—wire-pullers dignified with the name of statesmen, and so destitute of the first element of political good sense, in a country where the people rule, that there is hardly one of them who for the last dozen years has, at any time, guessed what the people thought and how they were feeling. It would of course have been a ridiculous attitude for the party to put itself in—that of deserting its chosen standard-bearers, finding new ones, nominating them, reconciling the jarring sections of the Democracy to the informally selected substitutes—and doing it all within twenty days of the day of election. The proposal was so fatuous that it is no wonder if people have ever since been looking about for some hidden reason which induced the World to make it. But having heard that in reality it came originally from the able men who thought Seymour and Blair could carry the country, nobody will think it necessary to look hard for occult reasons. The eagerness, however, with which the World and the inner ring of New York politicians caught up the idea and urged it on the attention of the party is a matter for curious consideration. The explanations that have been given are various, but a probable opinion is, that all hope of electing their Presidential candidates having been lost, our Democratic politicians resolved to take some means of impressing the New York rank and file with the necessity of trading Seymour votes for Republican votes for Hoffman and Assemblymen. The Assemblymen are, of course, to send a Democratic Senator to Congress in place of Morgan or Fenton; Hoffman is to remove the Tammany ring to Albany; and the State is to be blessed with a government like that of this city. If this explanation seems too far-fetched, it will seem so only to people ignorant of the political intriguing for which New York has always been notorious. We ourselves do not quite accept it. The selling out of Seymour, or we are much mistaken, began before the October elections, and was contemplated, if not determined upon, before he was put in nomination. However that may be, the articles in question have had something of the effect we have spoken of. Furthermore, they must have given the World managers a delightful experience of the "I told you so" feeling. Last summer the World worked hard for Chase and a progressive platform, and was severely snubbed for doing so. Now it has retorted upon its revilers; and not idly either, for it cannot be otherwise than that so frank a confession of defeat as it made in advising a change of base will do something to force the conviction on the party mind that the World's and not Vallandigham's wing of the party must rule. Republicans may properly rejoice at the whole affair, and that for a dozen reasons. One is, that it is something gained for honesty in politics if the Democracy throughout this and other States can be made to hate and disregard the treacherous Democratic managers of this city and Albany.

What effect all this manœuvring will have on the result in this State, it is hard to say. We are much inclined to think that it will have none, or little; that Griswold as well as Grant will defeat his opponent; and that neither Mr. Tilden nor Mr. Church nor Mr. Sweeney will go to Washington. Even if the prospect were not so good of giving Grant at any rate a tolerable majority in this State, even if Seymour gets the vote of every Democrat, there is not the least reason why Republicans should bargain. Grant has no need of our thirty-three electoral votes. What the Republican party in this State ought to desire above all things is the defeat of the Tammany candidate for governor; it is of vastly more importance than carrying the State for Grant. Meantime, the legitimate work of the campaign goes on with the utmost activity; the stump speakers are in great force, and processions and oratory are the nightly occupation of the citizens; the party headquarters are full of clerks mailing documents by the thousand; the American landscape which has people and has not a flag visible, must be rarely seen. The weekly number of meetings is some hundreds, and many of the speakers are very clever. General Sharpe, for example, puts to shame most of our experienced speech-makers. Governor Seymour is himself going to take the stump and formally become what some of the irreverent have called him—"the tail to Hoffman's kite." Elsewhere throughout the country, even where the October fighting was done, there is much ardor, but it is nowhere hotter than in the Fifth Massachusetts District, where the Democrats—the Democrat of that district is a being decidedly different from the "copperhead" or the New York naturalized variety—have nominated Judge Otis Lord, and are not going to vote for Mr. Dana. Mr. Dana is stumping the county, and so is General Gordon, who made Butler's acquaintance in war times, and feels that affection for him which animates the breasts of all the good officers with whom he ever came in contact. His speeches are very remarkably plain spoken. It is calculated that if a vote were taken to-day the poll would stand 3,500 for Lord, 3,500 for Dana, and 6,500 for Butler. But Mr. Richard Spofford and other leading Democrats are out in favor of their old ally, and it is improbable, we should suppose, that the vote for Lord will reach so high a figure as 3,500. The struggle is a very severe one; but however it may turn out, the more intelligent and respectable section of the Republican party will have the satisfaction of knowing that they have washed themselves clean of General Butler, and will be no longer responsible for any injury he may do the party, or any disgrace he may bring upon the national good name. By the way, the present devices of some of his friends are quite worthy of himself. The Boston Commonwealth—calling in again, if we are not mistaken, the "reasoner" whom it employed in the impeachment business—recently made an attack on Mr. Dana for having, when in England, written a letter, "which made every Tory rejoice and every Liberal sick at heart," against the extension of the right of suffrage to more men than at that time possessed it. This charge the Transcript shows to be sheer fabrication. Mr. Dana being asked for information as to the working of the two systems of balloting, that of voting with the sealed envelope or with the folded ballot, gave the information desired, and probably made very few Liberals very sick. Mr. Buffinton, implicated in the purchase of an appointment in the revenue service, is, we are sorry to see, nominated in the New Bedford District in the face of strenuous opposition.

An advertising apothecary, Mr. Helmbold, of this city, recently wrote a letter to match that which Judge Edwards Pierrepont recently wrote to Mr. A. T. Stewart, when he placed his check for $20,000 in Mr. Stewart's hands to be used by the friends of Grant for campaigning purposes. Mr. Helmbold, in his epistle, laid down the Democratic political creed, as Judge Pierrepont had previously laid down, with reasonable accuracy, the creed of the Republican party. The person to whom his communication was addressed is a member of a firm doing business up-town. It will hardly be believed, but the Tribune actually advises its readers—as if it were the Montgomery Mail, or the Independent Monitor, or the Atlanta Era, or the Petersburg Index, or a journal published at Richmond, on the James—to refrain from giving their custom to the firm in question. We hardly know what to say to this.

George Francis Train is among the latest adherents of Grant, as the "American People" are told in an address of which the Cable newsmonger has seen fit to telegraph a summary. He has discovered in the Democratic party a friendliness to England which is enough to drive every Irishman from the ranks; and for his part, if he is to contest the election of Morrissey, he insists on being an independent candidate. We doubt if his ambition would have satisfied itself with this humble leadership if he had had access to the World's files during the past week. The horrible destitution of Presidential candidates foreshadowed by that paper after the fall elections, would have inspired Train to quite another manifesto. The hardships of his imprisonment, however, ought not to be aggravated by his ignorance of what is going on in this country. It may be still not too late to drop Seymour for Train. The hard-hearted creditors who will not, as he says, let him out of jail till he is elected member of Congress, would certainly be thrown into consternation on finding that they had a President of the United States under lock and key in a British dungeon. His chances of release would be vastly improved by this higher nomination, and if he is wise he will telegraph a willingness to take Seymour's place—or Blair's. Blair has as good a chance as Seymour really; his becoming President has been admitted as probable even by the Seymour press of this State.

The Pall Mall Gazette, in reviewing the statistics of Irish emigration to this country, finds evidence, in the diminished numbers, of increasing prosperity among the Irish people, and looks to the time when wages will be so nearly equalized on both sides of the water that emigration from Ireland will cease entirely. Even now the returning emigrants amount to from a quarter to a third of the outgoing. Cessation, the Gazette thinks, will inevitably cause a great delay in the material progress of the United States, unless the Germans and other European peoples supply the place of the Irish. No one can doubt that this substitution will take place to an even greater extent than has already been the case since the German stream, for instance, began to surpass the Irish in volume; and, as we write, we learn of a vigorous effort which is making to put the Baltic population, and that of the provinces lying to the south and east, in direct steam communication with New York, by making a railroad centre of Stettin and using Swinemünde as a port of departure. Moreover, the emigrants of the future are to be still more largely agricultural than ever, when the South as well as the West is fairly opened to colonization. The Irish having served comparatively little as pioneers and cultivators, they will not be missed from this company, while their peculiar work on railroads and canals, and other simply laborious offices, will apparently be in time monopolized by the Chinese, keeping pace with the advance of the Pacific Railroad. How much the new treaty will accomplish for us on this side depends a good deal on the temper of the Californians and their submission to paper stipulations. Once admitted, however, the Chinese will not stop west of the Sierra Nevada. We shall be greatly surprised if they do not ultimately congregate in this city in considerable numbers; and they may contribute a satisfactory solution to the "servant-gal" question.

There are a good many reasons why the Spanish revolution may not result, as could be wished, in a liberal and stable form of government, and why speculations on this subject should be indulged in with caution. Supposing, however, that the Junta maintains itself till December 15, the date assigned for the assembling of the Cortes, Spain will have enjoyed in the interval a formally unexceptionable rule. Every decree of the Junta thus far has been, within the limits of possibility, as considerate of human and individual rights as if it were certain that the Cortes would decide in favor of a republic. The week's work of this provisional government has been, if we may trust the Cable, to reopen the free schools, to decree freedom to all children born of slaves hereafter in the colonies, to provide for conforming the national coinage to that of France, and to appoint, among other officials, a Minister to England. These and the acts which preceded them are well worth, if only to be put on paper, the bloodless revolution which has procured them.

In Italy, of course, the events in Spain have not caused inconsolable grief. The Roman question is now reduced to its lowest terms, and France can no longer share with any other power the odium of maintaining the Pope. Some late discussions, also, on the part of the Italian press, as to whether Italy could afford to make alliances in case of a war between France and Prussia, have become simplified since it is certain that Spain will not add weight to the Emperor's demands for assistance in such a struggle. Italy can with greater security plead its internal affairs as an excuse for neutrality; and that this is no mere pretext, the disorganized condition of many parts of the kingdom, and of the Romagna in particular, too plainly declares. In Ravenna the state of society is scarcely more tolerable than in Texas. Armed bands hold the country in terror, overawe the judges, plunder and murder with impunity; and even in the cities, in broad daylight, assassinations are so frequent that men fear to go about their peaceful avocations. Things have come to such a pass that the Government has sent General Escoffier, with extraordinary authority, civil and military, to break up the gangs and restore the dominion of law. The officials themselves, however, in all parts of the peninsula, are sadly wanting in honesty, and above all in independence of politics. Through them the secrets of the Government are constantly betrayed to the opposition, with the natural result of embittering party strife and preventing any ministry from doing its best to reform and govern the state. Neither prefects nor police are exempt from this practical disobedience and lawlessness.

THE OCTOBER CAMPAIGN.

Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana have united their voices with those of Vermont and Maine, in pronouncing the condemnation of the Democratic party. The struggle was more evenly matched than in the far Northern States, and the majorities are not so overwhelming. But they are large enough. They make the general result in November absolutely certain. Not only so, but they secure to the Republican candidates a clear majority of all the electoral votes, without counting the vote of a single reconstructed State in their favor. The whole number of electoral votes, if all the States were restored, would be 317. Only 294 will, however, be cast. General Grant is now secure of 152 votes from the States which never were claimed for the Southern Confederacy, without counting New York in his favor. He is also morally certain to carry Missouri and West Virginia, which will give him 168 votes of indisputable validity. In addition to these he will receive the votes of several reconstructed States, and is quite as likely as anybody else to carry New York and California, in which case Mr. Seymour will receive less than fifty electoral votes. In any event, he cannot possibly get more than ninety.

Although this result has been long foreseen by those who have studied the subject with impartiality, and the figures are exactly the same as those which we gave last June, yet the facts are so remarkable as to excite some wonder in minds which have from the first anticipated them. The Republican party will, next November, have carried three successive Presidential elections, by steadily increasing popular majorities. It will have carried a majority of the Northern States for its Presidential candidates four times in succession. It will have had a popular majority in the North at every annual election for eleven years, with only one exception.

Such a continuous series of victories is a marvellous thing. Public opinion undergoes even more rapid changes now than in former days. Indeed, the doctrines of the Republican party have changed greatly in some respects. Yet, amid all these changes, and with the heavy disadvantage of an enormous foreign immigration constantly making votes against it—and this is a fact not sufficiently considered—the party has maintained a hold upon the confidence of the people which is without any parallel in the last forty years.

The principal cause of this popular steadfastness may be found in the extraordinary obtuseness and wickedness of the Democratic party—qualities of which it has made even more than its usual display this year. Its obtuseness was illustrated by the nomination of Seymour—its wickedness and obtuseness both by that of Blair: the former proving that it could not get out of its old rut, even to save its life; and the latter showing that the only new allies that were welcome to its camp were those who came with more ferocity of spirit than was possessed even by the old line soldiers. Having thus opened the campaign by throwing away all chance of success in a fair fight, the party managers undertook to maintain their reputation for wickedness, as well as to recover their lost ground, by an organized and widespread system of fraud. In Pennsylvania they manufactured citizens by the thousand, under pretended forms of law, but really in open disregard of the law; and fearing lest these should not suffice, they forged unknown numbers of naturalization certificates. In Indiana, where the law affords most unwise facilities for such operations, they colonized voters from Kentucky in numbers which sufficed to carry two Congressional districts, and very nearly carried the State.

No one seems able to devise the means of punishing or fully preventing these monstrous frauds. The public conscience is not awake to their true character, and respectable men do not treat a political forger as they do the forger of a note. Unfortunately, all parties are more or less guilty in this respect. The Republicans cheated badly in Indiana in 1864, excusing themselves on the ground that their opponents were engaged in treasonable conspiracies. The Democrats, of course, have an excuse equally satisfactory to themselves. But, beyond all question, they do the most cheating, and their preponderance of sin brings its punishment in the loss of nearly enough votes among honorable men to make up for all that they gain by fraud. Moreover, men who uniformly cheat their political opponents are absolutely sure to cheat among themselves; and the notoriety of the Democratic party for the fraudulent character of its internal management has much to do with its present depressed condition.

How depressed that condition is, we have all been made aware by the extraordinary proposition of a change in the candidates of the party. This suggestion, although not adopted, has received a degree of attention that would never have been given to it if the party had not despaired of success. The Republican majority in Pennsylvania is not very large, while that in Indiana is extremely small; yet no sensible Democrat dreams of overcoming either in November. The Democracy has obviously lost all hope of further gains; it has exhausted its utmost strength, and no longer dreams of victory outside of New York and New Jersey. Of course no change can now be made either in the ticket or the platform. Rhetorically, it is well to praise "audacity," but when one-third of an army secretly longs for an excuse to desert, a change of flag or leader in the face of the enemy is a fatal experiment. The Democratic managers want to keep their party together for another struggle, although in this they foresee inevitable defeat.

The Republicans lose seven members of Congress, and these losses, added to those which are certain to be sustained in November, particularly in the Southern States, make it probable that the party will not have quite two-thirds of the next House of Representatives. While regretting the loss of some faithful members, we are not dissatisfied with the general result. The majority in Congress has been too large for its own good. It has had the power of suspending the rules and shutting off debate, whenever it was disposed, and it has exercised this power far too often for the welfare of the country and of the party. The majority in the next House, even if it numbers two-thirds, will be unable to muster such a vote without the unanimous concurrence of the party; and the moderate members will thus be able to hold their more incautious associates in check.

Indeed, the comparative smallness of the majorities by which the fate of this campaign has been decided is not a matter of great regret. We should have been more sorry than we can well express if the majorities had been the other way; but we think they are about as large as a far-seeing friend of republicanism could desire. The result actually attained will secure all the substantial fruits of the most sweeping victory, while it will also, we believe, impress upon the party counsels that moderation and patience which, far more than any temporary majorities, secure permanent and satisfactory triumphs.

NAMES IN POLITICS.

As we have more than once said, the contest in the Fifth Massachusetts district is not one of simply local interest. There is hardly a paper in the country which has not discussed it. There is not a decent or intelligent man in the country who is not watching it with anxiety. The reasons of this are obvious. In the first place, it affords an excellent test of the value attached to the character of public men by the party laying strongest claims to purity and morality; for here is the most disreputable politician of the party seeking the suffrages of one of its most intelligent, moral, and "pure-blooded" constituencies—meaning by "pure-blooded," let us repeat for the benefit of dunces, constituencies in which the original Puritan population, with its peculiar religious and social training, has suffered least from the intermixture of ignorant foreign immigrants with no training whatever. In the next place, it affords a test of the extent to which the worst men of the party have succeeded in indoctrinating the Republicans with Democratic notions of the nature of party discipline. The theories of the obligations imposed by this discipline, which were propounded by the wilder men at the time of the impeachment, naturally alarmed and disgusted most of those who believe that if you take from the Republican party its respect for the individual conscience and understanding of its members, and for rules of morality, you deprive it not only of all value, but of all reason for existing; and it led a great many to fear that the organization was moving rapidly along the broad and dirty road of unscrupulousness which has brought the Democratic party to its present deplorable condition. When moral reformers began to sneer at the "consciences" of the most highly respectable men, and to talk of respect for oaths as "cant," it seemed a sure sign to many that there was something rotten in the organization.

The failure of the attempt to cow the seven senators into submission, and the firm support these gentlemen received from the better portion of the press, and the rapid return of the party to a healthy and rational state of mind about impeachment, showed, however, that there was more alarm than was necessary, and that the reign of pure and unblushing unscrupulousness was not so near as it seemed. The defeat of Barnum in Connecticut, and the amount of "scratching" and "bolting" done in other parts of the country in the same year, proved, too, that there were plenty of Republicans everywhere determined to resist to the last any attempt to introduce into the party the Democratic doctrine as to the supremacy of caucuses. The New York Tribune preached that doctrine in all its nakedness with regard to Barnum; but three months later, seeing how the public felt, repudiated it boldly.

In Butler's case, his supporters are evidently trying to revive it. The "regularity of his nomination" is put forward as one of his claims to support with a confidence worthy of General John Cochrane, who said, when in the Democratic fold, that if the devil got "the regular nomination" he would vote for him, as if anything in politics could be "regular" which was not decent, which was not moral, and in which the right of virtue and intelligence to rule the world was not recognized! What makes it all the more remarkable is, that it is now put forward by men who have been professed moralists, who used to weigh cases of conscience, who act as if they believed that the moral law, unlike the common law, thought nothing too minute for its attention, and as if there were no "duties of imperfect obligation." Moreover, Butler's open disregard of party discipline—in his attempt to tax the bonds, his combining with the Democrats to endanger the public credit, postpone or make impossible the funding of the debt at a low rate of interest, and seduce the nation into an open fraud of the most despicable character—is treated as a mere bagatelle by men who treated the professions of respect for the obligation of an oath, uttered by the minority of the Republican senators in the impeachment trial, as mere cant and humbug, and the obligation itself as utterly insignificant compared with the obligations of party discipline. For several weeks Trumbull and Fessenden were spoken of as if they were a pair of hypocrites who had robbed a till, and defended the theft by alleging their desire to bestow the money in charity.

Another device is being resorted to for General Butler's assistance which is more dangerous, because more insidious, than the "regular ticket" plea. He is being cried up as a genuine "Radical," and his opponent as a mere "Conservative." Curiously enough, however, this too is borrowed from Democratic tactics. It is simply an attempt to practise on New Englanders the kind of deception involved in making names play the part of ideas, which the Democratic leaders have so long practised successfully on the Irish. There is no magic in the term "Radical" any more than in the term "Democratic." Both may be made to cover men and principles of the worst kind. There are Radical asses just as well as Radical sages. There are times when it is good to be a "Radical"—that is, a tearer up by the roots; and there are times when it is good to be a Conservative—that is, an advocate of preservation or construction. A man who persists in being always Radical, under all circumstances—and there are times when that may be to insist on pulling his cabbages up every day to see how they are growing—a man who insists on always destroying, and on looking upon all construction, or all respect or love for the thing that is, with suspicion, is a man for whom the politics of reasonable people has no place, and whom perseverance in his course may eventually bring to the lunatic asylum. Sensible citizens of a free and intelligent community do not ask about a candidate, "Is he Democratic or is he Radical?" but "Is he honest, is he pure, is he above reproach, is he able, is he eloquent, has he been a consistent and faithful supporter of certain principles?" They do not ask about a measure, "Is it a Radical measure or is it a Conservative measure?" because experience has a thousand times shown them that a measure may be "Radical," and yet be an unmistakable mixture of folly and rascality, or it may be Conservative, and be the product of both wisdom, knowledge, and discretion. For instance, the Butler plan of paying off the public debt in greenbacks, or fraudulently reducing the interest promised by the nation to the public creditor, is considered by him and many of his supporters in the Fifth District a "Radical" plan, because some Radicals preach it; but in reality, as Mr. Mill pointed out in the letter we published last week, it is an old feudal plan, hoary with age. The really novel radical, democratic idea is that the nation should keep its promises to the last cent, sink or swim, live or die. Mr. Dana, however, the "Conservative," advocates the latter; Mr. Benjamin Butler, the great "Radical," advocates the other. In short, sensible men who want to see the country well governed do not concern themselves with words but with things, and above all do not allow what Bentham called "question-begging words"—that is, words in the mere utterance of which everything in dispute is assumed—to take the place of argument, or to cover up the facts.

Moreover, it is high time that those who are fond of using the word "Radical" as a spell should explain to the public what they now mean by it. They clearly cannot mean what they meant three years ago. Three years ago, a "Radical" was a person who held that conditions ought to be imposed on the South; that it belonged to Congress to prescribe these conditions; and that, amongst them, the abolition of all political discriminations based on color should be included. To be sure, Radicals differed as to the importance they attached to each of these points. Some were most concerned about the negro, others about the Union; but that the interval which separated them was not very great may be conjectured from the fact that so long ago as 1865, so fierce a Radical as the late Mr. George L. Stearns expressed not only his willingness but his desire "to sink the negro in the general question," that is, to give up treating the blacks as a class or party, and treat their interests as simply part and parcel of the general interests of the community. Now all these points have been carried. Conditions which the country has pronounced satisfactory have been imposed on the South; Congress has imposed them, and the blacks have been admitted to the suffrage. We hold that any man who assisted in bringing about this result, who rejoices in it, and who, on this basis —the basis of equal rights, of liberty, and of security—wishes to see the country pursue the path of a national progress, governed by its virtue, its intelligence, its reason, and by the experience of the human race, is still a Radical, in so far as radical means anything that is either good or useful. But in the mouths of a great many of those who now call themselves Radical, and put the name forward as their great title to confidence, it has ceased to mean anything either good or useful. They have made it a synonym for violence, for extravagance, for perturbation and disorder, for scorn of the human understanding, for disdain of the light of history, and the teachings of science, and the slow, safe processes of law. In the impeachment time they made it a synonym for indecency and slander and scorn of individual independence. In the case of General Butler they are trying to make it cover disregard of the character of public men, disregard of the plighted faith of the nation, and disregard even for party discipline in the very cases in which party discipline acts as a salutary check.

One thing is certain, however, that the Republican party cannot be governed by names; and those who are relying on the influence of names to govern it will sooner or later come to grief. General Butler may be re-elected as a "Radical," but if he should be elected we count on him with perfect confidence to expose the folly of trusting anything to names. He will surely furnish a most striking illustration of their worthlessness as political guides. He will by his own career open the eyes of those whose eyes the career of the Democratic party has not opened, and he will, in Congress and out of it, triumphantly vindicate those who believe as we believe, and proclaim as we proclaim, that there is nothing in a man, be he priest, soldier, or politician, on which his fellow-men can rely but his character; that it is not by what he calls himself, or by his doings in this month or that month, that he is to be judged, but by the whole course and tenor of his life. He will himself show the inherent silliness and vanity of the argument that he ought to be elected "because the Copperheads hate him," as if the Copperheads would not hate any man who bore arms against the rebellion, and as if a man might not have borne arms against the rebellion and yet be morally everything that is detestable. And he will, by being a thorn in the side of the Republican majority in Congress, a fomenter of divisions, of strifes, a lover of chicane and of crooked ways, put those to the blush who think they are "cute" in supporting him and that his election will be the triumph of expediency. At Butler's age men do not change. It is not possible for him to serve faithfully such a party as the Republican party is and ought to be. But we shall not regret his election if his course puts an end, as we trust and believe it will, to the muddle-headed attempts to be "smart" and knowing in politics into which he has succeeded in seducing numbers of really well-meaning and once scrupulous Massachusetts moralists.

THE TRUTH ABOUT RUSSIA.

We confess to having felt considerably relieved when we read the Cable despatch the other day informing us of the narrow escape of the Grand Duke Alexis in the waters of Denmark, as it proved that the previously received announcement that he was about to visit this country was not true, and that the reflecting portion of the community would be spared the humiliation of witnessing another philo-Russian demonstration. Few people of good taste and good sense, who remember the reception of the Prince of Wales, ever want to see another royal personage set foot on our shores; but there are special reasons for deprecating the advent of a Russian prince, inasmuch as he would be received in a manner which would indicate not simply that Americans were hospitable and respected rank, and felt grateful for Russian friendship and support during the late struggle, but that Russian polity deserved and received our admiration. Extraordinary and lavish demonstrations of gratitude and attachment to foreign powers on the part of a nation like this are just as childish and undignified as extraordinary displays of resentment; but if they are ever to be indulged in at all by a free and enlightened people, it ought to be in token not of their appreciation of such cheap civilities as we have received from Russia, or even of such expressions of "sympathy" with us in adversity as she lately offered, but in token of their approval of the principles on which the Government is based, and of the policy of which it is the supporter, and of the nature of the part it plays in the work of progress. Those who think that our cheers even, and our banquets, ought to be made to help the cause of humanity, can therefore find little cause for comfort in our attitude towards Russia. Our adulation of her has already made us an object of pity or ridicule, not to other nations simply —because one might say their dissatisfaction was due to their envy— but to the wisest and best men in the civilized world, and amongst them those who know Russia best and have most faithfully studied her policy and her manners.

Not that we have a word to say against the Russians. There is no denying that they are an extraordinary people—a people of very wonderful natural gifts, whose future, it is to be hoped, will prove worthy of their powers. But they have, as yet, done nothing to merit the esteem of the world, nothing to earn the gratitude of the civilized portion of mankind. Moreover, their growth has long ceased to be organic growth. The additions made to the empire for the last ninety years have been the result of ruthless conquest, conducted with a barbarity and causing an amount of individual suffering for which the annals of no other modern nation can produce a parallel; and what makes the matter all the worse is, that its victories, both in peace and war, have, except in Asia, been the conquests of a lower over a higher civilization. The way in which very good people in America have been bewitched by the emancipation of the serfs is an illustration of that same perversion of the moral judgment and derangement of the sense of moral proportion which has converted a great many Radicals, after long years of labor in the attempt to apply abstract morality to practical politics, into repudiators of the national obligations and admirers of General Butler, or of anybody else like him who takes it into his head to be "sound on the main question," as if any classification of political "questions" could, in the forum of morals, enable a man to use virtues displayed in one field of activity to offset the rascalities committed in nine others. Our abandonment of the Poles, whose struggle for national independence has been one of the glories of the human race, because the Polish nobles did not do for their serfs in the eighteenth century what the Russian nobles only did for theirs—and that under compulsion—in the latter half of the nineteenth, is and must always remain a shameful incident in American history. Luckily it is only an incident, and it is one for which the reflecting portion of the community are not responsible, and at which the whole community will, we feel assured, one day feel mortified. Nobody who thinks about foreign politics, or has paid any attention to Russian history, believes that the Russian Government feels any respect for the principles on which this Government rests, or that its friendship for Americans has any better basis than the feeling that we are the one great power of the world which is not likely to interfere with the execution of Russian schemes of aggrandizement, or that there is anything in common between the two countries but size.

If there be anybody, not a regular blatterer, on whom the Russian glamour still rests, we trust he has been an attentive reader of the Russian news of the last three years, on which we have been constantly tempted to comment, and have only refrained from the feeling that it was such "an ancient tale of wrong" that it had no chance of attention. What is the Russia of to-day? What is the spirit of the laws by which she is governed? What offence against civilization is there, except the crime of man-holding and man-selling, which now does not pay in any country, which she does not commit?

The Russian penal code now in force throughout the empire embraces in its two thousand two hundred and twenty-four paragraphs, among others, the following Imperial enactments: There are declared to be twenty-five degrees of criminality, which are punished, some by death, some by exile and life-long hard labor in the Siberian mines, after the public infliction of one hundred lashes by the executioners, and the branding of the forehead and cheeks with the letters K, A, T; some by ninety lashes, branding, and deportation to Siberia for life, with hard labor for various terms of years; some by eighty or seventy lashes, branding, hard labor in fortresses, and perhaps perpetual confinement. Persons convicted of crimes against the "sacred person" of the emperor or the members of his family, or of "attempts on the honor of the emperor," are punished with death. So are those who know of such attempts and do not denounce them. The intentional injuring or mutilating of a statue or image of the emperor, erected at any public or official place, is punished with deportation for life to Siberia, and ten years of hard labor. So also is the man who propagates revolutionary prints, manuscripts, or pictures. Exile to Siberia is the punishment of him, too, who expresses an argument against, or a doubt concerning the rights of, the Imperial Government! These are a few specimens of Russian law, and not the most extravagant ones.

Illustrations of the daily acts of the Russian administration, sufficiently characteristic of its spirit, we find in abundance in our foreign files. The following communications we extract, in a condensed form, from the best informed issues of the last three months: "St. Petersburg, July 7, 1868. The Roman Catholic bishopric of Minsk is to be abolished. Within the last four years twenty-eight of its churches have been surrendered to the Greek Orthodox service, and upward of thirty-five thousand peasants converted to that creed." "Warsaw, July 8. The authorities here are now issuing their rescripts in Russian. Bills of houses-to-be-let written in Polish alone are prohibited. Nor are exclusively Polish business signs permitted." "Warsaw, July 15. An order of the Committee of Organization excludes officials of the Roman Catholic persuasion from the official and personal privileges bestowed upon certain classes by the ukase of August 11, 1867. All non-Russian teachers have been ordered to apply for examination by the Russian Examining Committee before the first of January next, from which day instruction in all schools, public or private, in the former Kingdom of Poland is to be done in Russian exclusively. What is to become of the schools in the country, where nobody knows Russian, is a grave question." "Warsaw, July 21. A counter-police has been established here whose duty it is to watch the regular police." "Wilna, July 25. General Potapoff, the Governor-General of the North-western Department, has issued a circular prohibiting, under severe penalties, the use of the Polish language in 'courts, churches, theatres, club and assembly rooms, hotels, inns, dining-halls, bar-rooms, refreshment-saloons, restaurants, confectionaries, coffee-houses, ale-houses, wine-cellars, warehouses, stores, public gardens and walks, printing, lithographic, and photographic establishments, and, in general, at all places to which the public has access; besides, all private conversation in Polish is prohibited, except in the interior of the houses, and in family circles." (This curious circular is in extenso before us.) "Warsaw, July 31. Jewish parents have been prohibited from hiring Christian wet-nurses for their children." "Wilna, August 5. The new conscription-decree for the western governments punishes evasion of service with confiscation. Towards Jews the decree is still more severe. A Jewish parent who knows of his son's intention to escape by flight, and fails to prevent it by denunciation or otherwise, incurs the same penalty." "Warsaw, August 5. The recently promulgated Imperial ukase on transmigration from one part of the empire to another places Poles and Jews under severe restrictions. The Emperor being expected to visit this city in September, orders have been issued by the police for the whitewashing of houses and repainting of signs." "Warsaw, September 2. The number of Catholic students to be admitted to any of the Imperial universities has been limited to thirty, by order of the Minister of Public Instruction. The price of admission to our grammar and higher schools has been considerably raised." "Wilna, September 15. The once celebrated Calvinist gymnasium of Sluck has been changed into a Russian institution. The Protestant and Catholic schools of these governments have almost entirely disappeared. The general number of pupils of the Lithuanian gymnasia has within the last six years dwindled down from 4,123 to 2,369, that of Polish Catholic pupils from 3,301 to 1,228. The cause is the deportation or impoverishment of so many well-educated and wealthy Polish families in consequence of the rising of 1863." "Warsaw, September 16. Our police makes great exertions to render the reception of the expected Emperor as splendid as possible. All owners of houses, and such tenants whose apartments are supplied with balconies, have been ordered to prepare large Russian flags, transparencies, etc. The illuminations, says the circular, have to be brilliant, and to last three days. A decree just issued orders the closing by our authorities of every bookstore in which a work is found which has not passed the censorship, and of every library in which an unstamped book is discovered."

The truth is, that our Russo-mania is based on little or nothing, and can have no endurance. When we know that country we shall —not revise our opinions in regard to it, for we cannot be said to have any, but we shall come to conclusions that will speedily dissipate European fears of a dangerous alliance between the most progressive of the Western nations and an odious and brutal despotism like the Russian.

A VALUABLE OPPORTUNITY.

Like all its forerunners, the Universal Exposition of 1867 is bearing results beyond its immediate object of showing the state of human industry in the various civilized countries, of bringing about a closer intercourse between the participating nations, and of accelerating the advance of each upon the high road of progress through the wholesome spirit of emulation. It has but recently transpired that, during the great international gathering in the French capital last year, and in a quarter least suspected of being capable of such a liberal initiative, there was conceived the germ of a scheme promising great and lasting benefit to art, and that, moreover, this germ has since grown to a state of fruition. Everybody remembers the "Congress of Princes," the assembling of which in Paris on the occasion of the grand industrial jubilee was duly proclaimed by the official and semi-official press of France in the most extravagant language as one of the greatest triumphs of the Second Empire. Sensible people would not be persuaded at the time that much good would come to mankind from the pompously celebrated meetings of the "mighty of the earth" under the hospitable roof of Napoleon III. But it seems that they have borne, after all, some useful fruits. Among the papers laid before the British Parliament at the close of its last session were copies of a correspondence between the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Marlborough, as Lord President of the Privy Council, which contained the proof that the royal and imperial guests of the French sovereign did not confine themselves solely to viewing the sights of the Exposition and enjoying the agrémens of Paris. It appears that an engagement was entered into by twelve princes, representing as many different states, by the terms of which each of the signers pledged himself to use his influence to inaugurate in his own country a system of reproduction of valuable works of art similar to that so successfully carried on under the auspices of the Department of Science and Art at the South Kensington Museum, and to establish in addition a regular international exchange of the works thus to be reproduced. The agreement was signed by the Prince of Wales, Prince Napoleon, the Crown Prince of Prussia, the Czarevitch, Prince Oscar of Sweden, the two brothers of the Emperor of Austria, the Princes Royal of Italy and Saxony, the brother of the King of Belgium, the Crown Prince of Holland, and Prince Louis of Hesse—all on behalf of the several reigning houses to which they belonged.

Who the originator of the happy idea was does not appear. But the tenor of the agreement shows that it was suggested by the fine display of reproductions made by the South Kensington Museum in the British section of the Exposition. That institution exhibited excellent specimens of French, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, German, Swiss, Hindoo, Celtic, and English art, reproduced by casting in plaster, electrotyping, photographing, and other processes, and showing alike the practicability and usefulness of the scheme formally adopted in the agreement. The Prince of Wales communicated the letter to the Lord President of the Privy Council, to whose functions the administration of the Department of Science and Art belongs, with the request to take such steps as would ensure the realization of the plan. The duke in his reply promised to do all in his power to promote it. The other parties to the agreement having also taken the necessary steps for the fulfilment of its terms in their several countries, there can be no doubt of its being generally carried out.

Now, it seems to us that the interchange of the proposed copies furnishes a precious opportunity for supplying one of the most deeply felt wants of our country. Its all but absolute destitution of collections of art is so notorious that we need not waste any words in depicting it. The most valued evidences of human genius extant are already gathered in the numerous, richly endowed museums of the Old World. To procure the originals is out of the question. But the reproductions made and to be made are, we believe, within our reach. The avowed object of the pact of the princes being the artistic education of the people, there can be no serious difficulty in securing to the United States the benefit of the results of their action. Our diplomatic representatives in Europe, with one exception, are anything but overburdened with work. With very little effort they could doubtless induce the proper authorities to let our republic profit by whatever may be done under the agreement in question. To be sure, we shall not be able to offer much in exchange. But then we are rich enough to pay the comparatively trifling cost of reproduction, upon reimbursing which, according to the details of the plan adopted, states unable to give an equivalent are to be furnished with the fac-similes desired. With a moderate yearly appropriation by Congress for the purpose—and a fraction of the money wasted on the class of pretenders of which Miss Ream is a fair type would suffice—we should in due course of time find ourselves in possession of a collection less precious, of course, but hardly less useful than the European stores of the original treasures. Suitable edifices for displaying it would naturally have to be provided. But if Congress should not muster courage to vote the money for constructing them, private liberality would in all probability furnish it.

To show the utility of such a national enterprise—we have hardly faith enough in the artistic enthusiasm of our people to consider the demonstration of its usefulness superfluous—it is but necessary to point out the scope of all similar collections in Great Britain, the importance attached to them in that country as indispensable instruments of popular education, and the highly beneficial influence they have already exercised upon the producing classes of the British Isles. The reproductions of the South Kensington Museum comprise not only the fine arts proper, but architectural monuments, and specimens of every description of meritorious artisans' work of different times and of different nations. They are intended alike for the education of artists and of artisans. The very first of the successive universal expositions having developed the fact that the want of competition under the former protective system had resulted in a manifest inferiority in point of artistic skill of the British artisans in certain higher branches of industry, the Government and people with characteristic common sense jointly set to work to provide means for the better professional education of their working-men, when after the adoption of a free-trade policy intrinsic excellence alone promised a continuance of the traditional industrial prominence of the United Kingdom. For this purpose, Parliament votes annually a sum of money which is expended by the Department of Science and Art. Part of the instruction is afforded by the specimens of works of art multiplied at the South Kensington Museum in the manner referred to, and accessible to the industrial classes not only at that central repository, but in branch collections opened in all the great manufacturing centres. The official reports of the British commissioners to the several world's expositions since 1860 all bear testimony to a marked progress in artistic taste, owing to the influence of these collections, which enables the British artisan at this time to compete successfully in several of the branches in which the French and other nationalities before excelled. At the close of 1860, the year in which this educational movement commenced, there were but nine special schools of science and art with 500 scholars in the United Kingdom. This number had increased at the close of 1864 to 91 schools with 4,666 scholars. At the close of 1867 there were no less than 283 schools with a total of 11,600 scholars! To all these schools, established partly with public aid and partly through the liberality of large manufacturers, the collections provided by the South Kensington Museum have been what maps and geographical apparatus are to the common schools.

Even the most enthusiastic admirer of our people and country will not pretend that all has been done for the professional training of our industrial classes that might and should be done. The example of Great Britain is being rapidly followed by the leading Continental states. Shall it be said of us that we do less for the elevation of our industrial producers than the nations over which we never tire of claiming our unapproachable superiority?

GEN. PHELPS ON GEN. BUTLER'S PRACTICAL ABILITY.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: A communication in your paper of the 15th inst. alludes to me in connection with General Butler in New Orleans during the war, and claims superior "practical" ability for that general. I should hardly notice this communication if it had appeared in any other paper than the Nation.

The Government, in choosing a general from New England to command in the South-west in the earlier stages of the war, was governed somewhat, it may be presumed, by its appreciation of New England character. Some of the better traits of that character, as I understand them, are a great love of liberty, devotion to fundamental principles, respect for law, order, and regularity, and, not least, for economy, or unwasteful expenditure of money. On the other hand, some of its inferior traits are shrewdness and cunning in politics, and addiction to certain peculiar habits of trade and traffic.

Now, it seems to me that, under General Butler's régime in the South-west, New England was more prominently represented in these latter traits of her character—in her proclivities to trade and politics—than in her better traits and qualities; and that, as an inevitable consequence of such a representation, her general became too much involved in material considerations to render his services of any practical value to the country, however much they may have redounded to his own personal interests, or apparently to those of the party to which he is at present politically attached.

The communication referred to claims for General Butler great prescience in making military preparations for the rebellion, in the certain anticipation of which he became the colonel of a Massachusetts militia regiment. But at the same time that the general was thus preparing for war, he was voting to place the government of the country and its resources at the disposal of Jefferson Davis. This is certainly a very remarkable case of practical ability!

The general finally entered the military service of the United States as early as April, 1861, and though much given to making speeches, rather more than is natural to a "practical mind," yet he never came out and fully committed himself in a decided speech in favor of arming slaves, a simple practical measure of war, until April, 1863. This long delay of two years, which extended far beyond the already too long deferred Proclamation of Emancipation, is utterly untenable as a war measure, in proof of which the present lamentable condition of the country furnishes ample testimony. It gives no evidence at all in favor of a practical turn of mind.

The general has admirable tact and shrewdness in keeping himself upon the political coach in the midst of the greatest stir and dust; but his claims to possessing practical statesmanship would be amusing if it were not for the sad verity that they have already cost the country so dearly.

Very respectfully, J. W. Phelps.

MR. WENDELL PHILLIPS'S LATEST STORY ABOUT GRANT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Mr. Wendell Phillips spoke last evening before a large audience at Tremont Temple, on the temperance question, and in the course of his remarks alluded to General Grant. The mention of the name brought down the house at once, showing, as might have been supposed, that the audience was wholly Republican in sympathy. Mr. Phillips then spoke of the "well-known fact" that Gen. Grant had promised his friends that hereafter he would keep sober. He next drew a fine picture of the momentous issues of the present political contest, and of the vast responsibility resting upon our standard-bearer, and then passed to the sad spectacle which the country presented in being obliged to risk all upon the ability of one man to keep his promise not to get drunk. Now, personally, I care nothing for the tales about the habits of Gen. Grant, but I should like the temperance wing of the Republican party, in this and other States, to know whether, in the opinion of the Nation, this latest story of Mr. Phillips has a better foundation than others of a similar character. Has Grant promised to keep sober?

Boston.

October 17, 1868.

[We ourselves entirely disbelieve the story. We will print any proof of so severe a charge that Mr. Phillips may see fit to offer.—Ed. Nation.]

LITERARY.

The Boston Transcript—getting its facts, we presume, from Messrs. Roberts Brothers—says that "Auerbach, the novelist, was first introduced to American readers many years ago by a Boston publisher, and since then three other works by him have been issued here," and further, that "he is indebted almost entirely for his present popularity in this country to the sagacity and enterprise of his Boston publishers." To these statements we are requested by Messrs. Roberts Brothers to call attention.——We may say here that "the State of Maine has issued a report entitled 'The Water-Power of Maine,' in which detailed information is given respecting the location, characteristics, improvements, ownership, and other features of a considerable proportion of over two thousand different water powers." It is a surprising statement of the natural wealth of Maine in this particular, and is worth a moment of anybody's attention. The manufacturers and other employers of mechanical power will, we should suppose, find it of value as well as of interest. Mr. Walter Wells, of Portland, the State Superintendent of Hydrographic Publication, will send a copy of the report, gratis, to any applicant for it.

—Mr. Chisholm Anstey has recently written a pamphlet which ought to be of some considerable interest to our legislators and judicial officers in California. We believe some of the ridiculous practices in the matter of administering oaths to heathens which Mr. Anstey reprobates are matched by practices which obtain on the Pacific Coast. We hear that when China men are to give testimony in a San Francisco court a chicken is brought in and killed by decapitation. Then, while the blood flows, the intending witnesses, with outward solemnity, imprecate on their souls a like painful death if they should commit perjury—which they almost invariably do as soon as they can get into the witness-box. Mr. Anstey asserts, and we are disposed to believe him fully, that the ceremony of breaking a saucer and telling the witness that if he swears falsely his soul will be broken in the same way—a proposition to which he freely gives his assent—is as idiotic a proceeding in the eyes of a Chinaman as it ought to be in the eyes of a Western Barbarian. So of the custom of burning "paper of imprecation"—a legal form which, according to Mr. Anstey, causes the Chinaman to laugh. The fact of the matter is, as the Pall Mall Gazette points out, the heathen's god is, as a rule, entirely indifferent to perjury unless his worshipper in committing it violates some arbitrary formula (and we in the West neither know this arbitrary formula nor the methods by which it may be deprived of meaning by an expert). Just so we see that the lower class of Irishmen apparently conceive of the Almighty as indifferent, or nearly so, if they when swearing can kiss their thumbs instead of "the book." It is true, too, as Mr. Anstey says, that in addition to this it must be borne in mind that most heathens take a peculiar pleasure in outwitting and overreaching Europeans, and evading their laws. This explanation is, we suppose, the obvious one; they match, as they are generally compelled to, fraud against force. All the charms ought to be left alone, Mr. Anstey thinks, and the only method adopted in the effort to secure honest evidence from these people should be that of a certain and severe punishment of the perjurers by human justice. And if in the case of these heathens the experiment would be a good one, how much worse a one would it be if tried in the case of Christians? Every one knows that the amount of false swearing in our courts is frightful, and there is grave doubt if the compelling power of the oath, and the fear of a supernatural punishment for perjury, are not less efficacious in promoting truth-telling than they are indirectly favorable to false swearing. On the mass of witnesses the oath seems to have little or no effect of any kind.

—That quality in Englishmen of the upper classes which does so much to endear them to Americans and to their colonial dependents—their supercilious, contented ignorance of all matters and things American or provincial, has recently been excellently exhibited by Lord Robert Montagu, who is the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, which is as much as to say that he is the British Minister of Public Instruction. He was making a speech at a political meeting the other day, and in the course of his remarks spoke of some statement made by the British consul "at Buffalo, in Canada." What the British Government have for a consul to do in Canada his lordship did not say. In view of Lord Montagu's office there would seem good enough reason for saying what we have heard said, that ignorance of the United States is really part of an Englishman's education. Nearly as many ludicrous stories might be told of very recent displays of this ignorance as were ever told of former generations of English. Their attention will, however, it is likely, be turned this way more hereafter than it has been hitherto.

—The Tuscan actor, Tommaso Salvini, whom we recently mentioned as being a great artist, has just achieved a success of the most decided kind in a new drama, entitled "Milton." It seems, to judge of it by a synopsis, to be a work of considerable merit. The scene of the play is laid in the last days of the Commonwealth, and the first of Charles the Second; but the author, the Chevalier Gatinelli, has not hesitated to bring within this space the principal incidents of Milton's whole life, both political and domestic—to say nothing of some other incidents. The first act sets forth the unhappiness of the relations between the poet and his first wife, Mary Powell. This lady is represented as having contracted an imprudent intimacy with one Henri De Saumaese, an intriguer in behalf of the king, who finds favor in Mrs. Milton's eyes because he is gay and handsome, and because he is a partisan of the cause to which she and her family are attached. The government informs Milton that a royalist plot has some of its ramifications under his own roof, and it is then that he learns of the possible disloyalty of his wife. There is a terrible outburst of grief and wrath, in the course of which the wife is driven from the house. Gatinelli deepens the moral gloom that gathers about Milton by introducing here his physical blindness, which, having for some time been increasing, now settles down on him in full obscurity. At the end of the act there is some lofty declamation by the afflicted poet on the need of elevating woman by educating her according to higher standards. The second act shows us Milton and his two daughters, with one of whom, Deborah, Arthur Monk, the son of General Monk, is in love. The general and his son have a violent altercation, for the young man will not obey his father—already meditating his subsequent treachery—but insists on remaining true to the cause of the Commonwealth, and Deborah Milton. In this act we have more declamatory poetry from Milton, who, in a highly eloquent soliloquy, utters his aspirations for the welfare of the race—a welfare which is to be the daughter of Liberty. He is made to prophesy a united Italy rejoicing in the overthrow of priestly tyranny; a regenerated Spain; a Germany emancipated from subserviency to the Hapsburgs; and the spread everywhere of the principles of English freedom. This act closes with the poet's being awakened from his dream by the return of King Charles, amid the booming of cannon and universal rejoicing. The most spirited scene in the act is one between Milton and Monk. In the third act Milton is visited by Charles, who is represented as a great admirer of the "Paradise Lost." The king offers the poet a thousand pounds on the nail for the copyright of the epic. But the five-pound agreement with Simmons has just been signed. After much talk, literary and political, the feigned bookseller takes his leave. Milton then recites to himself the passage from the "Paradise Lost" which relates the reconciliation between Adam and Eve, and the recitation is accompanied upon the harp by one of Milton's daughters—as he supposes. It is, however, his wife; she has always, since her expulsion, been in the habit of visiting her children by stealth. As the poet repeats the verses she becomes too much affected to continue playing, and finally falls at his feet and is forgiven. Just at this moment an officer enters with a warrant for the poet's arrest; but the king appears, deus ex machinâ, and the play ends with a brief dialogue between Charles and Milton, the latter telling the king—when he offers riches and honors on condition of Milton's writing the crown into popularity—that popularity can be secured if the wearer of the crown will do justice and love mercy. To the king's final question of when and where his proud spirit expects advancement, Milton replies, "After death," and the curtain falls.

—An Italian drama of a very different kind—of the general kind which the degraded Italian stage is pretty much given up to, but of a special kind almost singular—is a new play called "The Messiah." As the title indicates, the principal character is the Saviour. The first act opens with a scene between Pontius Pilate and Mary Magdalen, who are privately at supper together, and whose relations with each other are supposed to be the same as our American poet Mr. Laughton Osborn makes Mary's relations with Judas Iscariot to have been. The conversation is interrupted by the entrance of a Scribe or Pharisee, who denounces Christ as a revolutionary agitator, and demands that the governor shall have him arrested. Mary Magdalen, to the decided surprise of Pontius Pilate, warmly defends the accused. So ends the first act. The second act is a string of bombastic, stupid tirades on the rights of man, liberty, equality, fraternity, and all the rest of it, put into the mouth of Christ. What is in the third act we are not informed. The performance was too disgusting, and the audience made short work of it. It is possible that we may be less religious in this century than they were in the "ages of faith"—though people who try to prove the fact seem to succeed rather poorly; and it may be that it is only our taste that makes the old time way of handling sacred things seem shocking, and that our religious feelings are not in the least offended. But at any rate we shall all agree to rejoice that this play was "damned." Not even our Ritualists, we imagine, would undertake to revive in our day the "mysteries" of the unsceptical mediæval times.

—The English announcements of new books are very numerous despite the doubt that is understood to overshadow the immediate future of the trade in Britain, but doubtless we shall wait a good while for some of the works whose titles are now published in such profusion. Messrs. George Routledge & Sons have, we see, succeeded in securing Mr. Longfellow, and were to have published his "New England Tragedies" on the 10th of the month. It is said that Mr. Longfellow is very well pleased with the terms offered him. With their branch house in this country it seems as if Messrs. Routledge & Sons—the law of copyright in England having become what it is—might profitably put themselves in communication with a judicious selection of our American authors. Messrs. F. Warne & Co. have republished in two very cheap volumes (three-and-sixpenny), the whole of the original twenty volumes of the famous "Percy Anecdotes." Mr. John Timbs makes a preface. Another republication is a new volume of the set of Early English Reprints now publishing by Alexander Murray & Son. It contains John Lyly's "Euphues, the Anatomy of Wit," and "Euphues and his England." Mr. J. Russel Smith will also add to the number of old books in new dresses. The next work in his "Library of Old Authors" will be "The Diaries and Remains of Thomas Hearne," the literary antiquarian. He will also publish a new edition of Massinger's Plays; a new edition of Brande's "Antiquities;" and, better yet, an edition of George Chapman's "Poems and Dramatic Works," never before collected. Lovers of proverbs will be glad to hear that Mr. Alexander Hislop has added to the not discouragingly great number of volumes which belong to this interesting branch of literature a volume without which no collection will be complete. It is "A Collection of Scottish Proverbs," from which we will quote only this one, which is fully as Scotch as proverbial: "Put your hand twice to your bannet to ance to your pouch." Of works hitherto incomplete we are to have this fall the third and last volume of Bunsen's "God in History," the third and fourth volumes of Mr. James Spedding's "Life and Letters of Lord Bacon," the final volume of Professor Owen's "Comparative Anatomy and Physiology of the Vertebrate Animals," and the fifth of the eight volumes of Dr. Newman's "Plain and Parochial Sermons," which, as was expected, are going to have very great success. We see that among the poets Mr. MacDonald ("Disciple") and George Eliot both go into a second edition, and that Mr. Morris has reached a third. Swinburne's "Queen Mother and Rosamond" is also in its second edition.

—The lately received French works that we notice in Mr. Christern's monthly bulletin begin with one with the rather alarming title of "Moments Perdus de Pierre-Jean," being observations, reflections, objections, thoughts, and reveries by that gentleman, all of which are admitted and declared to be anti-political, anti-philosophical, anti-metaphysical, anti-moral—anti-everything-that-anybody-believes. M. C. Issaurat is the author of this work, which is doubtless leonine in skin only. The Reverend Father Kleutgen is the author of a work which some of M. Issaurat's adjectives would, we dare say, describe not so very badly. It will be complete in four volumes, and the title is "The Scholastic Philosophy." The Reverend Father Constant Sierp translates it from the German into French, having the author's leave to do so. Adam Moehler's "History of the Church" is translated by the Abbé P. Belch. Under the head of theology, where are ranged the works above-mentioned, we find also Volney's "Ruines," which in this latest edition is prefaced by a sketch of the author and a critical examination of his works by M. Jules Claretie. Among legal works which may very likely have interest for some of our readers we find one by M. Le Barrois d'Orgeval, entitled "Literary Property in France and Abroad," being a statement of the law as it stands, and an account of how it became what it is, followed by the treaties on the subject which have down to this day been concluded between France and the other European states. It will, by-and-by, perhaps, be possible for graduates of Northern law-schools to try their fortunes in Louisiana, and for that and other reasons we mention "The Code Napoleon, by way of Question and Answer"—a method, let us remark, which might be successfully applied to others of our American preparatory law-books than the one or two to which it has already been applied.

—It is very commonly believed that Paris is the "wickedest city" in all Europe. But the lately published report of the Municipal Bureau of Statistics at Vienna, for the period of 1862–65, goes to show that the Austrian capital has a far stronger title to that unenviable distinction than her French sister. The figures embraced in that document reveal a remarkable loss of vital force, with the consequent results of increased vice, impoverishment, and crime. The number of marriages in Vienna has diminished from 5,134 in 1862 to 3,602 in 1865—a decrease of 29 per cent. In the same period there was an increase of 8 per cent. in Paris, of 12 per cent. in London, and of 13 per cent. in Berlin. The number of illegitimate births in Vienna in 1865 was in the fearful ratio of 475 to every 1,000 children born, while in Paris and Berlin it reached only 276 and 165 respectively. The impoverishment of the inhabitants of Vienna is shown by other data. The number of cattle slaughtered for food decreased from 101,443 in 1862 to 98,181 in 1865; the number of depositors in savings-banks was only 89,600 in 1865, against 93,705 in 1862; the average amounts deposited declined in the same time from 105 to 92 florins; and the number of executions for non-payment of taxes increased from 32,781 in 1862 to 68,022 in 1865. This impoverishment was attended by a corresponding increase of crime, from 1,218 in 1859 to 1,932 cases in 1865. The number of suicides increased in the same years 36 per cent., while in London it has decreased 3, and in Paris 35 per cent. The mental retrogression of the Viennese is indicated by the decrease of the number of children attending public schools from 31,245 to 30,397, while evidence of a physical decline is furnished by the fact that of the recruits annually levied in the city only an average of 200 out of every 1,000 are found bodily fit for military service. That the social state of things at Vienna is but a faithful reflection of the condition of Austria at large, is proved by the decrease of nearly 15 per cent. in the number of marriages in the empire during the last fifteen years, and the far greater prevalence of crime than in other countries. In 1865 no less than 5,551 felonious assaults, 788 manslaughters, and 315 murders were committed in Austria, while in Great Britain, with about half the population, only 679 felonious assaults, 259 manslaughters, and 131 murders took place in the same year.

—One of the neatest things in contemporary journalism is a little passage at arms between the Paris Siècle and the Imperial organ, L'Etendard. The Siècle had said that the coup de main at Cadiz was executed with a precision and decision which did much honor to Admiral Topete. Whereupon L'Etendard says: "Thus a military man—a man placed by a regular Government over one of the great forces of the state—can earn the praises of the Siècle for having voluntarily betrayed his duty, falsified his oath, and directed against the Government of his country the arms which were confided to him!" This has a bad look, but the Siècle brazens it out: "Stop, stop! good Etendard. You forget where you are, and what application may be made of your words. Stop! in heaven's name! You are talking of things——" All of which may be supposed to give much pleasure to the frivolous Parisian who recalls to mind the Man of December.

DALLAS GALBRAITH.*

This new novel of Mrs. Harding Davis is better than her last, which we had occasion to notice a year ago. Certain offensive peculiarities of style which we then attempted to indicate have not, indeed, disappeared, but they are less prominent and various than in "Waiting for the Verdict." The story, the fable, to begin with, is very much more simple and interesting, and is, in fact, very well conducted. A really simple and healthy writer the author of "Dallas Galbraith" never will be; but on careful consideration we think it would be unjust not to admit that in the present work she has turned herself about a little more towards nature and truth, and that she sometimes honors them with a side-glance. In the conception and arrangement of her story, moreover, she displays no inconsiderable energy and skill. She has evidently done her best to make it interesting, and to give her reader, in vulgar parlance, his money's worth. She may probably be congratulated on a success. For ourselves, we shall never consider this lady's novels easy reading; but many persons will doubtless find themselves carried through the book without any great effort of their own. It is this very circumstance, we think—the fact that when a book is the fruit of decided ability it gets a fair hearing and pushes its own fortune—that makes it natural and proper to criticise it freely and impartially. The day of dogmatic criticism is over, and with it the ancient infallibility and tyranny of the critic. No critic lays down the law, because no reader receives the law ready made. The critic is simply a reader like all the others—a reader who prints his impressions. All he claims is, that they are honest; and when they are unfavorable, he esteems it quite as simple a matter that he should publish them as when they are the reverse. Public opinion and public taste are silently distilled from a thousand private affirmations and convictions. No writer pretends that he tells the whole truth; he knows that the whole truth is a synthesis of the great body of small partial truths. But if the whole truth is to be pure and incontrovertible, it is needful that these various contributions to it be thoroughly firm and uncompromising. The critic reminds himself, then, that he must be before all things clear and emphatic. If he has properly mastered his profession, he will care only in a minor degree whether his relation to a particular work is one of praise or of censure. He will care chiefly whether he has detached from such a work any ideas and principles appreciable and available to the cultivated public judgment. By his success in this effort he measures his usefulness, and by his usefulness he measures his self-respect.

These few words merely touch upon a question about which there is a great deal more to be said. We write them here because the book before us is one with regard to which it especially becomes the critic to remember that duty of which we have spoken—the duty of being clear and emphatic. About such novels as Mrs. Davis's it is very easy to talk a great deal of plausible nonsense. Miss Anna E. Dickinson, the famous lecturer—whom we have not heard—has just published a novel, which we have not read. We are, therefore, in no position to qualify Miss Dickinson's work. But Mrs. H. B. Stowe comes promptly to the front, and allows her name to be printed in large characters in the publishers' advertisements as authority for the assertion that Miss Dickinson's novel is "a brave, noble book." This is in no sense the language of criticism. And yet it is made with very little trouble to do duty as criticism—and criticism of weight. Mrs. Stowe and Miss Dickinson probably each regard it as such, and are very far from suspecting that they have done anything unwise—the latter in writing a book which compels the appreciative mind to take refuge in language such as we have quoted as Mrs. Stowe's dictum, and the former in yielding to such injurious compulsion. And yet we scarcely find it in our heart to condemn Mrs. Stowe. It is just these vague random utterances and all this counterfeit criticism that make the rational critic the more confident of his own duties.

Mrs. Davis, in her way, is an artist. And yet, as we say, "Dallas Galbraith" is a book about which it is very easy to make talk which is not too valuable, to divaguer, as the French say—to leave the straight road and go over to Mrs. Stowe. The attentive reader in these days has become familiar with a number of epithets under cover of which literary weakness and incompetency manage to find it a very merry world. When the best thing that can be said of a novel is that it is brave or noble or honest or earnest, you may be sure that although it may be, as Mrs. Stowe pronounces Miss Dickinson's tale, a very good deed, it is a very bad book. Mrs. Davis's stories are habitually spoken of as "earnest" works, and it is not hard to detect in reading them a constant effort to deserve the epithet. Their pretensions are something very different from those of the simple novel of entertainment, of character, and of incident. The writer takes life desperately hard and looks upon the world with a sentimental—we may even say, a tearful—eye. The other novel—the objective novel, as we may call it, for convenience—appeals to the reader's sense of beauty, his idea of form and proportion, his humanity, in the broadest sense. Mrs. Davis's tales and those of her school appeal, we may say—to the conscience, to the sense of right and wrong, to the instincts of charity and patronage. She aims at instructing us, purifying us, stirring up our pity. Writers of the other school content themselves with exciting our curiosity. A good distinction to make, we should say, is that with the latter the emotion of sympathy is the chief agent, and with the former the feeling of pity. We do not propose to enquire which is the higher school of the two. It is certain that the novelist who pretends to edify and instruct must be gifted with extraordinary powers, and that to carry out his character successfully he must have a stronger head than the world has yet seen exercised in this department of literature. There have been no great didactic novelists. Richardson, whom the world is now coming back to after a long desertion, is valued as the great inventor and supreme master of "realism," but his moralism hangs about him as a dead weight. The same may be said—the same assuredly will be said more and more every year—of Thackeray's trivial and shallow system of sermonizing. As a story-teller he is well-nigh everything—as a preacher and teacher he is nothing. On the other hand, the great "objective" novelists, from Scott to Trollope, are almost innumerable. It is our impression that Mrs. Davis might, by taking herself in hand, make a very much better figure in this company than she has heretofore done in the other.

Dallas Galbraith is the son of a reckless and dissipated father who has quarrelled with his family and turned his back on a rich inheritance. He dies early and leaves his wife and child penniless. The former marries again in such a way as to make it advisable for her boy to go out into the world. In the course of his youthful adventures Dallas encounters a certain George Laddoun, a plausible villain, who makes use of him in the committal of a forgery, and then subsequently establishes himself as a country physician in a fishing village on the New Jersey coast, with the boy as his assistant. Here finally the two are discovered by the searching eye of the law. Laddoun, however, has arranged matters in such a way as that Dallas shall incur the whole of the guilt (whereas, in fact, he is completely innocent), and, being on the eve of marriage with a young girl of whom Dallas himself is very fond, he persuades him for her sake not to betray him and blast his character. Dallas then, at the age of sixteen, consents out of pure generosity to suffer for the crime of another. He is sent for five years to the Albany Penitentiary, and we are meanwhile introduced to his father's family. The Galbraiths are great people in Western Ohio, and consist of Madam Galbraith, the head of the house (the hero's grandmother), her husband and her niece, Honora Dundas, who, in the absence of the rightful heir, is presumptive mistress of the property. The young woman to whom Laddoun was engaged, suspecting his guilt and cruelty, has dismissed him, and occupies a situation as housekeeper in the Galbraith establishment. When the young man's term is out, he reappears in the world and makes his way to his father's home. Here, without naming himself, but as a plain working mineralogist, he falls in love with Miss Dundas. Here, too, he meets his mother, who, a second time a widow, has returned to live with her mother-in-law. But in spite of these strong inducements he maintains his incognito and accepts an appointment on a geological survey of New Mexico. His motives for this line of action are his shame, his ignorance, his coarseness, the great gulf that separates him from his elegant and prosperous relatives. And yet they are not so elegant either; for this same Madam Galbraith aforesaid is, without offence to the author, simply a monster. Dallas remains a year in New Mexico and comes home just in time to witness a prodigious reversal of fortune in the family, caused by the combustion of a village built by Madam Galbraith for the purpose of working certain oil-wells. He is of great service in mitigating this catastrophe, and finally makes up his mind to reveal himself. He marries Honora. But on his wedding-night his evil destiny reappears in the person of Laddoun, who denounces him to the assembled family as an ex-convict. Laddoun dies of his bad habits, and Dallas establishes his innocence.

Such is a rapid outline of a story which is told with a good deal of amplitude of detail and considerable energy of invention. But whatever interest attaches to it as the recital of certain events, we feel bound to say that this interest is wholly independent of the characters. These characters seem to us, one and all, essentially false. The hero himself is a perfectly illogical conception. He is too unreal to take hold of; but if he were more palpable, and, as it were, responsible, we should call him a vapid sentimentalist. He is worse than a woman's man—a woman's boy. Active and passive, he is equally unnatural, irrational, and factitious. He is built, to begin with, on an impossibility. Dallas Galbraith would never in the world have sacrificed himself at the outset to the reputation of Laddoun. All his young nature would have burned in a fever of resentment against the rascal who had already compromised his weakness and innocence. He would have clung to the letter proving his innocence with a most unheroic but most manly tenacity. His subsequent conduct has in it as little of the real savory stuff of nature. He conducts himself on his return among his people, like—like nothing in trousers. If we can conceive of his having immured himself, we can conceive of it only on condition of the deed having been followed by the bitterest and most violent reaction. A young fellow who had done as Dallas did would feel that he had done his duty, once for all, to the magnanimous and the superfine. His mind would be possessed by a resolute desire for justice. Having exposed himself to so cruel a wrong, he would entertain an admirable notion of his rights; and instead of hovering about his paternal home like a hysterical school-girl, moaning over his coarseness and inelegance, he would have walked straight into the midst of it, with a very plain statement of his position and his wishes. George Laddoun, the villain of the tale, is scarcely a more successful portrait. The author has confused two distinct types of character, and she seems never quite to have made up her mind whether this person is a native gentleman, demoralized by vice and whiskey, or a blackguard, polished and elevated by prosperity. Laddoun, however, is better than Madam Galbraith. Where the author looked for the original of this sketch we know not; she has only succeeded in producing a coarse caricature. Madam Galbraith is a grand old grey-headed matron, who governs her acres and her tenants in the manner of an ancient feudal countess. She is compared at various times to a mastiff and a lioness; she sniffs and snorts and clears her throat when she wishes to express her emotions; she dresses in "clinging purple velvet," to show "the grand poise and attitude of her limbs;" and, in fine, she "leads society." The author has, of course, had in her mind an ideal model for this remarkable figure; but she has executed her copy with a singular indelicacy of taste and of touch. A self-willed, coarse-grained, rugged, and yet generous old woman was what she wanted for her story, but her manner of writing is so extravagant, so immoderate, so unappreciative of the sober truth, that she succeeds only in producing a vulgar effigy. In Mrs. Duffield, Galbraith's mother, she has adhered more closely to the truth. Nature here is represented and not travestied. In spite of the faults of conception and of style exhibited in these characters, we think that Mrs. Harding Davis might yet, with proper reflection, write a much better novel than the one before us. She has a natural perception, evidently, of the dramatic and picturesque elements of human life, and, in spite of all her weakness, there is no denying her strength. "Dallas Galbraith," as we have intimated, is almost interesting. What does it need to be truly so? The materials, the subject are there. It needs that the author should abjure her ultra-sentimentalism, her moralism on a narrow basis, her hankering after the discovery of a ghastly moral contortion in every natural impulse. Quite as much as she, we believe that life is a very serious business. But it is because it is essentially and inalienably serious that we believe it can afford not to be tricked out in the fantastic trappings of a spurious and repulsive solemnity. Art, too, is a very serious business. We have in our mind a word of counsel for the various clever writers of Mrs. Davis's school. That they should assiduously study and observe the world is an injunction which they will, of course, anticipate. But we can recommend them no more salutary or truly instructive process of research than to sit down to a thorough perusal of the novels and romances of M. Alexandre Dumas. In him they will find their antipodes—and their model. We say their model, because we believe they have enough intellectual resistance to hold their own against him, when their own is worth holding, and that when it is not, he, from the munificence of his genius, will substitute for it an impression of the manner in which a story may be told without being a discredit to what is agreeable in art, and various and natural in life.

THE NEW ENGLAND TRAGEDIES.*

THESE poems, Mr. Longfellow's only work since the appearance of his "Dante," would seem to justify—they certainly have suggested to us—the conclusion that he has been led to emulate the austere directness of the Italian, and has, therefore, consciously laid aside his own natural manner. "John Endicott" and "Giles Corey," in their almost bald simplicity, are as different as anything well can be from all the other original works of their author, and the regular reader of Longfellow who should take them up with any expectation of renewing the pleasure he has so often got from the superabundance of prettinesses to which the laureate of our American sovereigns has accustomed them, will be astonished at the extent of the disappointment prepared for him. In the not very fortunate prologues, to be sure, the old style is maintained. It is the Longfellow of the "Voices of the Night" and of "Hyperion" who thus addresses his readers, setting out with one of those bits of imagery drawn from literary sources which—as Margaret Fuller, we think, first pointed out—Mr. Longfellow all but inevitably puts between his naked subject and himself:

"To-night we strive to read as we may best
This city, like an ancient palimpsest;
And bring to light upon the blotted page,
The mournful record of an earlier age,
That pale and half-effaced lies hidden away
Beneath the fresher writing of to-day.
Rise, then, O buried city that has been!
Rise up, rebuilded in the painted scene,
And let our curious eyes behold once more
The pointed gable and the pent-house door,
The meeting-house with leaden-latticed panes,
The narrow thoroughfares, the crooked lanes!
Rise, too, ye shapes and shadows of the past
Rise from your long-forgotten graves at last," etc.

But turning to the tragedies themselves, we have a severity of handling which is altogether new in their author's writings, and of which, as it appears, our author is not a master. His theme is a well-worn one at the best, and perhaps, even with all the powers of pleasing which our charming author has at such easy command, it would have been impossible for him to have made anything very interesting out of the Puritan persecution of the Quakers, or the sufferings of the Salem witches and wizards. These are subjects for the dramatic poet, for tragedy cares nothing how familiar may be the incidents with which she deals; and there is room still for the novelist who, to other qualifications, shall add a faculty of reproducing pictorially the scenes and times of two centuries ago. But whatever success or want of it Mr. Longfellow, as a sentimental narrator of tales in gracefully ornate verse, might have had in retelling the old story, he could not—it was evident beforehand, and is now manifest—succeed either in the dramatist's or the novel-writer's way of dealing with it. He has none of the so-called constructiveness which the dramatist must have, and which the novelist also requires; his skill in reproducing more than the outside of distant times and people and places is of the slightest; he has never conceived a character.

Here in these two plays we have the traditional doctrine of election; the traditional minister of the word who denounces tolerance and frequently says "anathema maranatha;" the traditional grim magistrate, held in worshipful awe by the commonalty, but freely rebuked by the zealous ministers, and, ex officio, well read in the more uncomfortable portions of the Scriptures of the Old Testament; the traditional jovial mariner or other outlandish man, who hates Salem Harbor and loathes the Port of Boston, because the freeholders of both those towns are in a state of strait-laced grace which is altogether incompatible with the sufficient drinking of flip or with pipe-smoking on the Sabbath-day; the traditional self-deceiving victim of witchcraft, so-called; the traditional spiteful accusers, and blind and purblind judges, and fanatic Quakers, with every beautiful trait of character.

But none of these persons are presented in any other than the traditional way, and tradition, as it has come to print in school-books, has presented them to us with more rather than less vividness and force than Mr. Longfellow seems to have been able to use. Plot the two plays can hardly be said to have. Indeed, they are not to be called plays except as one speaks of the outward form, there being nobody to be played upon and nobody to play. In the first piece, Governor Endicott, of the encyclopædia, condemns a young and lovely Quakeress, of the school-histories and novels, to be whipped in three towns within his jurisdiction, and her father to be put to death. They had felt compelled, it seems, to come from Barbadoes to bear witness against the errors of the Puritans of New England; to say nothing of the fact that, without reference to their personal feelings, the magistrates of Barbadoes had driven them out of that colony. Governor Endicott's son, John, falls in love with the Quakeress, Edith Christison, quarrels with his father on account of her and her kin, and is fined. King Charles the Second's proclamation forbidding religious bloodshed comes to Boston in time to save Christison and partly save his daughter, and the tragedy ends with Governor Endicott's sudden and unaccountable death—"like one who has been hanged," as he used to hang too obstinate Quakers.

"Giles Corey, of the Salem Farms" is better than "John Endicott," whether as a drama for the stage or as a poem. There is some "go" in it as well as some motive. It opens with a speech delivered by "Tituba, an Indian woman"—who, by the way, talks of "Obi" as if she were a negress—who reminds one of that sort of Elizabethan witch which is descended from the classical, and who is far from conjuring up a lively idea of what the aboriginal New England witch might have been:

"Here's monk's-hood, that breeds fever in the blood;
And deadly nightshade, that makes men see ghosts;
And henbane, that will shake them with convulsions;
And meadow-saffron and black hellebore,
That rack the nerves, and puff the skin with dropsy:
And bitter-sweet, and briony, and eye-bright,
That cause eruptions, nosebleed, rheumatisms;
I know them, and the places where they hide
In field and meadow; and I know their secrets,
And gather them because they give me power
Over all men and women. Armed with these,
I, Tituba, an Indian and a slave,
Am stronger than the captain with his sword,
Am richer than the merchant with his money,
Am wiser than the scholar with his books,
Mightier than ministers and magistrates,
With all the fear and reverence that attend them!
For I can fill their bones with aches and pains,
Can make them cough with asthma, shake with palsy,
Can make their daughters see and talk with ghosts,
Or fall into delirium and convulsions.
I have the Evil Eye, the Evil Hand;
A touch from me, and they are weak with pain,
A look from me, and they consume and die.
The death of cattle and the blight of corn,
The shipwreck, the tornado, and the fire—
These are my doings, and they know it not.
Thus I work vengeance on mine enemies,
Who, while they call me slave, are slaves to me!"

This is a witch out of a book; she has as slight an infusion of the Salem witch in her as of the copper-colored medicine-man, though if she were real, one or the other, or both, and more probably both, those two ingredients would have made up the whole Tituba. But as the poem goes on it becomes more lifelike. Giles Corey's sullen and wicked servant-man, who has private reasons for hating the farmer and his wife, turns the prevailing witchcraft frenzy against his master and mistress. To be sure he accomplishes his purpose with as much ease as if he had been a personage in a melodrama written by a child; but still he has an available dramatic reason for doing what he does. Giles's wife, Mary—a sensible, good, courageous woman, whose somewhat anachronistic contempt for the prevalent delusion helps her to her condemnation on the trial—is sentenced to death for causes tragically small, and her husband dies under the peine forte et dure because he refuses to testify against her. There are no characters in these two poems which we owe to Mr. Longfellow's invention. Indeed, to say the truth, there is almost none already invented which he has brought before his reader's eye more vividly than it had been often brought before. Simon Kempthorn, captain of the Swallow—a bird of the sea, prophetic of spring, which brought Edith Christison to Boston—constitutes an exception to this remark. The poet's one success in this volume is in the portraiture of this breezy old sailor, who swears quite enough, and drinks, perhaps, a little too much, and is utterly disgusted by the stringency of the various prohibitory laws—now no more—which afflict the citizen of the world in Boston.

There is another success than the poet's of which Mr. Longfellow never fails. His beautiful kind-heartedness and sweetness are as delightful in these pleas for charity of judgment and for love to one another as in anything that he has ever written.

MODERN WOMEN.*

This volume consists of a series of papers published during the last two or three years in the London Saturday Review, treating of various points connected with the characteristics and manners of the fairer and weaker sex. They belong to that branch of literature which has come to be known among us as the "social article." The Saturday Review has had the credit of having shown us how good the social article can be; but it seems also to have been disposed to show us how bad. Singly, as they came out, these pieces may have appeared to possess a certain brilliancy and vigor, and, at a stretch, one can imagine them to have furnished a group of idle people, of unformed taste, a theme for ten minutes' talk. But it is as incredible that, as we are told, they should have produced a sensation then as it is that they should produce a revolution now. The authorship of the papers we have no means of knowing. We gather from intrinsic evidence that they are the product of several hands—in one of which, at least, we certainly detect the feminine griffe. But if they differ somewhat in tone, they differ imperceptibly in merit. They are all equally trivial, commonplace, and vulgar. The vulgarity of thought, indeed, which they display, the absence of reflection, observation, and feeling, of substance, of style, and of grace, and the manner in which the thinnest and crudest literary flippancy and colloquial slanginess are thrust forward in the place of these sacred essentials, is, when one considers their pretensions, the character of their subject, and the superior auspices under which they were ushered into the world, an almost inconceivable spectacle. As we read the volume, modern women—heaven save the mark!—passed quite out of our thoughts, and our attention transferred itself to modern scribblers. The great newspaper movement of the present moment has, we suppose, its proper and logical cause, and is destined to have its proper and logical effect; but its virtues need to be manifold, assuredly, to palliate the baseness and flimsiness of much of the writing to which daily and weekly journals serve as sponsors. But for their protecting shadow, persons ignorant of the very alphabet of style and of thought would not erect themselves as public monitors and teachers. But for the beautiful accessibility of their columns, how many beggarly hosts of intellectual jugglers and charlatans would not have thrust themselves into the great thoroughfare of honest thought, to the infinite annoyance of retarded and distracted enquirers. The world is great and is constantly growing greater; its shoulders are broad; it has an immense patience and a prodigious organ of digestion and disintegration. It is easily infatuated, but it is also profoundly indifferent. We suppose, therefore, that it will continue to endure without perceptible injury this immense pressure of unleavened literary matter. But we, nevertheless, recommend the producers and furnishers to be on their guard, and to listen once in a while to the rumblings of Etna.

The papers before us read like the result of an arrangement made, alike without conscience and without taste, by three or four sapient connoisseurs to "run" the flagellation of their female contemporaries as far as it would go. It has gone as far as "The Girl of the Period;" for this paper, which is placed first in the American reprint, is one of the later in the original series. The American reader will be struck by the remoteness and strangeness of the writer's tone and allusions. He will see that the society which makes these papers even hypothetically—hyperbolically—possible is quite another society from that of New York and Boston. American life, whatever may be said, is still a far simpler process than the domestic system of England. We never read a good English novel (and much more a bad one), we never read either Mr. Trollope or Mr. Trollope's inferiors, without drawing a long breath of relief at the thought of all that we are spared, and without thanking fortune that we are not part and parcel of that dark, dense British social fabric. An American is born into a so much simpler world; he inherits so many less obligations, conventions, and responsibilities. And so with the American girl. You have only to reflect how her existence, in comparison with that of her British sister, is simplified at a stroke by the suppression in this country of that distinguished being the "eldest son," of that romantic class the "younger sons." Another cause of greater complexity in life for Englishmen and English girls alike is their immediate proximity to that many-colored Continent, of which we, in comparison, have the means to learn so little. And this brings us back to the "Girl of the Period." This young lady, we are assured, is, in England, an exact reproduction, in appearance and manners, of a Parisian cocotte—or whatever the latest term may be. If this is not true, it is at least slightly plausible. Irregular society, in France, has become so extensive and aggressive that he who runs—and she who walks—may easily read its minutest features. An English girl who makes with her parents a regular autumnal trip to the Continent encounters face to face, in all the great cities, at all the chief watering-places, the celebrities—and indeed the obscurities—of the demi-monde. The theory of the Saturday Reviewer is that familiarity breeds not contempt, but emulation. Whatever may be the worth of his theory, his description of the young lady thus demoralized is decidedly vigorous. She is a painted, powdered, "enamelled" creature, stained with belladonna and antimony, crowned with a shock of false hair, wearing her walking-dress indecently high and her evening dress abominably low. She has no manners and no feelings, and only brains enough to ensnare a rich husband. She frankly sells herself; she marries for money, without a semblance of sentiment or romance. The relation of the Girl of the Period to marriage forms, under one aspect or another, the subject of the greater number of the ensuing articles. We find it reiterated, of course, with emphasis, that to marry, and to marry well, is the one great object of young girls' energies and desires. According as a girl marries or not, life is a prize or a blank. Innumerable arts, therefore, are practised both by the young ladies and their mothers, cunning machinations are devised, in the interest of this sacred need. It is all a very old story, and English novels have long since made us acquainted with it: how a match-making matron fixes her cold, magnetic eye upon the unsuspecting possessor of a comfortable income—how, with her daughter's aid and the insidious help of picnics and croquet and musical parties, she weaves about him the undisseverable web of a presumptive engagement, and finally leads him, muddled, confused, and bullied, to the altar. The various tricks of the marriage-market are enumerated with a bold, unpitying crudity. It is a very dismal truth that the only hope of most women, at the present moment, for a life worth the living, lies in marriage, and marriage with rich men or men likely to become so, and that in their unhappy weakness they often betray an ungraceful anxiety on this point. But to our minds there is nothing comical in the situation, and as a field for satirical novelists it has ceased to be actively worked. The attempt to draw an idle smile at the expense of poor girls apprehensive of spinsterhood is, therefore, not a very creditable one. On all other points women receive here equally hard measure. Some of the accusations touch, doubtless, upon real foibles and follies, but others seem to us thoroughly beside the mark. The article on "Pinchbeck," for instance, shows an absolute want of observation of facts. The writer's allegation is that women are given over body and soul to the adoration of sham finery, sham comfort, and sham elegance, and that, thanks to their insatiable longing for glitter and splendor where only false glitter and splendor are within their reach, our whole domestic economy is pervaded by a horrible system of Brummagem-ware. "If they cannot buy gold, they can manage pinchbeck; glass that looks like jet, like filagree-work, like anything else she fancies, is every bit to her as good as the real thing; and if she cannot compass Valenciennes and Mechlin, she can go to Nottingham and buy machine-made imitations that will make quite as fine a show. . . . Flimsy silks make as rich a rustle to her ear as the stateliest brocade, and cotton velvet delights the soul that cannot aspire to Genoa." The falseness of all this is apparent to the most superficial observer. Sham finery is of all things in the world the most abhorrent to women at all in regular "society"—and it is throughout of such women that our writers speak. Quantities of false ornaments—beads, buckles, pins, and the like—are nowadays manufactured for fashionable wear; and they are worn in profusion and variety, as being avowedly and notoriously false. But we could hardly name three objects of livelier contempt to women of ordinary intelligence than "mean" silk, cotton velvet, and imitation lace. The real accusation is that when a woman with a taste for dress desires a handsome silk and cannot afford it, she buys it, notwithstanding. The real ground of complaint is the insolence of splendor of women of small means. Another grievous fault, we are told, is women's mania, "Interference." In the picture drawn in the article with this title of the impertinent and aggressive attitude of the average British spouse, we quite fail to recognize the far-famed humility of that exemplary person. Its tone is so obviously ill-humored, and the quality and process of its censure so crude and brutal, that we accept it only with very many grains of allowance. And then there are "Feminine Affectations"—a dreadful and odious list; and the flimsiness and trashiness of "Æsthetic Women;" and the cold-blooded profligacy of "Modern Mothers;" and again, the indecency of the costume of the day; and the pitiable condition of "The Fading Flower;" and the odious pretensions of "La Femme Passée."

What do you see when on a clear autumn day you measure the length of the Fifth Avenue, or ascend the sunny slope of Beacon Street? Do you encounter a train of youthful Jezebels with plastered faces and lascivious eyes and a general dévergondage of mien? You meet a large number of very pretty and, on the whole, very fresh-looking girls, dressed in various degrees of the prevailing fashion. It is obvious that their persons betray a very lively desire to be well dressed, and that the idea "well dressed" has, to their minds, a peculiar significance. It has a sacred and absolute meaning. Their bonnets must be very small, their panniers very large, their heels very high, and all their appointments as elegant as possible. A young girl of fashion dressed to suit her own taste is undeniably a very artificial and composite creature, and doubtless not an especially edifying spectacle. She has largely compromised her natural freedom of movement. The most that you can say of her is that she is charming, with a quasi-corrupt arbitrary charm. She has, moreover, great composure and impenetrability of aspect. She practises a sort of half-cynical indifference to the beholder (we speak of the extreme cases). Accustomed to walk alone in the streets of a great city, and to be looked at by all sorts of people, she has acquired an unshrinking directness of gaze. She is the least bit hard. If she is more than this—if she is painted and touzled and wantonly chiffonnée—she is simply an exception, and the sisterhood of "modern women" are in no way responsible for her. She would have been the same in the good old times of our great-grandmothers. The faults and follies that can be really fastened upon the younger women of the present day are, in our opinion, all caused and explained by the growing love of luxury and elegance. The standard in these matters is so much higher than it was thirty and forty years ago that a young girl—even when she has money—needs a great deal more time to maintain herself at the proper level. She has frequently no time left for anything else—for study, for reflection, or sentiment. She is absorbed in the care of her person. A young girl given up to dress is certainly a very flimsy and empty creature, and there is something truly ignoble in the incessant effort to gratify and stimulate the idle taste of a host of possible "admirers." But between this sort of thing and the sort of thing described by the Saturday Reviewers there is a very wide gulf—a gulf made by that strong conservative element in the feminine nature of which the writer in question seems to have so little notion. Women turn themselves into painted courtesans for two reasons—as a means of gaining a subsistence which is impracticable in any other way or because they have a natural taste for the business. The first motive is common, and the second is rare; so rare that where the first does not exist, the rapprochement of the Saturday Reviewer is a wanton exaggeration in the interest of sensationalism. The whole indictment represented by this volume seems to us perfectly irrational. It is impossible to discuss and condemn the follies of "modern women" apart from those of modern men. They are all part and parcel of the follies of modern civilization, which is working itself out through innumerable blunders. It seems to us supremely absurd to stand up in the high places and endeavor, with a long lash and a good deal of bad language, to drive women back into the ancient fold. Their extravagance is a part of their increased freedom, and their increased freedom a part of the growth of society. The lamentable results—the extremely uncomfortable "wreck" society would be sure to incur from an attempt to fasten again upon womankind the tether which was sufficient unto the aspirations of Miss Hannah More and Miss Edgeworth, the authors of these papers would be the first to denounce. We are all of us extravagant, superficial, and luxurious together. It is a "sign of the times." Women share in the fault not as women, but as simple human beings. As women, they strike us as still remarkably patient, submissive, sympathetic—remarkably well-disposed to model themselves on the judgment and wishes of men. They reflect with great clearness the state of the heart and imagination of men. When they present an ugly picture, therefore, we think it the part of wisdom for men to cast a glance at their own internal economy. If there is any truth in the volume before us, they have a vast deal to answer for. They give the ton—they pitch the key.

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR OCTOBER.

Two Englishmen, Mr. Leslie Stephen and Mr. R. D. Osborn, an Indian officer, do the best writing in this number of the North American, which, by the way, is neither so large nor so good as usual. Mr. Osborn's account of the siege of Delhi is very graphic and interesting. It was well enough known before how it is that the English maintain themselves as masters of the millions of India, but it is a vivid flash of light on the subject when we are told of John Nicholson's having been adopted as a god by a new sect of fanatics which arose at his death and which to-day pays divine honors to "Nikkulseyn." Nicholson was an officer of cavalry, and, like hundreds of other English soldiers who have made themselves famous in the annals of Hindostan—or who have gone unknown to the grave—was a prodigy of hardihood, activity, and all the qualities that enable men to fight long and hard—"bodies of iron and souls of fire." He was the reality of which our friend Royston Keene Lawrence is the brummagem. But Royston Keene or Mr. Guy Livingstone would not have written anything with the tone of this:

"'Fancy,' he writes, 'a wretched little Wuzeeree child, who had been put up to poison food, on my asking him if he knew it was wrong to kill people, saying he knew it was wrong to kill with a knife or sword. I asked him why, and he said, 'Because the blood left marks.' And again, in the same letter: 'Before I close this, I must tell you of the last Bunnochee murder, it is so horribly characteristic of the bloodthirstiness and bigotry of their dispositions. The murderer killed his brother near Gurwalla, and was brought in to me on a frightfully hot evening, looking dreadfully parched and exhausted. 'Why,' said I, 'is it possible you have walked in, fasting, on a day like this?' 'Thank God,' said he, 'I am a regular faster.' 'Why have you killed your brother?' 'I saw a fowl killed last night, and the sight of blood put the devil into me.' He had chopped up his brother, stood a long chase, and been marched in here; but he was keeping the fast."

"In the character of this wild people Nicholson in a very brief time effected wonderful changes. Murder, burglary, and highway robbery became things of the past; and 'the Bunnochees,' writes Sir Herbert Edwardes, 'reflecting on their own metamorphosis in the village gatherings under the vines, by the streams they once delighted so to fight for, have come to the conclusion that the good Mohammedans of historic ages must have been just like 'Nikkulseyn.'"

Of these same people as they appeared at the time of the mutiny Mr. Osborn speaks as follows:

"How they fought for us at Delhi and Lucknow, and on a hundred other battle-fields, ought never to be forgotten by Englishmen; and, whether as infantry or cavalry, we feel assured that, under officers they admired and trusted, these gallant soldiers would hold their own against the best disciplined armies of Europe. It was pleasant to see the thorough good understanding which existed between them and the English soldiers, apparently in no way hindered or diminished by their total want of any common language. The English soldier would stroll down to pay a visit to his friend, the Sikh subahdar. The latter, delighted to see him, would at once offer him his stool, sitting himself, meanwhile, on his bed. The subahdar, with all the finished courtesy of a native, would then proceed to enquire after his friend's health in excellent Pushtoo; the other, nothing disconcerted, replies, maybe, in the Yorkshire dialect. The conversation becomes general, and has been known to extend over considerable spaces of time. Unlike the Hindustani, both Sikh and Ghoorkha have a strong taste for rum; and the mere fact that they could take their 'grog' like men raised them immeasurably in the estimation of the British soldier."

Mr. Stephen's article—as vigorously written as anything of his which we have seen—is upon "The Political Situation in England," and may be taken as the views and opinions of an enlightened, advanced Liberal—views and opinions which we accept with hardly the least reservation, and which we commend to the attention of all persons who take an interest in the revolution, of world-wide importance, now going on in social and political England. We should say that, perhaps, something ought to have been said about what seems to us the essential egotism of Mr. Gladstone's character; but, after all, it is not Mr. Gladstone who is leading his party so much as it is the party that is leading him, and the thing can be understood without giving too much study to him personally. The following sentences from this clever essay, with their humorous characterization of the Britisher's "native" and "foreigner," are a specimen of happy writing:

"John Bull, it is generally supposed, is a tolerably self-satisfied old gentleman. He has a profound contempt for that large class of two-legged animals which he describes summarily as foreigners or natives: the natives representing the more dark-colored varieties; and the foreigners, those who affect a certain semblance of civilization. And doubtless he possesses a vast fund of self-complacency, which is not the least evident in his moments of self-depreciation. His proverbial phrase, that they manage things better in France, implies a rooted conviction that, however well they manage things, they are Frenchmen for all that. Yet he does depreciate himself at times with surprising vigor and success. For some time past he has been in one of these fits. He has found no names bad enough to throw at some of his pet objects of veneration. As a savage will sometimes thrash his favorite idol for not bringing him luck, John Bull has been heartily belaboring things of which in his ordinary state he is more inclined to brag."

Far enough from being happy writing is Mr. Wasson's screed concerning "The Epic Philosophy." Not that his main idea is not to be accepted. On the contrary, it has long been fully accepted. And in many of the details the work is well done; nobody will, for instance, say no to the author's remarks on the "Iliad;" and, bearing in mind the definition of the epic which the writer insists upon, it is a more than usually good stroke of criticism to speak of the "Faust" as a half-epic or demi-epic. But that repellant, repulsive style which no man who keeps himself decently in hand could consent to write, Mr. Wasson, like many of the less distinguished transcendental writers, luxuriates in offensively. There is a better way than this of saying what Mr. Wasson wants to say in the words following: "Not by dead similarities, but by the living, flowing fellowship of heart-language do the unlikes of voiceful nature blend and sympathize in his thought." In fact, there are many better ways of saying it, as any one is well aware who is conversant with the critical commonplaces of the last half-century. It is, indeed, one of the dangers of an habitual practice of this inflated sort of writing, that it is with more than necessary difficulty that one makes sure one is not parading truisms—which remark is itself a truism that ought not to have escaped Mr. Wasson's attention. Still—or rather all the more on account of this fault—we advise the careful perusal of his article, which contains so much better thinking than writing that it is capable of instructing many and will disgust but few—and those few will be much displeased only with some of it.

Mr. George B. Woods is, we think, a new contributor to our more elaborate periodical literature, though he is well known to the world of journalism. His letters from Washington to the Boston Advertiser during the impeachment trial were excellent, and much the best of all the correspondence that was then sent out from the capital. His paper on "The New York Convention" is pretty well done, though it appears he has fallen into some errors of fact—as in attributing patriotic and valuable military services to the General McCook who mismanaged the Ohio delegation, and was therefore made to yield the leadership to Mr. Vallandigham. Had General McCook been in the field at all, it is possible that he might have been on the Federal side. His services in civil life were about as patriotic and valuable as those of Vallandigham himself. We think, too, that much might be said, which would be important to a full understanding of the inner workings of the convention, concerning the machinations of Messrs. Tilden and Green and the other managers of the New York men. Mr. Seymour, we are now inclined to believe, was honest enough, as politicians of his stamp go, in his intention to carry out the bargain with Mr. Chase. Perhaps there are tears in onions nearly as full of real feeling as some, at least, of those that he shed when he had lent himself to the violation of that bargain; but an appreciable part of his grief we take to have been quite sincere. We have not, however, been able to believe that some of Mr. Seymour's old companions in politics ever, from first to last, intended that anybody but he should be the nominee; and it seems to us reasonable to think that but for the plotting of some of our New York manipulators of State politics, Vallandigham's plans, on the success of which he is allowed to felicitate himself, would have turned out as perfectly futile as most of that gentleman's scheming.

Mr. Henry Brooks Adams talks learnedly and, to our mind, sensibly, though we do not wholly follow him, in his review of the tenth edition of Sir Charles Lyell's "Principles of Geology." He shows the unconclusive nature of the results already attained, but perhaps is a little long in doing it —or lengthy, to use a term somewhat more fully expressive. Mr. H. T. Tuckerman is to be trusted, we suppose, in his statements of the facts of D'Azeglio's life; and so, let us hope, is Mr. F. E. Abbot in all that he says of Mr. Herbert Spencer. "Harvard College Library" is the title of an article by Mr. Cutter, one of the assistant librarians in that institution, and, being his, is painstakingly accurate. It is not a pleasant picture that he presents to the graduates of our oldest university, and it will not be long, we imagine, before some of the alumni will be moved to do something to bring about a better state of things. An easy way, and one of some value, would be for each to subscribe for the Advocate, which offers to give all its earnings to the library fund. The class secretaries might even take the responsibility of doing so. But the State Legislature, knowing that Massachusetts without Harvard would not be the Massachusetts that she now is, but a Massachusetts that the world would respect far less, might possibly be induced to give something—the gift being made contingent on the raising of a certain sum by the college itself. It is a pity that Mr. Agassiz, with his nice knowledge of the legislative nature, does not—naturally he could not —take as much interest in the growth of the library as in that of the other collections at Cambridge.

The strictly literary part of this number of the quarterly is done by Mr. Henry James, Jr., in his review of George Eliot as a poet, and by the writers of the "Critical Notices." Mr. James's judgment in the matter of "The Spanish Gypsy" appears to us entirely sound. We were reduced to incredulity for comfort when we heard that the author was very much pleased with the reviews of her poem which had, some time since, been published by the English press. They almost all seemed to us rather to show how much the English literary world esteems and likes George Eliot than to display anything like a just appreciation of the performance which the critics had in hand. We ourselves imagine that her second thought will be to forswear henceforth the writing of verses.

The shorter critical notices are, without exception, good; though we should say—if it is not impertinent to give his name where he has not given it—that Mr. Lowell did well to keep to general disquisition in the case of Mr. J. J. Piatt's poems rather than to dwell long upon the poems themselves. It is fortunate, too, that antiquarians have several ways of proving their usefulness to mankind at large; the Popham controversy troubles few souls except by its existence.

Mildred: A Novel. By Georgiana M. Craik, author of "Leslie Tyrrell," "Faith Unwin's Ordeal," etc. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1868.)—As novels go, "Mildred" is a good novel—although it is far enough from being so in any sense in which one would speak of "The Newcomes" or "The Mill on the Floss" or "On the Heights" as good novels. With books like those it stands no comparison whatever, nor, to go a step lower, with Mr. Trollope's novels, nor with "John Halifax," or certain other stories of that class. Its merits as a work of art, that is to say, are not positive but relative—they appear plainly enough when the book is contrasted with the host of third-rate novels that glut the market, but dwindle rapidly when it is measured by severer standards. It is, however, very pleasantly and unaffectedly written, has a well-conceived heroine, and a hero who, though he may possibly have prototypes in nature, certainly has none in recent fiction. The book would have been better for a wise condensation in some places—the conversations, for instance, are nearly always unnecessarily long—and for more elaboration in others. Its chief fault is, it seems to us, that the author either failed to appreciate the use that might have been made of the materials at her hand, or had not skill enough to manage them well. The real problem which lay before her, the eleven years' of waiting and heart-breaking which her heroine is made to undergo, is passed over with a weak precipitation which settles Miss Craik's place in literature rather as a pleasant narrator of love stories, than as a skilful analyzer of human life and passion. So few writers present any claims to this distinction which are worth taking into account that it may be thought needless to make a formal denial with regard to Miss Craik's; and it would be so if she did not show through all her shortcomings a laudable ambition to do better and more artistic work than she has yet accomplished.

Natural History of Birds. Lectures on Ornithology, in Ten Parts. By Grace Anna Lewis. Part I. (Philadelphia: J. A. Bancroft & Co. 1868.)—Miss Lewis, of Philadelphia, has published a specimen number of "Lectures on Ornithology," in the hope that there will be encouragement for the whole series. In this we trust she will not be disappointed. Her work is vouched for as being, what it bears the marks of being, grounded on original and faithful study; one of the fruits, we may pronounce it, of the impulse given by Agassiz to the study of natural history in this country twenty years ago. The lecture form is not that best adapted to a complete treatise, because the ordinary conditions of time imposed upon the lecturer forbid such an arrangement and proportioning of his subject as he might choose for other reasons; besides that the style of the lecture-room is not—at least ought not to be—that best suited for reading. It has appeared to us that there are in the lectures before us some passages, aimed at hearers, which readers can very well dispense with. A still greater, and perhaps unavoidable, fault in the lecture style, when published without alteration, is that what the speaker makes perfectly clear by gesture, emphasis, and inflection is frequently obscure in the printed page. It is so occasionally in these pages—although this may not always be due to the cause mentioned, but to the frequent neglect of original investigators to point out distinctly every one of the steps of their investigation. Thus, in the sub-class which she styles Primores, it is not clear to us precisely what she considers to be the rank and affinities of the ostrich; on page 23 its class is spoken of as occupying "the lowest position among existing birds," while on page 13 it is said to "approach most nearly to the Mammals," which would seem to be the highest rank. The whole treatment of the second sub-class, "Terraquatiles," is exceedingly clear and interesting; the third, the "Insenores" (in which she follows Agassiz in placing the Raptores and Scansores), is obscure—we suspect because the exigencies of the lecture hour made it impossible to give the subject the full space which it needed.

Little Women; or, Meg, Jo, Beth, and Amy. By Louisa M. Alcott. Illustrated by May Alcott. (Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1868.)—Miss Alcott's new juvenile is an agreeable little story, which is not only very well adapted to the readers for whom it is especially intended, but may also be read with pleasure by older people. The girls depicted all belong to healthy types, and are drawn with a certain cleverness, although there is in the book a lack of what painters call atmosphere—things and people being painted too much in "local colors," and remaining, under all circumstances, somewhat too persistently themselves. The letterpress is accompanied by four or five indifferently executed illustrations, in which Miss May Alcott betrays not only a want of anatomical knowledge, and that indifference to or non-recognition of the subtle beauty of the lines of the female figure which so generally marks women artists, but also the fact that she has not closely studied the text which she illustrates.

The Week.

THERE is plenty of partisan murdering still going on at the South, although the people are of course aware that the Republican party, with a Congress very well disposed to make thorough work and a President very well disposed to use the veto power only when it is necessary, and the executive power whenever it is necessary, are going to be in power for the next two years, and probably for the next four. But registration is going on, and that is an exacerbating process. A Mr. Scott, a judge of election in Missouri, was called to the door of his house in the town of Harlem and killed on the threshold. He was a Republican who had given information to the board of registrars. In Monroe County, Arkansas, the Honorable James Hinds and the Honorable J. R. Brooks, the one a member of Congress, the other of the State Legislature, and both Republicans, were attacked by a gang of men, and Hinds was killed in the road, while Brooks was dangerously wounded. A day or two previously there were "more Democratic gains"—we suggest this phrase to the World as a good one—Mr. James Coolsey, a well-known Republican of the same county, having been shot for political reasons. At Boston, Texas, on the 7th inst., a Bureau agent died of murder. In Madison County, North Carolina, on this day week, at a mass meeting of Conservatives, a riot occurred, which resulted in the flight of the negroes without loss of life, but with some bruises. But on Saturday last New Orleans had a riot which resulted in the death of some ten or twelve men, of whom the majority were colored. The negroes were compelled to betake themselves to the shelter of their houses. Even the colored members of the police force were removed from their places, and told to keep themselves out of sight; and the whites filled the streets, listening to speeches from Steedman and other speakers. Meantime another riot occurred in the adjoining parish of St. Bernard, and troops were sent from the city, when immediately armed bands of the whites attempted to leave for the scene of action, and a self-constituted white police offered to preserve the peace of the city. General Rousseau had the sense to send these people about their business; but Governor Warmoth has had to ask him to take the government into his own hands. Practically, Louisiana is in complete rebellion against the acts of Congress, and will be ruled by rebels or by the military for some time to come. Whether or not there will be any election is uncertain. Mr. Johnson meantime "discoorses" on the finances with the tongue of an enchanter.

The naturalization mill has finished its work for this election, having ground out 35,000 voters in this city alone. Of these, 10,000 are perhaps rightly admitted, 10,000 have passed through the machine without having been here five years, and the other 15,000 have never, at any rate, been near the court-room; indeed, from 5,000 to 7,000 of these latter are non-existent. This is what one of our "upright judges"—he was upright at the moment—did one day last week. He invited a friend who happened to be in his court-room to sit by him while he played a little joke. Then he left off calling the names from the list before him and proceeded to call off a long string of purely imaginary names invented by himself on the spur of the moment: John Smith, James Snooks, John Jones, Thomas Noakes, and the like. For every name a man instantly answered, and took a certificate! Finally, seeing a person on the other side of the room scratching his head, the judge called out, "George Scratchem!" "Here!" responded a voice. "Take that man outside to scratch," said his honor to the usher; and resumed the more regular manufacture of voters. Yet there is not a single Democratic lawyer of any weight in this city who dares to come out and run for a certain one of our judgeships against this audacious ruffian, who might as well as not be defeated had any of his nominal party associates the nerve to face him and his backers. It is notorious that even among the nominating leaders, whom he purchases with services such as we have been speaking of and with money, he has not one friend and many enemies. At least 10,000 certificates of naturalization have been issued for the use of "repeaters," and scattered through the State. The total number of certificates fraudulently obtained, in this and other cities, is at least 25,000 to 30,000. This is a heavy load for Grant to carry in this State, and may be too much for him. Although, had we known the dimensions of the fraud perpetrated, our tone in predicting the result in this State might have been even less confident than it has been, we are still reasonably hopeful that this enormous wickedness will fail to achieve its purpose. Thousands of Democrats have been disgusted by the shameless conduct of their leaders, and Hoffman will lose more votes than he suspects, even in this city, as a consequence of the means which are used for his election.

---

The Democrats have been long endeavoring to enlist Andrew Johnson in the canvass, but he has, for some unexplained reason, until now given them no open assistance by any public expression of his "views." He has, however, at last taken the field. He commenced operations last week by a telegram to Mr. Seymour, urging him to enter the canvass in person against "the despotic power now ready to enter the very gates of the citadel." He also expresses his "trust that Mr. Seymour may speak with an inspired tongue," which Mr. Seymour certainly will, if he be allowed any choice in the matter. Mr. Johnson's greatest contribution to the literature of the campaign is, however, his letter to General Ewing, "on the subject of the finances." It is not long, and yet it gives a history of the national liabilities from the foundation of the Government to October 24, 1868. After this comprehensive survey, he comes to the deliberate conclusion that if the debt is allowed to become "permanent and increasing," forty millions of people will become "slaves" to "bondholders and tax-gatherers." The letter contains many striking and impressive passages, but on the whole the one most worthy of quotation is this, which we commend to the attention of all thoughtful Radicals: "In 1776 our national independence was proclaimed, and, after an exhaustive, bloody struggle of seven years, was, in 1783, acknowledged by the parent Government." A captious critic might raise doubts as to the accuracy of these dates, but we suspect Mr. Johnson rarely ventures on statements of this kind without having carefully examined his ground.

"Warrington," a well-known Boston correspondent of the New York Tribune and Springfield Republican, filled nearly two columns of the former paper last week with a defence of General Butler and bitter denunciation of his enemies. The Springfield Republican, the Nation, and various other papers, oppose the general's re-election, and the reason is, we learn, that he is "a radical." We are unable to say whether we oppose him because he is "a radical," because we do not know what a Butlerite means when he uses the word "radical." If to be a radical is to be like General Butler, we are unquestionably the enemy of radicals, and our special reasons for disliking him we have given on various occasions in detail. Butlerites, however, use the term "radical" now in such a way that their saying that we denounce him because he is "a radical," explains about as much as if they said we denounced him because he was a "rumptyfoozle." Of the "rumptyfoozle" we know nothing, except that Thackeray described it in a short Latin poem as a strange beast brought over to England from foreign parts in two ships, and which immediately on landing was claimed by that rapacious tyrant and conservative George the Fourth. But the proprietors of the animal made answer in a noble verse, which we commend to the Butlerites for quotation in their stump speeches:

"Non, Georgius Quartus, non tibi dabimus rumptyfoozlum nostrum."

There is a fine spirit of defiance to arbitrary power breathing through this line which must commend it to the general's followers.

---

What the character of the general's defenders as politicians is, is well illustrated by the utterance of this very "Warrington" in the Springfield Republican, three short months ago, before the Worcester Convention sat, and of which, let us add, he was a member—indeed, if we are not mistaken, a secretary, or some such dignitary. Says he, talking of his master's little scheme of taxing the bonds:

"The Tribune quotes the Chicago Platform, but there is nothing in that against taxing the bonds, and it would have been impossible for the Chicago Convention to adopt anything contrary to that policy. It has doubtless been very cheerful reading for the European bondholders—our gratulatory articles about our own honesty at Chicago. But all the men inside of politics know that the resolutions on the subject of finances were as meaningless as it was possible to make them. Nothing can be more mischievous than to denounce all projects for the taxation of the bonds as 'repudiation.' What is the use of giving a wicked name to acts which neither the public nor the private conscience deems wicked? I venture to say that Gen. Butler cancarry the Essex district on this issue alone if he chooses, and any other smart man any other Massachusetts district, and I say Essex and Massachusetts because we are not behind any other community in moral sense. You cannot persuade a man who pays a tax of two hundred dollars every year on his house and quarter of an acre of land and income of a thousand dollars that it is wicked to tax the rich old bachelor who lives opposite, and who has his hundred thousand dollars in bonds, his fair proportion of the expense of the Government. He ought to be made to pay."

This is a funny illustration of the sense the mechanical politicians, the party scene-shifters and stage-carpenters, entertain about their own profundity, and the contempt they feel for the popular understanding, as well as of their peculiar mode of "serving the party." There, we see, is the whole question settled—Chicago platform "meaningless," intentionally "meaningless;" the forcible reduction of the interest on the public debt perfectly justifiable; poor man who does not like to stand by his bargain not to be asked to stand by it because the other party is a rich man; General Butler, or "any other smart man," sure to carry any Massachusetts district on this very swindle. The Convention, however, settled it the other way. Yet the school to which this writer belongs—and he is the only one of the disciples who can write with any force or ability—actually administer "moral" rebukes to Fessenden, and roll their eyes when the New York Irish elect John Morrissey, and ascribe the lowness of American securities in foreign markets to "aristocratic hatred of our institutions."

General Hawley, we see, has addressed a most creditable letter to Mr. R. H. Dana, commenting severely on Butler's financial heresies, and encouraging Mr. Dana in the stand he is making, under all sorts of difficulties, against the flood of unscrupulousness which seems to be threatening to submerge the Fifth District. General Hawley says that only two members of the Committee on Resolutions favored the Butlerite view of the nation's obligations, and "the strong tide in the right direction was not conscious of their resistance, if they made any. In the Convention itself, covert repudiation made no sign. That body itself asserted its opinions with vigor and clearness, and, as it supposed, with unmistakable clearness. It takes much ingenuity and more violence to make its declarations sanction, or in any degree cover, those of the Tammany Convention." What do those cunning, 'cute creatures, "the men inside politics," say to this? General Hawley adds that General Butler, as regards financial matters, "is in deadly opposition alike to true radicalism and true conservatism;" and that one consequence of considering bond-taxation and greenback-substitution "non-essentials" would probably be "an immortality of shame." Finally he tells Mr. Dana that "he admires and respects his course" in "standing out for sound principles against the pressure of old friends and great majorities," and "bids him fight it out on that line." We are heartily glad to see that he is doing so. No matter whether Butler be elected or not, the opposition to him is every day awakening the conscience of the country, both as regards the value of character in public men and as regards the moral obligations of great communities. The rough and ready "moral reformers" and clergymen who are now showing themselves in the Butler ranks, will live to be as thoroughly ashamed of their conduct as a good many of their prototypes now are of ever having defended or been lukewarm about slavery. The kingdom of heaven may not be at hand, but neither is the reign of unmitigated and unblushing rascality.

We are very sorry to have to recur once more to Mr. Reverdy Johnson's performances in England; but it would be useless, even if it were right, to attempt to conceal the fact that he is causing the judicious of all parties to grieve deeply. Of the speech-making in which he is indulging we shall only say that, in the first place, it needs more discretion than he seems to possess to prevent its doing mischief; and, in the second, that no diplomat who knew England would expect it to do any good. There is no country in Europe in which, in spite of the popular form of government, oratory is of less use to a foreign minister. But we might forgive Mr. Johnson's speech-making if it were not for his fraternization with notorious enemies and revilers of the United States Government. Considering what kind of stuff after-dinner oratory is, we are, as a general rule, indisposed to hold a gentleman who is replying to a toast responsible for anything he says, as in nine cases out of ten he doesn't know himself what he is saying; but an American diplomatist who cannot keep from singling out Lord Wharncliffe and Mr. Roebuck and their like for expressions of friendship and esteem, even in after-dinner speeches, had really better come home. In doing this, as we have said two or three weeks ago, he is not simply wounding American susceptibilities, but he is violating all the proprieties of diplomatic life. His last performance in this line has been a public and cordial hand-shaking with Mr. Laird, at Liverpool. It may not be generally known that Mr. Laird was not simply the builder of the Alabama and other Confederate ships—for this he might have been in the way of trade—but that he built them joyfully and put feeling into them, and boasted in the House of Commons of his share in sending out the Alabama as the act of his life in which he felt most satisfaction. He was one of the most truculent and insolent advocates in Parliament, also, of the recognition of the Confederacy; and one of the last occasions, if we are not mistaken, in which he opened his lips in public about the war was in July, 1863, when he gleefully and tauntingly predicted that the next mail would bring the news of the destruction of the Federal armies in Pennsylvania and the capture of Washington by Lee, and thus force the ministry to acknowledge the independence of the Confederacy. We suppose Mr. Johnson has by this time completed his negotiations with Lord Stanley. If so, we hope Mr. Seward will have the grace to recall him. Where is "McCracken" all this time? Those who opposed Mr. Johnson's appointment, however, because he is a Democrat, need not attempt to take any comfort from these admissions of ours about him. He has failed not because he is a Democrat, but because he is—well, something which a good many fine young Radicals are also.

In 1864 General Grant found that General Lee was receiving surreptitious supplies from within the lines of Butler's army. He ordered Butler to "report at Lowell," which Butler did, but he wisely took with him certain records of the proceedings in certain courts-martial. Grant sent General George Gordon, a man whom he entirely trusted, to look into the affairs of Butler, his brother-in-law, Fisher A. Hildreth, and other agents and subordinates of the latter. Gordon has gone down into Butler's district and is making a speech, in which he charges Butler with having taken out of the department without leave the records above mentioned; with having on his way North prepared a fraudulent endorsement (without date) on the findings and sentence of a court in the case of one Whitlock; with having withheld this endorsement because Whitlock had consented, while under arrest, to give a great interest in his business to Hildreth, the brother-in-law; with having lent himself to the firm in question—Renshaw & Co. it called itself—and to three or four other firms engaged in selling supplies to rebel agents and getting cotton in return. Of course Butler "covered his tracks." All these charges, and more, made with the utmost particularity, Butler has utterly failed to meet. He of course quotes affidavits got from the men who are accused of having been implicated with him in the practices above mentioned, and of course his talent as a jury lawyer makes it very easy for him to handle these accusations in such a way before a large audience that they do not make at once their full impression. They have not the less ruined him, or at least sensibly shortened his rope, which has not now so very many months to run. We observe that he has declared that if Charles Sumner will declare that his (Butler's) election would be an undesirable thing he will withdraw. He would not; but still Mr. Sumner, of whose "courage" we used to hear something once, owes a duty to himself, and it will be interesting to see if he dares to perform it.

The Hartford Post asserts positively that the stories which have been for some time afloat that Mr. Charles Francis Adams favors Seymour and Blair, and is ill affected towards the Republican party, are "entirely false," and that he says that "he came home to obtain that rest to which he thinks his age and long public services entitle him, and that he shall not again mingle in politics and in public life." This statement, combined with the Post's opposition to Butler, makes it painfully evident that that paper has gone over to the Conservatives, and is now in league with the enemies of human freedom. It requires very little perspicacity to discover, as the world would admit if we mentioned the class of people who have discovered it, that Mr. Adams's professions of a desire for repose are simply intended to cover his participation in the most fiendish plots for the betrayal of the negro. If the telegraph offices were examined, and his communications with T——ll seized, and if his conversations with the man in the mask and long cloak, who meets him every night in his back kitchen, and who is believed by his neighbors to be F——den, were overheard, a good many dainty, kid-glove politicians would be astonished by what is going on "in our midst." Our advice to the faithful "dailies" and "weeklies" who are keeping watch on the crags of freedom is, to send out a very impudent and unscrupulous reporter to Mr. Adams's house, to have an "interview" with him, and get the whole story of his baseness from his own lips. Delicacy in such cases is treason to humanity. Whatever the hardened creature won't confess ought to be evolved from the moral consciousness of some right-minded editor. Mr. Adams's retirement and repose have, in our opinion, lasted about long enough. "The people" want to know what he is up to, and if the press is too corrupt or too weak to gratify them, we hope a Congressional Committee composed of the right men will prove more loyal to the great interests, etc., etc.

The Church Union, which has amongst other merits that of speaking out its mind freely, declares that the article which appeared recently in the Nation on the Water Street revival "was doubtless written by one who knows nothing about God's converting grace, and cannot write from an inside view of the work, which is now quietly and sweetly progressing in that part of the city." The spiritual condition of the writer of our article is, to use the popular phrase, "neither here nor there," and is not a proper subject for newspaper discussion; but this much we may say about it, that it is such as to cause him to rejoice heartily that he has not been obliged even by a sense of duty to take "an inside view of the work" in Water Street, for he has known enough about it all along to know that it was neither "sweet" nor "quiet." Moreover, it has, "humanly speaking"—and none of its promoters have any right to talk about it otherwise than "humanly"—proved a total failure. The Gospel is no longer "in Allen's den," but Allen is, and his harlots are, and the whole party are tenfold more the children of the devil than ever, and the net visible result of the movement—about the invisible results we shall take nobody's word—is that the community has been thoroughly disgusted, and great scandal brought on religion and decency, and the reformation of the Water Street brutes rendered more difficult than ever.

Affairs in Spain continue to look bright. There are occasional rumors of intrigues and counter intrigues amongst the revolutionary leaders composing the Central Junta, and though tranquillity reigns everywhere, and the new Government found the treasury well filled, and has been able to meet its obligations promptly, there will doubtless be no real feeling of security and confidence till a constituent assembly—to use the European phrase, or a constitutional convention, to use the American one—has met and framed a government. It will take some months for this, and, in the meantime, the country has nothing to rely on but the wisdom and moderation of the Prims and Serranos and the other chiefs of the new régime. The great danger of the crisis has, however, been touched on by our English correspondent on another page, namely, that the leaders of the revolution and the town populations, who are as yet its mainstay, are in advance of the mass of the population, and that, consequently, the sweeping reforms just made may not only not stand, but eventually bring about a reaction, such as occurred in so many other countries on the Continent after 1848. In the meantime, however, there is more "movement" in the Spanish funds than there has been for many a long year. They are not yet quotable on any of the leading European exchanges, but there are signs of a feeling in commercial circles that the three per cents. at 33 are not a bad investment. The Papal party everywhere, as might be expected, treat the revolution as the triumph of atheism. Archbishop Manning, in a recent lecture in London on the approaching Œcumenical Council, talks of Spain as a fallen angel, and even the Queen, whose moral infirmities are notorious, though the Pope did give her the Golden Rose, has found a defender in Sir George Bowyer, the well-known but somewhat too acute canon lawyer. Sir George says that Father Claret and Sister Patricinio, the monk and nun who have enjoyed the repute of directing the Queen's conscience, were two simple-minded persons who lived in blessed ignorance of, and indifference to, politics, and could not, therefore, have led her Majesty astray.

The death of M. Walewski, an illegitimate son of Napoleon I. by a Polish lady, and one of the present Emperor's most trusted advisers, has deprived the Imperial dynasty of the last of the three supporters and councillors who were really devoted to it, and who really commanded popular respect and affection. The other two were Messrs. Fould, the banker, and Count de Morny. Fould was "the man of business" of the Empire from its foundation in 1852, and whether in or out of office was listened to respectfully at the Tuileries, and prevented a thousand financial follies by his sagacious counsels. De Morny might have been called its "popularity man." He was a thorough Frenchman; and it was well said of him, that he had only to interrogate himself to know how the French public felt. He was hospitable, generous, kind-hearted—and, in fact, did more than any other man to give the new court a good footing in Parisian society and to feel the Parisian pulse for his chief. The rest of the Imperial entourage, such as Fleury, Persigny, St. Arnaud & Co., have never had any reputation or weight, and have always done the dirty work of the régime. The loss of the last of the three former must, at his age, make the Emperor feel that the shadows are thickening around him before the roots of the dynasty have struck into the soil.

WHAT MAY BE EXPECTED FROM GRANT'S ADMINISTRATION.

One of the unfortunate but inevitable accompaniments of a canvass, or in fact of all government by popular agitation, is that a measure cannot be carried without exciting extravagant expectations as to its result. It is impossible, for instance, in the present or any probable condition of the human faculties to elect a President by a party vote without leading the majority to look for a much greater improvement in the condition of the country as the reward of their exertions than is in the nature of things possible. Consequently, few Presidents ever pass through even one term without greatly disappointing their supporters. Of course there would be some disappointment even if an archangel were put in the chair, for it would not be in the power of an archangel to reward everybody who took an active part in the canvass, according to the applicant's own estimate of his deserts. But there is also sure to be a good deal of disappointment for which the hack politician is not responsible. No man can have ten or fifteen eulogistic "lives" written of him, or have several hundred orators and newspapers devote themselves for half a year to extolling him, and making light of his defects, without suffering from the cold criticisms of later and calmer days. Moreover, there is no man out of office, and who has never held office, who can ever have his fitness for office weighed accurately, even by the acutest observer. The number of those in every state of whom it may be said, with slight modification, what Tacitus said of Galba, that they enjoy a reputation for statesmanship the continuance of which depends on their never being called on to govern, is necessarily very great. Moreover, we have had a good many Presidents whose elevation was not even due to an untested reputation for administrative capacity, but simply to accident or intrigue.

The very best and ablest man must, therefore, owing to causes which have their root in human nature itself, expect to see the lustre of his name considerably dimmed by the time his first term of office has closed. We have little doubt this will prove true of Grant as of others, though none of his predecessors since Washington has gone through, under the eyes of the nation, before assuming office, such a severe trial of all his qualities, mental as well as moral, as he has. His enemies have tried in vain to represent him as a mere soldier, and to warn people against him, for reasons that would apply to St. Arnaud or Pelissier and Windischgratz; and the reason they have failed is, that the man who succeeds at the head of an American volunteer army can never be a mere soldier. A mere soldier could not and cannot command such an organization, because it is not and cannot be made the perfect military machine which is all set in motion by touching a single spring, as the Austrian or French army is. Even when in its best state for military purposes, it retains very largely its civil character, and has to be managed and manœuvred with a very large amount of that civil prudence, that power of persuasion, respect for prejudices and peculiarities, and skill in judging of individual character, which go to make a statesman's success. An American general who maintains good relations with the Federal Government, good relations with the governors of the States, retains the confidence and respect of the troops, and the good opinion of the public during arduous and difficult campaigns, such as Grant's have been, has passed through an ordeal such as no foreign general is ever called upon to encounter, and must possess many of the highest qualities of a civil ruler.

Within a very few days Grant will, we believe, be elected. While, therefore, perfectly aware that the triumph of the Republican party and the installation of Grant in the White House will not bring or even materially hasten the millennium, we believe there are certain things of the highest value which a man who is neither sanguine nor excited may, after due allowance has been made for the froth of the campaign, count on as all but certain to result from it. It will, in the first place, we will not say put an end to crimes and outrages at the South, but it will greatly diminish their number—so far diminish it as to produce what will be—for the South—a condition of peace and security; and this not wholly, or even in great part, by the application of force, for Grant will not have at his disposal the means of policing the South. But he will have the means of ending the flagrant disorders, partly by the supply of aid to the civil authorities in bad cases, and partly through the effect on the Southern imagination of the fact that the malcontents have neither sympathy nor support to look for at Washington. It must be remembered that order is not preserved in any community—not even in conquered communities—by the direct use of force. A reasonable apprehension of punishment, and a tolerably clear apprehension of the uselessness of resistance, is all that the most turbulent community needs to reduce it to something like tranquillity. Even in the worst districts of the South, the great bulk of the people desire a quiet life, and it only needs the belief that the state of things now established is not to be changed by assassination or arson, and that attempts to change it in this way will be repressed with the strong hand, to produce as close a semblance of order even in Texas as is possible in the existing moral condition of the population. The election of Grant will, in fact, be the approval by the country, after four years' deliberation, of the plan of reconstruction adopted by Congress. The most sanguine or flighty Southern politician will hardly continue to hope for the reversal of such a judgment as this.

In the next place, although we do not flatter ourselves that Grant's election will completely remove all danger to the public credit, it will give all the weight and influence of the Government, and of a formal expression of public opinion, to that portion of the Republican party which advocates the honest payment of the public debt. It will not silence the Butlerites; it may not prevent a split of the Republican party on this very question, and the return of its chief knaves and a large body of its more recent recruits to their old places in the Democratic ranks. But it will certainly cow, and may silence, the repudiators until the finances have been reduced to order, and something like a settled policy adopted with regard to revenue and taxation. That this is the general expectation both at home and abroad is shown in the rise in the value of greenbacks and Government bonds since the recent State elections. That is to say, the mere prospect of Grant's triumph has carried us nearly a fifth of the way towards specie payments without any cost to the country. His election will carry us still further, and then an economical management of the Treasury, and the suppression of War-Horses in the House and Senate, will, it is to be hoped, speedily do the rest.

Though last, not least, Grant's election will afford the best chance that has ever been offered of a reform in the civil service. It is only lately that the necessity of this has become fully apparent to the public. While population was small, society simple, and the work of government comparatively light, the evils of the existing system were not very striking. Since the war they have assumed proportions which it is no exaggeration to call awful, for they positively threaten the existence of the Government. From Presidents taken from the ranks of the regular politicians, bred under the influence of party usages and traditions, it was useless to expect any assistance in the work of reform. Even to Mr. Lincoln, honest and well-meaning as he was, the present plan of appointing public servants wore the appearance of a portion of the natural order of the universe, and there was something pathetic as well as painful in watching him devoting the first three precious months of his first term of office—when the enemy was literally at the gates, and the Government apparently in the throes of dissolution—to the distribution of "the spoils" in such manner as to "satisfy the claims of localities" and reward the various hack politicians of all degrees who had taken part in the canvass.

Now, Grant is not a regular politician. He will be the first President the country has had for many a long day on whom old party doctrines, as to "spoils" and "claims," will have no influence. He has been bred in a very different and a very much better school—a school in which honor and merit are still words that mean something, and that stand for forces in human affairs. He has shown, too, in his administration of the army, that he knows a good man when he sees him, and that as soon as he sees him he clasps him to him with hooks of steel. He is by education and temperament the foe of jobbers, intriguers, and blatterers, and will undoubtedly apply to the civil service, in so far as he can, the rules of selection and promotion by the aid of which he has given such splendid illustration to American military annals. We may therefore look for, at his hands, in the first place—if he gets a fair amount of support from the Senate—the formation of a cabinet in which knowledge and ability will count for a great deal, and the "claims of localities" and party usages for very little. We should not be surprised, for instance, and should be very much pleased—though we know nothing whatever about the probabilities—to see him put Mr. Sumner in the State Department and Mr. Wells in the Treasury. In the next place, the attempts to reform the whole civil service in which Mr. Jenckes and Mr. Patterson are engaged, and which will be renewed when Congress meets, will undoubtedly receive from him an amount of hearty support such as no regular politician would give them. He, like all military and naval officers, will, when brought into actual contact with the diplomatic, revenue, and postal service, be sickened by the spectacle of disorder and corruption which they offer, and will do what he can to make them what the army and navy are—a credit to the country instead of a shame and scandal.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AFTER THE ELECTION.

As we go to press, the reports which reach us from all quarters indicate that, although Mr. Dana's chances of election in the Essex District are by no means desperate, General Butler will very likely be successful and the Fifth Massachusetts District unfortunate. What we shall say in the present article is founded on the assumption of that probability, and if the assumption is incorrect, falls to the ground. Assuming, therefore, that General Butler succeeds in defeating Mr. Dana, what effect will the result have, not upon the members of the Butlerite sect of moralists, but upon the Republican party—upon the party which, for the past eight years, has held the reins of government—upon the party which has defeated the South and reconstructed the Union?

With the election of Grant and Colfax, the conflict about slavery, negro suffrage, and reconstruction must come to an end. For this election assures us that there shall be no re-enslavement, that in the States still disorganized the forces of the United States shall be used to the extent of the power of the Executive in protecting citizens at the South, whether black or white, in the exercise of all their rights, political as well as civil, and that the reconstruction acts shall be considered valid by all departments of the Government. More than this, as we have frequently pointed out, cannot be done. Military government of the South for the next twenty years—which, were it only possible, would be by far the best means of fostering the growth of peace there, accompanied as it would be by instruction for the negro and poor-white, and affording, as it would, protection to Northern emigrants—is unfortunately totally impossible. Unfortunately all parties are with rare unanimity agreed that the Southern States must, for the future, be left to themselves. A limit is already set to the Freedmen's Bureau, both by act of Congress and by common consent; and the minor theoretical topics of disagreement between the two parties—as, for instance, the criminality of treason and the question whether the Southern States at the end of the war were in or out of the Union—cannot very well any longer form substantial ground for difference. In other words, the chief points of dispute between Republicans and Democrats will be settled; the war which began forty years ago with the publication of the Liberator will have been ended in the complete triumph of the Liberator's cause. The Democrats will have been beaten, and the victorious hosts of the Republicans will be looking about them, uncertain in what fields to display their activity.

The Republicans will then find themselves composed of several small parties, different in aims, different in origin, different in destiny. We do not propose to enumerate them all, but some of them are these: In the first place, the old abolitionists, a party resting its claims to existence solely on the vigor of its conscience; in the second place, what may be called the later school of abolitionists, who began life by believing slavery to be not the most crying evil in America, but who were persuaded sooner or later into admitting that it was; in the third place, the majority of the party, who joined it to put down the rebellion with the simple feeling of patriotism; in the fourth place, the new negro voters, a body about which almost nothing is known, except that it is a docile body; and, in the fifth place, individual men of ability and distinguished unscrupulousness, who left their old party at the last moment to take sides with the stronger forces, and who are willing to do the same thing again. This fifth class is represented by, if not composed of, General Butler. The aim of the first class is the reign of "truth," a vague and unsatisfactory aim, because each one of them has his own notions of the proper definition of the word. The aim of the second class is simply good government and the application of the laws of reasoning and the deductions of experience to affairs of state. The third is quite as vague in its views as the first, and quite as much under the influence of its feelings. The object of the fourth is simply to be led to do what will make a tolerable life possible; while the fifth merely desires personal aggrandizement. Four of these classes were united by the war in the pursuit of a common enemy; the termination of the war and reconstruction leave them without any well-defined plan of action. One of them has just been called into existence. Meanwhile, it is necessary to observe that, though four of the classes are divided at hap-hazard into bondholders and non-bondholders, the limits of no one of them coincide with the limits of the bondholding and non-bondholding classes. The negroes, for example, are practically entirely non-bondholding. On the other hand, the Democrats also find their occupation gone, for slavery is abolished and the South is reconstructed. They are demoralized utterly.

Now, one of the two great parties being in a thoroughly disorganized state, and the other being undecided as to its future policy, a question of vital importance arises as to the payment of the debt. It is generally assumed that this question is settled by the announcement by the Democrats of their intention to pay the debt in greenbacks and to tax the bonds, and by the Republican declaration at Chicago that the debt is to be paid in good faith and that repudiation is a national crime. But although we are disposed to agree to the proposition that this might have been so had not the question of electing General Butler been made so prominent and interesting a one, by the refusal of a very large and respectable body of Republicans to support a man pledged to violate the honor of the country, it seems to us more probable that if General Butler is elected the five-twenty question will assume new and alarming proportions. And our reasons are these: The eyes of intelligent men all over the country are at this moment turned upon the Fifth Massachusetts District as one in which a test-case is trying, in which the question how much stretching the Chicago Platform will stand is being determined. It must not be forgotten that Butler himself has taken that platform as his, and has, in a letter to the Tribune, already long since stated his intention to pay the debt according to "good conscience," a phrase which does not differ essentially from "good faith," but which he interprets in his own peculiar fashion. Again, General Butler is, according to all received authorities, the great (Republican) apostle of the greenback plan,

> "That he who has sha'n't keep;
> And he shall get who can."

It was General Butler who received it from Pendleton, and who improved and perfected it. It is known as Butler's policy, and the question is whether Butler can, in the teeth of an active opposition, solely through the advantage which a regular nomination gives him, make the "payment of the debt in good faith" mean "payment of the debt in depreciated currency."

Only two or three State conventions have had the boldness yet to advocate in set terms the payment of the debt in gold and silver coin. Massachusetts has done so; but a vast majority of the States have made platforms which are only verbose amplifications of the maxim that "honesty is the best policy." The great question is, What do you mean by "good faith," and what do you mean by "repudiation?"—and the fact is that the Republican conventions have not generally dared to say what they do mean. Individual Republicans, like Secretary Stanton, have no objection to say what they think. But neither has General Butler. The conduct of Senator Morton shows the prevailing unsteadiness upon this and kindred points. Six months ago he said that he was "in favor of one currency for all," and used other expressions from which the public derived the impression that he thought the 5-20s should be paid in greenbacks, and that the currency should be paper. He has recently said that by "one currency" he meant "gold and silver," and that as for the payment of the 5-20s in greenbacks—"Why, gentlemen, breathes there a man with soul so dead," etc., etc. And what will he say six months hence? There never was a time when it was so curiously easy to misunderstand the plainest English words, and to misconceive wholly the political objects of statesmen. In the ordinary affairs of life, people generally know when other people mean gold and when they mean paper—or iron pyrites, as Mr. Atkinson would say—but in the present position of public affairs, the only thing one can find out, at least from conventions, which are the constituted organs of party expression, the organs of speech, the very tongues of their constituents, is that the love of "honesty," and "good faith," and "honor," and "equity," and "national integrity," and hatred of "baseness," "repudiation," and, let us say, all other forms of crime, has reached a development that, in any nation so young as this, must be regarded as highly gratifying, of course, but perhaps too precocious. When a great party, by its authorized agents, finds itself able to say nothing about the most important question which will agitate the country for the next generation but this, that it hates "vice," we cannot believe that there is any real union, any settled determination as to the particular form of "vice" which it is necessary to attack. Now, has the Republican party irrevocably made up its mind that the five-twenty bonds are to be paid in "gold and silver coin?" Has the Republican party irrevocably made up its mind that the bonds are not to be taxed? Twenty Republicans voted to adopt the report of the committee to which this subject was referred, and this was after the making of the Chicago Platform and that manly denunciation of the criminality of such proceedings, of which we hear so much. We believe that in the incoherent mass which will compose the Republican party after the election of Grant, a number of men, sufficiently large to exercise important influence, will be found ready to pay the debt in greenbacks, if only they can find a leader who calls himself Republican. If General Butler goes back to Congress, these men will reason in this way: The convention did not declare in favor of "gold and silver coin," except in a few cases; and in Massachusetts, where the strongest kind of resolutions were passed, they care so little in reality about it, that the chief repudiator of them all, the man who gave repudiation all its energy and living force, is sent back here, after a most active canvass—after a canvass which had its origin in the determination of the best men in the district that the five-twenty question should be made a plain one, and which was headed by one of the ablest men in the country. It is evident that the real power for the next two years is in Mr. Butler's hands to a most dangerous extent. The next Congress will contain more Democrats than the last, and they will vote solidly for repudiation in any form, as they did to tax the bonds in July.

We have discussed the question only as it bears upon the 5-20s; but there are a thousand other ways of bringing about what General Butler has so long advocated and apparently advocates now. For example, a sudden cry may be raised that we are over-taxed, that the corrupt native and the selfish foreign bondholder are forcing us to tax ourselves for their benefit, and ruining the country. Under this plea we might "pass" the semi-annual interest once or twice. Railroads managed by the smaller Butlers do such things with their dividends; why not governments? And surely no one—however inclined he is to suppose that the five-twenty question is really settled—will say that all other schemes of repudiation have been so thoroughly discussed as to preclude the possibility of a swindle. Let us repeat, that the Republican party has no settled policy for the years to come after the election of Grant; that both parties are in a loose, disorganized state; that at such moments unscrupulous men have a double power; and that if General Butler goes back to Congress, the party which sends him there will find itself split by the question of the debt into two factions which may never reunite. Harper's Weekly said the other day, that if the Republican party threw moral principle overboard, the party and the country are doomed. We do not agree as to the country, but we feel very sure about the party.

INJURIOUS WORKS AND INJURIOUS CRITICISM.

Miss Anna Dickinson has recently written a book, and Mrs. Stowe and Mrs. Lydia Maria Child having found it full of good feeling, have praised it lavishly on the ground that, whatever it may be as a novel, it is, as "a deed," a noble deed and a brave one. We are not going to quarrel at all with the way in which this critical opinion is worded. It is proverbial that to quarrel with the burning words of the poetical fraternity, if it is always easy, is very often very foolish, and shows a small and captious spirit which surely no one would like to make himself suspected of possessing. And we may say, without being cynical in the least, that we, for our part, frequently accept proverbs as true; the mere fact that many people habitually say a certain thing is not always conclusive proof of its entire or even of its partial falsity. So we are not unwilling to allow that "What Answer?" may rightfully be described as "a deed," though we confess that that would not have been our own way of speech if we had been trying to praise Miss Dickinson's novel, and most assuredly would not have been the way in which we should have spoken had we been intent on merely giving an honest, unimpassioned description of it. But people must talk as they can. And if the novel of "What Answer?" moves anybody to making the assertion that it is "a noble deed"—why, we may keep up a good deal of thinking, but we are not, on this present occasion, going to say anything in the way of verbal criticism. We are more inclined to beg the people who have said so, and who think so, to allow us to put upon their expression the meaning that it was the writing and publishing of "What Answer?" that was a noble deed, rather than that the book itself is such. If they will grant us thus much, then we will go on a step and say that they are wrong in many ways. This will become clear, we think, after a little of that honest consideration which the real importance of the subject ought to command from every person who tries to do his duty, and to enlighten his conscience from all possible sources before he takes the responsibility of action.

To talk of morality in the abstract is not nearly so easy as to act it in the abstract. We will, therefore, confine ourselves, for the present at least, to the concrete case before us. A thoroughly bad novel is put upon the market. Whatever a novel should have it lacks, and whatever a novel should not be it is. There is not a character in it. Its incidents are absurdly threadbare in all essentials. There is no plot. A chief difficulty of the very question—that of caste-feeling—which, as it pretends, is its chief concern, is in very great part shirked by the author's taking as the representative of a race despised on account of its color a most lovely and lovable woman, so entirely "white" that not even her lover suspected that she was "black" until he was told so. It is not true, as some have said, that there is anything approaching strict adherence to truth in the facts of the story. The style in which the book is written, if it is not good, is yet better than the school-girlish general conception would lead one to expect. Still, in each chapter, or in many of the chapters, there is more or less of that inflamed newspaper English which some people describe as being eloquence, but which, one day—for we are hopeful concerning her—Miss Dickinson will, we feel confident, be very sorry to have ever written or spoken. This eloquence is emitted in behalf of a certain "cause" about which it is now proper, and for some time to come will be proper, for almost all of us to keep silence till certain laborious ethnologists and physiologists—some of whom we assure our three ladies are to-day lean and pale from conscientious labor through many years—reach the conclusions which, as yet, elude them, but which they hope may yet be reached, and about which Miss Dickinson talks as if she had entirely settled the question. The novel, then, is emphatically a bad novel—without interest, even possessing some positive qualities which inflict pain on any one who in the least values art; without thought, and even flouting the labors of some of the most conscientious and studious thinkers in the world; without goodness of style, even characterized by many vices of style which—though Miss Dickinson may not to-day fully believe it—will do something to lead more than one young writer astray, and thus will do a service she never meant to do to the cause of immorality; will put off the times when we shall all think with clearness, and hate vulgarity of tone, and value that simple honesty of feeling and justness of thought which are the mark of the best natures, and which find all but inevitable expression in the best form as well as the best matter of literature.

This being the question, whether or not to praise such a book because one respects the author and has unbounded faith in the goodness and even the admirable greatness of her intentions—what answer? The question is at bottom quite the same in the case of Miss Dickinson's orations; though as an orator—and this cannot be said of her as a novelist—she did good service for which we cannot help being grateful—though we feel that we ought to encourage the sentiment of ingratitude—in more than one of our hardest fought political campaigns. But ought we to praise her for her labors? We ought to admit the good of which they have been productive and that the laborer meant even more good than she did; but nevertheless, it is past hoping, we ought to condemn her with little reservation. As Dr. Holland would say, we ought to condemn her for the same reason that we ought not to praise her. Praise and blame are revelations of the feelings of the speakers, and often they describe the thing itself which is praised or blamed, but also they encourage and deter. Now, to deter Miss Dickinson from the writing of such novels as the one she has written, and the making of such speeches as she has been in the habit of making, is, we are persuaded, a duty which we owe to her, which we owe to morals, and also to art —which is never good without being an ally, often perhaps indirect, of the best morals, and is never bad—we mean artistically bad—without being good morality's subtle but sure enemy.

To speak a little more at length of Miss Dickinson as an orator, inasmuch as we have spoken of her somewhat in extenso as a writer. She delights in speaking. We do not at all mean that she has any special liking for publicity, or that her whole course, since she became a public personage, has not been perfectly consistent with excellent claims to the high esteem of all who respect the truly womanly and the truly manly in character. Very far from it. But it is as natural as possible for her to orate; she cannot help it, even when she is holding the pen. Often enough she deserts her writing-desk for the platform, even when thoughtfully writing a novel is the business which she has in hand, and to which she should be attending closely; or rather she turns her desk into a "stump." Her really remarkable success before the people—the people considered as audiences, partisan in character, and assembled in the evening with brass bands and glee-clubs—is alone enough to prove this. She speaks with much glow and fire, and sometimes with an enthusiasm which is not always of the merely effervescent kind, but is sometimes consequent on the vivid perception of the real truth of things, and an ardent desire to make others see as she sees. It is to her, we think, though we are not sure, that we owe the happy phrase descriptive of our first year of the rebellion, the year of Bull Run and of an utterly unorganized army, but a year of great ardor and of unthinking patriotism—that we were then making war by precipitating ourselves on the South "in town meetings." But to be capable of fiery enthusiasm of speech, though it is one, and a great one, of the orator's qualifications, and though it is always enough to lift the average audience off its feet, is not a sufficient justification for the making of speeches. The political speech-maker ought to have, beside that, some considerable political and other knowledge, and ought to have done a good deal of hard thinking. We are not saying a really unkind thing, though we fear we are offending some people whom we should be, on the whole, glad to please, when we say that many of Miss Dickinson's orations made the judicious grieve for her hearers and for herself. She constantly attempted the handling of things of which she is as entirely unqualified to treat as a peri would be unqualified to make a commentary on Wheaton's books concerning international law. Not to put too fine a point on it, she frequently was very ignorant and very illogical, and was often rewarded with plaudits of which we can only hope that she did not feel proud, for she really was as "noisy" in mind and spirit as her hearers were in body.

In her book, and in her speeches, Miss Dickinson has been content to have good intentions—and it is because she means so well that it is so disagreeable to condemn her so thoroughly as we cannot help doing—has contented herself with having good intentions, and—with not doing her best. But not to do the best one can is even more surely fatal to real morality than it is fatal to success in artistic works. By laboriously educating herself, by consenting to hold her tongue until she had properly cultivated her fine powers, by working hard for herself before she began working for even the holiest of causes, Miss Dickinson—and we hope for her own sake that she will attend to this point—might have done far better service to the work in which she was interested, might have removed many dangers from her own individual path, and might have saved herself from the pain of the reflection, which we trust she is one day sure to make, that her bad novel, and her essentially bad speeches, have really, in the long run, done something to put off the day when wisdom, intellectual and moral, which is the sole hope of the world, shall be everywhere and in all men. Mr. Hinton Helper, with his late cruel and silly books, is not a person with whom we should be willing to rank Miss Dickinson—unless, indeed, we were talking with people who have given some comprehensive consideration to certain subjects on which most people have not as yet thought. But, without making odious comparisons, it is, we must say, surely true that bad preaching on the best of texts is in the end as immoral as good preaching employed for the enforcement of the worst of texts. Audiences may say No, and hasty people, whose hearts are with the speaker, may for a moment resent the making of profitable remarks to him or her; but the truth remains that there is not yet anybody in the world who has a right to make a poor book or to talk cheap eloquence, no matter what may be the cause which it is sought to promote.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, October 8, 1868.

OUR great occupation since I last wrote to you has been the Spanish revolution. I do not think, however, I can add very much upon that subject to what you must already have heard about it. Of all the revolutions which have taken place in Europe for the last twenty years, it has been, I think, the quietest by far; and at the present moment it has the most promising appearance. Prim goes to Cadiz, the fleet join him, the troops join the fleet, the people join the forces, and, after just fighting enough to show that the parties interested are in real earnest, the Queen steps over the frontier, curses her late subjects in good set terms, and makes an end—so it would appear, at least—of the last of the Bourbon monarchies. On the other hand, there are to be constituent Cortes, elected by universal suffrage, and charged by the popular will to do every sort of thing, possible and impossible, by which the people of Spain can be made happy and prosperous for ever. It is more like a transformation scene at a pantomime than anything else. One gets sceptical, however, as he goes on in life, as to the possibility of such triumphs as these—of the good over the bad principle. I do not profess to have any special knowledge of Spanish affairs—hardly any one has who is not specially acquainted with the country—but it appears to me quite incredible that things should have gone on as they are said to have gone on for all these years, if the Spaniards had not had a great deal in common with their queen. They never would have allowed her to act as she did, and in particular to do her very utmost for the overthrow and destruction of all the liberal measures which were carried, however hastily and imperfectly, thirty years ago—and of which, by right, she ought to have been the special representative and defender—if there had not been a great deal in common between them and her. The reactionary and superstitious party must be uncommonly strong in Spain, and I cannot believe that a mere change of government produced in this manner will weaken their strength. We shall surely hear more of all this before matters are ended.

To me the most interesting aspect of the Spanish revolution is its bearing on the rest of Europe, and especially on the great contest which is going on everywhere between the priestly party and their antagonists. You will probably have seen the Pope's various addresses to the world upon the occasion of the Œcumenical Council, and in particular his earnest request to Protestants, and to the non-Catholic world in general, to enter into communion with him. Take that letter, with the fact that the Œcumenical Council avows itself to be held as a sort of recognition of the principle that henceforth church and state are to be regarded as separate and—this is not said, but is implied—antagonistic bodies; that Austria has flown in the face of the Pope; that Italy is in open rebellion against him; that France is a most slippery and questionable friend; and the Spanish revolution will show you that at the very moment when the temporal and spiritual powers are dissolving partnership in the worst and most violent of moods with each other, the last of the faithful—the only nation which still professed to uphold the old principles in their full perfection and development —has seceded. I do not think the importance of this can be exaggerated; and I do think it possible that you in America may be specially tempted to undervalue its importance. I do not profess to know much about your ways of thinking and feeling on such subjects, but it seems to me that by a series of accidents you have been thrown into a position which prevents you from seeing how great a question the question of the relations between church and state really is, or what are the consequences of the practical solution of the question which you have been led to adopt. Your principle, as I understand it, is that religion is a matter of private opinion; that religious associations are voluntary bodies, like clubs for any other lawful purpose, and that government has nothing to do with religion, but rests on a basis of its own. I do not at all say that this is not true. I am more disposed to think that it is; but I do not think you quite see what follows from it. The inference appears to me to be that you—the American nation, in your corporate capacity—distinctly affirm that no religion is true, but that all theological systems are human speculations upon a doubtful matter, more or less plausible in themselves and containing a greater or less amount of truth, but no one of which is so probable that you will act in a matter so important as legislation upon the theory of its truth. I do not believe it to be possible to prove any other theoretical justification of toleration, or religious equality, or whatever else you call the system which treats religion as a matter of private opinion, than one which is founded on the principle that religion is matter of opinion; in other words, that the best of all religions is doubtful. The mere non-acceptance of the Koran or of the Roman Catholic creed, after notice of their contents, appears to me to amount to a denial of the truth of the claims of Mahomet and the Pope respectively. I believe that the matter is one in which it is theoretically, and practically too, impossible to be neutral, and that the eighteenth-century theories of government, which led the founders of your Constitution to think otherwise, are fundamentally wrong. From what little I have heard or read of America, I believe that in practice this is so to a greater degree than you yourselves may be apt to think. I have heard people say, for instance, in reference to the doctrine of eternal damnation for religious error, that it was morally impossible to hold it in a country where people of all sorts of creeds constantly met upon perfectly equal terms in every conceivable relation of life. I do not quarrel with your Constitution for being opposed to that doctrine; but I say that it is opposed to it, and that therefore it is not neutral as to religion. There is a great deal of truth in the principle that, in these matters, he that is not with me is against me.

This is hardly news, which, I suppose, is what you would like from me; but it is hard to make bricks without straw, and about this time of year our straw is running very low. We have, however, here and there a little incident which is more or less amusing. I cannot exactly call the Social Science Association amusing or little. It is, on the contrary, very big, and—as I say it in strict confidence to a trans-Atlantic public—indescribably dull. Some years ago I read a paper there on a subject of which I happened to have special knowledge, and never shall I forget the impression I received from the discussion which followed; and of the people I knew only one of the speakers, including the President, a very well-known man, had mastered even the A B C of the subject. Only one of them knew how to speak, and he knew nothing at all about the matter. The great bulk of the people I saw gave me the impression that all the writers whose articles had been refused by the inferior class of magazines had conspired together to give each other a hearing, upon the dreariest of all dreary subjects, there and then. Some man of more or less distinction had recommendations to make about matters which he really understood, and which were worth listening to; and here and there a political star—generally one just beginning to rise above the horizon—was advertising himself. I think if I were told to devise a proper punishment for Nero and Heliogabalus in a future state, I would sentence them to read each other essays alternately for a long term of years upon the Utilization of Sewage, the Dwellings of the Working-Classes, and the Statistics as to the Effects of Capital Punishment.

The only scrap of political news of the least interest is that Mr. Disraeli has published an address to the electors of Buckinghamshire, which I suppose must be taken as a manifesto as to his intentions for next session. It begins with claiming credit for himself and his colleagues for a variety of measures, and charging his antagonists with unfairness in the way in which they brought forward the question of the Irish Church; and it goes on to denounce their proposals as inconsistent with the fundamental laws of the nation, and with a variety of more or less sonorous commonplaces, which he calls principles, about the relation between religion and government. An impression prevails here in some quarters that when the next session begins he will try to repeat his policy about the Reform Bill, by bringing in a measure for the reform of the Irish Church, with securities against its disestablishment or disendowment, and gradually enlarging it into a measure designed to carry out each of those objects. Perhaps he may make such an experiment; but it is very difficult to play the same trick successfully twice running. It is more probable, I think, that he will be displaced by a vote of want of confidence as soon as Parliament meets. He has had a wonderful run of patronage. Nearly all the judgeships have been filled up since Lord Derby took office, and deans and bishops have taken to dying of late. Dean Milman, who died about ten days since, has been succeeded by Dr. Mansel. Both names, I take it, are pretty well known to you in America.

THE GREAT "RADICAL" ONCE MORE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your paper of the 15th inst. a communication of mine in the 8th October issue, upon General Butler, is severely criticised and several statements denied. My style is condemned, and I join the "Massachusetts Republican in New York" in wishing it were better, as I earnestly desire to influence the public upon several subjects. Although the charges made by me are based upon public records, I desire to substantiate them, as far as I can, without absorbing too much space in your paper. I am challenged to point to a single instance of General Butler's insubordination. I could adduce a score; but I content myself with citing his first and last acts, namely, his impudent letter addressed to his then commander, Governor Andrew, who had, in a moment of enthusiasm and good feeling, conferred upon Butler, as he then stated, "the greatest favor one man could confer upon another"—his letter, published by him in the newspapers, lecturing his commander because he declined to have Massachusetts militia, ordered to relieve the capital, diverted to suppress slave insurrections; then his insubordinate conduct in Massachusetts, a few months later, when, as major-general of volunteers, he heaped every insult upon her patriotic chief magistrate, interfered with his well-arranged plans for recruiting, and behaved in such a seditious and scandalous manner as to wring from Governor Andrew the following protest:

"I am compelled to declare, with great reluctance and regret, that the course of proceedings under Major-General Butler, in this commonwealth, seems to have been designed and adapted simply to afford means to persons of bad character to make money unscrupulously, and to encourage men whose unfitness has excluded them from any appointment by me to the volunteer militia service, to hope for such appointment over Massachusetts troops from other authority than that of the executive of Massachusetts."

Finally, his fatal insubordination in the Fort Fisher expedition, as to which General Grant testified in effect that General Butler went upon the expedition to Fort Fisher although he knew it was not intended that he should go; that he pocketed General Grant's instructions to General Weitzel, that officer never knowing of their existence till he read them in a newspaper after the return of the expedition; that consequently he had unconsciously violated Grant's positive orders to throw up entrenchments. In short, that General Butler, contrary to propriety and to orders, assumed the command of this important expedition, upon which so much labor and money had been expended, and then, in further violation of orders, retired from the fort this supplanted officer was ordered to besiege. As to his insolent oppression of those below him, General Phelps has already communicated to your readers his opinion of General Butler's character, from which I should infer that "their policy and hopes for justice to the negro were (not) identical;" and I decline to accept Mr. Parton's version of General Butler's "friendly controversy," as I do many of his statements, knowing several of them to be false. General Gillmore did not receive "simply a commanding general's expression of disapprobation of a subordinate's inefficiency," but was grossly insulted in a manner not at all justified by army regulations. A "Massachusetts Republican in New York" may think "the case of Chaplain Hudson is hardly worth comment," and may assert that he "was assigned to a tent at headquarters precisely similar in size and quality to those occupied by the staff;" but General Grant testifies that

"Chaplain Hudson was confined for fifty-odd days in what is called the bull-pen, near General Butler's headquarters, I understand, put in with deserters and all sorts of prisoners. The investigation shows that he was there that length of time without charge and without trial, though during a good part of the time he was there General Butler had a court-martial sitting right at his headquarters and could have tried him. No officer has a right to confine a commissioned officer in a prison or guard-house, except for mutiny, or for some offence where it would not be safe to trust the man at large. This was only a case of that sort for which he should not have been confined at all, except in his own tent, under arrest. When this came to my knowledge, I immediately ordered an examination made of all the prisoners about Norfolk, Fortress Monroe, and Portsmouth, to see if there were any more such cases. The result was to find a great many men in prison without charge. Some had been there for a great length of time."

So it appears that General Grant and a "Massachusetts Republican in New York" are not in accord as to General Butler's "insolent oppression of those below him."

As "to the malicious lies regarding General Butler's seizures of private property, and particularly the seizure of fifty thousand dollars in gold from Messrs. Samuel Smith & Co., of New Orleans, which rebels North and South have so industriously circulated and repeated that many of that class of 'Conservative Republicans,' who take all their opinions second-hand from whichever side on any question asserts itself by the noisiest and most persistent iteration, have accepted as facts." I have read the voluminous testimony presented to the military commissions and Congressional committees charged with investigating General Butler's administration at Norfolk and New Orleans, and either a cloud of witnesses perjured themselves, or else General Butler was guilty of prolonging the war at the expense of millions of dollars and thousands of lives by allowing his relatives and favorites to carry on an illicit trade within the rebel lines with rebel agents, and for use of rebel armies—men who (to adopt the language of one distinguished officer) "follow in the track of the army, traffic in its blood, barter the cause for which it is fighting with all the baseness of Judas Iscariot, but without his remorse."

Either all these witnesses lie, or else he sought out such men, allowed them to carry on this trade, and secured them from the law when arrested, with what motive I know not. I read in a pamphlet written by Judge Pierrepont, of New York, the counsel for Samuel Smith, "that in violation of his proclamation, and without authority of law, General Butler took fifty thousand dollars in gold from Smith & Co., in New Orleans; that it was their property; that this gold was not paid out to the troops, but retained by General Butler; that the gold was not taken or retained by any order, authority, or direction of the Secretary of Treasury or War; that so gross was the wrong to Smith & Co. that General Butler's own commissioners found Smith & Co. were the owners and advised a restoration of the money; that General Butler took the gold 10th May, 1862, and did not report it to the War Department until February of the following year; that he hesitated to pay it to the Government and refused to pay it to its owners, and retained it without security to the Government or to the Smiths and with the full use of it for two years and nine months, during which time gold had been at 285." This was in reply to General Butler's defence before the House of Representatives, which Judge Pierrepont characterizes as an audacious sham which ought to be exposed. As "to the contemptible insinuation that General Butler's name was received with hisses at a reunion of the officers of the Army of the James at Boston," two officers present gave me the information; one has since modified his version to "murmurs."

As "to the charge that General Butler urged on the rebels," General Craig, a member of the Charleston and Baltimore Conventions of 1860, states that Butler voted fifty-odd times for Jefferson Davis, and that at a "bolter's meeting" he made a speech in which he promised his fire-eating brethren (in the event of a war resulting from the rupture) the use of half a million Northern Democrats to slay the Northern abolitionists before they should invade a Southern State.

So much for my charges against General Butler, some of which I referred to as facts, some as reports which it behooved General Butler to refute before he proposed himself as a representative of honest and intelligent men. The fact is that General Butler had won a most unenviable reputation as a man and a lawyer in Massachusetts before the war began; indeed, Mr. Parton makes him out an audacious, impudent, unprincipled man and lawyer, "formed by nature to be an antagonist;" admits that he commenced his career at the college by saucy contentions and mock discussions with the college faculty, at the bar "by conducting suits brought by factory girls against the mill corporations," that he had great legal "legerdemain," "that he was not inclined to enquire whether his client's cause was constitutional or not," that he "was tabooed by the bar," and so on.

Leaving out the "muttering" and the "thundering" which displeases the "Massachusetts Republican in New York," General Butler seemed to have been born again early in 1861, and, as I have stated, Governor Andrew, an optimist, believing in his new birth, accredited him to the Federal Government as a brigadier of Massachusetts militia, which endorsement procured him his subsequent promotion. His career as an officer not only demonstrated his military disqualification, which would not, of course, invalidate his claims as a wise legislator, but also his vanity, his turbulence, his lawlessness, his vindictiveness, and, if we may believe the printed and spoken charges, his depravity. He commenced service by quarrelling with Governor Andrew, he ended it by abusing General Grant, earning the contempt of both. The relations of these good and great men with the rest of the world render comment unnecessary. Coming out of the war disgraced, he contrived to induce the electors of the Fifth District of Massachusetts to elect him their representative to Congress. As a Congressman he has been pestiferous, spending his time and wasting that of Congress in personal discussions and inquisitions, or, worse than that, advocating repudiation openly, or plotting for it secretly; his course has been mortifying and disheartening to every honorable patriot. He is now conducting his canvass with his usual plausibility and unscrupulousness; almost every assertion made by him has been proved to be a lie; as, for instance, that the Nation abused him because he opposed the diversion of any portion of a fund raised in Boston for the freedmen to the support of that paper. Now, he never was a subscriber to the fund, and never attended one of their meetings. The New York Evening Post abused him because Chaplain Hudson was an editor. Chaplain Hudson lives in Boston, and has no connection whatever with that journal.

The Chicago Platform insists on "honest" payment of our debts; he substitutes "possible," and asserts that it was originally so printed, and now it seems the plates have not been changed; and so on usque ad nauseam. If one is curious to learn how often General Butler's assertions are contradicted by unimpeachable witnesses, let him read the investigation of the "Committee on the Conduct of the War" into the Fort Fisher expedition. I have thus proved that the charges against General Butler rest on authority not to be questioned by

A Massachusetts Republican.

---

["A Massachusetts Republican," let us say, has not made the enquiries, of which he reports the result, about General Butler's connection with the contribution of the Recruiting Committee towards the capital of the Nation, either with our knowledge or consent. We never believed that General Butler had any connection with it whatever, but we never gave ourselves the trouble to find out whether he had or not. His assertion that our opposition to his re-election is due to his having opposed that contribution is simply an impudent invention of his own, which nobody connected with the Nation has felt himself so far reduced, either in his own estimation or that of the public, as to be called on to contradict seriously. The general's explanation of the hostility of other Republican papers is about as silly and unscrupulous as his explanation of the Nation's; and his being able to retail such stuff, considering what his history is, to attentive audiences of Massachusetts men, is as painful and discouraging a spectacle as any friend of good government has ever been called on to witness. Since our correspondent, who is a gentleman, has deemed the general's story about us of sufficient importance to investigate it, we will now say that anybody who asserts that the editor of the Nation either solicited or instigated, or was in any way instrumental in procuring, the vote of $15,000 to the capital of the paper, or that he even knew who composed the committee when the vote was made, or ever heard Butler's name mentioned in connection with it, except by Butler himself within the last month, has either been grossly deceived or is guilty of wilful falsehood. We may say the same thing of anybody who asserts that the Nation was established "in the interest of the freedmen," in any sense in which it has not advocated the interest of the freedmen, or for the purpose of serving the freedmen in any character but that of members of a free community, especially ill-fitted to detect the real character of politicians like General Butler. A paper exclusively devoted to the interests of the freedmen as freedmen undoubtedly was projected before the Nation, and out of that project the idea of the Nation grew; but no such scheme was ever submitted to the editor of the Nation, nor would he ever have participated in its execution, as all who are acquainted with the origin of the enterprise well know. The persistent mixing up of the two projects, in which a great many busybodies indulge, probably amuses them, but it does the Nation no harm. We have more than once seen insinuations in "organs," both secular and "religious," to the effect that this journal has departed from its original programme, but we have never thought it worth while to notice them. It is with great reluctance that we now depart from our rule of not troubling our readers with any reference to its private affairs. We shall probably never do so again. Nobody knows half as well as its conductors what its original programme was. That it has adhered to it faithfully and well we find abundant proof in the fact that there is not a quack, jobber, charlatan, knave, pretender, or blatterer in the country who has ever heard of it—and we hope before long to bring it to the notice of every one of them—who does not instinctively and cordially detest it.—Ed. ## THE PHILADELPHIA FRAUDS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The charges brought by you against Mr. Justice Sharswood are wholly without foundation, though, in view of the libels daily published in our local papers, your mistake was not an unnatural one. I enclose a copy of the opinion delivered by him, from which it will be seen that the method of naturalization in the Nisi Prius this fall was the same as has always been followed in the other courts of this city and county, and that for the first time in that court he introduced the system of examining the papers himself.

It may be added that, during the months of September and October, there were about six thousand naturalizations in the Supreme Court, where the Democrats were naturalized—the Prothonotary being a Democrat—and over three thousand in the other courts. Of the six thousand, about one thousand were from adjacent counties, so that only five thousand Democrats were naturalized in a city polling a vote of nearly 120,000; nor is the proportion of two Democrats to one Republican very extravagant. Of these, a very large number were entitled to their papers in 1864, and many others obtained their certificates from having served in the army for one year and upwards. Their names have all been published in the Evening Telegraph; but though the League has offered large rewards for the detection of frauds, I do not know that any have been arrested—the police, too, being all active politicians. On the other hand, Judge Read, who wrote the letter to Chief-Justice Thompson of which so much has been said, has been on the bench nearly ten years, and it was his habit, while naturalizations were going on, to leave the court-room altogether, entrusting the work entirely to Colonel Snowden; and at the very time so much was said in the Republican papers as to the manner of naturalization in the Supreme Court, I took part myself in arguments, both before the District Court and Common Pleas, when at the same moment the clerks were mumbling over the questions and affidavits in the corner of the room in so low a tone as not to disturb judges or counsel. And further, it should be said that the only wholesale fraud exposed was one headed by the "King of the Lobby," who brought down fifty or sixty men—many of them grey-headed—from Cattasauqua and had them naturalized on "minor's papers" in the Common Pleas, and when as many as could be arrested were sent down to the county jail District-Attorney Mann ordered their discharge, and they were all released—and certainly not to vote the Democratic ticket. Of course, this is only the "tu quoque argument;" but that is always good as far as it goes, and in this case it goes a good way to prove the entire propriety of the conduct of a judge to show that it has been sanctioned by a practice of thirty years, and by the conduct of his chief assailant. And I can say further, upon the authority of Mr. McMichael himself, who first brought the forged certificates before the court, that Judge Sharswood not only treated his application, irregular as it was, in the most considerate way, but himself suggested the plan afterwards adopted, and the best plan that could have been devised, to bring Devine before the court as a witness. As to the Prothonotary himself, no one questioned his integrity, and it was frankly conceded in argument. Indeed, he is the only Prothonotary in any of our courts that attends in person to the duties of his office. In the other courts they always act by deputy, and very few members of the bar have ever seen one of them. It can hardly be said, then, that Judge Sharswood "reluctantly ordered an examination." And, finally, as to the charge that he "declared the court adjourned sine die," it needs only to be explained that our Supreme Court consists of five judges, one of whom is assigned, in rotation, to hold the Nisi Prius for one month. When that month is up his power is gone, except as to cases already begun before him. When his opinion was finished, therefore, his court of Nisi Prius was adjourned sine die, ex vi termini; but Chief-Justice Thompson was sitting in the next room, and if the Attorney-General had anything to say, he knew where to go to. It was this rule, too, that kept Judge Read off the bench and compelled him to decide his cases, with the aid of Mr. Justice Agnew and Judge Williams ("not yet a full judge," as he phrased it in his letter), in his own study.

Under all the circumstances, then, it is not thought by Judge Sharswood's friends that it is his name that points the moral against an elective judiciary; but what they think of the course of Judge Read may be inferred from the fact that when Mr. Scofield introduced his resolution for the impeachment of Judge Field, on the ground of having expressed an opinion as to cases not yet argued before him (see Congressional Globe, January 30, 1868), the Democrats in the House of Representatives expressed their willingness to vote for the resolution if Mr. Scofield would vouch for the allegation, and the Democratic press and bar throughout the country held the same doctrine, and declared that if Judge Field had, in fact, so spoken in reference to questions then pending or likely to come before him, he should be impeached and removed.

I am, etc., A Philadelphia Lawyer.

Philadelphia, October 19, 1868.

[We have taken some pains to ascertain the truth of this matter from an impartial source, and, as well as we can make out, this is what is asserted, conceded, and cannot be denied by fair-minded men, Democrats or Republicans: They do not find fault with Judge Sharswood's decision, as regards the matter of it, but the honor of his court was at stake in the Devine case; and he showed in his decision more eagerness to vindicate the authenticity of the six thousand papers issued by his Prothonotary, and Devine's credibility, than the honor of the court. Devine acknowledges himself a drunken loafer, and Colonel Snowden's counsel pronounced him an irresponsible idiot; and yet the judge virtually undertook his defence, and professed to believe his worthless story. His opinion was undoubtedly a political document, but it must be admitted that it was intended to neutralize Judge Read's more irregular, equally partisan, letter.

It is a suspicious circumstance, to say the least, that Colonel Snowden's subordinates, when examined, with scarcely an exception, testified that they had been employed in his office but for a few days or a few weeks, and one of them, it turned out, had already served a term in the penitentiary for fabricating papers. We do not suspect Colonel Snowden of being personally concerned in the frauds; but it looks as though, under party dictation, he had cleared out his office in preparation for the political campaign, and allowed it to be manned by those who were plotting the wholesale manufacture of voters. It is a physical and moral impossibility that the requirements of the acts of Congress could be complied with when seven hundred and twenty naturalizations were granted in one day of five hours; and on the day when this took place a legal friend of our informant's, having business with the Supreme Court, found no judge on the bench, while naturalizing was going on briskly in two rooms. If Judges Read and Agnew have shown partisanship on the Republican side, Chief-Justice Thompson made an even more lamentable exhibition of it on the other side when the fraudulent naturalization papers were first brought before him, and Colonel Snowden professed himself unable to say whether the signatures were his own or not, and the judge descended from his judicial position to promptly pronounce them forgeries, thus becoming a witness in his own court. The comparison between Judge Read and Judge Field fails in this, that the complaint against the latter was for the assumed prejudgment of a case to be brought before him, while the former was merely remonstrating with a brother justice against vicious practices in his own court for which both justices were responsible before the public. It was irregular, however, and the whole matter cannot but exercise a most unfortunate influence on the confidence heretofore reposed by the community in the courts, and furnishes a very proper argument against an elective judiciary.—Ed. Nation.]

A CORRECTION FROM MR. CRANCH.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Dear Sir: In the Nation of Oct. 15 I find honorable mention of a poem of mine, entitled "The Nineteenth Century," published in the Atlantic Almanac for 1869. Your critic, however, says: "But we do not like

> 'Mysterious forces overawe,
> Absorb, suspend the natural law.'

For in the first place, they do not overawe or absorb or suspend the natural law; and in the second place, the inaccurate statement is prosaically made."

I do not wonder at his not liking the lines as he has quoted them. If he had read the poem a little more carefully, he would have seen that I did not write "natural," but "usual":

> "Mysterious forces overawe, > Absorb, suspend the usual law."

All laws are natural, but all laws are not usual or common. In the image of the magnetic storm and its mysterious power over the electric fluid of the wires, I endeavored to present the action of the grand Providential laws that overrule for a time the acts of individuals. But the substitution of the word natural for usual makes me out a supernaturalist, which, in the customary theological sense, I must protest against.

Begging your insertion of this correction,

I remain, very truly yours,

C. P. Cranch.

Fishkill-on-Hudson, N. Y., Oct. 16, 1868.

---

[There is nothing for us to do but acknowledge that by one of those accidents from which, as it seems, even weekly journals are not exempt, our critic got "usual" into his head when a part of Mr. Cranch's fine little poem fixed itself in his memory, and that thus the criticism was thrown away. It would have been excellent criticism, however, if the poetry had not turned out as it has.—Ed. Nation.]

LITERARY.

"PAR ORDRE DU ROI," M. Victor Hugo's new novel, or rather old novel, for it has been on the stocks, we believe, some twenty years or more, is to be published in Paris by M. La Croix, who paid its author 300,000 francs for it, and in this country by the Messrs. Appleton, who have bought advance sheets. The translation will have a translated title—"By the King's Command."——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton announce a work by Mrs. Murray, entitled "The Modern System of Painting in Water-Colors from the Living Model." In November the volume may be expected.——Mrs. Emma D. E. N. Southworth utterly disclaims all intention to charge the "distinguished authors (Mr. Boucicault and Mr. Reade) with any real foul play," but still for her own credit's sake desires to state that a forthcoming book of hers, which she has rechristened "Fair Play," appeared in the New York Ledger in 1865, and was copied into the London Journal in 1866. We do not of our own knowledge assert, but Mrs. Southworth of her knowledge does assert, that there is much resemblance between the two novels, and particularly, she says, quoting Mr. Reade, we think, that the likeness may be found in "that which has been called the most beautiful and original part of each story, and describes the strange situation of the shipwrecked lovers on the solitary island." Of all this it is only necessary to say that we must wait till "Fair Play" is published next month by Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers before it will be possible to tell whether there is anything but the slightest and most casual similarity between the two books.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. have nearly ready a new work by the amusing but somewhat untrustworthy Mr. Naphegyi. Its title is "Ghardaia; or, Ninety Days among the Bni-Mozab: A Narrative of Adventures in the Oases of the Sahara."——The Catholic Publication Society, with a desire to spread Catholic literature among the people, have resolved to make cheap books, and propose to publish very soon a work entitled "Gropings after Truth," in which Mr. Joshua Huntington, once a Congregationalist minister, relates how he became a convert, or pervert, or "vert"—as the mild-mannered say who strive to keep themselves impartial—from Protestantism to Catholicism. These "Gropings" are to be sold at twenty-five cents a copy. Father Hewit writes the preface.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt have in hand a new Danish novel: "The Fisher Maiden." We call it Danish, because it was written by a Dane and originally in his native tongue; but Leypoldt & Holt are translating it from the German, in which language the author had a simultaneous edition issued. Björnesterne Björnson is the author, and there is good German authority for calling him a charming one. "The Fisher Maiden" is a girl of low birth but of strong artistic tastes, who has a passion for the stage. To show how her art study and her natural traits of character reacted on each other, and what their interaction made of the heroine, is the design of the poet—he may be called a poet. He does not, however, show her to us after her histrionic life has been fully entered on, but while she is pursuing her study. The book ends with the ringing of the prompter's bell on the evening of her first appearance, and with the words: "And so the curtain rose."

—The last number of the Law Review is of about the usual value, and we are glad to be able to repeat our commendation of it. The present number is, perhaps, of rather less than usual interest to the merely general reader; but two things in it will please him. Mr. Ellis's essay on Brougham struck us as being a fair and judicious summing up of the life and labors—a life all labors—of that most remarkable—we do not know why we should not say so—of modern Britons. There is an immense fund of anecdote and "secret history" afloat concerning him, but it has not got itself into print yet, and may never. When it does, there will be a prize subject for two or three review essays by somebody. The article on the "Erie Railroad Row" is by far the clearest and fullest account of that extraordinary affair which has ever been published, and deserves to be universally read. Yet the writer (who is evidently a Bostonian) appears not to be aware of some facts which are a material part of the case, and, in his anxiety to be impartial, does injustice to some of the few upright judges who remain in New York. An ordinary reader would infer from this article that Judges Clerke and Gilbert, who granted the injunctions which tied the hands of Judge Barnard, were greatly to blame, and perhaps influenced by corrupt motives; whereas no one in this city, who knows anything about the bench, doubts the perfect integrity of these gentlemen, or the good faith in which they acted. It is true that the charges upon which they proceeded were not carried to trial, but it is notorious that this was the result of a private arrangement with which they had nothing to do. The lawyers also receive much of the reviewer's censure, and we think without any good reason. The insinuation that any of Mr. Drew's counsel attempted to bribe the judges is unjustifiable. There was no impropriety in seeking to retain Mr. Haskin as counsel; and the $5,000 offered to him was the smallest fee received by any counsel on either side of the litigation. Boston lawyers may think this a large fee, but it is not so esteemed here; and no member of the bar, if he were knave enough to offer a bribe, would be such a fool as to offer a judge $5,000 in a case of such importance. We can assure our Boston friends that our New York judges are not so lost to all self-respect as to take such grossly inadequate bribes. They know that the laborer in this, as in any other vineyard, is worthy of his hire. The sum that was thought worthy of notice—and which was fixed upon without the knowledge or participation of any lawyer—was $50,000. The moral sense of the reviewer seems also to have been shocked by the fact that detectives were employed on both sides, and that an affidavit made by one of them was read in court. This affidavit proved that the chief of a gang of kidnappers, bent on carrying off Mr. Drew by force from another State, had reported his proceedings to the judge before whom the cause was pending. The detective had never been employed by any lawyer engaged in the case, but Mr. Drew's counsel used his affidavit; and this the reviewer thinks a shocking offence! We suppose a gentlemanly lawyer must then submit to the robbery, and even the murder, of his client rather than use evidence of a detective; but if so, clients who have to deal with New York judges will unanimously dispense with gentlemanly lawyers.

—Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, are putting American literature under obligations by the work which they have undertaken of publishing their "Ohio Valley Historical Series." Of this enterprise we have once before spoken, and are glad to speak again, and are glad, too, of the occasion of our present speaking. It is the reception of the first volume of the set—"Historical Account" (we should have the article before "Historical")—"Historical Account of Bouquet's Expedition against the Ohio Indians in 1764," with a preface by Francis Parkman, and a translation of Dumas's biographical sketch of the general. Bouquet was a Swiss officer in command at Philadelphia, who, with a good deal of skill and courage, defeated the Ohio Indians in several pitched battles, and conquered a peace, welcome enough at the close of Pontiac's war. Mr. A. R. Spofford, the librarian of Congress, not long since discovered in the Force Collection a letter which makes it plain that Dr. William Smith, of the Philadelphia College, was the author of this readable little account of the expedition. The plans and illustrations of the original work Messrs. Clarke & Co. have had reproduced by the photo-lithographic process known as Osborne's Process—and very well indeed it does reproduce Bouquet's plans and President Benjamin West's magniloquent old pictures. The second volume of the series is to be a "History of Athens County, Ohio," which is that part of Ohio first settled by the whites. This work will include the history of the founding of the University at Athens, the oldest of Western colleges; of the settlement of the towns of Marietta, Athens, and many more; biographical sketches of the famous Tom Ewing, Bishop Ames, and other men of mark; and, besides these things, much incidental matter of a good deal of local interest and of very considerable value to the future historian. We Americans of the present generation wander to the points where our history touches that of the Old World, or we go abroad in search of themes, or we write the stilted, "dignified" history of our Revolutionary struggle, with its obvious "historical" availabilities. Only in rare cases, like those of Upham and Palfrey, do we try to write our own history. Let us, by the way, not forget the name of Mr. Parkman, with his episodes; there would be the less excuse, as he has a few pleasant words of preface in the volume we have been mentioning. But our children, some of them, unless Mr. Eugene Benson's worst fears are realized, will possess the genius which will grapple with the difficulties of writing the true American history, and every one such child of the future will surely rise up and call men like Mr. Moore and Dr. Smith blessed. Messrs. Clarke we must praise for the typographical excellence of their works, but we think our taste in the matter of tints for book paper differs a little from theirs.

—We usually allow Mr. R. G. White to talk without interruption when he takes people to task for their errors of speech, and, perhaps, do not give him too much attention. The vulgarisms that cause him such grief we, we desire to thank heaven, are entirely free from. But as he was laying down the law the other day in the Galaxy, on "Words and their Uses," he seems to have hit out right and left in a way which has brought him into contact with ourselves among others. It is to be hoped, as we believe we have once before remarked, that Mr. White is well learned in philological knowledge, for he is abundantly peremptory in all that he says, although, to be sure, he escapes the pertness and laborious dulness and triviality of the Moons and the Goulds. But to the matter in hand. Mr. White wants people to say "presidental" instead of "presidential." Now, as this is a word that we shall have to keep on using for more years than we can say, we should be obliged if Mr. White would inform us and the audience which he instructs what he does with "tangential," and what vestige of authority he has for what he says, and why he reasons from analogy as regards English orthography, and why he finds fault with so good a metaphor as calling a "canvass" a "campaign," and what "blatant Americanism" there is in a word so long known to English on both sides of the water as "presidential?"

—One who wished to keep the run of European affairs would probably, other things being equal, choose a German rather than any other newspaper: either the Augsburg, the Cologne, or the Weser Gazette. If he read only French, the Indépendance Belge would be preferable, for general news, to any paper published within the limits of the empire. The daily edition of any one of these, however, is rather expensive, besides demanding a good deal of leisure for its perusal. Le Nouveau Monde, a weekly journal just started in this city, undertakes, for a moderate price, to give a pretty full summary of foreign news, in addition to an unpartisan account of American politics, the irrepressible feuilleton, literary articles, agricultural information, etc., etc. We have seen only the second number, which certainly abounds in news, and contains foreign and domestic correspondence of its own. Prof. Blot appears to be contributing a series of menus, with directions for cooking; and the famous Baron Brisse promises to furnish immediately a series of articles on household economy, meaning by that term the art of living well in the cheapest possible manner. He intends to describe each week "two simple dishes appropriate to the season, easily prepared, and calculated to afford a varied nutriment." Le Nouveau Monde contains sixteen quarto pages, and is handsomely printed.

—Very pleasant reading is to be found in the thick volume (nearly four hundred pages) of Rev. Wm. Dunn Macray's "Annals of the Bodleian Library, Oxford, A.D. 1598–1867; with a preliminary notice of the earlier Library founded in the 14th century"—published by Rivingtons. The book is beautifully printed, and shows great care, industry, and research. It is delightfully indifferent to all the rules of scientific bibliography, and talks with about equal praise of the great prizes of the Library and of the odd collection of useless treasures that have been gathered there, from the Tartar Lambskin Coat, with its apocryphal history, to the illustrated Clarendon and Burnet, which, under the fostering hand of Mr. and Mrs. Sutherland, grew from the six volumes of the folio editions of Clarendon's "History of the Rebellion and Life," and of Burnet's "Own Times," into sixty-one elephant folio volumes, illustrated with nearly 20,000 portraits of every person and views of every place in any way mentioned in the text or connected with its subject matter. Of the late acquisitions, great stress is properly laid on a possibly genuine Shakespeare autograph in a copy of Ovid's "Metamorphoses," printed by Aldus at Venice, in October, 1502, and bought by the Library in January of 1865, at a sale of Sotheby & Wilkinson's, for nine pounds! A still more curious story is that told of the copy on vellum, with illuminated initials, of the first volume of the Vulgate Bible, printed by Faust and Schœffer, in 1462, which was bought in 1750 for two pounds ten shillings. The volume was imperfect at the end, ceasing at Job xxxii. 5, and seven leaves followed in contemporary and beautiful manuscript, which also ended imperfectly at Psalms xxxvi. 9, with one leaf wanting at the end of Job. In 1817 the Bodleian Library became the purchaser (for more than five thousand pounds), of a large collection of manuscripts formed by Matteo Luigi Canonisi, a Jesuit father, who died in Venice about 1805. His manuscripts were received at Oxford in 1818, and among some fragments which were found in one of the boxes were fourteen leaves of a manuscript Bible, which were at once recognized as being part of those wanted to complete this book, and which left only four still deficient. The volume came to the Library from the collection of N. J. Foucault, but through how many hands the missing leaves had passed in the seventy subsequent years ere they were thus marvellously restored to their place, it is impossible to tell. Apart from the charming tid-bits of bibliographical and personal histories which are told in the recital of the three centuries of the life of the Bodleian Library, the book has its own especial merit in showing how the fact that a library exists, and is meant to be always a safe and sure home for books, is of itself a standing invitation—sure sooner or later to be accepted—to all book collectors to make it the final receptacle of their life's labors. The list of donors and benefactors, beginning, of course, with Bodley himself, and coming down the long line of names of men famous for their devotion to the loving labor of book-hunting, is wonderful to look upon; Sir Walter Raleigh, Selden, Sir Christopher Hatton, Sir Kenelm Digby, Laud, "Anatomy" Burton, Selden, Hearne, John Locke, Rawlinson, Gough, Malone, Douce, were all large benefactors; and the name of almost every man famous for knowledge or learning, is in some way connected with the Bodleian during its long and useful career. The wheel of time worked to a good end when, in a turn of only seventy years, it brought back the missing leaves of the early Fifteener Bible. It had even more curious results in the contrast between 1649 and 1829; in the former year the Jews proffer six hundred thousand pounds for St. Paul's for a synagogue, and for Oxford Library to sell abroad—and only a little difference of a couple of hundred thousand pounds prevented the bargains; in the latter year the Bodleian began the collection of Hebrew literature which now makes one of its chief ornaments, by a purchase of five thousand volumes—the library of a Jewish Rabbi. There is a mention or two of American affairs that show how universal is the reach of such a vast library in its hold upon the affections of all who dedicate themselves to any class of literary labor. In 1749 a "Clavis Linguæ Sanctæ, or explanation of all the Hebrew and some Chaldee roots found in the Old Testament," was presented to the Library by Thomas Frankland, who wrote that "My wife's grandfather, Judge [Nicholas] Trott, Chief-Justice of South Carolina, desired on his death-bed that his forty years' labor relating to the Hebrew roots might be presented to the publishing library at Oxford." In 1861, Mr. George Livermore, through Archibald Cotton, presented his reprint, on vellum, of the "Souldier's Pocket Bible." There is a foot-note, in which is gravely "embalmed in amber" an extract from an account of a visit to Oxford by an American tourist, which appeared very recently in the New York Times, that recites with evident pride the American's honest embarrassment at having to give threepence, the price of a pot of beer, to the gentleman who showed him through this noble collection. Exactly what good service it does, except to gratify the author's pride in the civility and erudition of the janitor of the Library, it is hard to see; but it is curiously characteristic of the inartificial construction of his book—not the least of its charms.

—A late number of the Moniteur contains an Imperial decree ordering the execution of a detailed geological map of France, and charging a board of savans, of which M. de Beaumont, senator and member of the Institute, is the president, with the superintendence of the work. Up to this time there has existed only a general geological chart of France, in six sheets, on the scale of 1–500,000, the project of which was conceived, under the first Republic, as early as 1794, but not realized till between 1822–40. After the completion of the first general survey, the task of providing more detailed maps was left to the conseils généraux (administrative councils) of the several departments. But what these bodies did, or rather omitted to do, in this respect, furnished but another illustration of the historical incapacity of the French for local self-government, and their inveterate disposition to leave everything to the initiation of the central government. It was expected at the time that all the departments would be provided with special maps at the end of six years. But although nearly thirty years have since elapsed most of them have as yet to take the first step in the matter. The consequence was that France made, as compared to other nations, but a sorry show in the department of geological maps at the Universal Exposition of last year. Especially the splendid charts—on a scale of 1–63,000—of the British Geological Survey, covering nearly the whole of the United Kingdom, made the shortcomings of France painfully apparent, and roused the Imperial Government to a full realization of this backwardness. Hence the decree mentioned. The new general survey is to be completed in ten years, at an estimated expense to the state of one million francs. The eighty-six departments are to be comprised in 286 charts. The scale is to be an uniform one of 1–80,000.

—The famous map-publisher, Justus Perthes, of Gotha, has recently issued two works of great value to classical and biblical scholars. The first and most important of the two publications is a series of seven maps illustrating the topography of Athens and bearing the following title: "Sieben Karten zur Topographie von Athen mit lithographirten Beilagen und Holzschnitten," von Ernst Curtius. Professor Curtius, who for many years was connected with the philosophical faculty of Göttingen, but during the past summer accepted a call to the University of Berlin, is doubtless well known to some of our readers as the author of "Peloponnesos," one of the best historical and geographical descriptions of the Grecian Peninsula ever written. In 1832 he was commissioned by the Prussian Government to visit Athens and make a thorough exploration of the ancient city and its environs. In this enterprise he was assisted by Dr. Karl Bötticher and several other distinguished scholars of Germany and Greece. Ample funds were provided for the purpose of making such excavations as were necessary to settle obscure topographical questions, especially in reference to the sites of temples and other ancient edifices. The results of these researches are embodied in the above-mentioned series of maps, which in fulness and accuracy are incomparably superior to any hitherto published. Hills, valleys, rocks, quarries, all inequalities, depressions, elevations, and peculiar characteristics of the land are indicated by gradations of color and shading which have all the distinctness of relief. The second work is a "Bibel-Atlas in acht Blättern," by Menke, who seems to have made a thorough study of the subject, with the use of all the materials and information which recent scientific explorations have furnished in elucidation of the geography of the Holy Land. In mechanical execution both works are elegant specimens of German cartography.

—We have just seen an interesting little octavo of about a hundred pages, published at Naples, with the title, "Scoverte Archeologiche fatte in Italia dal 1846 al 1866." It was originally prepared in the form of a report to the Minister of Public Instruction, and is a succinct rêsumê of the archæological exhumations which have been made in Italy during the last twenty years, arranged in geographical and chronological order. The author begins with what, from an antiquarian point of view, is the most sterile soil of the Italian peninsula, viz., Cisalpine Gaul, and records with great care everything that has been brought to light, inscriptions, votive tablets, Carthaginian and Phœnician urns; Greek, Roman, and Etruscan statues, mirrors, tripods, candelabra; mythologic, heroic, and historical paintings; utensils of all kinds, sacred and secular, etc. The most fertile field of excavation is Rome, where more numerous and more important discoveries have been made than in all the rest of Italy combined. Here Fiorelli limits himself exclusively to what might be called classical in distinction from Christian antiquities, making no mention of Signor de' Rossi's valuable labors as contained in his "Roma Sotteranea Cristiana" (noticed in a former number of the Nation), and in the monthly "Bollettino di Archeologia Cristiana," which the same indefatigable scholar has published since 1863. In apology for this deficiency Fiorelli pleads the confini prescritti of his work. It is probably due to the same self-prescribed limitations that in the bibliographical appendix he enumerates only Italian authorities, and thus does great injustice to foreign, and especially to French and German, archæologists. Certainly the efficiency with which the Prussian Institute on the Capitol has labored in this field entitled it to some recognition; and a bibliography of Italian antiquities that omits the names of Bunsen, Lepsius, Platner, Röstell, Gerhard, Braun, Overbeck, Zahn, and Mommsen, is very far from the completeness which we deem essential in order to render such an inventory of any practical value. We trust that in the next edition of the "Scoverte," Fiorelli will revise and enlarge this appendix, forget that he is making an official report to his own Government, and remember that the scholars of every nation have an interest in whatever comes from his pen.

—The treaty of peace concluded between Austria and Italy at the close of the war of 1866 contained a clause providing for the restitution to Venice of the archives and treasures of art which the Austrians had carried away with them upon their final evacuation of the city of the doges. The Austrians clung so tenaciously to their prey that the plenipotentiaries of the two governments, appointed to carry out the clause, came to an understanding as to the works of art to be returned only in the early part of this month. According to the special convention concluded between them, the paintings carried off in 1866, to the number of two hundred, are alone to be restored to the Queen of the Adriatic. Those previously removed—their number is not small—are to remain in the Austrian collections, of which they now form part. As to the archives, only those relating specially to Venice are to be returned. The vast collection of diplomatic correspondence between Austria and Venice during the last three centuries, containing no less than three hundred folio volumes, very rich and all but unexplored material for historians, is to remain at Vienna. Altogether, it seems as though the Austrians had rather the better of the bargain.

MANNERS OF THE OLDEN TIME.*

This portly volume is another of the admirable productions by which the Early English Text Society is earning the gratitude of all scholars. It diverges a little, indeed, from the primary purposes of the society; for its philological interest is only secondary, its main importance being historical. Mr. Furnivall, who describes himself as the "foolometer" of the society, has collected from both MS. and printed sources a number of manuals of politeness and good breeding current among our forefathers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and has prefaced them by an introduction in his own peculiar style, in which he gives us a large amount of curious detail concerning education and manners in mediæval England. Thus, from cover to cover, the volume is full of that which enables us to reconstruct for ourselves the domestic life of our ancestors; and if in the process we lose much of the romance with which past ages are popularly invested, we can console ourselves with noting the vast improvements which we enjoy in all that lends comfort and dignity to private life.

To do justice to everything worthy of remark in this collection would require a volume not very far inferior to itself in size. We can only, therefore, enumerate the various parts of which it is composed, with an occasional extract to illustrate their quality. The "Babees Book" is a short versified code of instructions in manners for young persons, dating from about 1475. It is followed by the "A. B. C. of Aristotle"—a couple of pages of worldly advice, written about 1430. Then comes the "Tractus Urbanitatis," from a MS. of about 1460. The nature of these manuals of manners, and the ill-breeding which they were designed to correct, may be fairly shown by the following, from among the elaborate directions as to table observances:

> "To the beste morselle thou may not stryke
> Thowg thou neuur so welle hit lyke.
> Also kepe thy hondys fayre and welle
> Fro fylinge of the towelle,
> Ther-on thou shalt not thy nose wype;
> Nothur at thy mete thy toth thou pyke;
> To depe in thy cuppe thou may not synke
> Thowg thou haue goode wylle to drynke" (p. 14).

Then come "The Lytylle Childrenes Lytil Boke" and "The Young Children's Book," of about the end of the fifteenth century. Then two versions of "The Book of Curteisie that is clepid Stans Puer ad Mensam," attributed to Lydgate. Two or three minor pieces are followed by some motherly advice, "How the good Wijf taugte hir Daugtir," from a MS. of about 1430, which affords us a curious insight into the maidenly and wifely virtues held most in esteem at the period, while the faults to be eschewed can be instructively compared with the recent complaints of the Saturday Review. However we may have deteriorated in some things, it would be difficult to imagine a mother of the present day warning her daughter that if she gets drunk too often on malt liquors she will run some risk of disgrace:

> "And if thou be in place where good ale is on lofte,
> Whether that thou serve thereof or that thou sitte softe,
> Mesurabli thou take ther-of that thou falle in no blame,
> For if thou be ofte drunke it falle thee to schame;
> For tho that ben ofte drunke,
> Thrifte is from hem sunke.
> Mi leue child" (p. 39).

Domestic discipline was somewhat of the sharpest, though cursing and swearing at her children was not considered decent in a mother:

> "And if thy children been rebel, and wole not hem bowe,
> If any of hem mys dooth, nouther banne hem ne blowe,
> But take a smert rodde, and bete hem on a rowe
> Til thei crie mercy, and be of her gilt aknowe" (p. 46).

That the "smert rodde" was habitually laid on with no gentle hand is shown by Mr. Furnivall in his "Forewords" (p. vij.), where he quotes from the Paston Letters the treatment of her marriageable daughter by Agnes Paston, in 1454, "and she hath since Easter the most part been beaten once in the week or twice, and sometimes twice on a day, and her head broken in two or three places." This rough breaking-in lasted long and extended through all ranks of society, as is witnessed by the well-known description which Lady Jane Grey gives of her relations with her parents:

"For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speake, kepe silence, sit, stand, or go, eate, drinke, be merie or sad, be sewyng, plaiying, dauncing, or doing aniething els, I must do it, as it were, in soch weight, mesure, and number, even so perfitelie as God made the world, or els I am so sharplie taunted, so cruellie threatened, yea presentlie some tymes, with pinches, nippes, and bobbes, and other waies which I will not name for the honor I beare them, so without measure misordered that I thinke myself in hell" (p. vij.)

That the relations between husband and wife were also sometimes wanting in delicacy, we may gather from a piece of 1430—"How the Wise Man taught his Sonne":

> "And thou schalt not thi wijf displese,
> Neither calle hir no vilouns name;
> And if thou do, thou art not wijs,
> To calle hir foule it is thi schame;
> If thou thin owne wijf wilt defame,
> No wondir though anothir do so,
> But softe and faire a man may tame
> Bothe herte and hynde, bucke and do" (p. 51).

To this follow some dietaries and lists of recipes of the fifteenth century, and then comes Rhodes's "Boke of Nurture," reprinted from the edition of 1577, with another similar work of the first half of the fifteenth century, now first printed from MS.—John Russell's "Boke of Nurture folowyng Englondis gise." In his notes to this latter, Mr. Furnivall gives copious extracts from a hitherto unknown black-letter work on natural history, by Lawrens Andrewe, which are exceedingly quaint and curious. The notions prevalent in those days of the wonders of the deep may be gathered from such fish stories as the following: As for the "Huna," "whan he is in peryl of dethe be other fisshes than he onfacyoneth himselfe as rounde as a bowle, withdrawynge his hede into his bely; whan he hath then hounger He dothe ete a parte of himselfe rather than the other fisshes sholde ete him hole and all." The crab had the reputation of great cunning: "The creuyce eteth the Oysters, and geteth them be policye; for whan the oyster gapeth, he throweth lytell stones in him, and so geteth his fyshe out, for it bydeth than open." There was another fish peculiarly sensitive to fresh water: "Coretz is a fisshe that hydeth hym in the depe of the water whan it rayneth for yf he received any rayne, he sholde waxe blynde, and dye of it" (pp. 230–233). And yet another, which sadly puzzled the followers of the gentle craft: "Solopendria is a fisshe whan he hathe swalowed in an angle, than he spueth out al his guttes till he be quyt of the hoke and than he gadereth in all his guttes agayne" (p. 238). But we must not linger over these curiosities of nature, for we are but half through the volume, and have left ourselves space for little more than a bare enumeration of its remaining contents.

* "The Babees Book, Aristotle's A. B. C., Urbanitatis, etc. Edited by Frederick J. Furnivall, M.A." 1 vol. 8vo, pp. cxxxvj., 406, 132. London: Published for the Early English Text Society. 1868.

Some short extracts from several old works on hygiene follow, and then come "The Boke of Keruynge," reprinted from the edition of Wynkyn de Worde; "The Booke of Demeanor," from the edition of 1619; "The Boke of Curtasye," from a MS. of 1430–40; "Bishop Grossetest's Household Statutes," from a MS. of 1450–60; Seager's "Schoole of Vertue," from the edition of 1557; followed by a number of minor pieces, gathered from various sources, illustrative of the general theme of the volume. Then follows Part II., which consists of French and Latin poems "On the Manners and Meals of the Olden Time," together with a very copious index and an appendix of illustrative wood-cuts borrowed from Wright's "History of Domestic Manners and Customs."

The whole leaves upon us the impression that our ancestors were not particularly nice; and it was scarcely necessary for Mr. Furnivall to quote the passage from Erasmus, in which he explains, by the filthy habits of the people, the pestilences which continually afflicted England. "The floors," he says, "are mostly of clay, generally covered with rushes, so seldom renewed that the lower portions sometimes remain unchanged for twenty years, cherishing a mass of spittle, vomits, urine of dogs and men, beer, fragments of fish, and other unmentionable filth. From these, with the changes of the seasons, there arises a steam which, to my thinking, is anything but healthful." This description of the England of Henry VIII., be it remembered, comes from an ardent admirer, and one who, as a stranger, would not have troubled himself to describe habits to which he had been accustomed at home. We may, therefore, conclude that the Englishmen of those days were rather pre-eminent for their neglect of the graces and decencies of life; and yet, before we draw any farther deductions from these unsavory facts, it would be well to bear in mind the wise toleration of which Mr. Furnivall sets us the example: "Reflections on the good deeds done and the high thoughts thought by men of old dirtier than some now, may prevent us concluding that because other people now talk through their noses, and have manners different from our own, they and their institutions must be wholly abominable; that because others smell when heated they ought to be slaves; or that eating pease with a knife renders men unworthy of the franchise" (Forewords, p. lxvij.)

There is no literary publication association which does its work with so little of unnecessary expenditure, or which gives its subscribers so full a money's worth, as the Early English Text Society, and its unexampled success is simply the measure of its merits. We only wish that its list of American associates could be increased tenfold, and we can assure every student of the past that, no matter what his special line may be, he will find in its varied list of issues something every year that will richly repay him.

THE MAGAZINES FOR NOVEMBER.

Lippincott's is not the best magazine of the month, but we are inclined to think that the best magazine article of the month is in Lippincott's. "Mahala's Drive" has rather too heavy a villain in it, to be sure, and certain other things might be said about it; but readability is the virtue of magazine articles, and "Mahala's Drive" is most pleasantly readable. We do not remember having made a young lady's acquaintance, recently, with more satisfaction. Another story, not without merit, is "Doctor Aar," but most of its merit is in the sketching of Uncle Mem, and the curse of commonplaceness lies, though not with too much dead weight, on most of the rest of it. "Emanuel Leutze" seems to have been written by somebody who either had never seen that artist's works, or had never seen works by any other artist. However, it is by some one who knew Leutze personally, and that gentleman's friends will be glad to know what is said of him. A very fair specimen of the monthly variety of poetry—in the cultivation of which we do not conceive of the Muses as being very warmly interested—is "Silhouettes." The Honorable Amasa Walker's essay on "Legal Interference with the Hours of Labor" will bear careful perusal; and there ought to be a trades-union edition of it, in paper covers, just as there is a trades-union edition of Mr. Bristed's "Interference Theory of Government." There is nothing else, we think, in this number of Lippincott's which it is necessary to mention, either by way of commendation or for the purpose of gratifying the critic's natural perversity and malevolence, except the review of Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations." That essay is a good example of the second-best sort of the essays which Mr. Bartlett's work has called out. The writer shows knowledge, and he shows a greater or less want of exact appreciation of the value of his particular fund of knowledge. It was not Mr. Bartlett's business to include in his book every proverb of which himself and his coadjutors might know the origin; nor to reprint every striking expression to be found in poetry, because he could learnedly trace it through a chain of half a dozen authors; nor to resuscitate dead slang. "York, you 're wanted," may have been "frequently heard in Great Britain about 1832, when the Duke of York became insolvent;" and it may even be "common among Englishmen, especially on board men-of-war;" but, nevertheless, it was nothing to Mr. Bartlett, and can only go into his manual when he puts in "How 's your poor feet?" and "All round my hat," and similar devices, which we have noticed as especially common among Englishmen on shore, and which were in use when a good many people in Great Britain became insolvent. And we do not know anybody to whom this quotation is a familiar one:

"She very imprudently married the barber;"

or this one:

"Infants in hell span-long"— which, by the way, the Reverend Mr. Baxter, of Coventry and the "Saint's Rest," has been charged with inventing—certain of whose relatives, very distant ones, our essayist finds in Burns and in Saint Ambrose.

The Overland Monthly we continue to praise heartily. "The Confessions of a Débutant," in the October number, which is the last we have received, is a very agreeable account—and would be even if it were not also a most accurate account—of the feelings of a budding member of the theatrical profession. We speak as one having only a slight acquaintance with the wrong side of any foot-lights. "Old Texan Days" is likewise very good, and "The Californian Abroad"—whom we suspect to be now a Californian much at home in that region of racy humor—tells a highly amusing "Mediæval Romance" of the kind which the late moral showman, Artemus Ward, would describe as mucilaginous, its constituent parts being of several ages, including that of Mr. G. P. R. James. We fear it is the same author who did the "Angelus" which "Mr. Longfellow might," very easily, "have written," but wouldn't. Solider articles than any we have mentioned are: "What the Railroad will Bring Us," "The Vineyards of California," "Overworked Soils," "Did Drake discover San Francisco Bay?" "Porcelain," and a biographical sketch of Rosas, a little known man well worth knowing, who was not so long ago dictator in Buenos Ayres. On the whole, we do not know why we should not call the Overland quite as good as the best of the monthlies before us.

The Galaxy, for November, is to be called a good number. Much is to be forgiven Mr. Edward A. Pollard—whom we never thought to praise in this brief life—for the sake of his sensible and well-written "Story of a Hero," namely, of Admiral Bell. The new novel, "Cipher"—which, by the way, Mr. Eytinge ought to read before trying to illustrate it—goes on as it began, and is still a good magazine story. "A Talk with Mr. Burlingame about China"—China has just got into the place in current literature recently held by Alaska and previously by Crete—is by Mr. R. J. Hinton, and may be read. We wonder, let us here remark, how many persons there are in Washington who, no matter what, on this or other continents, they may happen to be writing about, cannot help lugging Mr. Walt Whitman into their discourse? Three we know of, we believe, and if they keep on they will make him as tiresome as we have no doubt Herr Freiligrath is this moment making him in the German translation; or, in fact, as he is in the American editions—or "The Editions of These States"—of "Leaves of Grass."

Mr. Eugene Benson's "Democratic Deities" we hardly know what to say about. We almost wish that we ourselves loved The Ideal so well as to be made very uncomfortable by everything real. It would be a pitch not reached by the hitherto most celebrated votaries of the veritable ideal. Another instance of a not very exhilarating inability to either take the world and use as much of it as may be needed or else to leave it alone and keep politely quiet, is furnished by Mr. E. R. Sill, in his melancholy verses —of a kind against which we are always constrained to protest. The "Picture of the World" is not a depressingly sad one, except to people who have no other world and who have not this one either, and—to give all the words their fullest sense—what thinking man is in precisely that condition? And if one is not a thinking man, what is the value of one's poetical productions?

The Atlantic opens with a vigorously-written article, or rather an article written with a good deal of spirit, by some woman who next month is going to put before us a scheme for co-operative housekeeping. There is a little exaggeration of tone in the writer's remarks, and the sky she paints is, we should say, a trifle more lowering than the real heavens. This article is, however, a good one, and her next can hardly fail to have still more interest. Mr. Hill's "Mayden Valley, Spinsterland" has not an exceedingly felicitous title, but the matter of it is such that we can recommend it to nearly all persons who heretofore have disliked or liked Mr. Hill's writing. It is humorous and witty, and agreeably sentimental. Of Mr. Benson's "Foreign Faces" we might, in general, say similar things to those we have said of his Galaxy essay above-mentioned. For a description of faces done in the same way, but with far more force and subtlety, we should refer the reader to Mr. Swinburne's essay on certain designs by various masters which he studied in his hot youth at Florence. "Sculpture in the United States" is a paper on art which seems to us to merit the praise of being thoughtful, temperate, and sound; "The Traditional Policy of Russia" is a sensible and well-informed article, which presents a side of the Russian question but little considered by Americans; "Calico-Printing in France" is instructive; "Kentucky's Ghost," by Miss E. Stuart Phelps, is exceedingly well told, and, thinking of it, we partly repent of having said so much about "Mahala's Drive." "What Five Years will Do" consists of letters all written by one person; "Bacon," by Mr. Whipple, is concluded. The poetry of this Atlantic is best in "My Darlings;" but what the writer of that pretty piece was thinking of when she joined the last four stanzas to the others we do not know. Not of her poem, apparently. It would not be right to let the Atlantic go without speaking highly of the "Literary Notices," which are sure to contain some of the most graceful, sedulously finished writings of the month, and which it is only rarely that we do not read with more pleasure than we get from anything else in the magazine. The writers of them, or rather the chief writer of them, is, however, sometimes ingeniously good-natured. But whosoever is wroth with him for having done "John Ward's Governess" may turn to the sly fun and the good sense and good feeling of the notice of Mr. Parton's last book, and forgive him freely.

Harper's has for its best thing of the lighter order another of Major De Forest's very entertaining sketches of the sad life of "the Bureau Major" in the Carolinas. There should be a book made of these papers and of "Parole d'Honneur"—a story of which, as we see by this index number of the magazine, Mr. De Forest is the author. We have on several occasions performed our duty of praising this vivid picture of Southern court-house-town life, and we ought, we suppose, to have known who was its author. In fact, we will make the further supposition that we did know. But the picture was so very vivid that we forgot to think of the painter. A heavy article which we read with a great deal of interest, and from which we obtained more information about the Chinese than we before possessed, is by Doctor William Speer, and is entitled "Democracy of the Chinese." How far the Celestials have carried "the town-meeting theory of government" will surprise most eulogists of the Puritans, and give them a new respect for a people who already should have seemed very highly respectable. There is really need that some San Francisco editor should bestir himself and show us the other side of the question, or our present Pacific coast system of perpetual assault and battery, and assault with intent to kill, on the handiest Chinaman will soon almost begin to appear hardly perfectly justifiable. As for the other articles in Harper's for November, they are well selected and as sure to be read as were the articles of the two hundred and twenty-two numbers of the other thirty-six volumes. One of the illustrated papers is on "Fish-Culture in America," another is on the "Explorations in Lower California," another, by Mr. M. D. Conway, is on the great concert singers of England (but perhaps it might have been as well if the illustrations had been left out of this one). Besides these articles there are many tales of the warmest love and a good enough account of "Mehemet Ali."

The author of "The Church of the Future"—namely, the Methodist—in the Galaxy of two or three months ago gives an easy triumph to an exultant writer in this month's Catholic World. Another of Erckmann-Chatrian's novels, "The Invasion," is begun in the number before us, and there is an article of no great acumen, though not at all ill-done either on Mr. Parsons's translation of Dante. He that believes in eloquent men will do well not to read the Reverend Father Hyacinthe's printed discourse on the text, "Misericordias Domini in æternum cantabo."

The next number of Putnam's is to contain a long poem by Mr. How ells. The present one has the inevitable Chinese article, a poem by Doctor Parsons, and sixteen other articles.

The Rev. Mr. George Bacon does the Chinaman for Hours at Home, and makes as light and easy an article as he usually makes. H. H. is agreeable company in her discourse about "The Speaking Bird, the Singing Tree, and the Yellow Water." Sometimes, we regret to say, she seems to be giving somebody a small pinch or nip, but on the whole she is pleasant and poetical. It may be wrong, but if it is it serves the author of "Storm Cliff" right, that as soon as we saw that she was the person who is writing the new story of New York life we decided not to have anything to do with it —at present, at all events. Whoever watches over the German translations that have been a good feature of Hours at Home manages the matter with care and discretion. This month a good story is told of Bulwer. It was well thought of, too, to insert Mr. Charles Welford's letter to the Bookbuyer. Hours at Home begins with this number a new volume, and adds a new department, which is to be called "Leisure Moments," and is to consist of brief essays after the fashion of the Galaxy's "Driftwood," the Overland's "Etc.," Harper's "Easy Chair," Putnam's "Table-Talk," and so on.

What Makes Me Grow? or, Walks and Talks with Amy Dudley. By the author of "Harry Lawton's Adventures," "Good Dogs," etc. With two illustrations by Lorenz Frölich. (New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1868.)—This is a "juvenile" which we recommend all people in search of suitable books for children to avoid. It is intended to adapt certain facts of physiology and natural history to the comprehension of little people of six years old and thereabouts. We doubt, however, the utility of informing even readers so uncritical and immature that they "have got several kinds of juice inside of them, and one which is of a bright red color," which does not "run about loose in their bodies, but goes inside of little blue pipes called veins"—or that their lungs are "two long things inside the chest," each of which "is joined to the throat by a sort of long narrow pipe"—that the diaphragm is a "see-saw thing" which "bows up against the lungs, squeezes them together, and so pushes the air back again out of the mouth." Nor do we consider speculations on the probable attitude and modes of locomotion of the snake "before the fall," or hints that we were intended by God to hate that reptile because the devil once entered into one, altogether desirable topics for children's books. When it becomes advisable to give them any physiological information, it has happily been provided for them in a trustworthy and altogether delightful manner by Jean Macé. Such a book as this, with its unfortunate and badly illustrated statements and its painfully unpleasant style, is a positive damage to children who may be unfortunate enough to read it.

Gold Elsie. From the German of E. Marlitt, author of "The Old Mam'selle's Secret." By Mrs. A. L. Wister. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—We have taken so much pleasure in reading this book that we really cannot find it in our heart to comment ungratefully on the fact that in all the essential details of plot and characterization it is an almost exact reproduction of its predecessor, "The Old Mam'selle's Secret." The author is still fighting vigorously against her ancient enemies, hypocrisy in religion and inordinate pride of birth and social position. We find our interest in the story—which is, however, quite well enough managed—entirely subordinate to the amused admiration with which we regard its author. She is the heartiest of democrats, and much the best advocate of the woman's cause, as it appears in fiction, that we have seen. The typical German woman, fair and rotund, who "mends the papa's hose" and plays for him the part of a dutiful and overworked upper servant, and is fitly rewarded therefor by accompanying him to the family club and the festive beer-garden, has no recognized existence in Miss Marlitt's ideal world. Her heroines settle themselves firmly on the rock of their own individuality, and being unusually well provided with the weapons of personal beauty, innocence, and genuine love for truth, "moral elevation and spiritual growth," do most sturdy battle with cant and with the aristocratic prejudices of their lovers. They come out victorious, of course, and the heroes, who combine in a curious fashion the peculiarities of Rochester and St. John Rivers, get in the end most loving and obedient wives. Really, both Elsie in this story, and Felicitas in the former one, are altogether delightful characters—and none the worse for being idealizations rather than portraits, since the idealization is of a good kind, and will give young girls who may read the books an impulse in the right direction. We commend them to all novel-readers, to many of whom the faults that interfere somewhat with our enjoyment of them—the over-fondness of their author for dramatic situations, for instance; her love for ruined castles, buried treasures, and artistically unfortunate secrets, which finally provide the radical heroine with as aristocratic a lineage as that of her oppressors—will very likely not seem objectionable.

From Horatio Stone, the Eminent Sculptor.

ROME, ITALY, June 28, 1868.

GEO. W. SAMSON, D.D.,
PRES. COLUMBIAN COLLEGE, WASHINGTON, D.C.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I have to thank you for your great work, "Art Criticism," a copy of which I had the pleasure of receiving from you some months since.

You have conferred a very great favor upon our country, and in fact upon all countries, where the fine arts are, or hope to be, instruments of civilization. You cannot fail to realize, in the influence of this most valuable addition to the literature of art, ample justification of the aim you announced, and the undoubting belief I entertained many years ago, when you were preparing your copious store of material, that you would, by its production, efficiently contribute toward the creation of a liberal estimate of the uses of art among our public men, who have to exercise the function of judges and as agents of the people, their patrons, in its national and municipal application.

It is a complete compend of the history, principles, and uses of art in all its forms and applications; and in a style so clear, concise, and animated that not only students who seek the knowledge it contains, but all readers, will study and obtain the facts it has to impart, with satisfaction as well as profit. I regard it as one of the best, if not the best, popular elementary work extant; so far as my knowledge extends, there is no work of the kind equal to it in the English language. Congratulating you upon its publication and success,

I remain as ever,
Your friend,
HORATIO STONE.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Saturday Review.

"The French—as in other things, so in science—have a knack which we have not. Since Buffon's days they have contrived to write scientific books in a poetical fashion and with a certain bouquet, as it were, of sentiment, and a kind of glitter and sparkle which is far from us. We feel this in looking at Michelet's 'The Bird,' which is graceful and airy in style, and is illustrated in quite the same spirit."

The Art Journal.

"It is a charming book to read, and a most valuable volume to think over. . . . It was a wise, and we cannot doubt it will be a profitable, duty to publish it here, where it must take a place second only to that it occupies in the language in which it was written. The engravings on wood are of a very masterly character; they are all first-class, admirably drawn, and exquisitely engraved; they may be classed, indeed, with the best productions of the art that have been produced in our age."

The Art Journal (Second Notice).

"Certainly natural history has never, in our opinion, been more exquisitely illustrated by wood engraving than the whole of these designs by M. Giacomelli, who has treated the subject with rare delicacy of pencil, and the most charming poetical feeling—a feeling perfectly in harmony with the written descriptions of M. Michelet himself."

Illustrated London News.

"One of the most charming books we have lately received—certainly a book worthy of perusal, and no less worthy of meditation."

Extract from Letter of M. Michelet to the Publishers.

" PARIS, 10th January, 1868.

"GENTLEMEN: I have hitherto had no faith in translations, but your excellent translator has reconciled me to them. As far as I can judge, his work is exceedingly well done.

"The illustrations are admirably printed, with a softness rarely shown in our French engravings.

"I am much flattered by the extreme care you have bestowed upon my book, and Madame Michelet is also delighted to see it so beautifully produced. Accept of our thanks and cordial greeting. J. MICHELET.

The Week.

IT is certain, as we go to press, that Seymour and Blair will have 36 votes in the electoral college, it is probable that they will have 87, and it is possible that they may get the 5 votes of Arkansas and have in all 92. Beyond reasonable doubt they have carried Georgia—intimidation got it for them—Kentucky, Maryland, Delaware, and Louisiana—intimidation again. To the 36 votes of these States probably we should add the 7 of New Jersey, the 3 of Oregon, the 8 of Alabama, and the 5 of Arkansas—where also murder has run riot for weeks—and finally the 33 of New York. How this State has been carried for the Democratic candidates, if indeed it has been carried for them, everybody knows. In twenty polling districts of this city the number of votes cast exceeds the total number registered. In other words, the Republicans have been cheated out of 33 electoral votes and New York out of the honor of giving them to Grant and into the dishonor of giving them to a plausible, dishonest, feeble politician by "repeaters" and "strikers." But for the excellent precautions of the police authorities the Democratic majority in the State would have been 30,000 or 40,000. Against Seymour's 36 sure votes and 92 possible ones we must set down 201 as sure for Grant and 239 as possibly his; Arkansas may have gone for him; and there is a bare possibility that, though the Ring candidate is certainly the next governor, Grant may have beaten Seymour. It is a possibility and hardly a probability. But he has carried all New England—unless one regards Butler's district as an exception—all the great West and North-west; in fact, if we look as we should at the Hudson County frauds in Jersey, and the shameless cheating in this city, Grant and Colfax may be said to have carried every Northern State. Take our account of the assassinations of the South, and Grant and Colfax must be considered as the choice of that section of the country also. As to Congressmen, the Republicans have had defeats in this as in the October elections. Especially in the Southern States have the Democrats made gains; but in the North also there have been Republican losses. Some of them, to be sure, were blessings in disguise. Donelly's defeat and Ashley's are honorable to the party. On the whole, it is probable that in the next Congress there will be 133 Republicans to 77 Democrats—not a two-thirds majority, and one that will keep the House more sensible than it was when the figures stood 174 Republicans to 53 Democrats. In the Senate, on the other hand, there will be more Republicans than ever. A Democrat may replace Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey; but Doolittle goes by the board, and so does Dixon, and so do Buckalew and Hendricks. We have no private analysis of the vote in Butler's district, but his majority seems to indicate that he was largely indebted to the Democrats for his "Radical" triumph. To the moral of his election, as already discussed by us, we have nothing to add, unless that, considering what the canvass developed in regard to Butler's character, his palpable failure to meet the charges against him, and the thoroughly disreputable and dishonest manner in which he conducted his own cause, the district must take far more shame to itself for his election than for his nomination.

No election in the country was ever attended by so much fraud as the one we have just gone through. In this State, of course, the natural home of chicane and boundless rascality, the fattening-place of the corruptest of all American politicians, every variety of cheating has been practised. The naturalization mill we spoke of last week is probably the most effective of all the means of defrauding honest citizens of the control of their political affairs. Men in thousands were made citizens who have no more right to a certificate and a vote than if they were still on their native side of the Atlantic. False names in thousands were put on the registration lists, and on the strength of them repeaters went from precinct to precinct voting early and often. In Brooklyn, in open defiance of law, the officials whose duty it was to count the vote deliberately announced their intention of performing their functions in secret with closed doors. This in order to make the majority as large as might be needed. Such a proceeding, of course, makes the perpetrators of it liable to punishment on conviction, but unfortunately it does not vitiate the poll—and conviction these gentry do not greatly fear. In order that it might be learned just how large a majority it was that would probably be needed, the notorious Supervisor Tweed and his associates sent out a day or two before the election to every county in the State a circular to this effect: The recipient was to make arrangements with a shrewd and reliable Democrat in each city and in most of the towns, whose business it should be to transmit in the early part of the evening an approximate estimate of the relative vote of the two parties. "There was, of course an important object to be gained." The object was, of course, that the Hoffman ring might in turn tell their henchmen in this county and Kings how many ballots to add to the number really cast, fraudulently or honestly. The desperate lengths to which Tammany went are perhaps more strikingly shown by the harmonious proclamations of Mayor Kalbfleisch and Mayor Hoffman—whom we are asked to believe only unfortunate in his associates, though the plain truth is that the most of them are as unfortunate in him as he in them—both of which incite to lawlessness and murder. Luckily some of these rascals, and some big fish as well as some little ones, are under arrest; and unless honest citizens, with proverbial American good-nature, let them go, they will stock the penitentiary, it is to be hoped. The Citizens' Association or the Union League Club never did better work than either would do by following them up with all possible severity.

"What more do the people of the North want?" as Mr. John Quincy Adams says; "what more have they a right to ask? What stronger and better guarantees?" etc., etc. Sure enough. The Republican club-rooms throughout New Orleans and several residences of Republicans have, within the week, been broken into and sacked; the nightly number of murders in the city has been for several nights more than a score; and, although it is not to be denied that the negroes are in some cases the aggressors, yet it is a true general description of the state of things in New Orleans, in the adjacent parishes, and in Louisiana generally, that former rebels kill Union men with alarming frequency, and that the United States soldiers under General Rousseau are no great hindrance. Rousseau, to be sure, has but 600 men in the city. The governor, Warmoth, has been obliged to keep in hiding, and so have many other Republicans who have made themselves conspicuous. There is simply a reign of terror throughout Louisiana, and the State will certainly have to be policed by Federal troops under a commander of a different stripe from Rousseau, or Chief-of-Police Tom Adams and his old companions-in-arms will continue to make Republicanism punishable with death.

"Only seven o' thim bites," as the Irishman said of his nine "quiet" dogs; and when we think that our erring sisters were ten in number, and that we get accounts of terrorism, rioting, and steady murdering only from Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, South Carolina, Missouri, Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee, there is no cause why a New Orleans and a Boston Conservative should not each take a cheerful view of the situation. As for the satrapy of Texas, we may say that we did some injustice, perhaps, in ascribing the recent assassination of Mr. Smith to the officer commanding the garrison at Jefferson. He had but twenty-five or thirty men with him guarding the jail when he was surrounded by a well-equipped mob of two hundred men bent on murder. The officer judged it right to make his men ground arms, inasmuch as they assuredly would have been overpowered. Yet it almost seems as if it was the duty of United States soldiers to go to certain death in a quarrel of that kind. Smith fought with desperate courage, and had eighteen bullets put into him before he stopped firing. General Reynolds, it is said, is to be removed from command in Texas—Mr. Johnson being dissatisfied with him for his attempts to suppress the horrors that make the State a disgrace to the country and the age. Arkansas has had a fight between fifty negroes and a party of white men, in which the former were defeated. Mr. Hinds's murderer turns out to be the secretary of the Monroe County Democratic Committee. On Saturday last a gang in ambush by a roadside in Little River County killed Captain Willis of the Freedman's Bureau, and Captain Porter Andrews of the army, and wounded the county sheriff. The same band of Conservatives killed two negroes on the same day. In the town of Crittenden, in the same State, six men were last week shot for being Radicals and two men for the reason that they tried to bury the others.

A similar thing happened in Tennessee, where a negro, discovered making a coffin for a man killed by the Ku-Klux, was whipped by a party of them, and afterwards, for having indiscreetly said that he knew who had tied him up, was taken into the woods and has not reappeared. At Huntsville, Alabama, a Radical meeting was broken up by a well-directed fire from a Conservative procession. "Judge Horton, a marked man, was mortally wounded," two negroes were killed and many wounded. Huntsville, it is to be remembered, is in a part of Alabama where white Republicans are by no means scarce. In South Carolina, Wade Hampton and his friends have put forth a circular deprecating assassination, which is a good action if it is a sad confession. Governor Bullock said, on Monday, that in Georgia "a reign of terror exists," and predicted that only one-third of the Republicans would dare to poll their votes. This was not an exaggeration. Florida voted by her Legislature and was quiet; and Governor Holden, in his private letters, speaks very hopefully of the future prospects of his State. It is almost the only State that we should feel like recommending to Northern men as a region in which they may settle in security. Its Quakers and Scotch, and its strong infusion of old Whigs, and its solid-headed, honest yeomanry—there is a good probability of a valuable colored yeomanry there—make it, altogether, a State to be honored, liked, and trusted. It certainly is now more nearly recovered from the effects of the war than any of the other members of the Confederacy; and this is directly traceable to the comparative moderation and sensible political course of its people. But with the other States it becomes clearer and clearer every day that something must be done; and we hope Mr. Garfield, and Mr. Bingham, and Mr. Jenckes, and Mr. Schenck, and Mr. Fessenden, and Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Conkling, are doing some thinking about it, and are not intending that the Gloucester sage shall have any word to say in the business. He will do better to confine himself to Grant's case.

The elections have served one useful purpose in New York, in marking more clearly than is possible in ordinary times the extent of the progress which the judiciary and the municipal government have made on the downward road. Election frauds on such an enormous scale have never been witnessed in this country. We described their magnitude last week; and more than one of the judges have participated, with divers other officials, in the issue of certificates of naturalization to fraudulent applicants, and one has done so openly, and as a good joke, with a cigar in his mouth and a glass of whiskey-and-water beside him on the bench, the room crowded with Irish and German emigrants getting their first lesson in the nature of republican institutions. At this shocking degradation of everything that is sacred in politics the whole body of Democratic leaders and officials seem to connive. The United States courts have, however, at last taken cognizance of the matter, which never ought to have been allowed to pass out of their hands, and the District Attorney, Mr. Courtney, has done his duty admirably. He has preferred bills of indictment against the leading criminals, including the judge, and the grand jury have found the bills—the whole being a regular legal proceeding, the propriety and justice of which can now only be decided by a trial. Here, however, the Mayor, who is also Democratic candidate for the governorship, and whom decency ought to have kept quiet, issues a proclamation evidently intended to encourage the fraudulent voters to resist the law, and denouncing the proceedings in the United States courts as a Republican conspiracy. Taking all these things in combination with the attempt on the life of Christopher Pullman, an indefatigable municipal reformer, and a working-man to boot, in the open street in broad daylight, and with still worse horrors which we hear every day, but cannot print, it may safely be said that we have reached a state in this city such as has never been witnessed in one of its size and pretensions, and the remedy for which must be sought outside the ordinary rules of the political art. We earnestly call to it the attention of those Radicals who have been preaching to the poor Democrats, by their support of Butler, that the character of politicians is of no question as long as they are sound on the great "issues." All our scoundrels here are, in the estimation of the local majority, "sound" on all "issues." Your definition of "soundness" does not influence them, but your disgraceful indifference to moral considerations does.

We have one more letter from "A Philadelphia Lawyer" about the election frauds in that city, which reaches us too late to print entire, and as it will not keep till next week we shall, we hope, satisfy him by saying that he denies that the Prothonotary's office was "cleared out," or that any more new clerks were employed than the business needed; that Chief-Justice Thompson offered himself as a witness in a case in his court, or anywhere but before Judge Sharswood. He asserts that the fact to which Chief-Justice Thompson testified on that occasion is admitted by "every one," and that the Prothonotary's hesitation about the forgeries was only momentary; that it is a very queer thing that if Devine's story was worthless, nobody has earned the Union League reward by trying to convict him; that the grand jury ignored a bill against a policeman for shooting a man "because the man shot was a Democrat" (this we consider rather strong on its face); that Judge Read's last performance, in delivering an opinion on the naturalization matter, with no case before him, is worse than that of which Judge Field was accused; that Judge Read's son, General J. Meredith Read, Jr., will be the next minister to England; and that the judge has stronger claims on General Grant than any other man in Philadelphia. But with this statement of the "Philadelphia Lawyer's" opinions the discussion of these particular frauds must cease as far as we are concerned.

There appears to be intense excitement amongst the Butlerites about dinners. Some meal given to somebody in times past must have given a serious shock to their nerves, and perhaps, though we hope not, has sown the seeds of permanent disease. They now shudder when they hear of anybody wanting to give a dinner to any public man they do not like. They tell you, for instance, in low, hollow tones, that R. H. Dana signed the invitation to Fessenden, or that the New York bar had invited Evarts to dinner, and look as if a criminal had just confessed to them where he had buried the body and what he had done with the watch and purse.

One of the chief members of the sect has just been elevating Butler above Grant in the moral and political scale, and the symptoms of some of the others are equally grave. There is, for obvious reasons, no use in arguing with them. In fact, it is getting to be cruel to do so. Quiet and repose are now the only things that will bring them relief.

The telegraph operator who communicated to General Butler the despatch from Mr. Samuel Ward to Mr. Edward Atkinson, which the general unblushingly published, has been discovered; but he prudently resigned when he found that discovery was impending. The president of the company, Mr. Atkinson says, is quite ready and willing to prosecute him; but thinks it would be of no use, as a man guilty of a similar offence in this city was discharged from custody on the ground that he could not in decency be prosecuted for an act which the Butler "Committee of Investigation" perpetrated last spring wholesale. Mr. Atkinson thinks the court would have decided differently, however, had it known that the committee repudiated the acts of the chairman in seizing the telegrams. The offender in question was not discharged by the court. The district attorney, Mr. Oakey Hall, refused to prosecute, on the ground set forth above; but if he had prosecuted, and the man had been convicted, the precedent would have availed little in this last case. No jury could with propriety convict a poor young man of stealing the Ward telegram when his older confederate, for whose benefit he stole it, and who used it publicly, was at the same moment going to Congress by the suffrages of one of the most moral and intelligent constituencies in the country. We know very well that a good many Butlerites flatter themselves that they can fence off the general's "soundness on the main question" from his other characteristics, and by keeping it constantly and principally before the public eye prevent their admiration of him from damaging the morals of the community. But unhappily Providence has seen fit to make this little arrangement impossible. A man's influence on society is the result of his whole character and career, and not of his "views" on any particular subject; and when General Butler is singled out by Massachusetts from her hundreds of thousands of worthy sons for honor and reward, it is not simply "the friend of the black man," or the "foe of the Copperheads," or the hero of the march through Baltimore that the poor young men see, but the whole man, totus teres atque rotundus—the Lowell lawyer, the Charleston delegate, the New Orleans proconsul, the impeacher, and investigator rolled into one. The telegraph operator who stole the despatch is, doubtless, as "sound on the main question" as Butler himself. The fact is, the Butlerite classification of "questions" is not registered in heaven or anywhere else, except the offices of a few Radical newspapers, and the sect may as well reconcile itself at once to the solemn fact that any society based on such a classification would go to pieces in ten years.

Secretary Seward made his appearance in the canvass during the past week by a speech to his friends and neighbors at Auburn, which was characterized by great moderation, good taste, and good sense. He abandoned none of the positions he has held during the past four years—this is hardly to be expected from a man of his years—but he defended them with calmness and dignity. He told the story of reconstruction according to the Johnson version of it. He said—what is quite true—that the plan Mr. Johnson attempted to act on was substantially the one devised by Mr. Lincoln; but it was a plan which involved more or less usurpation of power on the part of the President, and therefore depended for its success, as Mr. Seward admitted, on the popular confidence in the President's sagacity and good intentions. This Mr. Lincoln had and Mr. Johnson had not, or only in a very minor degree, and therefore the success which was possible to Mr. Lincoln was scarcely attainable by Mr. Johnson, even if all went well. On this point Mr. Seward was clear and candid. We therefore looked with some curiosity for his explanation of the cause of the overthrow of Mr. Johnson's plan in 1866, the sudden change in the Northern temper, and the rapid ascendency of the extreme Radical section of the Republican party. The true cause of these things undoubtedly was the revelation which was made of Southern schemes with regard to the negroes in the winter of 1865–6, and the reckless and barbarous legislation by which it was sought to put these schemes into execution; but of all this Mr. Seward, strange to say, makes no mention. To him, apparently, the triumph of the Radicals was due to an outbreak of "pure cussedness." As between the two parties now before the country, Mr. Seward prefers the Republican, and we presume has voted for Grant. "Very great crimes," he says, "have been committed in the name of liberty by the Republican party," but "no suspicion rests on its loyalty or its devotion to human freedom," and he cannot say as much for the Democratic party.

The Water-Street "revival" has, we believe, come to an end, and the researches of the City Mission have shown that very few, if any, of the class for whose benefit the movement was set on foot, amongst whom, we were assured, it was "sweetly and quietly" making its way, have profited by it, or even attended any of the meetings. It was got up and carried through to its end by a body called the "Howard Mission;" and the time now seems to have come to ask what is the "Howard Mission?" What is the nature of the organization? Who compose it? Who are its directors, trustees, or managers; and where do they live or do business? Where are its reports and especially its accounts of receipts and expenditures? If any printed accounts exist, who has audited them, and under what conditions? In asking these questions, we are not only giving expression to a legitimate curiosity on the part of several subscribers to its funds, but we are giving the body a chance of establishing a firmer hold on public confidence and gratitude than it now possesses.

Two very curious and interesting papers have recently appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes entitled the "Préliminaires de Sadowa," giving the history of the various intrigues, negotiations, and combinations which led to the outbreak of the war of 1866. They contain a great deal of matter never before made public, and certainly make the position of the Prussians, from a moral point of view, wear a somewhat unpleasant look. There was a touch of grim humor in the opinion solemnly given by the Prussian crown lawyers that, though the title of Prussia to the duchies may not have been good before she seized them, it was perfectly good afterward, because it rested on military conquest. But the most important point brought out is that Venice was ceded to France by Austria before a shot was fired; and the battle of Sadowa was, therefore, fought merely for the honor of the Austrian arms, and with the deliberate intention of evacuating the Italian territory after it had been won. The fact of the cession was not revealed till after Sadowa. The world was then given to understand by the Moniteur that it had just been made. There has not been in this century a more striking illustration than this affords of the wild, romantic, and therefore cruel, way in which aristocracies carry on war; and it helps everybody to understand how it is that aristocratic armies are being driven out of existence by the growth of the democratic plan of conducting war on business principles. The presence in Bohemia of the army which was fighting for "honor" in Venetia would probably have saved the aged empire, to say nothing of thousands of lives.

The report of which we recently spoke, that the French Emperor's mind was more inclined to peace than it has been for some time back, and that M. Guizot's article was the cause of his conversion, continues to receive partial confirmation. That is, there are plenty of signs that he is more than usually desirous of peace; but of course the cause of the change is somewhat doubtful. Advancing years count for something in it; the formidable character of the enemy he would encounter, the certainty that, while one great defeat would ruin his dynasty, three defeats would probably only weld Germany into a solid mass, and turn it on France in a white heat of rage and patriotism, doubtless count for more. The revolution in Spain has contributed something toward the result, but rather by way of providing food for reflection than by intimidation. There is always something suggestive to other monarchs in the fall of a monarchy, and the treason of the army and navy makes the Spanish revolution peculiarly suggestive to Louis Napoleon. A reduction of the army is still talked of, and the general confidence in peace is about twice as strong as it was a month ago.

THE DEMOCRATS AS AN OPPOSITION.

Mr. John Quincy Adams's speech in South Carolina, and the recent attempt to throw Seymour and Blair overboard, and the fact, which now seems to be well established, that there does exist in the ranks of the Democratic party a large body of persons who are sensible of the folly which has marked the course of the party during the last year or two, seem to furnish some foundation for the hope that the party will, during the coming four years, if it can do nothing else, at least furnish the country with something like a decent opposition. We are not, as our readers know, amongst the number of those who looked on in unmixed admiration at the Republican performances in Congress since 1865. They were undoubtedly marked by many follies and absurdities. The party in power was guilty of some foolish legislation; of many foolish attempts at legislation. Its leaders said a great many wild things, and for a while the control of the organization seemed to be put up at auction, the men that said the wildest things being treated as the highest bidders. People who talked to it of reason or experience, of possibility or impossibility, were denounced as traitors or idiots. So things went on till 1867, when undoubtedly the country was pretty well disgusted with Republican rule, and bore it solely because of the magnitude and importance of the interests the party had in its keeping, and which in no other keeping would have been safe. With the impeachment the critical point in the party fortunes was reached. The process, properly conducted, the country was perfectly willing to submit to, but it was not prepared for the scandals and excesses by which it in fact was marked. However, by good luck rather than by good management, it came out of it without serious damage. We have no hesitation now in saying, however, that it was saved from utter ruin by the votes of the seven senators. Whether they were corrupt or honest in their decision, it prevented the accession of Mr. Wade to the Presidency and the predominance of men like General Butler in the councils of the executive, and probably the nomination of Mr. Wade at Chicago. Now, there is no doubt whatever, in view of what the majorities have been at the late elections, both State and Federal, that the happening of either of these contingencies would have killed the party and delivered the country into the hands of the Democrats. Three or four months of the rule of Wade and Butler might have established the reign of pure "truth," but it would also have determined the country to bring that reign to a close at the earliest possible moment, and that moment would have been the 4th of March, 1869. These are not simple speculations of our own, nor are they things which anybody will hear at mass meetings; but they are things which nine out of ten thinking Republicans will tell you in a private room. The party has been saved, as we have said, first of all by the result of the impeachment process, and secondly, and proximately by the opportunity to follow the dictates of its sound and sober judgment which that result afforded the Chicago Convention.

But when one compares even the most foolish of the Republican leaders to the wisest of the Democratic leaders, one begins involuntarily to excuse the Republican vagaries. The Democrats in Congress, to be sure, were small; but they had nearly half the population of the North at their back. They were but a handful; but they, in reality, represented nearly as many voters as the majority. The knowledge of this fact would have made men possessing the least skill in their art a powerful and dreaded enemy. It could not, of course, have given them the victory, when heads came to be counted, but it would have given their criticisms weight and edge; would have made formidable breaches in the Republican ranks out of doors; would have held the more reasonable and intelligent portion of the Democratic party firm in their allegiance; and would, perhaps, only have been prevented from driving the Republicans from power by making them sensible of their danger and opening their eyes to the value of wisdom and discretion.

As things went, however, the Democratic members in Congress during the past three years have perhaps supplied the most comical and pitiable chapter in the history of legislative bodies. In the first place, in their parliamentary tactics they imitated Thaddeus Stevens, in acting rather like prophets who had a message to deliver to a stiff-necked generation than like politicians whose business it was to win men over to their way of thinking. One would suppose, to watch their performances, their dilatory motions when the final result was perfectly clear, their bombastic protests, their small parliamentary tricks, their personal attacks, their grotesque and absurd resolutions; their persistent opposition to everything good, bad, or indifferent which the really good men of the Republican party advocated; their readiness to league with the dregs of the Republican party in the prosecution of any scheme likely to embarrass the majority, no matter what its effect might be on the nation at large; their wild and reckless exaggerations of the really weak points in Republican rule; their ostentatious indifference to the public credit, as if the fate of the national debt could be anything but a matter of the deepest importance to any inhabitant of the country; their ostentatious indifference to the fate of the negroes, as if the condition, mental and moral and physical, of four millions of persons out of a population of ten millions could be a small concern to any honest and intelligent man appointed to legislate for it; their unwillingness to admit that there was any good motive whatever at the bottom of the prosecution of the war in which three hundred thousand of their own friends and neighbors had laid down their lives—in short, the concentration of their wits and energies during three long years on the one petty and disreputable task of impeding the path of the majority, a task to which the feeblest wits and energies were, of course, equal,—one would suppose, we say, that the sole object of their constituents in sending them to Congress was to act as a kind of light cavalry and make the enemy feel uncomfortable.

Their mission was, however, not to beat the Republicans in the vote, or wear them out by filibustering, or surpass them in badinage, but to present to the country and the world regularly and temperately, and as ably as they could, with as little exaggeration as possible—exaggeration on the part of minorities being the equivalent of the military offence of being drunk on duty—that other side of every question that came up which it was naturally the tendency of the majority to overlook or conceal. But they presented no side of anything. They ranted by the hour. Not one of their speeches was of any more use in elucidating any point under discussion than the crackling of thorns under a pot. They did not even protect freedom of debate; they made it ridiculous. They talked so much nonsense that when the majority was gagging them, the public laughed and said it served them right. The discourses of their ablest man (leaving out Reverdy Johnson), Senator Doolittle, were wild statements of doctrines, both social and political, which everybody knew were dying or dead, and with which there was no chance whatever of influencing the drift of public opinion. Their weightiest men in the House never produced anything more formidable than dry essays on "the negro's place in nature," and one of them had the candor to acknowledge that his essay on this subject was the composition of an obscure Ohio doctor. Their political economy was not a whit better than Thaddeus Stevens's, and such as it was they did not understand it, and seldom produced it; and, when they did produce it, handled it as a savage might a gun. On the currency and taxation they gave no evidence of possessing any fixed views whatever. Sometimes they were for greenbacks and sometimes for gold, and were opposed apparently to all taxation; but whether they preferred greenbacks or gold became more and more uncertain as the years rolled on. Their last proposal on the matter of finance is to make the currency as bad as possible for the purpose of annoying the party that suspended specie payments.

They have now once more a chance of regaining a little respectability. They have four years in which to prepare for the next election, and during that period some of the weightiest questions in political economy and jurisprudence will come before Congress. They can, by a very small amount of exertion in the discussion of these matters, win back a considerable amount of popular confidence. Suppose they were to take up even one reform, and advocate it with temper, and knowledge, and discretion. They helped General Butler in deranging the plan of the Committee of Ways and Means; suppose they were to help Mr. Jenckes in preparing the Civil Service Bill. This would commit them to nothing inconsistent with the position they now hold on reconstruction and would certainly win popular respect. Suppose, too, they were to make themselves the champions of what Burke calls "civil prudence" in their treatment of the Southern question, accept all accomplished facts, admit the negro's right to security as well as liberty even while denying his right to vote, and denounce all outrages on him or oppressive legislation directed against him. Suppose they were to take hold of some theory of revenue and taxation which has some basis in facts and derives some support from human experience—say hard money, or free banking, or free trade—and preach it zealously and consistently; do something, in short, to win back for Democrats the credit of thinking and reasoning. Suppose, in short, they were to substitute some line of action for mere abuse of the party in power, would they not speedily win back some of their lost ground? Has any opposition ever succeeded in preserving a shadow of authority or a particle of weight after it had ceased to have anything to propose or affirm, and had begun to rely wholly on negation and invective?

SLANDER AND LIBEL.

A NEW law-book, by Mr. John Townshend, designed to present the profession with all about the law of slander and libel which a lawyer can expect to find in a single volume, and which does present it with great conciseness as well as completeness, and which nevertheless supplies instructive as well as entertaining reading for laymen, suggests some reflections worth noting touching the effect of the changes in modern society in lowering the value and interest of the law of libel. We do not mean to say that the time has come, or is even near at hand, when it will make no difference whether a man can or can not bring an action or get out a warrant against his fellow-man for the use of language injurious to his peace or reputation. A legal remedy for the wrongs of the tongue there will doubtless always be, and always should be; but there seems to be little question that it will be hereafter less and less resorted to. Not only is the world growing less and less sensitive to personal abuse or depreciation, but personal abuse and depreciation do people much less harm than they used to do. It is not very many years ago since a man of average respectability, and not a clergyman, was expected, in nearly all civilized countries, to kill or wound anybody else of average respectability who said unhandsome things about him and refused to retract or apologize. If a man said I had lied, although I might have a character for truthfulness of thirty years' standing, I was obliged to try to murder him, and to give him at the same time a chance of murdering me. Or, if he said I had on a certain occasion behaved in a cowardly manner, I was obliged, although I might have led the van on a dozen famous fields, to wash out the imputation, as the phrase was, in his blood. It does not seem in those days of sensitiveness to have made any difference whether the slurs thrown on one had any foundation or not, or whether people believed them or not; he was obliged to act as if they did believe them, and to feel or feign the greatest indignation, and show it by risking his life. Even men whose age or profession or principles prevented them from exacting "the satisfaction usual amongst gentlemen" were forced either to go to law for "the vindication of their honor" or to undergo social reprobation, more or less severe according to the moral and mental condition of the society in which they lived. This extreme sensitiveness, too, was not confined to the upper classes of society. Suits were brought by persons of all ranks for the punishment of charges which could have done no damage except to the feelings, and which would now simply excite laughter. The slanders recited in some of the older recorded cases are uncommonly amusing. Actions have been brought for calling a man a "thieving puppy," a "bankrupt knave," a "bankrupt skrub," a "cuckoldy rogue," a "hog thief," or a "rebellious knave," and for saying that he "got drunk on Christmas Day," or that he was "an enchanter" or "a varlet." Judges have gravely ruled that it was not actionable to call a man a "thievish knave," or "a cheat," or "common filcher," or to say that he had "thievishly taken" some money; but that it was actionable to call him a "thieving rogue" or a "thieving pirate," or to say that "he deserved to have his ears nailed to the pillory." In fact, the books swarm with the results of solemn deliberations of the great masters of the law upon the precise force and effect of epithets used in a passion by pairs of foul-mouthed and uneducated disputants, who probably never in their lives had weighed a word they uttered.

In England, during the latter half of the last century and in the early part of this one, the attorney-general's time was largely occupied in prosecuting printers and authors for saying naughty things about men in authority and about the Christian religion and the general principles of morality. The attacks of a "news-writer" or pamphleteer, however absurd or extravagant or pointless, set men in the highest positions nearly wild. The letters of Junius are mostly a mass of turgid and pompous abuse, which few editors of good newspapers would now be willing to print, and yet they convulsed English society in their day, and in consequence of their doing so still furnish materials for one of the dullest bits of contemporary speculation. The European dread of libels was felt in America by the statesmen and clergy in mostly the same degree, and it led shortly after the formation of the Government to the passage of an act providing for the punishment of editorial attacks on persons in authority. It really seemed to good people at that time as if a writer could break up the framework of society with epigrams and sarcasms and epithets. One of the most curious relics of the old state of feeling as regarded spoken or written imputations on the character, is the practice of "posting" persons who refused to fight a duel—that is, sticking up a bill on a post or gate announcing to the world that A. had been guilty of certain base acts and was, in the estimation of B., "a liar and a coward." It has completely died out in England, and we doubt if it was ever known on the Continent; but one hears of it occasionally still in that great museum of antiquated observances and exploded theories, the Southern States. The last person of whom we have heard as resorting to it was, as might have been expected, Mr. Pollard of the "Lost Cause," who made his appearance not long ago, in some public place in Richmond, armed with a long gun, and majestically kept watch while a negro, carrying a paste-pot, a brush, and piece of paper bearing a defamatory composition from the Pollard pen, "posted" one of his enemies on a suitable wall or paling. There was a time when this ceremony, which was usually performed with great solemnity, was supposed to inflict ineffaceable infamy, being the equivalent of the unavenged "soufflet" of the French code. It was the rod by which cowardly slanderers were whipped to the field of honor or driven from society, and was, therefore, really a terrible penalty. The newspapers would, of course, have supplanted the bill-sticker, even if the practice of exposing one's enemies to the scorn of the world still lingered amongst us; but what more than anything else has driven it, and all things like it, out of use is the decline of the idea of conventional "dishonor"—that is, of the belief that one's character can be really affected by what other people say apart from the truth of what they say. We might express the same thing more accurately by ascribing it to the growth of realism, in our way of looking at all the social relations. It is the application of the utilitarian test which has killed the duel, and this same test is doing much to make the action for libel an obsolete remedy. Rationalism has done much the same work in this field as in others. People have found by experience that, as a matter of fact, it does a man no harm to be libelled, unless the charge made is one that, if true, or if generally believed, would affect his fitness for his calling. To charge a clergyman with licentiousness, or a doctor with malpractice, or a lawyer with selling his client, must always be an injury, as real as robbing his house or assaulting him, and in such cases, doubtless, the law will always be appealed to for protection. In fact, the legal theory on which the action for libel is based, is that a man suffers pecuniary damage in every case in which he is libelled. It is only, of course, by the aid of a fiction that this is applied to a great number of cases, in which the person libelled suffers simply distress of mind or loss of consideration on the part of his neighbors. But people find that verbal attacks on them nowadays, which do not cause them specific damage—that is, damage in money—really seldom cause them any damage whatever, and, consequently, are growing more and more careless about such attacks.

One reason of this, and the greatest one, is the growth of population and the multiplication of the objects of popular interest and attention. In the old days before steam and electricity and the daily press, when towns were scarce, books and periodicals few, and news scanty and long in coming, the opinion of one's neighbors had a weight of which we can now form little idea. Everybody in all but the largest cities knew everybody else and all about him, and a difference with a fellow-townsman seriously interfered with one's comfort, because it furnished the community with an exciting subject of conversation and reflection. If a man's enemies took it into their head to go about calling him a "rogue" or a "cuckoldy knave," and posted up a bill pronouncing him a "coward" and a "liar," which he would probably have to pass twice a day, and which every person in the place would read, it naturally made his life miserable, although his business and his credit remained as good as ever. How much the smallness of a place and the narrowness of interests have to do with increasing the intensity of quarrels, is well illustrated even in our own day by the bitterness of the contentions between the editors of newspapers in country towns in remote districts. When one sees one's foe every time one leaves one's house, and hears his epithets on every breeze, even the most successful "action on the case" seems a very feeble and imperfect consolation.

In our time, however, everybody is so much occupied not only with what is passing in the immediate neighborhood of his own abode, but all over the Union and all over the world; everybody's interests are so diversified and so numerous, he reads so many books and papers, has so many schemes in his head, knows, on the whole, so little and cares so little about his neighbors, has so little certainty whence they came or how long they will remain, that few charges against them are sufficient to make him raise his eyes and listen. Knowing how he feels about libels on other people, he is not concerned much about libels on himself. If anybody "posts" him he knows so well that the bill will either be speedily covered up by a picture of the gathering of the priceless Buchu in the forests of Araby, or by an account of the miraculous cures of the Mandrake pills, that he never troubles his head about it. Even the assaults of the newspapers are deprived of most of their power by the frequency of their appearance, and their multiplicity. Twenty or thirty years ago, when New York was a comparatively small place, and it had only one morning paper of any note, people felt it necessary to go down and horsewhip the editor whenever he threw dirt at them. There are far more names called and more dirt thrown now, in the aggregate, than there was then; but there are so many engaged in it, and the noise is so loud and so incessant, that nobody is much troubled by it. There are no horsewhippings or bloody noses or torn clothes, in consequence of "newspaper slanders;" and, on the whole, it is seldom anybody is hurt by them. A curious illustration of the way in which the common law adapts itself to the wants of human nature is afforded by an English case cited by Mr. Townshend, in which it was ruled that publishing of a newspaper that it was a "vulgar, ignorant, and scurrilous journal" was not actionable, but that to say of it that it was "low in circulation" was actionable. Now, as we remarked in speaking of newspaper quarrels the other day, a newspaper might bring the former charge against a great many other papers in this city and elsewhere without breeding irreconcilable enmity. It would probably get repaid in kind, but the matter would blow over, and the two combatants might hope speedily to be engaged once more in the interchange of "journalistic amenities." But if it said their circulation was declining, gentle peace would quit the scene, shrieking, and with veiled face, and without the smallest hope of return: so that the legal principle here meets the demands of the community with remarkable accuracy.

There is, however, one bad feature, and it is a very bad one, in the growing indifference to libellous attacks, and that is the small influence which the utterance of libels has in damaging the character of those who utter them. It is one thing to refuse to sue a man for assailing your character, imputing bad motives to you, loading you with abuse, and holding you up to scorn and contumely, in the mere wantonness of power and for the purpose of helping "a cause" or a party; but it is another thing to treat him as if he had done nothing wrong, and as if these were legitimate weapons of public discussion. A platform or newspaper ruffian may be too insignificant or too harmless a person to be worth an action, but a person whom he assails, and who, nevertheless, embraces him when he meets him, not only shows himself wanting in self-respect, but does a serious injury to the cause of morality. A brutal press and brutal platform are as great curses as can afflict a free country. Even if they cannot damage an individual character, they do blunt the moral perceptions of the community at large, they rob reason and judgment of their legitimate influence on public opinion, they obscure or hide the real issues in great controversies, they give ignorance and impudence an undue prominence in politics and society; and even where they help on the work of social or political reform, the help is like the aid of mercenary troops, purchased at a price which deprives the result of half its value.

TURKEY AND GREECE.

ATHENS, October, 1868.

THE efforts made by the Turkish Government to mislead public opinion in Europe and the United States might, properly directed, have served to justify a good opinion; and no more satisfactory evidence is needed of the utter rottenness of the whole Ottoman organization than the systematic substitution of seeming for being, diplomats clever at lying for governors capable of justice, wholesale bribery of public men and newspapers for reformation. It is understood here that a great effort is being made now to control the public sentiment of the United States, and some people, whose sympathies have no channel to run in, in that direction, are said to have been gained, while the friends of the crescent make no secret of their belief that they have gained the good-will of our naval dignitaries; and though no one of us will believe that any of our officers could be gained à la Turque, it is not to be denied that the general feeling of those who have recently been here was strong in prejudice against the Greek and good-will for Stamboul. This is easily explained. Our navy, as a general thing, likes respectable people and stations where is much entertainment, established governments, and especially those who make their seaports agreeable by little attentions and civilities, and dislikes poor and dirty people and stations where are no parties or theatres; and this especially when those people imagine that the origin and character of the American nation give them the right to demand its sympathy and aid. All men have an instinctive dislike of people who demand help as a right—they prefer those who sit humbly in the dirt and silence, waiting in patience what crumbs may fall to them; a right to ask implies an obligation to give, and when we don't want to give, the easiest way to get out of it is to deny the right to ask. The Greeks have the fault of asking as if they had the right to ask, and especially of Americans, as if they conceived that liberty and prosperity induced sympathy and a desire to aid those who are deprived of these blessings. Both great mistakes, and the first a double mistake. The Greeks have no right to ask anything from anybody, for though we are, in common with mankind, under immense obligation to the Greek race, those obligations have no legal character, as not involving any form of property known to the law; and, moreover, if we were under obligation, who does not know that any man "would rather give than pay?" Again, the possession of liberty does not give the slave a higher place in our pity, as is shown in that we ourselves protected slavery until we were obliged, in self-defence, to kill it, while all the world knows that the poor are infinitely more charitable than the rich; or if any man doubts it, let him station himself near one of the legalized beggars on one of the bridges over the Seine, where blind and lame are allowed certain places to appeal for charity, and make note of how many and what people stop to give the unfortunate alms. If I take an example from Paris, it is because in New York or Boston we are not addicted to that mistaken practice of alms-giving to public beggars.

The above considerations don't come home to us in America, but to our sailors who may be obliged to go to meet them they have their full weight; and especially when it was proposed to employ our elegant and picked ships in the dirty humanitarian service of transporting suffering Cretans, it was speedily ascertained by the entire service how much we were interested in the discouragement of insurrection and how much we were bound to non-interference in the affairs of these people—since which a growing respect for the rights of the Sultan and the integrity of the Ottoman Empire may have been observed in the navy, as well as an increased dislike of the Greeks as a knavish, presuming people, bombastic, bragging, and intrusive. (How long is it since we ceased in the estimation of most European nations to appropriate these epithets exclusively?)

I admit the force of these motives as sufficient to account for the hostility of our naval officers to the Cretan movement, without in the least impeaching their incorruptibility as a body, and should repel as a personal insult any allegation to the contrary. I do not even deny entirely the accusations against the Greeks. I do not myself like the national characteristics, and in general I may say that I don't like Greeks (in general, I don't like Americans or mankind)—I don't like negroes, but I don't see what my antipathies have to do with their inalienable rights or my duties towards them. I can't say that I should enjoy being a member of a Cretan community, but I don't see what that has to do with my obligation to do to them as I would have done to me were I fighting for my inalienable rights against a system of oppression more galling than Southern slavery. We only cease to be responsible for the vices of others, or their woes, when we have done all in our power to help them to get rid of the causes of them.

But in our politicians and our civil functionaries, as well as a portion of the press, I do not feel the same confidence as to incorruptibility as in the navy. We know very well what is bought and sold in Washington, and I do not think it idle to fear that the Sultan's money will find slaves there other than those he sent. I know that there is much anxiety felt as to the effect of public opinion in America, and that great efforts will be made to turn it, by the two capital dodges of false news representing the insurrection as suppressed, and the urging of our international obligations—as if all our international obligations were with the oppressor rather than with the oppressed; as if we, whose fundamental principle is that there is no right to govern without the consent of the governed, should affirm the eternal right to misgovern without that consent, wherever we ourselves are not concerned.

"But," the Porte lawyer or newspaper advocate will say, "we are giving to the Cretan rebels what we did not permit other powers to give our own." We were obliged to submit to popular and official sympathy carried to an extreme, to loans of money and arms, to the opening of ports for blockade-running, and the open justification of all this; and we could only make a pretence of diplomatic quarrel at the undisguised fitting-out of a fleet in English ports. "But the Sultan was our friend, and forbid the entry of rebel privateers into his ports." I should like to see—no, I 'd rather not see—a man simple enough to believe that the Sultan or the true Turk of any rank could be a friend of a republic of our kind, or ever gave himself a thought of us. He had clever ministers who saw that, finish how it might, our war would leave only one maritime power, the North, the only one it was worth his while to conciliate. We had a shrewd representative at Constantinople who knew how to make our case and show how it accorded with his interests. That was all. And because a despot flattered us, we must forget the principles to which we owe our own existence and the friendly foreign aid to which is due the completion of our independence. To the arguments drawn from our Southern rebellion to be applied to the Cretan insurrection, there can be no reply but contempt for the intelligence or honesty of those who use or accept them.

The dissemination of false news is much more likely (I flatter our national common sense in believing) to do the Cretans harm in America. It is employed with immense effect in Europe, where the majority of people are persuaded that the insurrection has ceased to exist. Up to a recent period the foreign ministers in Athens may be supposed to have believed that the insurrection was declining, though the consular despatches from Crete were unanimous in describing it as unchanged; but I have good grounds for saying that the ministers are satisfied that the Porte has no immediate prospect of subduing it, and that, in consequence, a new pressure has been put on the Greek Government to withdraw the aid afforded the Cretans, but that the new advance has been met by unqualified refusal to change the Hellenic policy. This refusal and direct antagonism to the English policy, which was before so favored by Bulgain, may be in part attributed to the unmasking of what has been known as the "English intrigue" in Crete, the movement in favor of a principality urged by English agents, and without doubt encouraged by the Bulgain ministry. It has become evident now to Bulgain, as it has been long to clear-headed people, that this movement was intended rather to make the Cretan cause seem weak in the knees, than to effect a result in the direction of a principality, which Mr. Elliot well knew would not be granted. What was really intended was rather to arrest the élan of the insurrection, and make the world believe that it was failing in courage and willing to make terms with the Turk. The first step in this intrigue was to persuade one of the chiefs to petition England for her mediation. This taken and the petition made, it was rejected on the ground that it had n't sufficient authority, and the English consul informed the petitioner that the petition must be made by the Assembly of the Cretans, and represent the general desire. The next petition then was transmitted by the Assembly, and was to have placed the insurrection at the discretion of the English Government, but the war party inserted a clause modifying the petition, so as to insist on the popular aspirations, i.e., asking the English Government to annex the island to Greece. This spoiled the whole thing; and now the English Government, after having induced the Assembly to favor the petition, refused to receive it on the ground that it did not recognize the existence of that body! And yet, though I have the most certain knowledge that the English agent in Crete and the legation here are thoroughly satisfied that the Porte has no prospect of reducing the insurrection, in all material points stronger than it was a year ago, we shall see the English newspapers maintaining, in the interest of the Sultan, that the affair is as good as over.

English diplomacy here has met an utter defeat, and the Greek Government will henceforward make no attempt to control the Cretan movement in an unfavorable sense. Of this I have the highest assurance. An expedition of 500 Cretans sets out to-night for Crete to rekindle the war in a section where it was supposed to have died out. This is in accordance with a policy determined long ago, to abandon the western districts temporarily and induce the Turks to concentrate their forces in the central districts, when the insurrection would break out again in Kinamos and Selinos. A more important organization is projected and will soon be landed in Crete, and the Turkish army, already weakened so as to be really incapable of the occupation of the island, supposing it temporarily conquered, will find itself beset by new terrors and a resuscitation of the insurrection such as this year has not seen, when it will be evident that I speak the truth when I say that the troops hold less of the island than they held a year ago.

Mr. Canfield, late United States Consul at Piræus, has turned up as part of the revolutionary expedition of one O'Reilly in Syria, near Damascus, and has been taken prisoner with several others, according to the Turkish account. A conspiracy with extensive ramifications has been discovered to have been in progress at Constantinople. The Bulgarian affair broods and grows, and we shall soon hear of a new insurrection in Lebanon. The rotten old fabric of Othman seems to have touched bottom somewhere. There is but one place fit for it, and that has no bottom, they say.

CREEDS AND RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Dear Sir: In an article entitled "Religious Conventions," issue October 18, you make this statement, namely: "Mere intellectual sympathy, or sympathy of any kind, is too subtle a thing to hold a religious organization together."

Placing the high value we do upon the editorially expressed opinions of the Nation, and appreciating the weight they carry with them to the thinking minds of the reading public, we were sorry to find this statement, unqualified as it should have been by some proper explanation, thus going abroad to the prejudice of a glorious work begun.

We should agree substantially with the main idea advanced, that some creed was necessary to a proper church organization, but differ very materially in regard to its relative importance in the same. We think that the great mistake of the Christian church, from the Papal degeneracy down to our own day, has been this very elevation of creed, so-called, to an importance Christ and his apostles never taught, nor intended it should have, in the Christian ἐκκλησία. You say that a school of philosophy, or a society of speculative enquiry, may be founded upon sympathy, but not a "church militant, a growing and aggressive church." We believe that just the opposite of this is true, and this conviction we apprehend to be the only true exponent of Christ's life and teachings. We believe that if Christ had intended to found his church upon a creed, he would have stated it so explicitly that there could have been but one, instead of the many there are now. It seems to us plainly taught throughout the whole Gospel that Christ intended his church should be a brotherhood, united by a bond of divine as well as human sympathy, not an organization shut in by the narrow bonds of an intellectual "credo."

Protestantism made as great a mistake when it founded its hopes upon belief as Catholicism did when it rested in works. We are told that the devils believe; and we apprehend that a person may assent to any creed with just as little of the spirit of Christianity as the devil himself. We think we are correct, too, in saying that the principal object of theological schools and speculative enquiry has hitherto been to find out and teach creeds; but, God be praised, there is one man in this age (Dr. Bushnell) who has apprehended what a school of theology should teach, and has dared to say it—said it, too, as no other man will be able to say it for another fifty years.

Πίστις has too long been translated belief. Trust is an attitude as different from belief as light from darkness. I may believe without sympathy, but I cannot trust without sympathy.

We spoke of a glorious work begun. We referred to the sympathy which sprang up so wonderfully at the time of the great universal revival of 1857 and 1858; a sympathy which brought the churches of all creeds so much nearer together in feeling, and so promoted harmonious action; a sympathy which has been increasing ever since, inaugurated by the individual sympathy and heart-work of such men as Robertson and Bushnell—a heart-work which we wish to see go on until creed shall sink to its true insignificance in Christ's ἐκκλησία, and all who love Christ shall be bound together in one sympathetic union of heart and life.

It seems to us that the cause of Christ and humanity demands that you should at least set yourself right in the matter, if misunderstood, as it is possible you may be.

Very respectfully yours, Chas. Gardner.

University of Chicago.

[Professor Gardner's hostility to creeds seems to be based on their abuse. What we say is simply that a religious organization without a creed you cannot have. If the whole Christian church were melted into one "brotherhood" to-morrow, and were animated by the deepest "sympathy," divine as well as human, the brotherhood would still be based on a creed—and that creed would consist of at least two articles: "There is one God; and Christ's origin or mission was divine." Nobody who denied either of these propositions could or would belong to the brotherhood and share in the sympathy of Christians quâ Christians. The necessity of a creed as the basis of a human society is, in fact, a consequence of the constitution of the human mind. I cannot league myself with people or sympathize with them unless their aims and my aims are identical, and what our aims are can only be ascertained by throwing them into the form of propositions. This done, you may call the propositions a platform or declaration, or anything you please, if you do not like the term "creed," but the thing remains and cannot be got rid of. In matters religious no association can be formed for worship unless the members put on paper some statement of the view they take of the great problem of human existence. It may be a narrow or a comprehensive statement, but statement there must be, and the association will be successful or unsuccessful in proportion to the earnestness and tenacity with which the leading affirmations of the statement are held by those subscribing to it. It matters little, for the purposes of this discussion, how πίστις is translated. You cannot "trust," any more than "believe," without having formed some definite conception of the thing you trust in, and nobody can share your trust unless you describe its source; but the minute you do this you publish your creed. All this seems to us so plain that we confess we are surprised at being called on for an explanation. It must be remembered that we have been discussing simply the nature and bases of "religious organizations"—that is, human societies called churches, sects, denominations, formed for common worship or mutual edification. Of the effect of creeds on individual churches we have said nothing, and say nothing; we know very well that a very high type of character—such as that of many Stoics—has been formed without creeds or religious associations; but we know that in the past no religious association has ever existed or flourished without definite, sharply traced, positive belief, and we believe that all attempts to dispense with them in the formation of religious brotherhoods in future will fail, because it seems to be a law of human nature that great and protracted exertion of the will, called energy or earnestness, is only possible as the consequence of a distinct conception of the object aimed at. A general and vague desire, for instance, to promote the happiness and prosperity of mankind may make a benevolent man or an active philanthropist, but it will not make a good church-member. Our illustration, in fact, explained our meaning. We think Unitarianism unlikely to succeed as a denomination, because there is no point, not even the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, at which all Unitarians will stand and affirm. This cannot be said of any other religious body.—Ed. Nation.]

LITERARY.

Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. have nearly ready, "The American Juror, being a Guide for Jurymen throughout the United States," by H. B. Wilson, and a book of physical geography, entitled "The World We Live In." They also have in press an edition of a valuable work not well enough known, though it contains good criticism, namely, Campbell's "Specimens of the British Poets," which, as it has numerous steel engravings, will be a good holiday present from steady-going people to people who like their presents to be at once not dear and really valuable. "Dallas's Letters" is a series of letters written from London by Mr. Dallas, when—between '56 and '60—he was American minister in England; they are edited by a daughter, Julia. We mention by their titles these other native works and reprints which may be expected from Messrs. Lippincott & Co.: "Deep Down: a Tale of the Cornish Mines," by R. M. Ballantyne; "The Gospel in Enoch," by Henry H. Tucker; "The Apostolical and Primitive Church Popular in its Government," etc., by Lyman Coleman, with an introductory essay by Neander; "What I Know about Ben Eccles," by Abraham Page; "The Old World: Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor," by Dr. J. R. Freese; "Recollections of Persons and Places in the West," by H. Brackenridge; "Incidents of the United States Christian Commission," by the Rev. E. P. Smith; "The Wife's Messenger"—an anonymous novel—and two "Juvenile Libraries." Books, by the same house, which we have not, we believe, previously mentioned, are these: "Specimens of the Greek and Roman Classic Poets, in a Chronological Series from Homer to Tryphiodorus," which is a republication—to the extent, at any rate, of having an American imprint—of a translation, in three volumes, by Charles A. Elton; a cheap edition in paper of Maurice Hartmann's novel, "The Last Days of a King;" a "Book of Elegant Extracts," with seventy illustrations; and "Chambers's Miscellaneous Questions." This work contains questions and answers on matters of literature, art, science, and so on. Messrs. Lippincott & Co. announce as beginning in the January number of their magazine a story of the present day—American, we presume—entitled "Beyond the Breakers."

—The present generation of readers of good literature probably first made the acquaintance of their favorite publishing house when its name and style was Ticknor, Reed & Fields. That was some fifteen or twenty years ago. The house was then a pretty old one, as houses go in America, having been founded in 1833, when its style was Allen & Ticknor. Mr. John Reed having retired, the firm name became that one with which we are all familiar, Ticknor & Fields, and continued the same after Mr. William Ticknor's death in Philadelphia—where he and Hawthorne were together, if we remember right—in 1864, when Mr. Howard Ticknor nominally took his father's place, though Mr. James T. Fields was really the head of the firm. At that time, also, Mr. J. R. Osgood was admitted to partnership and infused new life into the business. It is to him, we believe, that Every Saturday owes its foundation, and to him, too, doubtless, is due some of that popularizing of the Atlantic which, though good from the point of view of business, has not overmuch pleased its former admirers—and some of that popularizing of the North American which has pleased everybody—unless some of the aged country graduates of Harvard, who have not yet been heard from, are dissatisfied. The Dickens tour, also, was made such a success as it was by his sagacity and good management. The firm, as it is now constituted, has in it all the elements of success. It inherits the good relations established by the old managers between themselves and many of the leading literary men of Great Britain as well as of this country. Nobody would expect a new book of Tennyson's, or Browning's, or Dickens's, or Longfellow's, or Lowell's, or Emerson's, or Holmes's, or Agassiz' to make its first appearance before an American audience unless with the imprint of Fields, Osgood & Co.

—We had occasion, some months ago, to point out a number of errors in Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt's edition of Miss Yonge's "Landmarks of History"—to criticise it severely, as may have been thought by our readers. Time was (for we are glad to say it happens much less frequently nowadays) when a similar notice would have brought from the publishers a complaint of our harshness, and probably an intimation that the reviewer must have been actuated by feelings of personal unfriendliness to the author. Or, still seeking a motive other than the pure love of truth and desire to promote sound scholarship, they would have surmised that the reviewer had endeavored without success to persuade them to publish a book for him, or to print an article in their magazine, and now sought this opportunity of revenge, either with or without our connivance. They might even have gone so far, with the help of the indignant author, as to fix upon the person who undoubtedly wrote the review—an attempt, we need hardly say, which uniformly failed of its mark. We should, at the same time, have been treated to homilies on the dreadful consequences of such discouraging and repressing criticisms; "there would be no literature if the aspiring author were thus to be chilled in his first efforts to get a hearing." And, finally, a more or less permanent coolness might have arisen between the publishing house and the Nation, indicated by a diminished advertising patronage or a withholding the works of the firm from the paper. None of these things, we are happy to say, did Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt. They immediately prepared to issue a second, revised edition of the "Landmarks," which has now appeared, and which bears opposite the title-page a "special notice" to the effect that, certain inaccuracies having been exposed by the Nation in the former edition, "the volumes were placed in the hands of the same careful scholar to whom was entrusted the ultimate revision of the historical portions of the 'New American Cyclopædia.' He not only gave them a thorough revision, but added a very full chronological table of events, from the fall of Napoleon to the present time. The present edition contains these alterations." To which is added, in conspicuous capitals: "Any one detecting an error in any of our educational publications will confer a great favor by reporting it to us immediately." We submit that this conduct is in the highest degree praiseworthy, and deserving to have attention called to it as exceptional. Rarely enough do we find publishers who prefer the interest of the public to their own profits or the feelings of an author, and who, therefore, are thankful for honest criticism from whatsoever source. We could mention, indeed, a firm, in one of our great cities, which makes it a principle to correct on the spot any error, however trivial, in the plates of works it has already published, and that, too, even when there is a great improbability that another edition may be called for. This conscientiousness has no worldly reward, we may be sure, but it is that which, after all, constitutes and maintains the high—perhaps relatively the highest—reputation which the house we allude to enjoys at this moment.

—The most interesting feature of the Riverside Magazine for November is not the opening fable by Hans Christian Andersen—for the subject-matter of which one had better consult Mr. James Greenwood's "Purgatory of Peter the Cruel." The first place is rather to be assigned to the "Negro Fables," given subsequently, which are a positive contribution to the literature, if it may be so called, of the American Africans. They were taken down as they are reproduced, verbatim, from the lips of slaves or freedmen, and are specimens of a countless number of similar inventions. So far as we know, the Rabbit is the Reynard of them all; he appears in three of the four contained in the Riverside. The first, by the way, sounds so familiar to us that we cannot help thinking we have seen it in print before. However, this is what Br. (Brother) Rabbit says to "de tar baby," which is Br. Wolf's device for catching his cunning enemy. Both hands are stuck fast with slapping "de little girl," but Br. Rabbit hardly comprehends the seriousness of his position:

"He raise his right foot, and say, 'Gal, see dis foot? if I hit you wid dis foot, you tink horse kick you.' And he hit her wid his right foot, and it did stick; and so he up wid de odder foot, and say, 'See dis foot? if I bit you wid dis, you tink tunder roll over you.' And he hit her, and dat foot stick; so he say, 'Little gal, I won't say nottin' to you at all; I have knock down many a man wid my forehead, and if I happen to hit you wid it, I split your head wide open.' And he butt her wid his forehead, and dat stick."

Br. Wolf catches him next morning and makes a big fire to burn Br. Rabbit:

"As dey was passin' de brier-bush, Br. Wolf daughter say, 'Pa, you better trow him in dat brier-bush.' Br. Rabbit say, 'Do, Br. Wolf, trow me in de fire, 'cause if you trow me in de brier-bush, I done.' Br. Wolf say, 'Well, Br. Rabbit, you is a mighty tricky fellow; I want de whole race of you to die away.' Br. Wolf tink Br. Rabbit didn't want to go in de brier-bush, so he trow him dere. Br. Rabbit jump about and laugh. 'Br. Wolf, you couldn't trow me in a better place, for I was born and raise here.'"

In number two Br. Wolf is badly humiliated by Br. Rabbit, plots one revenge which fails, and tries another:

"Br. Wolf den made a bargain, and play dat he was dead, so dat he could catch Br. Rabbit. One cold day Br. Wolf was laid out before de fire on a table. Br. Dog send round to Br. Rabbit, to let him know dat Br. Wolf is die. Br. Rabbit come up to de door; it was berry cold, and he say, 'Gentlemans, is Br. Wolf dead, in fact? I am sorry to hear he is die.' Br. Rabbit step up by de fire and warm his hands, and he say, 'Gentlemens, we must hab someting for setting up, and bury him to-morrow morning.' As he step from de fire, he say, 'Look here, gentlemens, someting ain't right. I mus go and look at Br. Wolf face.' As he raise up de sheet, he say, 'Look here, gentlemens, did Br. Wolf grin after he dead?' He had de sheet in his hand, but didn't put it down. De gentlemens said, 'No, he didn't grin.' Br. Rabbit say, 'Well, man can't dead, less he grin.' As he say dis, Br. Wolf, wid his stupidness, grinned, and Br. Rabbit jumped out de door, and said, 'Neber see dead man grin yet.'"

The art of these tales is shown very well in the foregoing extract, in the non-essential particulars about the cold, the fire, etc. So a little before, when Br. Dog is engaged to catch Br. Rabbit for Br. Wolf: "Br. Dog leave his fiddle and eberyting to de guard-house, and tell de guard man to mind dem, and he would call back for dem on Friday." The story goes on, but Br. Dog never goes back for his fiddle.

—As not many of our readers had an opportunity of witnessing the scene in Printing-House Square on Tuesday night last when the returns were received, and as not many of them, we trust, read the World, we may as well borrow from that journal an account of a precisely similar scene which took place on the night of the 13th ult., after the Pennsylvania and Ohio elections:

"Long before that time" (nine o'clock in the evening) "the vicinage inhabited by H. G. and his satellites had become far noisier and more dangerous to a good citizen than Water Street at the height of the prayer-meeting at John Allen's, the Wickedest Man in New York. That wretched purlieu and every infamous haunt in the metropolis seemed to have rendered their vilest, most depraved denizens to swell the assemblage in and about the Tribune's door. A villanous class, for whom the editor of the Tribune invented the false name of 'the low Democracy,' herded there to plague the inventor by behaving in a manner that the Democracy of this city in the flush of their greatest triumph never would think of emulating. The shouts of this worthy set turned out to be for 'Grant and Colfax!' and it was as much as a respectable person's life was worth to appear within billingsgate or pistol-shot of it at those times when an aged servitor in the office ministered to the passions of a depraved mob by hoisting an exaggerated array of figures, indicating Republican majorities, on the inner walls."

Luckily, "up to the time of this writing," our informant says, "no overt act had been committed on the World office or its visitors," and he seems to think that the cause of this moderation on the part of the gang of ruffians whom he has been describing was due to their abject fear of the immense number of bankers, merchants, clergymen, lawyers, and cultivated ladies who thronged the office of the World and the adjacent streets. The fact of the matter, however, is very different. As the "H. G." above-mentioned says, "Let us nail that lie at once." The fact really is that the notorious slowness of the World in getting in the returns, and a deep-seated, popular distrust of its mathematicians, caused its own proper crowd to invade "the slum on Spruce Street"—as it falsely calls the Tribune office—while the Tribune's friends were compelled, unless they chose to consort with these creatures, to betake themselves to the World and get such news as they could, or to the Democrat—which latter paper, by the way, with the immense multitude that besieged its doors on the night in question, is not once mentioned by the World's reporter. But the jealousies among newspapers are very intense. As we have seen, they lead to wilful perversion of facts such as we have just been reading. Then for days the Tribune is obliged to defend itself from the maliciousness of such attacks by calling the World's attention to various arrays of figures, by allusions to Mr. Pomeroy and to the small circulation which a "certain concern" enjoys in comparison with other Democratic journals. Seriously, whatever the World may enjoy in the way of circulation, it enjoys the services of an almost inimitable rascal of a low humorist. His work is often very excellent in its way; hardly equalled by anything of the kind that has ever been done for our city journalism of late years. The Herald once was very good at it; indeed we imagine that we used to find in the Herald traces of the hand of this same gentleman from whom we have been quoting, but it is now some time since, in our perusal of that esteemed sheet, we have been delighted by his grave and outrageous lies; his choice vocabulary, composed of words a little too large for him mixed with bits of slang and bright inventions of his own; his cheery approval of infractions of all law; his unmeasured smiling abuse of the Radical demons who afflict this country; his evident belief in personal honor. It is all, we regret to say, highly pleasing to us, though we should have to make sad work of him if we put ourselves to considering him as a morally accountable being with a character to keep and transmit or lose. He does the World good service, though; its more refined persiflage is often trivial stuff, evidently manufactured, and by some hand momentarily loath to labor at the grinding machine; and the wit of the World is often impudently bad morality as well as poor wit, but the low-comic man is pretty unfailingly good. We hope, though the elections are over, that he will not lose sight of "H. G." nor of the German Republicans nor of our prize-fighting friends.

—A St. Louis correspondent would like to know the name of some periodical which gives the titles and prices of all books published in English, and of some others which do the same thing for French, German, and other European literature. Messrs. Scribner & Company's semi-monthly Bookbuyer, which is given away to any one who will pay the postage on it, contains a very full list of English works, and so does Mr. Childs's American Publishers' Circular. But these serials derive a part of their information from the English Bookseller and the Publishers' Circular (London), and both are comprehensive and accurate. Mr. F. W. Christern, of this city, and Mr. L. W. Schmidt, respectively, issue catalogues of French and German works, and their monthly lists may be had on the same terms as the Bookbuyer. Trübner's American and Oriental Literary Record will give our correspondent the titles of the latest South American and Asiatic books, and of most of those published in the various languages of the European continent.

—Some passages in the official and private history of Counsellor Richard O'Gorman, the Honorable Mr. Fernando Wood, Judge George G. Barnard, Judge Albert Cardozo, Mr. Godfrey Gunther, and several other well-known citizens suggest to a writer in Putnam's Magazine (Supplement) the question which he says is every day more and more discussed among honest citizens, whether "a vigilance committee for the city of New York after the pattern of that of San Francisco" is not an absolute necessity. The tale he has to tell is that of the famous "Wood Lease" case—a piece of litigation which had for its object the prevention of payment by the city of $180,000 to the Honorable Fernando Wood for ten years' rent of premises whose total value is a small fraction of that sum, which were unfit for the particular purpose for which our Common Council hired them, which, finally, not being accepted by the municipal law officer for whom they were chiefly hired, were occupied by other tenants from whom Mr. Wood got a second rent. The pamphlet—a most interesting one, we cannot say an astounding one—will be read with avidity on the other side of the water as well as on this. Mr. Parton's revelations of the secret history of the Common Council is nothing to it, and the question above-mentioned is indeed suggested by it. The state of things depicted is simply frightful, and that the picture is veracious no one will for a moment doubt. The book itself, with its minuteness and vividness of detail, and the evidence it gives of having been prepared by some one who knows perfectly well the persons and things of which he is talking, of itself carries conviction of its truth.

—In a work entitled "Chaucer in seinen Beziehungen zur italienischen Literatur" Herr Alfons Kissner revives the question so ably and ardently discussed by Warton, Tyrwhitt, Wright, Craik, and many others, of Chaucer's indebtedness to Italian literature. Craik, as is well known, speaks of these "supposed obligations" with a scepticism verging upon contempt for those who maintain such a theory, and even affirms that the Father of English Poetry was entirely ignorant of the Italian language. This assertion (of which no proofs are given either direct or implicit) will seem strange to those who remember how frequently and fondly Chaucer alludes to his Italian compeers in verse, to "the wise poete of Florence, that highte Dante," whom he also calls "the great poete of Itaille," and to Francis Petrarch, Enlumined all Itaille of poetrie."

"whose rhetoricke sweet

It is difficult also not to regard the "Decamerone" as the model of the "Canterbury Tales," so marked is the resemblance between them, both in general plan and in phraseology. Craik's suggestion, that both poets may have drawn from an older source, is hardly sufficient to explain the almost verbal identity of passages like the following from Boccaccio's [II] "Filostrato," II. 5:

"E or fussi prima pur venuto al porto
Al qual la mia sventura ora mi mena, Questo mi fora grazia e gran conforto;"

and the following from Chaucer's "Troilus and Cresseide," I. 76:

"God wolde I were arrived in the port
Of death, to which my sorrow wol me lede;
Ah! Lord, to me it were a great confort."

But it is foreign to our present purpose to discuss this point. The student of English literature who has read Craik's plea will find in Herr Kissner's volume an able presentation of the other side of the subject, and will thus be furnished with all the data essential to the formation of an intelligent and independent judgment.

HORACE GREELEY'S ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF.*

PERHAPS there is not in the United States a better known name than that of Horace Greeley. There can be no doubt, therefore, that these "Recollections" of his busy life will have readers in good store; and with better reason than many books multitudinously read. For it is much of it very readable, and what is not is readily skippable, so that it is fairly on a level with the capacities and the convenience of all kinds of readers. The many admirers of Mr. Greeley will find much in this story of how bravely, through early privations and later discouragements, he fought his way to fame, fortune, and influence, to confirm their enthusiasm for their "guide, philosopher, and friend;" while they who may not put so high an estimate on his talents and services as his more ardent partisans, may remark in this candid narrative the original defects of character and deficiencies of education to which are due those errors of method, those eccentricities of action, and those imperfections of manner which, to their thinking, have hindered his attaining the great usefulness which the great opportunity he had won for himself justly demanded at his hands. Such a career as this volume describes, conducting its hero up from the depths of an extreme though not a sordid poverty to the eminent position in the world of politics and journalism which he achieved, might well make a wiser man than Mr. Greeley think more highly than he ought to think of his own share in effecting the great changes he had witnessed, and to over-estimate the importance of the part he had had in them.

The personal narrative is well told and full of human interest—egotistically told, if you please, but egotism is the essence and the charm of autobiography. The opening passages describing the Scotch-Irish of New Hampshire, yet racy of the soil from which they came, their odd customs, their eccentric ministers, their marriages redolent of gunpowder, their funerals consoled by rum, their Calvinism tempered by wrestling, boxing, and dancing, their simple, laborious, cheerful lives, make a Puritan idyl very pleasant to read. His own early acquaintance with poverty, and his childish part in the battle for life, waged by the stout-hearted New England yeoman, his father, with the rocky soil of the Granite State, to be defeated at last, is all simply and touchingly told. One rainy Saturday night, towards the end of August, the father being away, the good mother "gathered her little ones around her and delighted us with stories and prospects of good things she purposed to do for us in the better days she hoped to see." The next Monday the farm and farm-house and all that belonged to them were levied upon and they "were as bankrupt a family as well could be." Thence they removed to Vermont, and "made the acquaintance of genuine poverty—not beggary, nor dependence, but the manly American sort." While the family were wrestling manfully with their fate in Vermont, the future editor entered on his apprenticeship as a printer at Poultney. Not long afterwards his father abandoned New England and set forth to hew out for himself a new home in the northwestern corner of Pennsylvania, then little better than a wilderness. The young apprentice walked over from Poultney to spend a Sabbath and bid his family farewell. "It was a sad parting. We had seen hard times together, and were fondly attached to each other." He was tempted to go with them, but he would have thus broken faith with his master, and he returned to him. Still, "a word from my mother might have overcome my resolution; but she did not speak it, and I went my way." On his way he again felt and resisted the temptation to return, "and my walk back to Poultney was one of the slowest and saddest of my life." In the new home in Pennsylvania his father spent more than forty years, dying very lately at a great age; and though his latter days were clouded by disease, they must have been cheered by the celebrity and, we may be sure, though it is not said, made easy by the filial piety of his son.

Mr. Greeley, as is so generally the case with men who have made a mark in the world, had a mother above the average of the women of her condition, and his education began at her knee. The "abundant store of ballads, stories, anecdotes, and traditions" which she had learned from her aged grandmother, who had emigrated from the North of Ireland early in the last century, "was daily poured into my willing ears." "I learned to read," he goes on, "at her knee, of course, longer ago than I can remember; but I can still faintly recollect her sitting at her 'little wheel,' with the book in her lap, whenever I was taking my daily lesson, and thus I soon acquired the faculty of reading from a book sideways or upside down as readily as in the usual fashion." Possibly, some of the severer critics of Mr. Greeley's course might trace some of the wrongheadedness of his conduct, and the extravagance of his language, to this knack of oblique and topsy-turvy reading, applied to the living page which reflects the events and characters of daily life. His other schooling was of the slenderest kind which the schools of very poor New England districts could afford. His real education, after leaving his mother's knee, he gave himself. While living with his father in Vermont, he was liberally furnished with books from the house of the employer of the family, who thus made some amends for the loss of a part of their poor wages through his insolvency. At Poultney, young Greeley had access to a town library, doubtless well supplied with the solid reading such collections contained forty years since, and on this he fed, with a good healthy appetite, in the intervals of his daily toil, none of which were given to any common recreation. He says on this subject: "I have never since found books and opportunity to enjoy them so ample as while there; I do not think I ever before or since read to so much profit."

With this amount of preparation the young journeyman set out to seek his fortune. Of course we have no space to follow him in detail from Erie and its Gazette to New York, and from the Morning Post and New Yorker to the Tribune. All this is good reading, and we can recommend it to all who enjoy the spectacle of a hard struggle with adversity and difficulties finally rewarded with great material success. All that is strictly personal to Mr. Greeley in his personal and political narrative, diversified by episodical excursions into the realms of temperance, Grahamism, Socialism, and Spiritualism, is well worth the reading. The recital of the various presidential elections, the points on which they turned, the character of the candidates, and all the matters pertaining to them or to politics in general, will be interesting or not to the readers according to the degree of their knowledge or ignorance on the subjects. But then there is no difficulty in abstaining from reading it. The work is not particularly well arranged, and one is sometimes carried forward beyond the point at which the narrative has reached and sometimes he has to go back to pick up some fact which had been anticipated and put it in its right place. But desultoriness is a venial offence, if it be not a positive virtue, in a personal biography of this sort. Perhaps the best works of this kind are such as are made up of random recollections—"whimwhams and opinions"—and incidents great and small set down as they came to mind and hand without being carefully digested and set in order. The nearer such a work approaches to a narrative, or a relation of facts and opinions by word of mouth to an interested listener, the better story it is. And this is no bad example of the egotistical, self-complacent, gossipping, rambling, miscellaneous medley of failures and successes, of joys and sorrows, of opinions, good and bad, and their issues, which we all of us like to read, because it gives us a glimpse at a human being in some measure divested of his accidents, and because "we have all one human heart."

Mr. Greeley, it will be seen from what we have said, is emphatically what is called a "self-made man;" and he is evidently proud of the fact, as indeed he has just reason to be. We would not in the least derogate from the high honor he deserves in having made himself what he is when we say that he is not one of the few exceptions to the general rule that self-made men are seldom made well. It is very rarely that a man appears in the world able fully to supply by the energies and from the resources of his own mind the power, the intelligence, the discipline, the insight, the sagacity which are usually the result only of eminent talents laboriously trained by careful processes of education. One of the effects of a thorough education is that it teaches a true self-knowledge and a distinct perception of the proportions of things and of the relations of men to them. In these particulars, as it seems to us, Mr. Greeley has suffered from the want of a wider culture and a stricter intellectual discipline than fell to his lot. By his professional experience and excellent natural abilities he has been able to establish a journal of very wide circulation and of great influence over a large and excellent class of minds. This gives him great power for good, which, we think, the uncertainness and eccentricities of his course always hinder him from exercising to its most beneficial extent, and which he most signally failed to employ to the best advantage when it was most needed. The Tribune might have been the controlling force of the nation during the rebellion had it been in the hands of a wise, far-seeing, and sagacious man, instructed by the experience of the past, and capable of applying great principles to new events and of helping to shape and guide them. It need not be said that it was impotent to fill this great office. Its editor was not strong enough for it. He was overpowered by an overweening sense of his responsibilities—which a truly great man never is. It has been reported that he really believed what his pro-slavery enemies affirmed, that he was the main cause of the war and all the calamities that attended it! And really, extravagant as the statement is, it affords the best explanation of the strange vagaries and unaccountable backings and fillings which marked his course in his paper and out of it. A better trained mind would have known that he was but one of the multitudinous forces which combined to produce the war, and that it would have been brought about had he never existed; and a more cultivated taste might have saved him from the intemperate violence of counsel and language which has marked the more recent course of his journal. Though, indeed, we must confess that he may cite the example of the organs of the vilest Copperheadism, and of the extremest soi-disant philanthropy, to show that talent and education are no preservative against the most profligate unscrupulousness of statement and the most frantic scurrility of phrase. A better training, we are sure, would have saved Mr. Greeley from the Niagara negotiation—a blunder which very narrowly escaped being a crime—and from his being one of the bondsmen of Jefferson Davis. This last act, though merely a piece of insensate folly, has done more to damage his prestige than the former one, though that was of so much more grave a character. He admits that it has cost him thousands of subscribers to his "American Conflict." It has cost him much more than that.

But our space is exhausted. We will only say to the American boys born in poverty, to whom Mr. Greeley dedicates his work, that, while they may well be alive to the encouragement his life affords them, they should not fail also to mark the faults of character and the deficiencies of preparation which hindered it from being crowned with the highest success.

LUTHER AND THE REFORMATION.*

THERE are men of whom the world never gets tired, and Luther is one of them. With a single exception, probably no man ever lived about whom more has been written, and will continue to be written. And one need not look far for the explanation. It would be saying little to say that he is a representative man; he is one of the vital forces of modern civilization. Blot Luther from the sixteenth century, and the historical development of the last three hundred and fifty years would have been impossible. He it was who spoke the solvent word. In him the work of preparation culminated. By him the seething elements of progress were fused, forged into a thunderbolt, and hurled against the one power which obstructed the march of civilization and led mankind captive at its will.

It was not the least part of the greatness of Luther that he understood the age. At every emergency he seemed master of the situation. His inconsequence and conservatism, for which he has been so soundly berated by "radicals" from his own day to the present, and at which Roman Catholic writers were so fond of sneering, were the salvation of his cause. "The history of modern times," says a great writer, "moving slowly over a broad arena, disappoints no expectations more than those of fiery spirits concerning the time necessary to the completion of reforms already in progress." That Protestantism in religion and republicanism (by no means convertible with democracy) in politics are correlates there can be no doubt; but the Reformation in Germany was at first necessarily monarchical in its character. Rome demanded (as she still demands) absolute subjection to her will, both in the church and in the state. There was not the slightest hope of making a successful stand against the hierarchy in matters of religion, unless the princes could be enlisted against the Pope. To have made enemies of both at that juncture would have been madness, and would have resulted in certain destruction. "Divide and conquer" is the motto of minorities; festina lente, the motto of history. This is the key to Luther's relation to Thomas Münzer and the revolt of the peasants. His conduct towards them is generally regarded by the friends of progress as a dark and ineffaceable stain upon his memory. This is the superficial and plausible view of the matter. But the careful student of history, who looks deeper, and does not at every turn allow his sympathies to run away with his judgment, who does not insist on measuring men and events by his own subjective standard, will not be likely to concur in their verdict. Certain it is that the peasants of that time were subject to the most galling oppressions, and that the demands made in the celebrated "Twelve Articles" were moderate and just no one will now attempt to deny. That Luther deeply sympathized with the sufferings of the common people is beyond all question. He defended them, and earnestly desired and sought to better their condition. He boldly told the nobles and princes that they were the executioners and spoilers of the poor; that they had nobody to thank for the insurrection but themselves; that they had sacrificed everything and everybody to their monstrous selfishness and pride, until the people neither could nor would endure it any longer. He exhorted them to comply with the reasonable and equitable demands of their subjects, and warned them in the sternest language against any resort to violence. "You may conquer and crush these poor peasants," he said, "but God will raise up others who will crush you in the end." He besought the peasants, on the other hand, to prosecute their demands with moderation, conscience, and justice. It was only when they threw off all restraint, burnt, plundered, and butchered by wholesale, that Luther cast the whole weight of his mighty influence against them, and called upon all good men to exterminate them from the earth. It was the moment of the utmost peril, and Luther knew it. The temporary success of the peasants, in the spirit which then animated them, might have been the defeat of humanity for centuries. It would have resulted in the instant coalition of the rulers and the hierarchy against them; church and state would have been consolidated as never before; the Reformation would have been extinguished in blood throughout Europe, and what is known as modern civilization would have been strangled in its infancy.

But Luther's conservatism manifested itself in matters of religion as well as in politics. In the beginning of his reformatory work he touched a single point at the periphery of the polity of the church, and to his astonishment the whole vast system trembled to its very centre. In the attempt to bring about an inner-ecclesiastical reform of certain abuses he was led to the enunciation of principles which, carried to their logical consequences, would have utterly destroyed the church as it then existed. They were principles which demanded centuries for their historical unfolding. The process of history, as of nature, is "first the blade, then the ear, and afterwards the full corn in the ear." But there were men then, as there are in every age, who were bound to have them all at once. They saw the prophecy in the seed, and could not wait for its fruition. They did not know that the seed must be put into the earth at a season when the grown plant, with its ripe burden, is impossible. They rushed to the instant realization of the hidden purposes of Providence. Luther was alarmed, and especially at the fact that the extremists in religion were also the levellers in politics. At first he reasoned with them, and attempted to convince them that everything could not be done at once. "Not everybody," he said, "must do what he has a right to do, but must have an eye to the advantage and furtherance of his brother; just as the mother gives her child at first milk and then afterwards more solid nourishment." But these men were not to be reasoned with, and it must be confessed that Luther had no great faculty for calm debate. The whole cast of his mind was dogmatical, rather than dialectical. He doubtless saw, too, that the mass of men at that day were not much influenced by sound argument. Thus the exigencies of the case drove him to dogmatic utterances which were not only at variance with his fundamental principle, but also with his previous express declarations. He became reactionary, and certainly went further in this direction than would have been necessary had there been no opposite tendency to counterbalance. The reaction crystallized in the Confessions of Faith, and, for the time being, the progressive movement was at an end.

Justifiable as the reaction under the circumstances undoubtedly was, it nevertheless placed Luther in a false position and made him a riddle both to his contemporaries and to later ages. It involved him, furthermore, in personal quarrels and animosities, and developed in him a measureless violence of spirit and a persistent wrongheadedness which the utmost stretch of charity can scarcely excuse. It is true that with this great personality everything became personal. He decided no question on purely objective grounds, and was no lover of abstractions. He endowed everything with flesh and blood, and the devil of his imagination often stood in bodily form before him. His whole life seemed to him a warfare against the powers of darkness. Whatever went wrong was done through the personal instigation of Satan. Any estimate of the character and conduct of Luther which leaves this out of sight will be sure to be false.

It is a remarkable fact that there is as yet no adequate history of the Reformation, nor any complete and satisfactory life of Luther in any language. The celebrated work of D'Aubigné, besides being thoroughly vitiated by the theology of its author, suffers either from a want of thorough acquaintance with contemporary history and with the literature of the period, or from a want of historical and psychological insight. Jürgens attempted to meet the want of a complete and adequate biography of Luther. He had evidently prepared himself by thorough study of the sources, so far as they were then accessible to him. But whether he was possessed of the other qualifications necessary to the work we are left in doubt, for the three large volumes (2,181 pages) published in 1846–7 are entirely occupied with the life of Luther up to the first act of the Reformation, in the year 1517, and consequently with matters about which there is little room for difference of opinions. The publication of the work was interrupted by the political events of 1848–9, and has not since been continued, which is greatly to be regretted, although the original plan would have made it so voluminous as to render it almost useless to the general reading public.

What the coming historian of the Reformation ought to be it is easy to say, but hard to prophesy when he will make his appearance. It is known that Mignet has been engaged for over thirty years in the collection and study of the sources for such a history. He is said to have several hundred volumes of manuscripts in his possession, which were written during the period of the Reformation with reference to that movement. Judging from his brilliant and philosophical history of the French Revolution, which, everything considered, is perhaps the best of all the numerous works on that subject, we might reasonably expect an adequate treatment of the great theme from his pen. But, alas! Mignet is already seventy-two years old, and there is, therefore, but little prospect that he will live to complete so great a work, even if in the immediate future the first instalment thereof should make its appearance.

In regard to a life of Luther the case is somewhat more favorable. Rare and manifold as the qualifications are which the biographer of Luther must unite in himself, the present writer is so bold as to think he could put his finger on the man who possesses them all. There lives in Germany to-day a man who is fitted as perhaps no other living man is for this peculiar work. A historian of the very highest rank, he is known wherever good letters have made the modern languages common property. With a career of nearly forty years of brilliant literary activity behind him, he has already accomplished more that will be of permanent benefit to mankind than is usually allotted even to men of the first order of ability. Nature, culture, and outward circumstances have conspired together to make Georg Gottfried Gervinus a historian in the most comprehensive sense of the word; and he above all others is the man who could give us the classic biography of Luther. We say this advisedly. The peculiar character of the long line of Gervinus's literary achievements points to him as the man who would be able to do justice in all directions to such a subject. The time and the man would both receive their due. For while he knows the force and sweep of ideas in the progressive development of mankind, he never forgets the value of personal factors, and so neither makes history an abstract power which crushes all individuality nor so emphasizes the individual as to make history the sport of personal caprice. He neither swamps the particular in the universal nor is he afflicted with that peculiar blindness which cannot see the forest for the trees. His works are so rich in subtle yet thoroughly human analyses of character that one is almost inclined to regard character-painting as his especial forte. Who that has once read them can ever forget his delineations of Machiavelli, George Forster, Shakespeare, and Schlosser? not to speak of the numberless character-pictures in the "History of German Literature" and the "History of the Nineteenth Century." But it is not mere general fitness for the work which suggests Gervinus as the biographer of Luther; there are numerous indications in his published works of a profound reverence and love for the great Saxon reformer. And now that the "History of the Nineteenth Century" has been laid aside for a brief interval, that a promise made in the preface to "Shakespeare" may be fulfilled, why might not this interval be extended for a few years so as to give us the work suggested?

The time has come when the biography of Luther can and ought to be written. There never was a period in the history of the church since the Reformation when an adequate life of the great reformer was so necessary as now; never a time when it would have exerted so great an influence. Then, too, all the preliminary work for such a life has been done; the sources have been thoroughly sifted and arranged, and they are all accessible. One of the most valuable contributions to the literature concerning Luther has recently been made by Dr. Burkhardt, in the book which furnished the occasion for the foregoing remarks. De Wette was the first to make Luther's voluminous correspondence accessible to all scholars. In the five large octavos published 1826–8 he gave us the "letters, missives, and written opinions of Luther, collected from other books and from unpublished manuscripts," with a complete revision of the text and critical and historical annotations. In 1856 this work was rendered more complete by the Rev. J. C. Seidemann, who issued a sixth volume, of over seven hundred pages, containing letters and written opinions of Luther not found in De Wette's edition. Scholars, however, have for a long time known that the collection is still incomplete and needs a thorough critical revision in the light of the results of later research. In particular, the fact that the letters addressed to Luther (with but few exceptions) had not found a place in the collection, made the answers to them often unintelligible. Dr. Burkhardt has, in the volume before us, attempted to remedy these defects. Himself archivist to the Court of Weimar, he has had unusual opportunities for consulting the most important archives and libraries in Germany, besides having received assistance from various other European countries (Sweden, Denmark, Hungary, and Italy), and from numerous persons whose position or scholarship enabled them to contribute to his work. As the fruit of many years of such labor as only Germans are capable of, he has given us not only the material for a thorough revision of the previous six volumes, embodied in nearly fourteen hundred annotations, containing textual emendations, corrections of dates, references to codices and to numberless works which give further information in regard to obscure passages and to persons mentioned in the text, but, in addition to this, nearly three hundred hitherto unpublished letters, together with an epitome of the contents (telling where they are to be found in extenso) of about the same number, which have already been published but not collected. Many of the new letters are exceedingly important, while others seem at the first glance to be of subordinate value. Those who seek only to be interested and amused will not be attracted by Dr. Burkhardt's book, but to the historian or biographer, and to the editor of a possible future and complete collection of Luther's correspondence, it will be invaluable.

THE BACHELOR OF SALAMANCA.*

It is certainly interesting to note the predilection which Le Sage entertained for Spanish literature, and the pertinacity with which he attempted to introduce the works of Spanish dramatic writers on the French stage. He "imitated" Lope de Vega in one comedy which he brought out; it was incontinently damned. He tried another taken from Calderon; it shared the same fate. He courageously presented a third from Roxas; it was doubly doomed to follow in the footsteps of its ill-starred predecessors. Any other young aspirant for literary honors might have reasonably despaired under such discouraging circumstances, but Le Sage could not be put down; he was irrepressible. His tactics, however, were now changed; he cut loose from the Dons, and relied upon his own national and mother wit. Success immediately crowned his sensible resolution; for as soon as he trod upon French ground he touched the French heart. Fugitive pieces of one or two acts each for the Opéra Comique made their appearance in rapid succession, and they were as popular and applauded with as unvarying uniformity as his adaptations had been universally unpopular and condemned. But the author, with all the encouragement from the French muse, felt a partiality for his first mistress; he was still fascinated with southern literature. Therefore, in the meanwhile he essayed again to seduce his countrymen to see with his eyes the charms and to hear with his ears the tones which to him were entrancing. This time, however, the Castilian comedies were abandoned and the Castilian romances substituted; their poetry was laid aside for their prose. These romances were not produced as imitations, but were boldly proclaimed to be taken bodily, and the writer's names were in every instance announced. Still French nature was not disposed to catch the Spanish fever; Le Sage was aiming at an impossibility. As well might he have hoped to substitute the Latin-Arabic tongue in the place of the Latin-Frank; for the literature of these adjoining nations is not only dissimilar but radically unlike. The Spanish comedia does not mean what is understood by the French comedy; it is as different as Dante's, with the scenes laid in an inferno, from Shakespeare's in the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Our author resolved on another change; he gave up the translation of both comedies and novels; he would catch the plan or leading idea of a book, nothing more. Borrowing the method of Guevara, he wrote the romance of "Le Diable Boiteux," which was a satire on public men and public institutions in France, and it met with prodigious favor. The sensation it created can only be compared with that elicited by the "Dunciad," which Pope brought out in England about the same period. But, like the destiny which has overtaken the "Dunciad," the key to the "Diable" is lost, and the two most popular works of that age are now hardly called for.

But while Le Sage was receiving felicitations from his friends on the success of his satire, he did not neglect the Opéra Comique. His dramatic compositions were plentiful, although of ephemeral merit; they were also more profitable than honorable. Yet the greater portion pleased the public, and that was enough for him. Moreover, in this mass of matter presented from time to time to the manager there was one piece with which he happened to make a decided hit. This was in the five-act comedy of "Turcaret." From its first appearance it met with universal approbation; it was greeted with unbounded applause by the Parisians; and it was equally fortunate in satisfying the more critical taste of the court. Nothing else was talked about in literary and dramatic circles; nothing else was acted in the theatres. "Turcaret" was the rage, and its author was proclaimed the worthy successor and equal of Molière. Molière, however, was dead, and could not defend the supremacy of his fame as the legitimate autocrat among comic writers. But Voltaire was living, with no humble pretensions to the first place in dramatic literature. The absence of jealousy in his character was not one of his virtues, and he could not bear to hear the praises of Le Sage trumped everywhere, until his own fame dwindled by comparison into a faint echo of former times. He became angry, of course, and did not conceal his dislike to the author of "Turcaret." To his own malignant temperament he poured out a daily sacrifice of sarcasms, biting, brilliant, and bitter, on the head of his rival; nor was his adversary and abomination slow to return corresponding compliments. The public enjoyed this battle between tragedy and comedy as mischievous school-boys witness a set-to between a snarling mastiff and a cat. Voltaire stigmatized his opponent as a pirate for ever prowling beyond the Pyrenees in search of intellectual plunder; Le Sage sneered back again that the producer of "Phædrus" was not so partial or particular about the country he ravaged; and, punning on his name, declared his was vol terre à terre wherever he could rob.

When "Gil Blas" was published, everybody readily surmised it was another "Diable Boiteux," but with the scenes laid by Le Sage in Spain; and thus they commenced rummaging its pages in search of satire on men and things in France. It was on all sides pronounced perfect; the "Devil" was not equal to it. In truth, "Gil Blas" is the novel upon which the fame of its author must for ever rest, and will rest for ever. But was it an original composition by him, or was it only one more of his many importations from Castile? This question has given rise to as much discussion as the famous controversy respecting the authorship of the "Letters of Junius," but it cannot here be dwelt upon. Le Sage died, and some years thereafter Voltaire, in the course of his literary publications, declared that "Gil Blas" was the work of a Spaniard, in a manuscript entitled "Relaciones de la vida del lescudero Marcos de Obregon." Although this manuscript has never been found, the world has been content to accept the unsupported opinion of the philosopher of Ferney. All Spaniards believe that none but a Spaniard could have produced it. Llorente, the last disputant on the subject, the historian of the Spanish Inquisition, in a memoir read before the French Academy in 1820, affirms that none other than one long resident in the country could have composed it, and it is well known Le Sage never set foot in Spain. Llorente further maintained that the "Bachelor of Salamanca" was originally a part of the same novel.

"The Bachelor," however, was printed separately many years subsequent, and the author announced on the title-page that it was taken from a Spanish manuscript. The book, notwithstanding the high reputation of the writer, produced no sensation in Paris; it was merely glanced at, and speedily gathered to its many brethren. To be sure, the Abbé Desfontaines, an historian of the French theatre, affected to be pleased with it; but La Harpe pronounced it to be the tamest of Le Sage's romances—a judgment which is entirely to be accepted, and which certainly buries it deep beneath a huge pile of rubbish.

Yet, among the many curiosities of literature, the "Bachelor" has one claim to attention upon the American scholar. It is evident that the second volume was written by some person conversant with Mexico under the vice-regal government. The adventures purport to have occurred in that country; the "Bachelor" writes that he was a secretary in the palace. His statements, in addition, bear the authentic ring of genuine revelations. In an historical aspect, therefore, the romance is entitled to respect as a delineation of manners and habits of that distant period in that distant locality. The great debate at present there among the learned is upon the point whether the people were more happy under a king or under a republic. Don Lucas Alaman, the most graceful of Castilian writers, the best of Mexican historians, and in his lifetime the chief of the Church party, believed they were blessed under the Spanish crown; he has painted their situation in rose color. But the "Bachelor" has thrown some dark shades into the picture, nor can the truth presented by his canvas be doubted. He, however, states that he was an official under the viceroy, the Conde de Gelvez. There was no viceroy with that title. He undoubtedly means the Marquez de Gelvez, the Conde Priego, who governed in 1862. A Conde de Galvez held sway for a short time in the next century, in 1785.

The translator has done his work well. We only wish, for the publisher's sake and the sake of the success of his laudable undertaking, that the labor had not been expended on a book so dull and comparatively worthless.

EGYPT AND THE BOOK OF GENESIS.*

EGYPTOLOGY, so greatly enriched of late by the researches and discoveries of Lepsius, Mariette, Birch, Rougé, Brugsch, Chabas, and others, has found a new and able cultivator in Dr. Ebers, of Jena, who has just issued the first of two volumes destined, we believe, to occupy a place among the prominent publications in that vast and interesting field. Under a similar title, "Die Bücher Mose's und Aegypten," Hengstenberg, in 1841, published a work on the same subjects, with the avowed object of confirming the authenticity of the Mosaic narratives by the testimony of the Egyptian monuments, and of defending it against that testimony, in all cases of discrepancy. Dr. Ebers has no object in view but purely critical examination, comparison, and elucidation. As an Egyptologist, bent neither on assailing nor defending scriptural statements, he lends the light of his science to illuminate all of the first two books of Moses that has any reference to the history or the language of Egypt, and if the result, in almost all cases, tends to enhance our opinion of the external knowledge contained in the Hebrew records, this is by no means to be attributed to the theological bent of the enquirer, but exclusively to the convincing force of impartial research. The work is the product of extensive knowledge, as well as of conscientious labor, and, after due sifting on the part of competent scholars, it cannot but serve to fertilize and extend the field of Biblical criticism. Here we must content ourselves with acquainting our readers with its principal contents and some of its more important conclusions, without entering into a detailed discussion on the merits of single points.

After giving an introductory sketch on "hieroglyphic writing and its deciphering," and another, more ample, on the physical geography of Egypt, the author opens his dissertations on the Book of Genesis with remarks on the Gihon, one of the four rivers of Paradise, in which he, like so many others from Josephus to Ewald, recognizes the Nile, although—letting alone the geographical question—the name of the river that "compasseth the whole land of Cush" is nowhere used by either Egyptians or Hebrews as designating the river of Egypt—their Hapi or Yeor.

* "Aegypten und die Bücher Mose's. Sachlicher Commentar zu den Aegyptischen Stellen in Genesis und Exodus. Von Dr. Georg Ebers, Privatdocent an der Universität Jena und Vorsteher des Grossherzogl. Ethnographischen Museums daselbst." Vol. I. Leipzig, 1868.

Of the Mosaic ethnological table (Gen. x.), which is next in order, only the Hamitic division is examined, and that also only as far as Egypt is concerned. Ham, according to our author, in no part represents the Ethiopic or African race, though he represents dark-colored nations and sun-scorched lands. Cush, the father of tribes in Ethiopia, in Arabia, on the Tigris, and elsewhere, and Phut—whom he identifies with the Punt (Arabs) of the Egyptians, as designating some of the roving tribes of Northern Arabia—are no more African than their younger brother, Canaan. The same, he demonstrates, is the case with Mizraim, who represents Egypt.

The main—or perhaps, more properly speaking, the dominant—parts of the Egyptian people, as is proved by the shape and color of the monumental figures, by the skulls and hair of the mummies, by the early and extraordinary civilization of the Pharaonic realm, and partly also by philological evidence, could not have sprung from African aborigines. They "were of Caucasian descent, and . . . together with other tribes, whose skin likely but later assumed its dark hue under a scorching sun, they migrated from the regions of the Euphrates and Tigris, probably across Arabia, into the north-eastern parts of the African continent. Possibly a division of these emigrants separated itself from the bulk, and pitched its tents in the blessed regions of Arabia Felix. Those who struck the Nile established themselves on the banks of that beneficent stream, spreading along them upward as far as the torrid zone." Climatic influences, however, and amalgamation with aborigines, gradually so modified the complexion of the Egyptian that even his original descent became doubtful, and he could be classed by superficial observers among the blacks. Five hundred carefully classified Egyptian skulls, forming a part of the Paris exhibition of 1867, which the author had the opportunity to examine, distinctly proved the correctness of this previously established view. The ancient Egyptians looked with contempt upon negroes. Their language betrays Semitic affinities, though chiefly in the vocabulary. "Having settled in Egypt they preserved many roots and some forms of their original tongue, though in the main accommodating themselves to the dialect of the natives." The people of Meroë, as the monuments show them, resembled the Egyptians in form and color. Besides, they were not the teachers, as was once believed, but the disciples of the latter in civilization and art. These flourished on the lower Nile before the monuments on the upper were created.

The Hebrew name of Egypt, Mizraim, or Matzor (fortress), our author very plausibly proves to have been given that country on account of a defensive wall, supplied with bastions and watch-towers, which separated it from its Semitic neighbors on the north-east, having been erected by the Pharaohs of the old dynasty as a protection against Asiatic invaders, a protection which proved insufficient, however, against the Hyksos. That wall —of which Lepsius on his late journey discovered some traces—is presumed to have extended across the Isthmus of Suez, connecting the fortified towns of Pelusium, Migdol, Heroöpolis, and Clysma with each other, and, by a branch, with Heliopolis also. The shorter name originally designated only Lower Egypt, the longer, with the dual form, was applied to the whole of the country, which the ancient Egyptians, unlike the Greeks, considered as consisting of only two parts. The native name, the Kham or Kam (dark) of the hieroglyphic inscriptions, always designated the whole, having reference to the black soil of the valley of the Nile, and corresponding to the Ham of the Scriptures, of which it may have been the origin. The Greek name, Ægyptus, our author identifies, after Rheinisch, with the I-Caphtor of the Hebrew Bible, the island-country or coast-land of the Caphtorim, which, according to their view, means the Delta.

A vast amount of learning is devoted to the demonstration that of the descendants of Mizraim, as enumerated in the Mosaic table, the Ludim, Anamim, and Lehabim corresponded to the Lutu (common Egyptian people), the Amu (a nomadic tribe near the Isthmus), and the Lubu (dependent Libyans) of the monumental records; that Naphtuhim and Pathrusim designated the two grand divisions of ancient Egypt; and that the Casluhim and Caphtorim were more or less Egyptianized Phœnicians who inhabited the region around Mount Casius and the Delta, respectively, "from where issued the Philistines," or principal parts of them.

By far the amplest dissertation of the book treats of the Caphtorim—the Kaft-u, Phœnicians, of the Egyptians; of the coast-land they occupied in the empire of the Pharaohs; of their other settlements, mostly commercial, in that empire, and principally at Coptos; of their relations to the Egyptians proper; of their services as sailors and mariners; of their expeditions, in the service of Egyptian kings, to the islands and coastlands of the Mediterranean; of their share in developing the art of writing—an invention of the Egyptians—and spreading it among the nations; of the influence they exercised, through the introduction of Syrian, and chiefly Sidonian, elements, upon the mythology and worship of the Nile cities, and of a number of kindred topics. On this subject our author means to be exhaustive, regarding it as the main part of the volume, and if his arguments, in spite of all the Egyptological and classical learning and research employed in their support, fail to remove all objections and doubts, and on many a point remain entirely conjectural, we must, on the other hand, acknowledge that he has succeeded in drawing into his wide-spread critical net a multitude of interesting things, which the uninitiated will find highly instructive, and the scholar as highly suggestive.

In connection with the Caphtorim, Dr. Ebers treats of the Hyksos; of their race, which he with most other Egyptologists holds to have been Semitic, as well as of their dispersion after their expulsion from Egypt. In the following parts he discourses, among other things, of the Patriarchs, of the name Pharaoh, of circumcision among the Egyptians, and of some parts of the story of Joseph, the details of which he compares with what is known from non-scriptural sources about the domestic habits and some of the institutions of the Egyptians. His illustrations from purely Egyptian sources are here still more abundant than in other parts of the work. The whole book abounds in excellently executed hieroglyphic quotations, which, together with its numerous remarks on that ancient form of writing, on Egyptian words and forms of speech, and on books and dissertations on these subjects, can almost serve as an elementary guide to the linguistic sources of ancient Egypt. The style of the author is pleasant and often animated, but he is sometimes too discursive, and frequently indulges in repetitions. The print, in all its variety of letters, is fine, but not always correct.

Doctor Jacob. By M. Betham Edwards, author of "A Winter with the Swallows," "Dr. Campany's Courtship," etc. (London: Bradbury & Evans. 1868.)—The scene of Miss Edwards's rather peculiar little story is laid in the free city of Frankfort, which is described with a good deal of apparently accurate detail. Her hero, Doctor Jacob, strikes us as a new acquaintance in fiction. He is a clergyman of the English Church, who comes to Frankfort for the purpose of raising funds to aid him in fulfilling his duties as a self-appointed missionary to the Jews. He is sixty years old, but handsomer than most handsome men of thirty, being possessed of "every possible physical advantage—a fine, well-posed head, six feet two inches of height, fine sensitive eyes, a clear healthful coloring, an English pair of shoulders, and the easiest, gracefulmost carriage in the world." He has also a "vast and well-stored mind," great knowledge of human nature, manners which fascinate everybody, and a "gift" in preaching which charms money out of all pockets. The actions of this aged Adonis do not in all respects conform to the received codes of either clerical or lay morality. In the first place, the reader is left until nearly the close of the book in suspense, which, considering that it is intentional on the author's part, is not too harrowing, as to the nature of his relations with Miss Macartney, the English governess in a school superintended by the Fräulein Fink. Miss Macartney is evidently greatly troubled by Doctor Jacob's advent in Frankfort; she has a horror of meeting him, and yet she loves him tenderly.

The Baroness Ladenburg, a pretty woman of forty, with a husband, a grown-up son, and numerous children of various sizes, also cherishes a passion for Doctor Jacob, which is of long standing. The doctor is "a Goethe among women." He has "only to hold out his hand, and every little warm heart drops into it." His last conquest is a little "Mädchen" of eighteen, who adores her venerable lover to that degree that when, out of consideration for the sorrows which untimely widowhood would inflict on her, he breaks his engagement to marry her, and leaves Frankfort, she goes after him, is devoured by jealousy when she finds him travelling with Miss Macartney (who turns out to be his daughter), and has many disastrous adventures. Yet, notwithstanding the love which exists between him and all women, Doctor Jacob has lived a pure life. He delights in the society of modest and refined women, and takes pleasure in supplanting men who might be his grandsons—but he never abuses his easy victories. He was once, to be sure, on the point of eloping with the Baroness Ladenburg, at her earnest solicitation, but that was when he was comparatively youthful—not over fifty-three at most—and he was easily prevented by his daughter. With the only two women who had just claims upon his time and his affections he appears to have found it impossible to live. He separated from his wife after six years of wedlock, and, after his reconciliation with his daughter who had been alienated from him by some malicious intrigue of the baroness, and who is represented as a woman of fine character and great affection for him, the experiment of remaining in the same house with her failed utterly. Another peculiarity of Doctor Jacob's is a great fondness for jewels, perfumes, and kid gloves, and he runs in debt for such articles so deeply that in order to free himself he appropriates the funds collected for his mission. He creates great scandal in Frankfort, but all his undenied and undeniable guilt fails to rob him of the love of the best men and women whom he has met there. Finally, the reader leaves him alone in his old age, meditating upon the errors of his life, doubting, disbelieving, and unhappy.

The character is a peculiar and not a very plausible one, but Miss Edwards draws it very well, as indeed she may be said to draw every character that she introduces. They are all distinctly outlined, and the story is cleverly written—which makes the fact that it is hardly pleasant reading and not specially interesting a somewhat perplexing one. We account for it in this way—that the reader never shares the half doubt that exists in the mind of the author with regard to her hero. She desired to represent a man open to influences only on the sensuous side of his nature, and yet pure in mind and in life, falling into errors not because he fails to comprehend his duties, or through wilful disregard of them, but from inability to resist gratifying his desire for the more refined pleasures of the senses. But, through some subtle, unintentional fault in her phraseology, we fancy, when he makes his first appearance in the study of Dr. Paulus, a hazy impression that he is "a fraud" occurs to the reader—his venerable beauty, his snowy hair, his complacent smile indistinctly suggest the patriarch of Bleeding Heart Yard, and one is prepared to find him embezzling missionary funds, and would not be too harshly surprised to find his hand in the poor-box. It is only when there seems a probability that he may, after all, be justly entitled to the love and respect he gains from every one, that the reader takes more than the mildest interest in him. His love passages, too, though Miss Edwards does her work skilfully, are just the least bit absurd. It was a mistake, moreover, to make him a clergyman, since there was apparently no satire intended. He is a parson quite too far 'over the line." He plays his part, too, on an insignificant stage. Miss Edwards's Frankforters would doubtless be more uninteresting in reality than in her presentation, and one is inclined to think that people who could be moved to tears and to lavish generosity by such eloquence as she gives us a specimen of in the doctor's missionary sermon deserved to have their pockets emptied and their wives and daughters innocently fascinated. The book shows thought and cultivation, and suggests that the author might do work which would be much more agreeable. Her present story forms the third of Messrs. Bradbury & Evans's Handy-Volume Series, a series which Roberts Brothers are reprinting under the same title.

Jesus Christ: His Times, Life, and Work. By E. de Pressensé Second edition, revised. (New York: Scribner, Welford & Co. 1868.)—M. de Pressensé is one of the most eloquent preachers, and undoubtedly the leading scholar, of the moderate Orthodox party in the Protestant Church of France. Less conservative than the late Monod (Adolphe), who was the active head of the Conservative party, less radical than Timothy Colavi, who represents the average quality of the left wing, his position in the French Protestant Church is not unlike that which Neander occupied in Germany and Bushnell holds here in America. A man of strong feeling and stiff prepossessions, his scholarship is liberal enough to give an appearance of tolerable fairness to his dealings with his opponents. A sense of the individuality of his own position, which he not only feels but of which he seems rather proud, would naturally prove a corrective of any harsh judgment into which he should find himself enticed. His present work is a rather ponderous duodecimo, but is written in such a bright and easy style that its demand upon the mental energies will not be great, more especially as the deeper the subject the more superficial is his treatment. It is to be regretted that M. de Pressensé's talent runs to speculation rather than to criticism, as the great questions here discussed are upon trial rather upon critical than speculative grounds, and upon the issue of this trial will depend the necessity of a further trial in the courts of speculation. M. Pressensé does not ignore the critical question, but he subordinates it to the speculative, and having decided on speculative grounds that his own view is tenable, he subjects it, on critical grounds, to anything but a rigid examination. The peculiarity of his own view lies principally in insisting on the human side of Jesus's character and work. The volume is made up of five books. The first discusses the credibility of the supernatural as opposed to Hegelian, positive, and theistic speculation, and the credibility of the Gospel narratives, together with the religious state of the world at the appearance of Jesus. The second treats of the youth of Jesus and his preparation for his work; the third of "The Period of Public Favor;" the fourth of "The Period of Conflict;" the fifth, consisting of nearly two hundred pages, of "The Great Week: Death and Victory." The notes, even more than the text, indicate that the author has brought to his work the results of wide acquaintance with the literature of his subject, as well as with its localities in the East. The book is not one to excite the popular interest excited by Renan's work and "Ecce Homo," but in many circles will no doubt be well appreciated and enjoyed.

Men of the Time:

A Dictionary of Contemporaries, containing Biographical Sketches of Eminent Living Characters of Both Sexes. In one thick 8vo volume, printed in a new, clear type, bound in extra cloth, with gilt top. Price, $6.

This edition (the Seventh) has been thoroughly revised and brought down to the present time. In its preparation, the aim of the work—as explained in former impressions—has been steadily kept in view—namely: to furnish, in as compact a form as possible, a series of biographical sketches of Eminent Living Persons in all parts of the civilized world. Its plan has been materially improved by the addition of two entirely new features—the first, a Key to assumed names, which will enable the reader at once to trace the authorship of any volume published with only initials or a pseudonym affixed. The second, a Biographical Index, containing the dates of birth and death of eminent characters who have passed away, and a reference to the edition of this work in which their biography is to be found.

A NEW EDITION OF

Familiar Lectures on Scientific Subjects.

By SIR JOHN F. W. HERSCHEL, BART. Illustrated with numerous diagrams. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

"A book of most profound and romantic scientific charm. Without any strain of manner, the author paints picture after picture from the wonderful discoveries made known to us by the study of the physical forces at work on the earth and in the heavens."—The Spectator.

THE REIGN OF LAW.

Essay on Divine Government. By the Duke of Argyll. With four plates from drawings by J. Wolf. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2 50.

"We think it would be a profitable enterprise for some American publisher to reprint this book. It is one of the best of its class published in recent times. . . . Of the scientific merits of the book we have but a word to say. The author contributes to the illustrations of design in nature an interesting discussion of the 'machinery in flight' in the wings of birds, and by this and other scientific matters makes his book a very readable one."—The Nation.

"This volume is a remarkable work in which the logical sufficiency of the arguments is equal to the perspicuity with which they are stated. The style is simple and clear, and not without eloquence, and the aptness and variety of the illustrations are striking."—The Evening Post.

AN ADMIRABLE TEXT-BOOK.

ROBINSON CRUSOE IN WORDS OF ONE SYLLABLE.

By Mary Godolphin. With 12 highly colored drawings in oil. 12mo, extra cloth, $1 50.

"We could not name at this moment a book better deserving to be given to young readers, or to be used in primary schools, either as a text-book or as a prize for excellence. It is remarkable for avoiding the great stumbling-block of most writers for children—not polysyllabic words as such, but words too big for the age addressed, which are apt to be at once long and derived from classical rather than from Saxon roots."—The Nation.

COOLEY'S NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

A TEXT-BOOK OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. An Accurate, Modern, and Systematic Explanation of the Elementary Principles of the Science, adapted to use in High Schools and Academies. By Le Roy C. Cooley, A.M., Professor of Natural Science in the New York State Normal School. 1 vol. 12mo, with numerous illustrations, $1 50.

In this text-book are embodied the results of careful study and of long experience in teaching. In dealing with the various problems coming within the range of the science which he expounds, Prof. Cooley uniformly proceeds from the cause to the effect, thus pursuing the only natural method, and that which is the simplest. In form the work is strictly logical; and in matter it is concise, clear, and distinct, while it is brought down to the latest development of the science.

The Week.

THE effect of the elections, so far as we can yet judge, seems to have been everywhere tranquillizing. A very large proportion of the Democratic party is undoubtedly well pleased with the result, and is trying in a clumsy and impudent but perfectly good-humored way to make out that Grant is a Democrat. We have commented elsewhere on the small conspiracy got up in Boston to put Grant under surveillance as a suspected person from the first moment, and use that eminent friend of virtue, General Butler, to harass him into favoring a new scheme of reconstruction, which has, as "the genial critic" says, "all the charm of a romance." The mere exposure of the scheme is sufficient to defeat it and amuse the public hugely. It is curious to see how the conspirators, now that they have elected their man, throw off all pretence of adhesion to the Chicago Platform touching the public credit, as well as the "enthusiasm" for Grant, of which they tried to make a show during the campaign.

From the South there is little news, and that little is mainly good news. The result of the election has apparently had the sobering and soothing effect that was hoped, although it is as yet too soon to say much on this head. We have heard of no assassination or rioting since a week ago Tuesday, and then there were disturbances—so far as we know—at only two or three places. The chief ones occurred in Georgia—at Augusta and Savannah—the negroes having their usual luck, and the white sheriff at Augusta being killed by some thoroughly overawed conservatives. The Associated Press, as is usual in all such cases, is to be almost entirely disbelieved in its accounts of the matter. The majority in Georgia, as Camilla and Warrenton foreshadowed, was Democratic, and was 40,000 or thereabouts. The negroes staid away from the polls, of course. In Louisiana, however, the work of intimidation was most perfectly done; the Republicans cast 300 votes out of about 24,000—a result which will probably make General Sheridan reflect when he hears of it.

From South Carolina the news is not only negatively but positively good. A number of the leading Democrats of the State, among them Wade Hampton, called in a body on General Scott, and expressed their intention of "accepting the situation." They say they will henceforth give a unanimous and hearty support to the State government—and how much the State government needs support is well known to everybody who knows how the South Carolina Democrats have done everything in their power to bring it into hatred and contempt, and make it impossible for the machinery of government to move. To call the treasurer "a thief," the legislature a collection of "swindlers and ragamuffins," and the governor "bogus"—to openly threaten the subversion of the constitution—and to counsel a refusal to pay taxes, have been common in South Carolina ever since Governor Scott entered on his term of office. We have little doubt that he will find it easier during his present trip to borrow what money the State wants than he would if the Democratic leaders had not made their call—and not so easy as he would find it if people up here fully believed them.

What we get from Texas is hardly to be called news, for it consists of facts embodied in General Reynolds's October report of Freedmen's Affairs during the preceding year. He exhibits with official coolness of language the most ferocious Anglo-Saxon community that we can think of, engaged in the most ferocious work that the Anglo-Saxon race ever engages in—namely, living in a frontier country and living with a race which has no standing in the courts, and is unfortunate in the color of its skin. The general says that from the close of the war down to the 30th of September of this year, there have been 27 murders of colored people by persons whose color is unknown, and 464 by whites. There have been in the same time 11 murders of whites by persons whose color is unknown, and 253 by white persons. Besides these outrages, there have been 6 murders of Bureau agents, 214 shootings or stabbings of negroes who survived their wounds, 158 whippings of negroes, and much burning of school-houses and breaking up of schools. Many of the whites killed and wounded were, of course, Union men. It is gratifying to know that in the southernmost counties, where the negroes and planters are most numerous, the feeling between the two classes is better than in the interior and upper parts of the State. To keep Rousseau at New Orleans and to remove Reynolds from Texas, is quite a characteristic proceeding for Mr. Johnson.

The newspaper correspondents are busily occupied in recording the rumors about Grant's cabinet, and every train will now bring crowds of expectant office-seekers to Washington. The New York Tribune alleges, and we hope correctly, that Grant is having all written application for places burned instanter. It will be interesting to see to what extent he will be able in this matter to resist the ordinary political influences. We notice that there are two sets of rumors about the Cabinet: one fills it on the regular old plan, with Messrs. Butler, Wade, and the like; the other with Sumner and Farragut and Stanton and the like. Mr. Greeley is spoken of, and we hope truly, for the Postmaster-General. He would work at his duties savagely, and would be honest, but probably would be a poor disciplinarian, and would be apt to be surrounded and to be made the dupe of some sad fellows. Still, he would be, on the whole, a good officer, and ought to have something. With the Civil Service Bill to save him from his "entangling alliances," he and the Post-Office together would form a beautiful and efficient machine.

It seems very probable that in the House of Representatives of the Forty-first Congress the Republicans may, after all, have a two-thirds majority. They cannot have it at the beginning of the session, for, from the latest returns, it looks as if there would then be about eighty Democratic members. We imagine, however, there are several of these who will certainly not keep their seats till the middle of the session, and that the twenty-seven new Democrats—a net gain of twenty-five for that party—will be so much diminished by successful contesting that the Republicans will again be two to one. It will be but a bare two-thirds vote, though, and for several reasons will not be nearly so dangerous as the majority in the present House. For one thing, the Southern members whom Butler captured in a body last summer he will not have so well in hand next year, for at least ten or twelve of the seats gained by the Democrats are Southern seats. Then, the more conservative element in the Republican party, if, indeed, it is not hereafter going to rule, and even if we have not seen the last day of the Ashley and Phillips power, will at all events have to be conciliated, and cannot any longer be driven. Moreover, from the increased number of Democrats, even should it be less than one-third of the House, we may reasonably expect something more effectual in the way of opposition than we have now—though, we confess, we do not see just where it is coming from; Mr. S. S. Cox and Mr. James Brooks together are of hardly more value than Mr. James Brooks alone or Mr. S. S. Cox alone. One of the members who may very likely be unseated is Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, whose district was undoubtedly the scene of corruption, and who probably was really defeated. Another is Mr. Erastus Wells, of Missouri, elected by a small majority over Mr. Pile, whose friends declare that he means to contest. Mr. Orestes Cleveland, of New Jersey, is charged in court with having paid $2 a-piece for some of our Rosenberg naturalization papers, and is not expected to stay in Washington till the end of his term. There are four new men from Louisiana who assuredly will be sent home again, and so, we imagine, will be the two new men from Arkansas. Should a fair proportion of these gentlemen and one or two of the Pennsylvanians be ousted, the two parties will bear more nearly their present relation to each other. We regret the defeat of Mr. Boyden in the Sixth North Carolina District, and cannot account for it, but we suppose Mr. Shober to have been honestly elected.

The New York Tribune, which, though it has done nothing to help, has done nothing to hinder Butler's going to Congress "to watch Grant," has within a few days tried to increase his powers of mischief by coolly claiming for him the credit of "substantially projecting and executing the expedition to Ship Island and New Orleans," "the success of which gave the rebellion the heaviest and most damaging blow," etc. This, of course, means, if it means anything, that Butler captured New Orleans. The capture of New Orleans, be it remembered, consisted in the forcing of the passage of the river by the fleet, and we are here given to understand that it was General Butler did this. As Mr. Greeley tells the story in his "American Conflict," Butler's contribution to the result was his taking a large body of men to the mouth of the Mississippi; the bombardment of the forts, which he may have helped to plan, proved a total failure; the idea of breaking the boom and passing the forts was conceived by Captain Farragut, and decided upon "in a council of captains," and triumphantly executed by Farragut and the captains. This done, the city surrendered, and General Butler appeared on the scene without a scratch and fresh as a daisy. This pretence that he took New Orleans is a capital illustration of the excellence of his "press arrangements," to which it is due, too, that he never appears in any public place without calling forth "wild and enthusiastic cheers."

---

The Tribune then gently chides him for his manner of conducting his canvass. He ought not, it says, to have told stories about the motives of the newspapers which opposed his election which he must have known to be untrue, and it calls this "the Butlerian fashion of controversy." So it appears the "dear delightful devil" told a few lies in his stumping. But then, why should he not? Did not the naughty newspapers irritate him, and do not the "Copperheads hate him?" Would it not be a waste of virtue for a man whom "the Copperheads hate" to speak the truth, or keep his nose out of his neighbor's writing-desk, or his fingers out of the public till? What would be the use of incurring "rebel hate" if one had to be just as decent and honest after as before? It is quite clear that some of the Butlerites have to be a little better grounded in their master's doctrines, and we respectfully advise him to open a class at some convenient place during the winter for the instruction of the ministers of "the Gospel" and the editors of "the wholesome and independent family papers" who supported him. Such articles as this in the Tribune will bring discredit on the denomination. The class, when in full working order, will be a pleasing sight for the moralist. We hope also Mr. Sumner will take an early opportunity of letting the world know in what writer on ethics, either political or social, he found his warrant for holding his peace when Butler offered to retire if he (Mr. Sumner) asked him. In which of his books, no matter of what age or school, does he find it maintained that such a man as Butler is a proper person for such a district as the Fifth Massachusetts to select for its representative in a legislative body? We promise to publish the passage entire when furnished to us, provided the author is not a Jesuit or Machiavelli.

---

We made some enquiries last week with regard to the "Howard Mission," which got up the performances in John Allen's den known as "The Water-Street Revival," such as: Who are its managers or directors or trustees? Who is its treasurer? Where are its reports, and particularly its accounts of receipts and expenditures? If any exist, who has audited them? No answer has been returned to these questions, so far as we know, and we have looked for one closely in the daily press. We now repeat them, and take the liberty of warning all charitably disposed persons not to make any contributions to the funds of this organization until its accounts, properly audited, are laid before the public, and the names of its responsible managers revealed. Ministers who find that its agents are operating in their congregations will do well to put the latter on their guard. We say all this in compliance with the suggestion of more than one subscriber to its funds, who would like to know, but who do not as yet know, what use has been made of the money.

---

The latest telegrams from England give ground for believing that the Alabama question and all similar ones are in a fair way of settlement. All claims are to go before a mixed commission, and all classes of claims concerning which the commissioners shall not be unanimous are to be referred to an arbitrator, to be previously chosen. That arbitrator will, it is said, be the King of Prussia—that is, of course, two or three Prussian jurists. The two whose names are guessed at by the English press, are said to take a favorable view of the American side of the present case, but this will hardly cause an objection to the selection of Prussia as the arbitrator, inasmuch as what the English Government most wants now, is not to avoid paying the Alabama damages, but a good excuse for doing so. It seems hardly likely that the farce of putting monarchs forward as the arbitrators in these cases, when the real work is done by lawyers, can be much longer kept up. If two German publicists, sitting in their own rooms, can settle such a controversy as that now pending between two such powers as America and England to the satisfaction of the disputants and of the world, the establishment of an international court of arbitration cannot be very long delayed. There is something absurd in the incessant quotation of the text-books by diplomatists, and the refusal to give the men who write the text-books any personal share in settling the quarrels. If Mr. Reverdy Johnson has really succeeded in providing machinery for the settlement of the Alabama case, he has prevented his diplomatic career from being wholly ridiculous.

The small dose of minority representation which was introduced into the late measure of Parliamentary reform in England does not work well. The Liberals are, in those cities to which the provision applies, using all their ingenuity to find means of evading it; and to judge from the comments the matter calls forth from the Liberal press, the scheme on which Mr. Mills and Mr. Hare have expended so much admiration does not find much favor in England. The Daily News truly says that Parliament, or any legislature, is above all things an instrument of government, and that whatever impedes its action as an instrument of government is an evil. It is doubtless well that it should also be a "mirror of the nation," reflecting all shades of opinion, if its being so does not interfere with the proper performance of the main function; but, in a vast number of cases, it would interfere with it. If, for instance, the Democratic party here had been represented in Congress in proportion to its numbers, the war would certainly never have been carried to a successful conclusion, and the Union would now be a thing of the past.

Mr. Mill has got himself into a scrape with a portion of the English public by writing a letter favoring the election of Mr. Chadwick by a certain Scotch borough, and discountenancing that of Mr. Bouverie. Mr. Chadwick is best known as a social science reformer, and is a final authority on sewerage, prison discipline, and such questions; but he is unknown in political life; and Mr. Mill, therefore, gave him, at his request, a sort of testimonial or recommendation, as a good person to take the place of the present member, Mr. Bouverie, whereat Mr. Bouverie, as might have been expected, is greatly annoyed, and the papers accuse Mr. Mill of over-meddlesomeness. The fact is, that the position in politics taken in England of late years by what are called the "philosophers"—such as Mill, Goldwin Smith, Fawcett, and Harrison—is such a novelty that people are ready to resent in them a species of interference which has, until now, seemed the most natural thing in the world on the part of great landholders—an interference which journalists make a profession of exercising—namely, that which consists in offering advice to voters. Mr. Mill defends himself with much ability in a long letter, in which there is a nearer approach to humor than we have noticed in any of his writings.

---

The only other incident of importance in the English news is Mr. Reverdy Johnson's persistence in his foolish courses. It now appears that Laird himself was ashamed to go to the Liverpool dinner, to which as member for Birkenhead he had to be invited, and did go with great hesitation, but Mr. Johnson relieved the poor man of his embarrassment by advancing briskly upon him and shaking him cordially by the hand, whereupon Mr. Laird cheered up and sat down to the banquet. Mr. Johnson has the satisfaction of knowing that he has not only disgraced his own Government in the eyes of foreigners, but has revived on this side of the water the animosity towards England which time and the prospect of a peaceful settlement of outstanding differences have done much to allay. A kind of silly and ridiculous satisfaction with the small pomps of his position seems, in fact, to have taken possession of him as completely as if he were only twenty years old.

---

The Bohemians, who think themselves just as much entitled to their ancient autonomy as the Hungarians, and have, besides, been harrowed up into excitement by the Pan-Slavic manœuvres of Russia, have been giving the Austrians a world of trouble. They won't assimilate, and will be turbulent, and things have at last reached such a pass that the Government has been obliged to proclaim martial law in Prague and its vicinity, and to quarter troops in great numbers of the small towns, with the threat of quartering them gratis on the inhabitants if the disturbances continue. Many of the bishops, too, in Austria Proper are recalcitrant, and, having set the law at defiance, prosecutions against them have been ordered. The revolution in Spain is likely to help to bring them to reason, however.

Prussia is, in the meantime, busily engaged in assimilating her new acquisitions, and finds it hard work. The stern Prussian régime, full of duties, responsibilities, taxes, but also full of noble anxieties, interests, and aspirations, is a terribly hard one at first for the inhabitants of some of the small states recently annexed, and which enjoyed under their old rulers great physical comfort in combination with much political and moral degradation. The Frankforters, on whom an enormous forced contribution was levied during the war, and who now find the national taxes added to the old municipal taxes, which were all they used to have to pay in the days of their independence, and who hate the Prussians like poison, are still muttering curses not loud but deep against their new rulers. In Hanover, many of the old army officers and courtiers still play at privy conspiracy and rebellion, and occasionally get into the hands of the police. In the Grand-Duchy of Nassau there is a dismal wail over the increase of taxes and the approaching abolition of the gambling at Wiesbaden. In fact, there does not seem to be thorough satisfaction with the change anywhere except in Hesse-Cassel, where the Elector was literally an old ruffian who united the morals of "John Allen" with the manners of the mediæval baron. He used to steal the wives of his subjects and sell his signature to his own state papers, and was apparently only prevented from robbing on the highways by laziness. No such potentate has been seen in Europe for over three hundred years.

The embassy of Nubar Pasha in regard to mixed courts for foreigners in Egypt has so far been crowned with success that England, Prussia, and lately Italy, have admitted the urgent necessity of reforming the present system, and have agreed to send representatives to a diplomatic conference at Cairo to consider the Viceroy's proposition. If this body should report that the mixed courts offer sufficient guaranties to Europeans, they will undoubtedly be established; nor can any reason be assigned why France should not give in her adhesion to them, though she has declined to assist in discussing them. The Suez Canal lends a prospective importance to the question above what it has already; and if France feels secure in her control of the transit between the two seas, Italy is interested to stand well with Egypt, having a mind to compete for the carrying trade between Europe and the East, and make Brindisi the rival of Marseilles as a port of departure. The Viceroy, on his part, continues his efforts at rapprochement with European civilization, and is instituting a municipal government for Alexandria, to the great delight of the European colony there. He narrowly escaped, however, being cut off in the midst of his work by some would-be assassin, who, on the Viceroy's recent entry into the city, aimed a couple of missiles at him from an upper window.

The latest news from British India is, in many ways, interesting and important, as it shows that the old framework of Hindoo society is in a fair way of being broken up through the agency of material progress. The Government is at last making a serious attempt to supply a body of reliable statistics, throwing light on the mental, moral, and physical condition of the population of each province, and, we may add, rendering the articles on India in the existing cyclopædias well-nigh worthless. Some of the incidents recorded in the reports are very hopeful. The Chumars, or workers in leather, are despised and oppressed by other castes, and a large body of them have accordingly quitted their old abode in the northwest, and emigrated to some vacant lands down on the plateau of Chutteesgurh, near the head-waters of the Mahanadi River, where they have nearly all, 400,000 in number, abandoned their old calling, taken to agriculture—abandoned, too, their old faith, and say they are waiting for a new God, and in the meantime have constituted themselves into a monotheistic sect, of which the sole rites are prayer and purity of life and charity; and the "Thoughtful Teetotaller" will be glad to hear that they prohibit smoking or drinking spirituous liquors. An able missionary of the Scotch Church is at work amongst them; but, unlike the Water-Street "Revivalists" and some of our street-preachers, he does not confine himself to preaching religious doctrines: he is acting as a teacher of civilization. Another large body of low-caste people in the same region have repudiated Brahmin rule and are clamorous for schools, not only paying a heavy school-tax but making voluntary contributions for the same purpose. In six years the schools amongst them have increased from 4 to 95, and the scholars from 241 to 13,276. Mr. Maine, the eminent jurist, so well known for his book on "Ancient Law," and who fills a high office in India, also reports an interesting negotiation he has had with another sect called the Brahmos, composed of high-caste Hindoos, who have abandoned Brahminism, but will not accept Christianity, and, in the meantime, as they belong to no existing religious sect, find no provision made for their legal marriage. Mr. Maine has accordingly draughted a bill, authorizing their marriages to be celebrated before a civil registrar, without any religious ceremony.

THE ELECTION AND ITS FRAUDS.

THE result of the Presidential election has not, on the whole, differed materially from what every intelligent observer has anticipated for a long time past. General Grant is elected by a majority which has never been equalled at any contested election in which the Southern States participated. His majority in the Northern States is greater than even that of Lincoln in 1864. The North has thus, in four successive Presidential elections, shown something of the same tenacity, perseverance, and determination which have had such a splendid illustration in the character of its chosen leader. The line is unfortunately broken by the defection of New York; but the Republican gains in other States are more than sufficient to counterbalance the loss in this. New England once more presents a solid front, Pennsylvania exceeds any majority which she has cast since 1860. Ohio returns to the standard of 1866. Illinois maintains the wonderful vote of that year. Iowa far excels any former majority; and the West generally does nobly. The large majorities for equal suffrage in Iowa and Minnesota are also gratifying evidences that the contest has been decided upon principle and not upon mere personal issues.

The general result of the election has been sufficiently commented upon in anticipation. But it has had two peculiar features which demand attention, for they threaten the whole system of republican government. Two States, at least, have been carried for Mr. Seymour by organized assassination, and two more by organized fraud. We leave out of account Alabama, which has been carried for Mr. Seymour (if carried at all) by the force of social proscription, by the threat of starvation, and by widespread violence. But no reasonable man can fail to see that Georgia and Louisiana would have certainly voted for Grant had not the minority organized themselves into armed bands of murderers, who, by frequent assassinations at various points, made a sufficient number of the majority comprehend that they could only vote for Grant at the peril of their lives. The unanimity of the vote at New Orleans and Savannah, immediately after the anti-negro riots there, would alone be sufficient demonstration of this fact; but it is confirmed by hundreds of other incidents, such as the Camilla massacre, the murder of Col. Pope, the numerous murders of Northern men and negroes, and the diabolical complacency with which the most respectable organ of Democracy in this city records the killing of "another carpet-bagger" from time to time.

There is reason to believe that the accounts of these events which reach the Northern papers, horrible as they are, are not merely free from exaggeration, but they are far from conveying to our minds an adequate impression of the real state of things. It is very easy for Mr. Adams, on a visit to the South, to find a pleasant side of society. There is no society within the pale of nominal civilization which has not its pleasant side. The dens of New York where sailors are lodged, robbed, beaten into insensibility, if they cannot be made to drink themselves into it, and then sold to the first outward-bound ship, are kept by men who have a genial element in their nature. The judges who have been accustomed daily to receive bribes from such men, and the prosecuting officers who generally save the judges from that trouble by taking the fee themselves, have often been men of attractive dispositions, whom innocent philosophers like Mr. Adams could never believe to have been guilty of such crimes. The empress who watched from her window while the tongue of her rival was pulled out by the roots, her body stripped before a vile crowd, and her back torn into stripes by the knout, was a charming woman, lavish of affection to her friends, unwilling to punish her male enemies with severity, and too tender-hearted to sign a death-warrant for any ordinary murderer. Facts are not to be overcome by the sight of amiable faces and polished manners. The single fact of Wade Hampton's circular, advising the Democracy of his State to make no further assassinations, outweighs ten thousand such sights as those which convinced Mr. Adams that the South was peaceful and orderly.

The monstrous frauds by which New York and New Jersey were carried against Grant, and which were intended to carry Pennsylvania also, are perfectly notorious. Their magnitude is such as to make it difficult to believe in their existence, and almost impossible to overcome their effect. Their existence is not, however, seriously disputed. Mayor Hoffman denounces those who attempt to punish or prevent these frauds, but carefully abstains from denying that they have been committed. He could not look any man in the face while he did so. No politician pretends to deny them. These frauds may be briefly summed up thus: 50,000 persons were naturalized in this city, of whom 20,000 to 25,000 never went near the courts, and not more than 10,000 to 15,000 at the outside were ever sworn, or were entitled to their papers. At least 20,000 fictitious names were registered in the cities of New York and Brooklyn; the number was probably greater than this, but could not have been less. In a single ward votes were cast upon more than 2,000 fictitious names. To deter Republican challengers, one of the most conspicuous was knocked down in the middle of the day, and as nearly murdered as it was in the power of his assailants to do. Seven thousand of the vilest roughs in the two cities were appointed by the sheriffs to arrest challengers and to force in fraudulent votes. The fraudulent naturalization papers were scattered over the State of New York, and greatly reduced Grant's majorities in the interior counties. Votes upon fictitious names, however, could only be cast in the large cities, where it is impossible to know all the faces at a poll. Without these, the State could not have been carried for Seymour, although the majority for Hoffman is probably large enough to dispense with this aid.

It will naturally be asked why such acts are not punished by legal process. The answer is simple. The district-attorney, who alone can prosecute, and the local judges, who alone can try charges of this nature, either are directly concerned in organizing these frauds or are indebted for their positions to those who are thus concerned. The few decent judges who are left on the bench have nothing to do with such crimes in the regular course of their duty, and they rightly abstain from going out of their regular course to reach such offenders, for if they did, the party managers would speedily supply their places with the right men, and justice would be utterly unknown in the city. The result of the whole situation is that election frauds, committed for the benefit of the dominant party, are absolutely unpunished and unpunishable, except where they happen to violate a statute of the United States, and thus come under the cognizance of a Federal court. With impunity thus guaranteed to them, the amount of fraud committed by the Democratic politicians is limited only by their lack of ingenuity or the want of time.

The Tammany Ring have now achieved the principal object for which they have carried on the Presidential election. They have the governor of the State, and they hope to buy up enough members of the Legislature to carry through all their merely financial schemes. Next year they believe that they will be able to secure the Legislature, so as to break down the laws which now keep the police out of their hands; and this being done, New York City will be wholly at the mercy of Tammany. Law will be administered by perjurers, property will be guarded by thieves, and life will be protected by assassins. These may seem extravagant expressions, in the judgment of persons who are not familiar with this city; but they are not a whit too strong to depict the probable future of New York. We have now judges on the bench whom no man would believe under oath. We had, under the rule of Fernando Wood, a police notoriously in league with the principal burglars of the city. We have a district-attorney who, in a case where all the evidence that was published showed a deliberate murder, accepted a plea of manslaughter, and a judge who fined the murderer six cents. We see a tremendous scheme of fraudulent voting carried on without disguise, and a respected citizen stricken down in broad day for daring to interfere with it. We know active politicians who have done their best to murder scores of men, and we know that they are never punished unless they happen to attack a man of greater political influence than themselves. The police are the only protection remaining to the honest citizens of New York; and now the loss of the Legislature for a single year would throw the police into the hands of Tammany Hall. When that is once done, it can never be undone, for New York city will ever after give 150,000 majority as easily as it now gives 50,000, and the governor being thus secured, his veto will prevent any change.

Much anxiety is naturally expressed for the future prevention of such monstrous frauds as those which have just been perpetrated. Our hopes in this direction are very moderate. The governor elect cannot, of course, sign any bill which would injure those to whom he owes his election. The Legislature cannot pass any party measure over his veto. There can, therefore, be no change in the law, and its administration in this city will be in the future what it has been in the past. Congress, however, has it in its power to put an end to one large class of frauds—those which are connected with naturalization. It is absolutely necessary that jurisdiction over this subject should be confined to the Federal courts. It is a purely national matter, and ought not to be left to any mere State officer. The provision allowing aliens, arriving here while under eighteen years of age, to become citizens without a previous declaration of intentions, ought also to be repealed. All aliens come here in their youth, if we may believe the records of the courts at election time. A young man of eighteen can declare his intentions just as well as if he were twenty-one. A record should be kept at Washington of all naturalizations, and all certificates should be countersigned there. The certificate of final naturalization should always contain the record of the previous declaration of intentions, and should itself take effect at least a year after its date. All this might be done without extending the term of residence required for a single day. There would then remain only the risk of forgery; and this, when every certificate was numbered in its order, and recorded at Washington, would be an improbable contingency. Congress must take hold of this duty with firmness and courage, or else remove all restrictions upon naturalization, and declare every man a citizen upon his arrival in the country. Under the present system, all honest foreigners are kept out of citizenship for five years, while all the unscrupulous ones are admitted forthwith.

SPANISH AFFAIRS.

The Provisional Government in Spain has turned out, as everybody expected, very liberal indeed. Its leaders are naturally men of advanced ideas who have lived much abroad, and know by how large an interval Spain lags behind other nations in all that constitutes modern progress. Consequently, the very first use they have made of their power has been to institute great reforms, likely to prove of incalculable and immediate benefit, if the mass of the population are ready for them; but likely to do some harm now, and good only remotely, if the people are not ready for them; and it is the almost complete ignorance of the outer world as to the mental and moral condition of the people which has rendered it so difficult to form an opinion of any great value about the policy which the Serranos and Prims have been pursuing. Travellers in Spain have been few in number, and the condition of the country is such that these few see nothing but the great towns and the picture-galleries. Of the peasantry and artisans and small traders less is probably known by the European or American public than of the same classes in any other country on this side of the Black Sea. The experience of 1848 has satisfied most close observers of European politics that revolutions based on ideas which have not got firm hold of the body of the population postpone, instead of hastening, the triumph of liberalism. The days are gone by when nations could be dragged along the road of progress, whether political or social, by aristocrats, whether "gentlemen" or "advanced thinkers," and the Spanish liberals have not had the opportunity of preparing the popular mind for what they were going to do, either by agitation or other process of education.

One very good test of the political condition of the Spanish people has been applied, however, and the result, we are bound to say, has been exceedingly satisfactory—much more so than a month ago we should have ventured to hope. As soon as the Queen's Government was overthrown, the administrative authority was seized upon at the capital and in all the provinces by bodies for which the only equivalent known in America is the "Vigilance Committee," but which in Spain they call Juntas. One junta, composed of local notables who either planned the revolution or knew it was coming, and sympathized with it, assumed the central authority at Madrid; and "the people" of the capital broke open the arsenals and armed in support of its authority. Now, in France when a movement of this sort occurs in the capital the provinces remain perfectly tranquil, and the local authorities, the préfets and sous-préfets, transfer their allegiance to the new power, and all goes on as before. But in Spain, centralization not having yet triumphed, things did not go in this way at all. On the contrary, each province and town, and even village, as soon as the royal reins were seen to slacken and drop, formed a junta of its own and set to work to administer the government within its own limits—so that a few weeks ago Spain was ruled by a series of vigilance committees exercising high and low justice, each maintaining friendly relations with the central vigilance committee at the capital, but still reserving to itself the right to say what it would or would not do in the existing emergency. Now, if there had been any want of common sense amongst the masses, if they had been wanting in civil prudence, or had been afflicted with any political or social crazes, most assuredly they would have seized this opportunity of putting their crude imaginings into practice, and of trying to remodel society on their own peculiar basis. But there has not been the slightest indication given in any quarter that the Spanish people, taken as a whole, dreamed of any other freedom or progress than historic freedom and progress, based on the national traditions and the national habits. The local juntas made no attempts to bring society suddenly to perfection, except in one village near Cadiz, where the committee set about an equal division of property both real and personal, and were rapidly putting an end for ever to poverty and its attendant inconveniences when the appearance of two hundred soldiers from the city at once restored the old social system with all its imperfections. Moreover, as soon as a good provisional government was formed at Madrid the central junta laid down its authority, and the local juntas all followed its example and handed over the administration to the regular officials. It must be confessed that a people which passes through such a crisis in this way gives proofs such as but few peoples have ever afforded of the possession of the political sense.

Another test of the political condition of the country and of the quality of the Spanish mind has been afforded by the discussions on the form of government which is to permanently replace the Bourbon monarchy. There has been no attempt made by anybody or any section of politicians to forestall the national decision by a coup de main or coup de théâtre at Madrid. No attempt has been made either to set up a republic or a particular monarch "by acclamation," as the custom is in Paris. The "armed people," who took the muskets from the arsenal and who patrolled the streets and maintained order during the first days of excitement, have, now that the Government has been organized, given back the weapons to the authorities without expressing any opinion whatever on the great problems of human society. The question whether Spain shall be a confederated republic, or a "republic, one and indivisible," or a monarchy, and, if a monarchy, whether Victor Emanuel's son, the Duc d'Aosta; or the King of Portugal's father, Dom Ferdinand; or the Duc de Montpensier, shall have the crown, are being slowly and calmly debated in the press and on the platform, the leaders openly declaring their opinion to be in favor of monarchy, but all parties, including the red-hot democrats, agreeing to leave the matter to the decision of the Constituent Assembly, which will meet in two months. The tone in which General Prim and Marshal Serrano utter their opinions, too, and the arguments by which they support them, are in the highest degree calm, moderate, and statesmanlike.

Of the reforms on which the Provisional Government has ventured without formally consulting the country the most important are the release of education from the hands of the priests, and the expulsion of the Jesuits and the destruction of the convents. Until 1812, the work of education was wholly monopolized by the Church; it was then thrown open to laymen, and continued to be so till June of this year, when Isabella, as part of her reactionary policy, issued a decree again committing it to the clergy exclusively. The Provisional Government has now declared it absolutely free to everybody who pleases to open a school. All monasteries founded since 1837 are abolished;

all founded before that date are to be reduced by one-half, and are forbidden to receive novices. These seem harsh measures, and in their practical operation will doubtless cause a good deal of individual suffering, but in dealing with an evil of such magnitude as Spanish ecclesiasticism no reform is possible without the infliction of great individual suffering. The Jesuits have been driven out of the kingdom altogether and their property confiscated, they having been, as they always are when they can get near the central authority, active politicians. They are taking refuge in other European countries, but the largest flight of them seems to have descended on unhappy Belgium, out of which they and their confrères seem in a fair way to eat the vitals. At Antwerp, one of the local papers says that the area which the religious corporations are covering with buildings is equal in extent to that covered by new dwelling-houses since the levelling of the old fortifications; and another adds that the sum expended in erecting churches and convents during the last ten years equals that expended during the same period on private dwellings. In fact, one of the most curious phenomena of the political and religious crisis through which the civilized world is passing, is the wrathful expulsion or spoliation or overthrow to which the priests have been subjected in every country in which they have long held sway, and the necessity under which they find themselves of taking refuge and making their headquarters in those countries in which all influence on political affairs has been for a long while carefully denied them. Perhaps the most singular phenomenon, too, of the Spanish revolution is the consideration which the Queen—a notoriously immoral woman, whose last favorite, Señor Marfori, an ex-actor, has accompanied her into banishment—managed to secure from the Pope, who not very long ago presented her with the "Golden Rose," the great ecclesiastical certificate of piety and fidelity. But His Holiness probably felt, like some of our American moralists and sages, that as long as she was "sound on the main question" her vice and tyranny were matters of small moment.

Slavery in the Spanish colonies seems undoubtedly to be doomed; the question now under debate seems to be that of gradual or immediate emancipation, and the usual sophistries are being employed by the planting interest, in the teeth of the West Indian experience, to secure the indefinite postponement of the absolute extinction of this great "peculiarity." But it is safe to say that after what has happened here, and considering what the public opinion of the world is on this subject, it will not be possible to touch the prison-house at all without pulling it down altogether. Of the establishment of religious liberty we do not speak as a reform, for that is but the natural consequence of the great reform involved in the overthrow of the priests. Taken for all in all, the Spanish revolution, as far as it has yet gone, has been one of the most hopeful victories liberalism has won, and if it continues as it has begun will furnish a new and splendid guarantee that "government of the people by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

"WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH THE NEGRO?"

During the first few months after the war this question was very frequently put by a great many people, who asked it simply because they did not think it could be answered; in other words, used it rather as a good conundrum than as a means of getting information. Their opinion clearly was that the negro was an insoluble problem, and they hoped and believed that he would bring to shame and confusion everybody who had ever done anything to help him. Frederick Douglass, who shines amongst his school of politicians by the possession of a shrewd common sense and a keen and incisive tongue, answered the question at a meeting of the Anti-Slavery Association, and with a good deal of force, by requesting everybody to "let the negro alone" as the very highest benefit his white neighbors could confer on him. Now, though this answer really contains in it the key of the whole negro difficulty, of course it has to be interpreted in a large and liberal way, and with a due regard to surrounding circumstances. It would not have been right to "let the negro alone" immediately after the war. To make emancipation a blessing and not a curse to him special means had to be provided for his protection and education, until he had become familiarized with the machinery of free society, and had learned to play his part in working it; until the ruling race had given some satisfactory indication of respect for his rights, or he had been provided with the legal means of asserting them, and the knowledge necessary to use the means effectively.

The Freedmen's Bureau was one most powerful and beneficent agent in making the transition from slavery to freedom easy, and it has been maintained up to the point where there was danger of its preventing the growth of self-reliance and prudence among those for whose benefit it was established, and danger of its becoming a prey to jobbers and professional politicians. Its labors were admirably supplemented by the American Freedman's Union Commission, which was established four years ago, by the voluntary efforts of private individuals, to do for Northern charity toward the freedmen what the Sanitary Commission had done for Northern charity toward the soldiers—that is, organize it, conduct it through proper channels to the quarters in which it was most needed, prevent waste from want of concert and concentrated responsibility, and prevent its being cursed by the spirit of sectarianism or localism. It has succeeded in doing all that it set itself to do in a remarkable degree, its main efforts being directed, since the first year or two pending the assumption of the work by the State governments, to the supply of the freedmen's greatest want, education. It has established and kept going thousands of schools all over the South, and has, during the past year, devoted a large portion of its funds to sowing the seeds of schools—if we may use the expression—by training white and colored teachers; and it is a remarkable fact that Union majorities at the South are in the ratio of freedmen's schools—that is, the more schools you have, the more votes you get for peace and quietness, for the maintenance of the United States Government, and for the payment of the United States debt, and the equality of men before the law. In short, the story of the influence of education on politics at the North is the story of the influence of education on politics at the South.

The Commission now propose, after providing funds for the maintenance of their schools one year longer, to dissolve and leave the work they have begun to be carried on by the Southern people themselves, and they do this because they have been made sensible by many signs that they are just nearing the point where persistence in treating the freedmen as an object of commiseration or as the pupil or ward of the community would not only bring into ridicule all that has been done for him, and all the arguments on which the claims made for his political equality have been based, but would seriously interfere with the growth of his own character. In stopping their work now, they stop it while it still retains the public sympathy and respect, and thus render a valuable service to the general cause of charity; for if charity have any formidable enemies, it is they who keep philanthropic "movements" going after the intelligent portion of the community has ceased to see the necessity of them, and after they cease to have any visible basis but rhetoric, sophistry, and exaggeration.

The action of the Freedman's Commission may, and we hope will, furnish a useful lesson to legislators and political agitators in the stage of reconstruction on which we are now entering. If the negro is what so many of us have been asserting that he is, a man who has only been kept by a gross abuse of the power of the majority from taking his full share in the work of progress, both moral and material, he must be left to win his way to his proper place by the use of ordinary means. The value of difficulties in strengthening and elevating white character is now an old and trite subject of remark. The most energetic and successful white communities are those for whom Providence has apparently done least, as far as outward circumstances are concerned; and the same proposition is true in a vast majority of cases with regard to individuals. Wherever the industrial field is fairly free, the "self-made man" is getting the better of the man whose father supplies his capital; and though education is an equipment which always gives its owner an immense advantage, the educated man who has nothing but his own brains to look to for aid in the struggle of life almost always beats the educated man who enters the arena with his material future provided for by others. The thing which has probably most contributed to make New Englanders "the bosses" in nearly every undertaking in the country, and has placed South Carolina conquered at the feet of Massachusetts, is the fact that New England hills are bleak and bare and the New England soil stony and unproductive. Of course, everything must be done that can be done to make the difficulties with which the negro has to contend no greater than those with which poor white men have to contend. He ought to have security, and he ought to have education, in so far as it is in the power of the Government to supply them; but the great burden which weights the negroes in the race is one which neither Government nor philanthropists can remove, and that is the want of all the ordinary claims to social respectability. These claims, in the case of a race, are based on a history rich either in great deeds or great men, and in the case of individuals either on wealth or professional or commercial success, or learning or genius. No white race, or white man, who wants these things is thought much of. The negro race must, in short, win a good social position in the way other races have won it; and when it has its roll of poets, orators, scholars, soldiers, and statesmen to show, people will greatly respect it; but not till then, no matter how many novels are composed in its honor or how many sermons are preached against "the sin of caste."

So, also, as regards individual negroes, it may be confidently asserted that as soon as a tolerable number of them have conquered the difficulties which prevent so many of us from being great lawyers and orators and poets and statesmen, they will soon come to be valued, like other men, for what they are, no matter what may be the color of their skins or the size of their facial angle. Prejudices, of course, are hard to conquer, and happy is he who when he enters on life finds none in his path; but there is only one way of conquering them for black or white, and that is—performance. People won't dare to sneer at a black skin when they have become familiar with the spectacle of a black skin covering sages and heroes and jurists and millionaires. Therefore, those who wish the negro well should preach to him incessantly the lesson of self-reliance and self-deliverance; should spend all they can for books and maps and teachers for him, and as little as possible on gaseous lectures about his political rights; should, whenever they feel an irrepressible desire to stump for the negro, or vote for Ben Butler or his like for the sake of the negro, expend their zeal in packing up their valises and going to the South, and there doing, as hundreds of admirable Northern men and women are doing at this moment, a little honest—unnoticed here, but we may be sure not unnoticed everywhere—work for the negro, by opening schools for his instruction in letters, in industry, in morals, and in politics, and affording him an example of unostentatious devotion to duty.

THE DANA-BUTLER CONTEST.

The history of the contest in the Fifth Massachusetts District is a profitable subject of study in various ways. It furnishes an excellent illustration of the vile uses which may be made of party machinery and also an excellent indication of what the Republican party is coming to, if a certain section of its politicians are to have their way. As we enjoy the blessed privilege of being as indiscreet as we please—a luxury of the delights of which no journalist who has not tried it can form any idea—we shall begin at the beginning by saying that with this section General Grant was not, and is not, a favorite. They opposed his nomination as long as they possibly could, and supported their opposition, as their amiable custom is, by spreading damaging stories about his personal character, either inventing them or passing them on without enquiry, as best suited their convenience. The dislike of him had two grounds, one rational and the other irrational. The first was his extreme reticence about his political opinions. He determined not to be examined against his will, to ascertain his fitness for an office which he did not seek; and besides this, he has strong views as to the impropriety of political partisanship on the part of military men, and therefore, whenever the emissaries of the enthusiasts came to talk politics with him, he "talked horse." This was, of course, unsatisfactory; but the difficulty was finally removed by Grant's quarrel with Mr. Johnson, which was looked on as furnishing the required evidence of his soundness. Moreover, Chief-Justice Chase, after whom they had had hankerings, about this time began to show symptoms of *un*soundness, and it was becoming tolerably clear to all thinking men that without Grant for a candidate, and a more sensible platform than the enthusiasts were likely to supply, the party would go to the wall at the election. The enthusiasts, therefore, with unusual good sense, temporarily subsided and accepted Grant. During the canvass they produced in his praise a fair amount of the ordinary campaign cant, but it was hollow, unctuous, and mechanical, and never completely disguised the fact that they looked on him with dislike and suspicion.

Their second ground for disliking him was his character, meaning his temperament and mental constitution. He is a kind of man whom they not only do not take to, but hold in abomination. Silent, reserved, scrupulous, thorough, exact men, respecters of law and experience and distrustful of gab, they look on as limbs of Satan. A man who keeps quiet and attends to his business they always entertain the darkest suspicions of, and imagine he must be "up to something;" and for character, apart from rhetoric, they have not the smallest respect. All the men whom they admire and consider really "great" rarely leave the stump except to snatch a hasty meal, which, however, must not be too savory or well served, because that would give it the air of a "dinner," and to "dinners" they seem to trace most of the evils which afflict mankind.

They are accordingly still very doubtful of Grant. Their programme—and they do not now conceal it—for the next session is one of a peculiarly Radical character, and consists in treating the South once more as a tabula rasa for a totally new experiment in social and political reorganization, in which all that has been done and which we have all been supporting for the last two years shall be set aside as null and void. To carry out this scheme they are ready, if necessary, to throw the public credit overboard, and to swamp the judiciary or so arrange matters that judicial decisions, as some of their organs gravely proposed with regard to the Senate during the impeachment trial, shall, on all important political questions, be previously arranged at prayer-meetings, mass-meetings, and other assemblies of right-minded citizens, and sent by mail to the court with instructions to deliver them on pain of "infamy." For this policy it is hardly necessary to say there is no chance of any support from Grant, and it is now hardly a secret that warfare against him in Congress is being already organized, and General Butler, as an old and bitter enemy and a thoroughly unscrupulous partisan, has been selected to lead the attack, and the campaign pretence of enthusiasm for Grant is already thrown off.

General Butler had carefully prepared "a regular nomination" for himself long before the convention met in the Fifth District, and, of course, he got it "unanimously" the moment the convention met. The important point for Mr. Dana and his friends to make then was, that, in spite of his regular nomination, he was not an orthodox Republican, and that therefore he was not entitled to the aid of the moral force of a nomination. This was undoubtedly proved by the resolution of the Chicago and Worcester Conventions, and by the record of Butler's career in Congress. The Republican press throughout the country, too, were unanimous in saying so, and two such sterling Radicals as George William Curtis and General Hawley proclaimed it loudly.

To this Butler replied by saying that he was recognized as "sound" by all his Massachusetts colleagues and by the State Central Committee, and it is too true—shamefully and disgracefully true—that not one member from Massachusetts had ever raised his voice to protect Republican principles from him. That work has had to be done by Mr. Garfield and other representatives from other States. Two members of the Massachusetts delegation—Messrs. Boutwell and Banks—stumped the district under the auspices of the Butler club; and Mr. Sumner, when challenged by Butler to say whether he thought him (Butler) a good representative for a Massachusetts district, had not the courage to say no. Moreover, the State Committee gave its funds for the district to the Butler Committee, although they could not deny that the Republican press, and all the leading Republicans outside, considered Butler a dangerous man.

This local recognition of Butler, and the invitation to speak in Faneuil Hall, are due to two causes: First, Butler has made a considerable number of the busybodies who work the party machinery thoroughly afraid of him. They dread his tongue, and dread his unscrupulousness and vindictiveness. Secondly, because the State Committee is controlled by the enthusiasts, who are in favor of the application of root-and-branch Radicalism to everything under heaven—that is to say, do not believe anything to be of any value in the government of men but the noble emotions. God's great gift of reason and the inestimable treasure of human experience they treat as of no account; and they want to apply the great Radical solvent to the finances, the judiciary, appointments, and everything else in the Government, hoping to produce a great political elixir that will banish all misery and wickedness from the United States. In this great attempt of course they can count on a leader in Butler, and they have chosen him for their leader. From Mr. Dana they could hope for no sympathy or assistance, as he retains some old-fashioned views as to the value of the human mind, and the intentions of the Almighty in creating it—views which have done great things both for this nation and for the human race, and will, we confidently believe, do great things again. This will account for the bitterness of the personal attacks on him.

No account of the causes of Butler's success would be complete, however, which did not state that he has been scattering his repudiation doctrines broadcast in the district ever since 1867, and they have probably taken as deep root there now as in any Democratic district, and his personal presence on the scene, and his way of talking and looking at things, have of course lowered the tone of the young men of the better sort, and stimulated those of the worse sort into new life and activity. Still, Mr. Dana's canvass, we are assured, carried the number of his (Mr. Dana's) supporters from 500 up to 4,000. The small number of votes he actually received was due to panic caused at the close by the growth of despair as to the final result. There were, too, indiscretions and mistakes in the canvass on which it is needless now to dwell. Mr. Dana has the consolation of knowing that he had from the first the hearty sympathy, and has now the gratitude, of the great body of all the best men of the party all over the country—of all men of every party who believe that the character of its legislators is the most valuable of a nation's possessions, that no cause is good which is based on rascality, and that the general adoption of the principles and practices which have secured Butler's election would ruin, and deservedly ruin, any government that ever existed or ever will exist. In the cause of morality it is always better to have "fought and lost, than never to have fought at all," and Mr. Dana may feel sure that he is, after all, on the winning side. The future is not for the Butlerites, as their master well knows. Their capacity even for mischief is nearly gone, and it will rapidly disappear after they next produce their great "pill of health" in Congress.

UNKIND PRAISE.

We publish elsewhere a letter from a friend of Miss Dickinson's taking us to task for our recent criticism of this lady's speeches and novel. To which we reply, first, that we have never said or insinuated that Miss Dickinson's career as a woman, daughter, and sister was not worthy of the highest admiration. Any comments on it from us, either in praise or blame, would, in fact, have been an impertinence, and consequently we have never made any. Moreover, we did not intend our remarks to be understood as expressing an objection to Miss Dickinson's or any other young person's speaking in public till she "had mastered all things." In getting at "the drift of our criticism" it must be taken for granted that we are not wanting in common sense. Everybody's earlier exertions in every calling must, of course, be imperfect; in fact, everybody's life, till nearly forty, is an experiment. Most men certainly reach that age before they do their work well, or are even sure of the nature and extent of their own powers. But any young person whose earlier efforts in any calling are for any reason exempted from the constant criticism either of judicious friends or not wholly unscrupulous enemies, is in danger of running utterly to seed long before middle life, of becoming shallow, careless, conceited, and bumptious. If we had a son or brother who was taking the stump at the age of nineteen with considerable oratorical gifts, and found that circumstances had surrounded him with people who, every time he came down off the platform, told him he was the equal of Demosthenes or Burke or Patrick Henry or Webster, and that he was likely to be led on into devoting his whole time to spouting, we should labor most earnestly to secure his withdrawal from the political arena, and to prevent his speaking too often, or even speaking at all, without having his attention called to the faults inseparable from his youth, inexperience, and ignorance. The great end of training for men and women is to make them acquainted with the degree of their own ability and the extent of their own attainments, and this is just the thing which Miss Dickinson has been prevented, by the exigencies of her position, the gravity of the political crisis, and the want of judgment on the part of her friends, from receiving.

We happened to be present at that first appearance of hers in Hartford of which "I. B. H." speaks, and can testify that on that occasion a very large portion of her discourse was devoted to topics which she evidently understood only very imperfectly, if at all; that it was very incoherent; that the most effective part of it was a very youthful description of the assault on Fort Donelson and personal hits directed against leading Democrats, which were certainly "telling," but which we, for our part, would rather not have heard from a very young lady or gentleman at a political meeting. The conclusion with which we came away was, that she was a person of very remarkable powers—that she was a person of very remarkable character we learned from other sources—and we sincerely hoped that after she had done a reasonable amount of work for the Republican party fortune would so favor her, and friends would so counsel her, that she would devote two or three years to hard and conscientious study. It appears that this was not possible, however. She has not only had no regular education, but hardly a word of judicious criticism from any quarter. We felt all along that no brain and no character could help being injured by such a career, but we have avoided saying so. The party needed her help, and she gave it without stint and with enthusiasm; and much as we regretted seeing such a woman sacrificed in such a way, we kept perfectly silent, because we were unable to say that she was not doing some good, and could not tell how far her conduct was controlled by circumstances.

Secondly, we have neither overlooked nor ignored the fact that "great good may be accomplished in the world by very imperfect and faulty mediums." We do not blame Miss Dickinson for writing a novel. We believe had she been more happily situated during the last seven years, she would either not have written this one before us or would have done it better. But, after what has passed, there is nothing wonderful in the fact that she should write an exceedingly poor novel. The present controversy, however, has been caused not by the novel so much as by the conduct of her injudicious critics in coming forward and praising it in terms only applicable to the most finished works of genius. In writing a novel she has entered on a new field of activity, in which she is a complete novice, and has produced as a first attempt a work of art both "faulty and imperfect;" and forthwith we are assured it is a magnificent success. If "What Answer?" be "a great and noble" book, what remains for us to say of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," for instance, which is a work of art of the highest order, uniting excellence in motive with excellence in execution? Of course, the effect of such criticism is to lead the unlearned and unstable to suppose that there are no degrees of excellence in "mediums," and that any piece of ill-conceived and ill-executed work, if it be only prompted by good intentions, and the "cause" be a noble one, is entitled to the highest praise. This we must say, we consider a sad lesson for masters in the art to read to young beginners. Of course it is right to "welcome young allies" cordially, but they must be welcomed in the language of soberness and truth, and not in the language of exaggeration and flattery. The cause of truth is the first of causes, and simplicity and accuracy both in speech and demeanor are amongst the first of virtues.

Of the real effect of all this on Miss Dickinson, and of her own opinion of her work, we know nothing except what we learn from "I. B. H.'s" letter. Possibly she has a character which has remained proof against the temptations by which she has been surrounded, and has acquired or retains an abiding consciousness of her own defects. But the appearance of the novel, we confess, has led us to fear the worst as to the effect on her of the unmeasured praise of her admirers. The book is not simply a work of art intended to delight the eye or refine the taste. It is put forward as an instrument of persuasion, and treats, as we pointed out in our last article, one of the darkest problems in ethnology, physiology, and morals as if it were as good as settled, and as if all that is now needed were to write a burning tale so as to open the eyes of the multitude to their wickedness in refusing to accept the solution offered by the writer. One of the most tremendous and palpable facts in history is the influence of race on moral and social and religious ideas. One of the most difficult questions in the whole field of ethics is the nature of the motives by which a man or woman should be mainly guided in selecting the person with whom he or she is to share the responsibility of producing and educating children. The considerations which bear on it are almost innumerable. But here in Miss Dickinson's book it is taken in one of its most difficult sides and disposed of in a very slight and very sentimental fiction, and her friends pleasantly call the work "an emphatic protest against the spirit of caste," and a "great and noble work," a "beautiful and effective testimony," a "bright book glowing with light and heat," a "vehement appeal," "a story which is history and prophecy," "a faulty, noble, captivating, and brave petite [sic] novel," "a powerful book, full of fire and passion." Some of the critics acknowledge "it has faults," as indeed "Paradise Lost" and "Hamlet" and "Don Quixote" have, but all shout most vehemently that they are not worth notice—like the spots on the sun, we suppose. Now, we concluded from the appearance of the book, from its quality, and from its subject-matter, and from the frantic—we use this word advisedly—applause which was showered on it, that its author was being rapidly led astray, and that it was time for the friends of soberness, of simplicity and truthfulness, of thoroughness and real earnestness, to raise their voices and say their say. We are no defenders of caste; but we have our own notions as to how the spirit of caste, so far as the negroes are affected by it, is to be overcome, and we shall take an early opportunity of setting them forth. They may not be very valuable, but they have the merit of rating various other agencies in the government of the world far above stump-speaking or article-writing.

We are sensible, in saying all this, that we are saying things that will prove very disagreeable to a great many good people; and nobody is more familiar with the discomfort of doing this than we are. But we must go one step further, and add one other reflection, which Miss Dickinson's career, or rather the probable effect of her example on her weaker juniors of both sexes, has suggested. One does not need to have much experience of "movements"—that is, of the talk in the press and on the platform by which great political and social changes are brought about or accompanied—to see that they depend for all their value, for the completeness and permanence of their results, upon the individual character of the men and women of the country; in short, not upon the earnestness displayed at public meetings, but upon the earnestness displayed in everyday life. No matter what triumphs you achieve in legislation, you accomplish nothing of any use to society unless the men who execute the laws are honest, and the public opinion which is to see to their enforcement is healthy—unless the general sense of duty and the general spirit of self-sacrifice are deep and powerful—unless, in short, truthfulness, simplicity, and modesty are leading features in the national character. Now, since the cause of the negro became triumphant—since it became the cause of the majority, it has not, in our opinion, done much to promote these virtues. It has drawn to it a prodigious number of orators and poets and "fine young Radicals," whose performances not only make the judicious grieve, but are a real hindrance to right feeling and right thinking. The progress it is just now helping seems to us to be a progress in which brass-bands, foot-lights, flabby newspaper articles, "stirring poems," Ben Butlers, unscrupulous and foul-mouthed pseudo-philanthropists, play an unnaturally large part. We hail Grant's election with double joy because his career is a standing protest against these things, and a standing vindication of the simple and manly virtues, of secret alms-giving, of closet prayer, of silent tears, of obscure heroism, of hidden faith, of untrumpeted patience and fidelity.

MR. EMERSON'S NEW COURSE OF LECTURES.

BOSTON, November 4, 1868.

THE readers of the Nation, who are interested in all good things, will perhaps like to hear a word of Mr. Emerson's new course of lectures now going on in Boston. The announcement that such a pleasure is coming, to people as old as I am, is something like those forebodings of spring that prepare us every year for a familiar novelty, none the less novel, when it arrives, because it is familiar. We know perfectly well what we are to expect from Mr. Emerson, and yet what he says always penetrates and stirs us, as is apt to be the case with genius, in a very unlooked-for fashion. Perhaps genius is one of the few things which we gladly allow to repeat itself—one of the few that accumulate rather than weaken the force of their impression by iteration? Perhaps some of us hear more than the mere words, are moved by something deeper than the thoughts? If it be so, we are quite right, for it is thirty years and more of "plain living and high thinking" that speak to us in this altogether unique lay-preacher. We have shared in the beneficence of this varied culture, this fearless impartiality in criticism and speculation, this masculine sincerity, this sweetness of nature which rather stimulates than cloys, for a generation long. At sixty-five (or two years beyond his grand climacteric, as he would prefer to call it) he has that privilege of soul which abolishes the calendar, and presents him to us always the unwasted contemporary of his own prime. I do not know if he seem old to his younger hearers, but we who have known him so long wonder at the tenacity with which he maintains himself even in the outposts of youth. I suppose it is not the Emerson of 1868 to whom we listen. For us the whole life of the man is distilled in the clear drop of every sentence, and behind each word we divine the force of a noble character, the weight of a large capital of thinking and being. We do not go to hear what Emerson says so much as to hear Emerson. Not that we perceive any falling-off in anything that ever was essential to the charm of Mr. Emerson's peculiar style of thought or phrase. The first lecture, to be sure, was more disjointed even than common. It was as if, after vainly trying to get his paragraphs into sequence and order, he had at last tried the desperate expedient of shuffling them. It was chaos come again, but it was a chaos full of shooting-stars, a jumble of creative forces. The second lecture, on "Criticism and Poetry," was quite up to the level of old times, full of that power of strangely-subtle association whose indirect approaches startle the mind into almost painful attention, of those flashes of mutual understanding between speaker and hearer that are gone ere one can say it lightens. The vice of Emerson's criticism seems to be, that while no man is so sensitive to what is poetical, few men are less sensible than he of what makes a poem. Of the third lecture (and I have heard but three) I shall say something by-and-by.

To be young is surely the best, if the most precarious, gift of life; yet there are some of us who would hardly consent to be young again, if it were at the cost of our recollection of Mr. Emerson's first lectures during the consulate of Tyler. We used to walk in from the country to the Masonic Temple (I think it was), through the crisp winter night, and listen to that thrilling voice of his, so charged with subtle meaning and subtle music, as shipwrecked men on a raft to the hail of a ship that came with unhoped-for food and rescue. Cynics might say what they liked. Did our own imaginations transfigure dry remainder-biscuit into ambrosia? At any rate, he brought us life, which, on the whole, is no bad thing. Was it all transcendentalism? magic-lantern pictures, on mist? As you will. Those, then, were just what we wanted. But it was not so. The delight and the benefit were that he put us in communication with a larger style of thought, sharpened our wits with a more pungent phrase, gave us ravishing glimpses of an ideal under the dry husk of our New England; made us conscious of the supreme and everlasting originality of whatever bit of soul might be in any of us; freed us, in short, from the stocks of prose in which we had sate so long that we had grown well-nigh contented in our cramps. And who that saw the audience will ever forget it, where every one still capable of fire, or longing to renew in them the half-forgotten sense of it, was gathered? Those faces, young and old, a-gleam with pale intellectual light, eager with pleased attention, flash upon me once more from the deep recesses of the years with an exquisite pathos. I hear again that rustle of sensation, as they turned to exchange glances over some pithier thought, some keener flash of that humor which always played about the horizon of his mind like heat-lightning, and it seems now like the sad stir of the autumn leaves that are whirling around me. To some of us that long-past experience remains as the most marvellous and fruitful we have ever had. Emerson awakened us, saved us from the body of this death. It is the sound of the trumpet that the young soul longs for, careless what breath may fill it. Sidney heard it in the ballad of "Chevy Chase," and we in Emerson. Nor did it blow retreat, but called to us with assurance of victory. Did they say he was disconnected? So were the stars, that seemed larger to our eyes, still keen with that excitement, as we walked homeward with prouder stride over the creaking snow. And were they not knit together by a higher logic than our mere sense could master? Were we enthusiasts? I hope and believe we were, and am thankful to the man who made us worth something for once in our lives. If asked what was left? what we carried home? we should not have been careful for an answer. It would have been enough if we had said that something beautiful had passed that way. Or we might have asked in return what one brought away from a symphony of Beethoven? Enough that he had set that ferment of wholesome discontent at work in us. There is one, at least, of those old hearers, so many of whom are now in the fruition of that intellectual beauty of which Emerson gave them both the desire and the foretaste, who will always love to repeat—

> "Che in la mente m'è fitta, ed or m'accuora
> La cara e buona immagine paterna
> Di voi, quando nel mondo ad ora ad ora
> M'insegnavati come l'uom s'eterna."

I am unconsciously thinking as I write of the third lecture of the present course, in which Mr. Emerson gave some delightful reminiscences of the intellectual influences in whose movement he had shared. It was like hearing Goethe read some passages of the "Wahrheit aus seinem Leben." Not that there was not a little Dichtung, too, here and there, as the lecturer built up so lofty a pedestal under certain figures as to lift them into a prominence of obscurity, and seem to masthead them there. Everybody was asking his neighbor who this or that recondite great man was, in the faint hope that somebody might once have heard of him. There are those who call Mr. Emerson cold. Let them revise their judgment in presence of this loyalty of his that can keep warm for half a century, that never forgets a friendship, or fails to pay even a fancied obligation to the uttermost farthing. This substantiation of shadows was but incidental, and pleasantly characteristic of the man to those who know and love him. The greater part of the lecture was devoted to reminiscences of things substantial in themselves. He spoke of Everett, fresh from Greece and Germany; of Channing; of the translations of Margaret Fuller, Ripley, and Dwight; of the Dial and Brook Farm. To what he said of the latter an undertone of good-humored irony gave special zest. But what every one of his hearers felt was that the protagonist in the drama was left out. The lecturer was no Æneas to babble the quorum magna pars fui, and, as one of his listeners, I cannot help wishing to say how each of them was commenting the story as it went along, and filling up the necessary gaps in it from his own private store of memories. His younger hearers could not know how much they owed to the benign impersonality, the quiet scorn of everything ignoble, the never-sated hunger of self-culture, that were personified in the man before them. But the older knew how much the country's intellectual emancipation was due to the stimulus of his teaching and example, how constantly he had kept burning the beacon of an ideal life above our lower region of turmoil. To him more than to all other causes together did the young martyrs of our civil war owe the sustaining strength of thoughtful heroism that is so touching in every record of their lives. Those who are grateful to Mr. Emerson, as many of us are, for what they feel to be most valuable in their culture, or perhaps I should say their impulse, are grateful not so much for any direct teachings of his as for that inspiring lift which only genius can give, and without which all doctrine is chaff.

This was something like the caret which some of us older boys wished to fill up on the margin of the master's lecture. Few men have been so much to so many, and through so large a range of aptitudes and temperaments, and this simply because all of us value manhood beyond any or all other qualities of character. We may suspect in him, here and there, a certain thinness and vagueness of quality, but let the waters go over him as they list, this masculine fibre of his will keep its lively color and its toughness of texture. I can never help applying to him what Ben Jonson said of Bacon: "There happened in my time one noble speaker, who was full of gravity in his speaking. His language was nobly censorious. No man ever spake more neatly, more pressly, more weightily, or suffered less emptiness, less idleness, in what he uttered. No member of his speech but consisted of his own graces. His hearers could not cough, or look aside from him, without loss. He commanded where he spoke." Those who heard him while their natures were yet plastic, and their mental nerves trembled under the slightest breath of divine air, will never cease to feel and say—

> "Was never eye did see that face,
> Was never ear did hear that tongue,
> Was never mind did mind his grace,
> That ever thought the travail long;
> But eyes, and ears, and every thought,
> Were with his sweet perfections caught."

THE HUMORS OF THE CANVASS IN THE BUTLER DISTRICT.

BOSTON, November 5, 1868.

It may interest your readers to hear an impartial account of the proceedings at Salem, on the day before the election of General Butler. The great difficulty for all who have been caring about the recent struggle in the Fifth District has been that the newspapers on both sides have had the usual partisan descriptions of speeches, of persons, and meetings; and it has proved impossible to get from any press in this city trustworthy news. The meeting which in the Traveller figured as a "paltry Dana affair," turned out, in the Transcript, to have been an "enthusiastic Republican rally," and the speech which, in the latter paper, was listened to with "marked attention," was received, in the other, with "shouts of derision." It was quite confidently stated last week that a few days more would give Dana the election; but how reckless this assertion was may be seen from the result, which gives Butler 13,000 votes to Dana's 1,800. Nor has it been any more easy to discover what were the real questions at issue in the canvass; whether the people were really thinking at all about the bonds and taxation, or whether they were only interested in the moral and physical deformities of the various candidates. It was evident that Mr. Dana was making speeches about finance, but it was equally evident that General Butler was not. On the whole, convinced that the real state of the contest would reveal itself to an eye-witness much more fully than to a reader of the "dailies," I took a Salem train, which left Boston at 12:15, on Monday last. Salem was the great point of interest on that day, for the following reasons: General Kilpatrick having, at the urgent request of Mr. Dana's friends, consented to take the stump, was immediately assailed by General Butler in a speech at Marblehead, and covered with abuse of the vilest kind—too vile, in fact, for repetition. On this Kilpatrick, nothing daunted, had issued a challenge to Butler to meet himself, Colonel Whittemore, and General Gordon on Salem Common at two o'clock on Monday afternoon, and repeat and prove his vile slanders to a mass-meeting of citizens, if he could. In reply to this Butler pleaded, first, a previous engagement; second, that the challenge was issued simply because his enemies knew that this engagement rendered an appearance on his part impossible; and third, that to meet such a contemptible trio as his challengers would disgrace him. Still it was hoped by the more ardent that he might change his mind.

Monday was a cold, rainy, almost wintry day, and Salem, as you know, is a quiet, conservative, almost sleepy city. But even in the cars one became aware that he was approaching a scene of great excitement. A conversation something like this took place between two men opposite me: "I hope to God he 'll be defeated, the —— renegade; why, there is n't a greater scoundrel on the face of the earth than that Butler." "But Dana 's a renegade, too," said the other, a comfortable, good-natured-looking man—such a man as may be seen at any ward meeting or caucus. "What do you mean?" "Why, he do n't live in the district; he lives in Cambridge; he 's a renegade just as much as Butler is." This information was received with much disgust, and the man replied with an emphasis which I can only describe as apparently arising from a desire to end the discussion with a friendly and impartial expression of opinion. "Oh! he 's a renegade, too, is he? Well, damn him."

On reaching Salem, I found that the storm, so far from diminishing, had increased to a threatening pitch, and I was glad to be able to spend the hour which must pass before the meeting began in the warmth of the little refreshment-room; and indeed I began by this time to doubt whether there would be any meeting at all. In the refreshment-room were two men, lunching and talking with vigor of the Butler and Dana canvass; they soon went out. I had seated myself at one of the tables and called for something to eat; a young fellow of twenty-five or so, evidently a native American, was sorting newspapers on the floor. Thinking to obtain some information from him, I said, "There is to be a Dana meeting this afternoon, I hear; bad afternoon for it." "Guess there wun't be no Dana meet'n this afternoon," said he. "Are there many Dana men in Salem?" On this he half rose from the floor, and eyed me for a moment with intense suspicion, as if discovering a possible Dana man before him, and then said, quietly, "'bout four or five." Finding that the rôle of inquisitive stranger did not bring me much success, I tried another: "I am sorry to hear that there 's not much chance of Butler's defeat." "You 're sorry?" said the man; and now I found I had touched the right spring.

"You 're sorry? Why, ain't he the reg'lar nominee? These Dana men think they can come down here and impose a candidate on us. No, sir; we 're goin' to 'lect old Ben Butler. Did n't he hold New Orleans? Th' ain't a rebel in the South but what hates him worse 'n poison."

"What do you think of the loyal papers in the North that oppose his re-election?"

"What do I think? I think they 're bought. I 'll tell you what, sir, it 's money 's at the bottom of this Dana movement. Kilpatrick 's paid $1,500 for every speech."

"But you do n't suppose that such a paper as Harper's Weekly is bought, do you?"

"Well, I do n't know about that; I know why the Boston Advertiser supports Dana, though. They published a libel on a young lady, and she employed Butler to prosecute them. That 's why the Advertiser supports Dana. These papers go and say they oppose Butler because he 's in favor of repudiation; but that ain't it; why, do n't he say he goes for paying the debt all fair'n square, letter and spirit, 'cord'n to conscience? 'Tain't no such thing as repudiation; money 's at the bottom of all this fuss."

Notwithstanding the wretchedness of the day, the streets were full of people, for, in addition to the mass-meeting on the common, there was a "regular" meeting at Mechanics' Hall, where a certain General Gibson, of Ohio, was to speak. Through the principal street of the town a man was driving a caryall, on the outside of which was a poster announcing this meeting and another for the evening, while inside, the driver, stopping every few steps to clash together two pieces of sheet-iron or some other metal, shouted "Great Ree-publican meeting this afternoon at Mechanics' Hall; ád-dress by General Gibson, of Ohio. Great Ree-publican meeting this evening at Mechanics' Hall; ad-dresses by Dr. George B. Loring and ex-Governor Boutwell. Three cheers for Butler—one." These cheers he then proceeded to give himself, to the delight of the crowd, after which he drove a little further, and then da capo. If any one will read Hawthorne's description of Salem in the "Custom-house," he will fully know what a Bedlam Essex Street seemed.

Workmen were by this time busy getting ready a huge tent on the Common, and two stands had been brought into the field in order that General Butler's last remnant of an excuse for non-appearance might be taken from him. Meantime the "regular" rally was going on at a great rate, and after having a short conversation with a New Jersey Democrat, who assured me that if Butler came to reply to Kilpatrick's challenge the shedding of human blood would not be at all surprising, nor, I think I may add, displeasing, to him, I went to Mechanics' Hall, heard the end of General Gibson's speech, and reached the Common again just after the tent had been raised and as the crowd began to gather for the "regular" meeting. This crowd, small enough at first, was before long swelled to an enormous size by the Butler men who came over from the hall to hear Kilpatrick, and make an afternoon of it. The little boys were uproarious with joy, and shouted "three cheers for Ben" till they were hoarse. In a short time a brass-band drove up, and the crowd, seeing the speakers' carriage in the distance, amused itself with crying out, "There they come! there they come!" and "Got them mules with 'em?" which latter cry was variously interpreted by different bystanders, some inclining to the opinion that it referred to a caricature recently circulated in the district, in which General Butler appeared to great advantage driving a fine span of horses, while Mr. Dana made rather an ignominious figure as the humble possessor and driver of one mule; while others as stoutly maintained that it referred to the charge brought by General Butler against General Kilpatrick, that he had made a dishonorable use of the opportunities afforded him by his position as general of the Union army by stealing animals of this kind. I am inclined myself to adopt a middle opinion and to believe that while some were actuated by the recollection of the caricature and others by that of the Marblehead speech, there were still others who joined in the shout without knowing anything about it, from the mere "joy of being."

At last the chairman (Willard Phillips, of Salem, I think) introduced Mr. Dana, who was greeted with derisive shouts, requested to take off his gloves or put them on, I hardly remember which, and he began to speak amid loud cheers for the opposing candidate. He spoke for five minutes—or rather he and the crowd spoke for five minutes—in the following manner:

Mr. Dana: "Fellow-citizens"—

The Crowd: "We ain't yer feller-citizens."

Mr. Dana: "Fellow-citizens of Essex"—

The Crowd: "You ain't from Essex—three cheers for Butler."

Mr. Dana: "I come from"—

The Crowd: "Cambridge—Cambridge."

Mr. Dana: "Well, now, what county is Cambridge in?"

The Crowd: "Middlesex."

Mr. Dana: "And what county is Lowell in?"

The Crowd: "Middlesex."

Mr. Dana: "Very good—I come from the same county from which your present representative comes."

The Crowd: "Three cheers for him."

It was evidently of little use to attempt to make a financial speech, so Mr. Dana contented himself with saying a few words and reading a "telling" letter written by Butler some time in 1867, in which he urged that Grant should not be nominated to the Presidency, because he "had no head and no heart" and was "impotent to govern." The letter, however, produced no effect other than more cheering for Butler, and Mr. Dana good-humoredly sat down to give his audience an opportunity to enjoy the "richness" of the afternoon in General Kilpatrick's oration. Kilpatrick rose and began to address the crowd, reminding them in no very mild language that this was not Texas, but Massachusetts, a State which he had always been taught to respect as the home of free speech, and that if they did not want to hear him they should have stayed away, but as they had come they had better listen to what he had to say; that he had been foully slandered by General Butler, and had challenged him to appear before the meeting that afternoon and prove his charges. Now he wished to know why General Butler was not present.

By this time the audience had forgotten their previous disgust with the "renegade," and had become quite interested in the young cavalry officer and his slandered reputation, and some one of the anti-Butler men plucked up courage enough to cry out "good;" after which the crowd vociferously applauded the orator to the end of his address. To give you even an abstract of his remarks would be impossible. But I can give you at once a very good idea of the general character of them, and of the general character of the questions popularly considered at issue in the last days of the canvass, by one or two specimens. General Kilpatrick said: "General Butler, in his speech at Marblehead, accused me of being an infamous liar, because I reported that on my voyage home from Chili after the Arica earthquake I saw five hundred mummies thrown up on the sand. General Butler says I am an infamous liar, because I said that. Now, I did say so, and I say it again; and what is more, I am going to prove it." He then took up a book by Squier, whom he called the "greatest living authority on the ethnology of South America in the world," and read a statement by the author—the audience listening the while in rapt attention—showing that the story about the mummies, so far from being of necessity an "infamous lie," was perfectly credible.

Continuing his speech, he showed that the charge brought against him by Butler that "he had raided round Richmond but not into Richmond" was a slander, because the reason was not properly given; which reason, indeed, was unlikely to be given by the Marblehead orator, inasmuch as it was this—that arrangements had been made at the time of the expedition referred to according to which Butler was to meet Kilpatrick and support him, so that together they might rescue the Libby prisoners; but that, unfortunately, when Kilpatrick reached the assigned point, General Butler was eighteen miles away; and this explanation was received by the audience, which by this time was grown very magnanimous, with great enthusiasm. The orator then showed that the charge brought against him by his enemy that he was an intemperate man was untrue, because he never drank intoxicating liquid of any kind; and having made a telling hit by a vivid representation of General Butler's "devious eye," and requested the crowd to recollect that the personal controversy to which they were now listening had not been begun by him, who had endeavored to remove all personal considerations from the canvass, but had been driven into a defence of his own character by the unmanly attacks of his malignant foe, he sat down. The chairman then put this question to the crowd: "Has General Kilpatrick refuted the vile slanders uttered by General Butler in his speech at Marblehead?" a question which was answered by an enthusiastic "Aye," after which the meeting adjourned.

"A Progressive Man."

MISS DICKINSON'S NOVEL.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your issue of October 29 appears a criticism of "What Answer?" which I desire to comment upon if you will grant me a column or two for the purpose.

Three considerations of importance seem to me to be overlooked by your critic in his notice of Miss Dickinson and her friends, Mrs. Stowe and Mrs. Child: 1, Every beginner is necessarily to a certain extent an infliction upon the public. He must have practice, and the world must bear with him while he is young in his business. The tailor, the mechanic, the lawyer, the clergyman, the artist, the editor, all do a good deal of imperfect and clumsy work before they become either very successful or very useful; and the orators and book-makers are not exempt from the same law of inexperience. All that we ought to ask in any case is that each shall cultivate himself in all his faculties just as far as he is able while keeping himself and those dependent on him supplied with food and clothing, and that he shall teach by example and precept according to opportunity all the moralities that tend to godliness.

Let us look at the life of this young girl and see wherein she has failed in duty to herself or the public. At fourteen, waking to the realization that her mother was overtaxed in body and spirit by the care of five fatherless children, of whom she was the youngest, she determined to be a burden to her no longer. Accordingly she procured employment as a copyist, and worked at whatever her hand could find to do by day and by night, giving up with an anguish of disappointment at once and for ever her studies at school. She afterward taught district schools in the country, once resolutely refusing a good salary secured to her by a friend until the admirable mistress of a neighboring school, who was paid only one-half what the former male teacher received for the same service, was put upon equal terms with herself. About this time, and while under sixteen, she attended a meeting of Progressive Friends in the City of Philadelphia, and there, under the excitement of the moment, flamed out, to the surprise of herself and every one else, in a little speech in defence of women, who were being sorely handled by a gentleman of the old school. Soon after a Society for the Reformation of Fallen Women, in Philadelphia, persuaded her to speak for them, and a crowded hall in the great city was filled and electrified. Then came more school-keeping for low wages, and months of hard work in the Mint, where wages were better; then loss of place there, because of patriotic utterances distasteful to the ruling powers, and at last an invitation to work among the hills of New Hampshire in the critical campaign of 1863. After weeks of continuous labor there, rewarded by kindness and devotion but by small returns otherwise, Connecticut, being in desperate straits, also sent for the young missionary with fear and trembling—and one motherly woman, of the best that the city held, taking the young girl by the hand, walked alone upon the stage with her before a cold, critical audience in conservative old Hartford. At the close of the speech there was one enthusiastic movement toward the stage of men, women, and children, and such words of welcome and blessing from young and old were showered on that young head as brought it low in humility and gratitude; and for many weary days and nights after, up to the last day of that memorable struggle, some of the severest work of the campaign was entrusted to this girl of nineteen. No one who was present on the Saturday evening preceding the election and heard her speech to the working-men of Hartford, of whom there were supposed to be a thousand present, will ever say that she spoke then of what she did not understand. By the kindness of friends in Hartford and the faith of one of the presidents of your Loyal League in their testimony, she at last was promised Cooper Institute and one hundred dollars for the night, whatever the sale of tickets. This seemed a large sum to one whose labors of love had for so long procured her little but love in return; but though a part of the profits (one-half, I think) were given to the soldiers, she received something over two hundred dollars for this one night's work and was thereby fairly launched upon a remunerative business. Since that day her venerable mother has lived restfully in a home of her own once more, and has been able to entertain there children and friends as in the good old days of her early prosperity.

During all these years Miss Dickinson has been, of course, utterly unable to give herself to close study, such as a mind like hers would naturally crave; and the tendency of such success as hers has been to encourage faults of style, in both speech and writing, peculiar to her temperament, and incidental to youth and inexperience; but if in all these years she has lived a true womanly life, and brought only honor upon her sex in her efforts at self-maintenance, and has battled for the cause of patriotism and womanhood with all the power that God has given her, how ought we to judge her and her works? In what spirit should we criticise them? Hopefully, I should say, in the spirit of hearty praise and encouragement, and of that divine approval, "Well done, good and faithful servant: thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many." Yet the whole drift of your criticism is, "Thou shouldst never have spoken a word, young woman, till thou hadst mastered all things; let us hear no more from thee till thine eyes are turned from the vanity of making a living, and thy lips, in perfected utterance, drop only wisdom for the multitude."

2. A second consideration omitted is this: that the difficulties which beset a woman in earning an ample maintenance, such as young men desire and are encouraged to seek, are left entirely unnoticed, and the rather severe criticisms upon both her speeches and books are such as would hardly be applied to any young man of twenty-six, who had given himself from boyhood to the maintenance of his mother's family and the service of his country in the field. One does not often meet with a perfectly parallel case, I am aware; few young men have ever earned for themselves, under the most favorable circumstances, an income such as she has earned; but it is not difficult to conceive the tenderness with which the early efforts in print of those brave boys would be handled by the wise and good, especially if put forth in behalf of a despised cause.

3. The fact is entirely overlooked or ignored that great good may be accomplished in the world through very imperfect and faulty mediums, and that a great deal of good that is sadly needed must be left undone if such mediums may not be employed. "A novel without a plot, without goodness of style, without interest (that is, interest to the critic), is going to put off the time when we shall all think with clearness," etc.; when, in spite of all its defects (and no one regrets these more keenly, doubtless, than the author), it is the most emphatic protest against the spirit of caste that has appeared in American literature; and those two ladies who, having given the best part of their lives to the cause of freedom, knew well its present needs, and were generously moved to welcome publicly this zealous young ally, are treated with a species of mild contempt such as seems to your critic best adapted to their superficial and inartistic attempts at criticism.

Lest it should seem to your readers that there really has been, according to the apprehension of your critic, a convocation of ladies for the simple purpose of upholding Miss Dickinson in her apparently harmless desire to do a little more good and make a little more money, allow me to state that Mrs. Stowe happened to be at my house just after Miss Dickinson had left it on a certain Monday morning, and being full of a genuine sympathy with the book, which she had read an evening before at one sitting, and much drawn toward the writer, whom she declared herself anxious to meet, "now that she knew her heart," I begged her to write the young lady a word of encouragement, since I knew her to be a good deal solicitous as to the fate of her first venture in print. She accordingly sent her a kind word of greeting from her "grandmother in the good old cause," bidding her be of good cheer and not mind what the papers might say of her book; and then she volunteered for one of our local papers the unoffending little notice which seems to have drawn down upon herself the ire of your critic in a preceding Nation, and to have brought to her young friend a more downright condemnation than might otherwise have been measured out to her. I had the pleasure of enclosing the letter and the printed paragraph to Miss Dickinson, and received in reply a modest little note from which I make an extract, begging pardon of all concerned, for I do assure you, Mr. Editor, that no human being knows that I am about to do this, and I alone am responsible for the breach of confidence: "Dear Mrs. Stowe—how good and kind and generous of her to write that notice—it has done and will do me so much good; with myself as much, if not more, than with other people; it makes me feel more earnest, unselfish, better in every way, to have the approbation of so great and heroic a soul. People say a great many kind things about the book; indeed, I think the judgment of the public is, and will be, a great deal kinder than that of the papers. I am sure—I hope for a great many reasons—that it will be widely read."

And to widen the breach of confidence a little, let me quote, in reply to the assertions that "there is not a character in it;" that "it is not true, as some have affirmed, that there is anything approaching strict adherence to truth in the facts of the story," a following paragraph which reads thus: "S—— did not know at all that I put her into the book, and when she found herself there she said it struck her in such a strange, almost awful fashion, that she had to put it down and lie all night, the book in her hand, but not reading it. She said, 'You have put me, the internal me, into that book so completely that I feel as though I had parted with myself—in some moods as though I had died and come to life again.' Well, God speed it."

I have spoken, Mr. Editor, mainly of Miss Dickinson's book; your critic condemns alike her book and her speeches. Of the latter it is sufficient to say that no public speaker draws larger audiences, or is more in demand in all parts of the country, and not least in our centres of education and intelligence. He alludes also to the factitious aids of brass-bands and glee-clubs as one secret of her success. All such help ceased more than two years ago, with the excitement of the war, and yet her success has continued undiminished to the present time.

I am, respectfully yours, I. B. H.

HARTFORD, November 2, 1868.

[We have discussed elsewhere the principal points raised in this letter. It contests the judgment we have passed on the literary merits of Miss Dickinson's book only on one point—her failure to create any characters. "I. B. H." asserts that the book does contain at least one, and calls as a witness a person who was "put into the book" and recognized herself immediately. To which we reply that such testimony is, in the critical forum, of no value whatever. A very few light, unskilful strokes are always sufficient to remind vividly of himself a person not accustomed to the analysis of his own mental impressions, particularly if he finds them in a book written by a friend. His imagination at once fills up the outline, and he fancies that what were only faint suggestions—of no use to anybody but the original, or his intimates—are a full-length portrait, life size. A "character" in a novel is something very different. It is the presentation to any reader whatever of a distinct and fully drawn personage, whom the imagination can at any time call up without the assistance of a model. If we suppose ourselves having to call some London tapster, who suggested

Sam Weller to Dickens, as a witness that Sam Weller was really a "character," we shall see how useless for purposes of criticism "I. B. H.'s" rule is.—Ed. Nation.]

"YORK, YOU'RE WANTED."

To the Editor of the Nation:

In your issue of October 22, 1868, mention is made of Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations," reviewed in Lippincott's Magazine, and you bring the critic to book—I dare say very justly—for the way in which he has handled the subject. But I was somewhat startled when I came upon the following: "Nor resuscitate dead slang." "'York, you're wanted,' may have been frequently heard in Great Britain about 1832, when the Duke of York became insolvent."

Now, if the Duke of York had ever become "insolvent," it must have been prior to that date, for by that time he had long paid his debts by paying the great debt of nature, dying in 1827. If living in 1832, he would have been king, being the heir presumptive to George IV. after the death of the Princess Charlotte.

The slang expression of "York, you're wanted" never had any reference to the Duke of York; it became familiarized publicly from the musical drama of the "Slave," wherein it is applied to a knowing character, "Matthew Sharpset," a wide-awake Yorkshireman.

THE NUMBER OF THE SPIRITUALISTS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In the Boston Commonwealth of October 7 the following sentence occurs in an article of some length and ability on Spiritualism:

"Do we know that of these thirty millions of thinking inhabitants of our land from three to five millions are Spiritualists?"

Now, what I wish to ask is, Does anybody know this? Indeed, are there any statistics whatever on the subject beyond the vaguest guesses? When it was currently announced two or three years ago that the Spiritualists numbered nearly a million believers, it struck the thoughtful reader as something too marvellous for easy credibility; but now we have it soberly stated by a writer who—though favorable to its beliefs and doctrines—writes about the Spiritualistic movement and its shortcomings with apparent candor, that the number is three times, and perhaps nearly five times, as great. This estimate, at its lowest point, would make the number of Spiritualists larger than the three most important of our Protestant denominations, each of which has its church edifices and visible monuments in almost every township of the land, while there are no outside indications hardly anywhere out of the large towns and villages—in which they hire halls for their progressive lyceums—that such a body as the Spiritualists exists at all.

Does it not seem apparent upon the very face of them that these statistics originate more in enthusiasm than in figures? If they be true, however, then one out of every ten white persons, both North and South, is a Spiritualist.

Hoping the enquiry in this note may be worth the place it will occupy,

I am, yours very truly, Joel Benton.

THE BUTLERITE SECRET.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The honorable energy with which you arrayed yourselves in the interest of true Republicanism against the brummagem article which Mr. Butler has so unfortunately succeeded in foisting upon the voters of Essex County, induces me to address to you a few remarks showing the true motive which, now that the struggle is over, every one may see lay at the lowest foundation of the movement. Since it is no longer worth while to conceal the fact, those who have been in the secret from the beginning are now content to acknowledge that the purpose which General Butler is to serve in Congress is simply that of a watch-dog upon General Grant. It is a painful fact that a clique of extremists in this State, skilled in wire-pulling and fond of office, and through a small success in these branches of petty local politics deriving a certain degree of power for themselves, have been from the beginning very unfriendly to the project of raising General Grant to the Presidency. The Commonwealth, a sheet by no means of the first rank, is the organ of these men. Until swept away by the stream, this paper would fain have stood out against General Grant's nomination. Its final yielding was reluctant and ungracious. A pretty programme of this set is reported to have been spoiled when impeachment failed, and it is whispered that part of this programme was to send Mr. Butler as minister to England—a statement which is so absurd as to sound almost like a joke, but which I am well assured is quite veracious. The editor of the Commonwealth has been an active supporter and canvasser for General Butler in the Fifth District. General Butler himself has apparently feared to trust even his own marvellous audacity and control of expression, if he got upon the dangerous ground of his feelings toward General Grant. He has generally kept aloof from the subject. Once at a late date in the contest he allowed himself to say that if the next administration should seek to interfere with his disposition of the patronage in that (the Fifth) District, this unwary executive would find its hands full for the rest of the term in taking care of Mr. Benjamin F. Butler. Now that the election is over talk is more freely heard among the extreme Butlerites to the effect that General Grant's future is still problematical, that he may be a second Johnson, and that it is utterly essential to the safety of the nation to have General Butler in Congress to watch him! Such, then, is clearly the grand object which the representative himself and those who are really in sympathy with him and really know his sentiments have in view, and have had in view from the beginning. This fact was so carefully concealed while the contest was going on that it was difficult for the opponents of the general to make that use of it which it deserved; it is only now that it begins to be popularly known, when it is too late for the knowledge to have its due effect.

Yours, etc., Anti-Butler.

LITERARY.

We are requested to say that on Friday, the 13th instant, in the rooms of the Chancellor of the New York University, there will be a meeting to discuss the feasibility of organizing and sustaining an American Philological Society. A number of the linguists of this and other cities have promised their attendance, and all others will be welcomed. The hour of assembling is three o'clock in the afternoon. — We have to announce a new magazine for the young folks, to be edited by Captain Mayne Reid, and published by Mr. G. W. Carleton & Co. "The literature of this magazine is intended to be of the highest character known to the pages of a periodical," and this for the reason that the experience of its conductor "tells him it is not necessary to write down to the youth of America." Perhaps experience should tell all authors that it is never necessary to write down to the youth of any nation; we don't recall any very successful instances of book-writing in which the author was not his best self. Onward is to be the title of the magazine—that is, the prospectus says, Onward "along the track of civilization; on towards goodness and glory," etc., etc. It is not a very taking prospectus, we must say; and the work of the artist is hardly more pleasing than that of the writer: a figure which strongly suggests a young woman with stuffed legs escaped from the "White Fawn" or the "Black Crook" stands on the north pole and points off into the heavens at her left to a diminutive eagle, which must have been taken from a nickel cent of the first unfortunate issue.——Prof. J. D. Whitney announces that Messrs. B. Westermann & Co., of this city, have for sale some, and soon will have all, of these works relating to California: Vol. I. of the "Geology" (pp. 525); Vol. I. of the "Palæontology" (pp. 263), which is ready, and Vol. II., of which a part is nearly ready (sect. 1, part 1) and the remainder is in press; the "Ornithology," which will be confined in two profusely illustrated volumes. Indeed, all the books above-mentioned are enriched with plates. Besides these, the following works on kindred subjects, and which may be said to belong to the same set, will be, or already are, in the market: "Mining Statistics, No. 1," containing a tabular statement of the quartz mines and mills which, in 1865, were between the Merced and Stanislaus Rivers; "Geographical Catalogue of the Mollusca west of the Rocky Mountains, between Latitudes 33° and 49° north;" "The Yo Semite Guide-Book;" "The Yo Semite Book" (photographically illustrated, sold by subscription, and now all sold); and finally, "A Map of the Vicinity of San Francisco Bay." These are the publications of "The Geological Survey of California," and they are the work of Professor J. D. Whitney himself, aided efficiently by Messrs. W. M. Gabb, George G. Meek, A. Remond, Doctor J. G. Cooper, Professor S. F. Baird, and others.——Mr. Carleton announces, besides his magazine, "A Life of Mark M. Pomeroy," known as "Brick" Pomeroy. Mrs. M. E. Tucker prepared the book from materials chiefly furnished by Pomeroy himself. The author of "Liffith Lank" and "St. Twelmo," who apparently is not in love with the work of publishing for himself, gets Mr. Carleton to stand sponsor to his new satire, which will be entitled "The Wickedest Woman in New York." "The Arts of Reading, Writing, and Spelling" s another of Carleton's announcements.——Messrs. Roberts Brothers will publish translations of Auerbach's "Edelweiss" and "Dorfgeschicte" —already once translated in this country—and republications of Richardson's "Clarissa" (Mr. Dallas's abridged edition, we presume); of "Tales of School Life," by Mr. Ascott R. Hope, whom readers of his other works will be glad to meet again; of Miss Luyster's translation of "Life and Works of Thorwaldsen;" of Miss M. Betham Edwards's "Kitty;" and of the "Tallants of Barton."——Sheldon & Co. announce "The Child Wife: a Story of Two Spheres," by Captain Mayne Reid, and "Gleaning among the Sheaves," which we take to be sermons, by Mr. Spurgeon.——Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son will publish "Blindpits," a novel by a new author, and "Astronomy without Mathematics," by Mr. E. B. Davison.

—A Baltimore correspondent brings two complaints against these "Literary Notes." The first is that we frequently speak of works "sold only by subscription," or "to be had only of the agents," without further particulars. The subscription paper, he says, never comes along, the agent never makes his appearance. As to this, we can only reply that in general we design to give all the information that we possess, and we think our correspondent will find that in the cases alluded to mention is almost always made of the publishing firm, to whom a letter of enquiry might be addressed by the person interested. But the second complaint is that we do not tell where books published in Europe—as, for instance, at Gotha—are procurable on this side the water. This omission has weight, to be sure, with country readers, and all such we may as well inform here that foreign works noticed in the Nation, or in any other periodical, can be obtained either directly or mediately of any importing bookseller; thus, to name those of this city alone, of Scribner, Welford & Co. (English publications especially); or of F. W. Christern (French especially), L. W. Schmidt, B. Westermann & Co., and E. Steiger (German especially). And any local bookseller would undertake to procure, through these or kindred houses in other cities, the remotest publication in any country of the world. In further answer to our St. Louis correspondent of last week, it may be well to call his attention to these works of bibliographical reference: For absolutely complete lists not only of French books and pamphlets, but of maps, engravings, and music, he may go to the Bibliographie de la France, published weekly at 20 francs per annum, and containing over 11,000 titles each year. It is based on information furnished directly by the Minister of the Interior. A similar list of Italian books, entitled Bibliografia d'Italia, is published at Florence; price 5 francs per annum. This periodical is now in its second year. The Germans think their Allgemeine Bibliographie für Deutschland (1 thaler 2 groschen per annum) is in some respects superior to the French Bibliographie. It appears every week at Leipzig, is republished in a classified form every three months, and again in one alphabet of authors, with a classed index, every six months. These can all be obtained through any of the foreign booksellers in this city. As it is going beyond our correspondent's question, we will merely mention here the Nederlandsche Bibliographie, the Svensk Bibliographi, the Dansk Bogfortegnelse, and the Boletin Bibliográfico Español.

—A very good specimen of the educated pioneer of fifty years ago was Judge James Hall, who recently died in Cincinnati at the age of seventy-three years. Born in Philadelphia, in 1795, Hall received a common-school education, or rather a part of one, for he was not slow in conceiving a disgust at the routine school teaching of those days; but the defects of his early instruction he made up for by a wide course of desultory reading, by pretty steady writing for various periodicals, by a study of the law and of the military profession, and by the acquisition of the Latin and French languages. At the age of nineteen he entered the volunteer service, and took part in the first campaign of the war of 1812. Afterwards he served under Scott, Brown, and Ripley, as a lieutenant in a battery of regular artillery, and distinguished himself so much as to be designated one of the five artillery officers to accompany Decatur to Algiers. He was twenty-five when, having been admitted to the bar, he resigned his commission, and two years afterwards, in 1820, he wandered down the Ohio, which then flowed through a country almost a wilderness, and settled in Shawneetown, Illinois. The inevitable newspaper divided with the law the young counsellor's attention, but before he had been in his new home a year he was made circuit attorney and became an efficient prosecutor of the horse-thieves and regulators which infested his nine counties as well as the West and Southwest generally. For four years he carried his library in his saddle-bags, forded rivers, traversed bridle paths for hundreds of miles, slept where he could, fed on Indian meal and pork, and under all sorts of difficulties did what he could to bring criminals to justice. That all his difficulties were not outside of the court-rooms will be readily inferred by readers of this sentence of death passed upon a notorious villain by a popular judge, who desired to maintain and extend his popularity, and was willing to conciliate the freebooters as well as the other classes of his acquaintance: "Mr. Green, you have just been found guilty. Will you have the kindness to stand up, Mr. Green? I really would not trouble you, Mr. Green, but such is the established custom of the court. As I was saying, Mr. Green, you have just been found guilty by the jury, Mr. Green, of—of—I believe you called it murder, Mr. Foreman of the jury; yes—murder. You will please take notice, Mr. Green, that it is the jury who find you guilty; not I, Mr. Green. I express no opinion on the subject, but I am compelled by the law—it 's a mere formality so far as I am concerned, Mr. Green—to sentence you to be hung by the neck till you are dead—dead. At what time would it be agreeable to you to be hung, Mr. Green?" Making due allowance for the latitude of after-dinner discourse, we have little doubt that Mr. Hall, when he told the story of this solemn sentence, departed not at all from the truth of the facts. Only a caricaturist, as we Eastern people count caricaturists, could have done justice to the state of society in our Western country half a century since. Immediately after his four years of practice as circuit attorney, Mr. Hall was elevated to the bench, and made a very good judge for the place and times, though his decisions have no very authoritative weight, we dare say, in the courts of to-day. In 1833, Judge Hall took up his abode in Cincinnati, in which city he resided until the day of his death, editing a magazine which his countrymen, in mercy to him and themselves, have forgotten, writing for the newspapers, and acting as president of a bank. He was all his life more or less interested in literary labor, and he produced one work which the quarterly reviewers of the day abused bitterly, and one he produced which even now is worth some attention. The "Letters from the West" which the English critics fell foul of was a youthful production which was put on the English market, without its author's consent or knowledge, by an injudicious friend of Mr. Hall's, a good many years after he had ceased to be a youth, and, of course, furnished a text from which were preached a good many truly British sermons, which had for their burden the general baseness of Yankee judges, who, it was said, evidently did nothing but attend barbecues and horse-races and dances—the fact of the matter being that the writer, when his letters were written, was a young man seeking the fortune which when they were published he had found and for some eminently respectable years enjoyed. Those, however, were the days when nobody read an American qook except an ignorant and malignant, or at best an ignorant, quarterly or monthly reviewer. The more valuable of Judge Hall's two principal works is a "History and Biography of the North American Indians" in three folio volumes, illustrated by more than a hundred portraits of celebrated Indians and filled with information derived from traders and settlers. It was always an expensive, and is now a rare, book, found in public libraries and hardly anywhere else. Mr. Hall's life was a very busy one, and the immense mass of materials for a pioneer history which he must have had in his head has never been adequately presented to the public. This is a pity, for the pioneer days are hopelessly over. Besides an infinitude of newspaper and magazine writings—among which is a manly and courageous defence of the Catholics against an attack on them by Dr. Lyman Beecher—Judge Hall published in the course of his life these among other books: a "Life of Harrison;" "Border Tales;" "Harpe's Head: a Legend of Kentucky;" "The West, its Commerce and Navigation;" "Tales of the Wigwam and the War-Path;" "Sketches of the West;" "The West, its Soil, Surface, and Productions;" "Legends of the West." Nobody who would understand how the people of the great Valley became what they are should neglect Judge Hall. Our facts in regard to his life we owe to a memoir of him prepared for the Cincinnati Commercial by "J. F. M.," who, it is no harm to say, is Colonel Meline.

—We do not know if it is Postmaster-General Randall who is responsible for the infliction upon us of the new set of postage stamps; if it is not, we wish that he in the exercise of his authority would do something to secure a tolerable set of designs. What we have at present are not good; indeed, the present two-cent stamp, with the head of Jackson, is to be called villanous, but what we are going to have will be execrable. On the three-cent stamp there is to be "a finely engraved locomotive. This is surrounded by lines of lightning, indicating the speed with which the letters are carried on which this stamp is used." The five-cent stamp is to have a portrait of Washington, which, by right, ought, we should say, to be kept on the stamps most frequently used, and we can see no good reason for making any change. The ten-cent stamp is to have "an excellent microscopical copy of the painting of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, bringing in the Rotunda at Washington." The copy may be good; but the more excellent is the copy of a picture that is detestable, the worse for the people before whose eyes it is constantly set. Again, on the thirty-cent stamp, which, fortunately, is little used, there is to be a copy of another strenuous effort of bad art, "The Surrender of Burgoyne," which hangs in the Capitol. The twelve-cent stamp has a picture of a steamer at sea; and inasmuch as the letters costing two cents for postage are generally sent by a carrier, the stamp for them has a figure of a post-boy at full speed. We suggest a picture of a Brooklyn ferry-boat blocked in the ice, "indicating the speed with which the letters are carried on which this stamp is used." Not many people will say that it is the business of governments to teach art, but nobody will say that it is the business of governments to give false teaching of any kind, and it is decidedly to be regretted that all the hundreds of thousands of people who are going to see these stamps every day are going to get more or less accustomed to deformity, when it would have been nearly as easy to set beautiful conceptions and forms before them.

—A year and a half ago, says the Advertiser, a Boston physician, Dr. S. A. Green, saw exposed for sale at a stall in Paris on one of the quays—which are the Parisian Nassau Street, the mart for second-hand books—a manuscript written in French. Turning over the leaves he discovered references to events in our American Revolution, and for that reason, to say nothing of his general interest in historical study and research, he purchased the work without knowing exactly what it was. It proved to be an interesting autograph military journal of Count William de Deux-Ponts, who served in this country as a colonel under Rochambeau, and was actively engaged in the campaign which resulted in the surrender of Cornwallis to the united forces of Washington and our French allies. Dr. Green has printed "Mes Campagnes d'Amérique" and the author's notes, without the slightest change. He has appended a translation which is described as being excellent both as a translation and as a piece of English, and has prefixed an introduction containing all that he could learn concerning the count—who, by the way, is usually confounded with his elder brother, Count Christian—and concerning the regiment which he commanded with so much gallantry. The book is an interesting contribution to the mass, which yearly grows larger, of materials for American history.

—Besides the many public and private reasons which excite regret for the death of the late Mr. Octavius Pickering, in Boston, on the 29th of October, there is the special one that it leaves unfinished a valuable work, well begun—the life of his father, Timothy Pickering, of which the first volume was published by Little, Brown & Co. about a year ago. The succeeding volumes were to embrace the post-Revolutionary career of this interesting character, and promised to be of rather higher historical and political value than the first. Mr. Pickering was undoubtedly engaged in preparing them at the time of his death, and it is to be hoped that he had accomplished enough to make it practicable for another—perhaps his own son—to complete his undertaking, and thus still further enrich a department of our literature which is distinctively and honorably American.

—At the February meeting of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences a paper was read by Mr. Lewis H. Morgan, of Rochester, upon "The Origin of the Classificatory System of Relationship." As the entire work, of which this appears to be a summary, is to be published by the Smithsonian Institute, it will be sufficient to call attention to the most prominent points of the discussion. As a contribution to what has been termed "Comparative Jurisprudence" Mr. Morgan's researches have the greatest value, and by strong presumption, if not actual proof, carry the historical enquiry at least one step further back than the firm ground upon which Maine's treatise rests. Mr. Morgan does not give us any new facts with regard to the Indo-European, or Aryan, family; but he evidently believes that this family passed at one time through the remarkable social stages which he describes in the Malay, Turanian, and Ganowanian (North American Indian) families. The Malay system, as represented in the Hawaiian language, he considers an earlier stage than the others, by reason of its greater simplicity, not always good evidence in discussions of this nature, but very probable here. The peculiarity of all these is that the classification of kinship is by generations; nephews and nieces are not distinguished from children; uncles and aunts from parents, and so on. This usage prevails in its entirety among the Malay tribes; its origin is explained by one Hawaiian custom quoted from Judge Lorin Andrews: "The relationship of 'pinalna' is rather amphibious. It arose from the fact that two or more brothers, with their wives, and two or more sisters, with their husbands, were inclined to possess each other in common." Of course in this state of society no distinction was possible between sons and nephews. But in what Mr. Morgan considers the later stage of development found among the North American Indians, this principle holds only half-way; brother's children rank as one's own, while sister's children are called nephews and nieces. This appears to mark the commencement of the tribal development, in which all the descendants of a common ancestor—usually in the male line, but sometimes also in the female—rank as one whole; the children of daughters or sons, as the case may be, belonging to the tribe of the other parent. It is a remarkable fact that this North American system exists with very slight modification in Southern India, and, indeed, with further modifications among other Asiatic peoples. Of course, the importance of these facts lies in the inferences drawn from them as to the growth of the family idea in the human race. In the Indo-European race, as Mr. Maine has shown, the family is the primitive institution, so far as has yet been traced; and perhaps it will never be found possible to supply the missing link between the Turanian family system and the Indo-European, any more than between the languages. But Mr. Morgan enumerates the various stages through which he thinks it probable that the human race naturally passed, beginning with promiscuous intercourse, and ending at last in the modern family. Whether all his conclusions are to be accepted or not, he has certainly led the way in a most interesting and fruitful investigation, which he has the merit of conducting in a thoroughly scientific method. It should be remarked that, besides his personal observations among the Indians, he has been aided by the most zealous co-operation of the Department of State, the Smithsonian Institute, and the various missionary boards; and that his tabulated schedules will cover four hundred and fifty pages of the Smithsonian contributions.

—The many persons for whom geographical explorations have a charm, and who do not subscribe to "L'Année Géographique," would be interested to read the survey of the lustrum 1863–68 in the address of Dr. Adolph Bastian, delivered last April on occasion of the fortieth anniversary of the Berlin Geographical Society. This address has been published in pamphlet form—not translated, so far as we know—and is a monument not only of the author's comprehensive knowledge and masterly power of condensation, but of his lively sense of the services which geography renders to human brotherhood, to comparative science, to commerce, emigration, and international industry. Scarcely a name that has distinguished itself in the past five years in any quarter of the globe is omitted in this retrospect, while especial honor is paid to those explorers who have perished in the pursuit of their disinterested aims. The address opens with a just tribute to the memory of Carl Ritter for his acute and original apprehension of the importance of geographical studies, and then follows the roll-call of those who, in the period mentioned, have sought to extend our acquaintance with the earth's surface and inhabitants. Mr. E. G. Squier is the only American whom we have observed on this list, reference being made to his investigation of Peruvian antiquities, with the announcement of his forthcoming work ("ein grosses Werk")—of which several papers were recently published in Harper's. Dr. Bastian takes a very deep interest in the human side of geographical discovery, and he gives some significant aperçus of the extent to which the Chinese are spreading over the islands of Polynesia, supplanting the savage aborigines, and establishing themselves, or allowing themselves to be established, in Australia, Peru, Cuba, and California. A considerable work of Dr. Bastian's, which is, however, merely preliminary to one still larger, entitled "Das Beständige in den Menschenrassen" (The Constant Element among the Races of Mankind), from the press of Dietrich Reimer, at Berlin, has just reached this country, and we hope in due time to give our readers some notion of its contents.

—Another contribution to geographical knowledge is to be found in Dr. Petermann's supplement to his "Geographische Mittheilungen," relating to the Trans-Vaal Republic. In the north of that country, of which we have our latest accounts in the travels of Chapman, a German, Karl Mauch, has recently discovered rich gold deposits; and the interest thus awakened in South Africa and the country of the Boers—an interest which may have the most important and far-reaching results for all that region—has induced Dr. Petermann to publish a description of the Trans-Vaal by Friedrich Jeppe, its postmaster-general; together with not very encouraging extracts from Dr. Wangemann's book of travels. The latter is director of the Berlin Mission, and in 1866–67 visited the remains of the colonies founded in British Caffraria by the survivors of the German Legion in the Crimean War. He found there "Berlin" and "Potsdam" and "Charlottenburg" in most beautiful locations, but in a deplorable state of decay, and spiritually as destitute as their neighbors the Boers. The latter are, of course, touched off somewhat rosily by Jeppe, and would seem to be not so badly in want of religious and secular education as Chapman has painted them, himself friendly to the people. Of the climate and natural productions of the country Jeppe speaks by the card, and enumerates a long list of abundant minerals worth the working. The population of the Republic is put down at 25,000 to 30,000 whites, and about 250,000 natives, the whites being mostly born on the soil, of German, French, and especially Dutch emigrants, the founders of the state. Their simple government is described in detail: a constitution of 269 articles, supplemented where defective by Dutch-Roman law; an executive council of five members, of whom only one bears the title "Member of the Executive Council," the rest being officers of state. The present President is Marthinus Wessel Pretorius, whose name points to a German origin, and is, in fact, borne by the editor of the St. Louis Westliche Post. The map which accompanies the supplement is by far the most complete and accurate of any heretofore published, and we owe it to the combined labors of Mauch, Jeppe, and Merensky.

—Renan, in the preface to his "Questions contemporaines," declares it was not primary (or popular) education that triumphed at Sadowa, but the university, rather. "The University makes the School;" the higher culture gives strength to the lower; and Austria was defeated "by German science, virtue, Protestantism, and philosophy—by Luther, Kant, Fichte, and Hegel." Since he goes on to contrast France and Germany in respect of their universities, there is for the former an unpleasant inference to be drawn, which is not diminished when one compares the intelligence of the French and North German armies. In the Prussian military and naval service there were enlisted during the fiscal year 1867–68, 88,607 men, of whom 3,295, or 3·72 per cent., had had no education (ohne Schulbildung waren). The states and provinces which contributed this total showed percentages of ignorance ranging from 14·72 (Posen) to 0·17 per cent. (Nassau and Frankfort). The Prussians proper had 1,427 uneducated men out of a contingent of 11,365 (12·56 per cent.) Now, in 1857–61, of the conscripts from Brittany and Central France, and from several departments of the South, 66 per cent. were so illiterate that they could neither read nor write. They represented in all twenty-five departments, and were properly marked "black" on Manier's Carte éducationelle de la France. The "white" were four in number, viz., Doubs, Bas-Rhin, Meuse, Haute-Marne; but 5 per cent. of their conscripts being wholly illiterate. We have before us the "Record of the Service of the Fifty-fifth Regiment (colored) of Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry," printed privately in Boston last July. The regiment consisted of men drawn from all parts of the country; more than one-half were pure blacks, three-eighths were natives of the slave States, and two-eighths had been slaves. Yet there were but 51 per cent. that could neither read nor write, and only 67 per cent. that could not write; figures which make the negroes a shade lighter than the "blacks" of Brittany. We may note further that one of the men is stated to have been born in Africa, and is classed in another list as a "student." He is, we believe, the one of whose learning such accounts reached the North as to make it proper to style him a "pundit."

—A work bearing on this subject of popular education in Europe is named in Mr. L. W. Schmidt's catalogue for October: "Die Fortschritte des Unterrichtswesens in den Culturstaaten Europas," by A. Beer and Fr. Hochegger (Vienna). The second volume has just been issued, and relates to Russia, Belgium, and Switzerland. Other works that may be noticed in the same catalogue are: Proost's "Recherches sur la législation des jugements de Dieu," referring chiefly to Belgium, but incidentally to the principal countries of Europe (Brussels), which might be bound up with Mr. H. C. Lea's "Superstition and Force;" and these two medical works, of which the need of the first, in France, may be presumed from the fact of its appearance a century after Rousseau exhausted the subject, while the value of the second is not problematical: (1) "De l'allaitement maternel étudié aux points de vue de la mère, de l'enfant, et de la société. Conseils aux pères et aux mères de famille," by M. Brochard (Paris); (2) "Le rôle des mères dans les maladies des enfants, ou ce qu'elles doivent savoir pour seconder le médecin," by J. B. Fonssagrives (Paris). "Die Alterthümer unserer heidnischen Vorzeit" (The Antiquities of our Heathen Past) may possibly throw some light on the lays of Roland, so ably discussed at Bremen by Dr. Hugo Meyer. There are thirteen lithographic plates of objects in public and private museums. "Four Letters on Mexico," by the Abbé Brasseur, are published in Paris, and treat of the Mexican hieroglyphics, the close of the age of stone, the temporary glacial epoch, etc., etc., after ancient Mexican documents.

—We desire to call attention to the fact that Germany has once more produced a book "destined to create an entirely new era in the science of antiquities, more especially with regard to the Mosaic books and the Bible"—whatever the last six words may mean. This time the subverter, though he issues his book in Germany—in Erlangen—is by birth an American, namely, Mr. George Brown. Does any one know him? Though he is deceased, we believe, and is now not to be known. Worth knowing he certainly would have been, by some people at all events—for example, by the man or woman puzzled to know "why it is that neither America nor Oceania are once mentioned in the Scriptures." Such person's mind Mr. Brown would at once have cleared up; and his book, we should suppose, can be recommended for the same purpose. Mr. Brown saw clearly that it was precisely in Oceano-America that every scene and event of Biblical history is laid. From ignorance of this fact rise most of the difficulties of Biblical critics. We copy from the Pall Mall Gazette the headings of some of the chapters of this dangerous volume, and advise our readers to shun it: "The Bible among the American Aborigines; The Paradise in the South Sea; Eve in America and Oceania; Noah in Cuba; Nimrod and his Empire in America; Sodom and Gomorrha in America; Abraham's War and the American, chiefly the West Indian, Circumstances of the Period; The Idea of the Trinity in the Americo-Hebrew Antiquity, as found in the History of Abraham; Moria, the Places of Worship of Americo-Hebrew Antiquity; Jacob and his Sons in America and India; Esau; Edom in the Brazils; Reuben in America; The Egyptian 'Narrow Sea' in Isaiah, or the Behring Straits; Egyptian names explained from the Indian with relation to America; The Stations of the Israelites; Jews and Spartans; Ireland and Wales in America; Gog and Magog in America; Biblical Oceania."

MR. PARTON'S SMOKING AND DRINKING.*

"THAT was the time when bread was an article of diet, and the devil had not invented hot biscuit." A writer who says things so sharply cut and recollectable as this saying is, is sure of readers, and Mr. Parton says such things pretty often. And whenever he says them, he is talking on some topic of current popular interest; in fact, he never talks on any other—except, to be sure, in his "Humorous Poetry of the English Language." Clear and incisive, addressing the average man as average men, if they could, would address "self and friends," or "our noble selves," he has been admirably successful as a writer. Yet, his success has its drawbacks too. Take, for example, the successful sentence we have just been reading—it is as good as almost any other sentence of his for the purpose of showing what our author is. It asserts the badness of "hot biscuit," and truly hot biscuits are probably not good. Also, it contains, implicitly, the rather sweeping assertion that honest wholesome bread is an article of diet which now is hardly to be found. The author being an American, and engaged at this moment in talking about American things, we are to understand him as saying that America is almost or entirely given over to the reign of unwholesome hot bread. Unfortunately, however, facts are decidedly in the way of any social philosopher who seeks to reach such a conclusion as that. In other words, it is not wholly true, nor nearly true, that to-day more "hot biscuit" than good bread is eaten in our beloved country; and a statement such as Mr. Parton lets himself make could only be made by a somewhat hasty, somewhat self-confident generalizer, who is in the habit of thinking more about his writing than about what he says.

"Smoking and Drinking," then, although we are rather in sympathy with the author's intentions, we have read without getting too much pleasure from it. For reasons just now hinted at, we were unable in perusing it to feel any strong confidence that our instructor knew quite enough of what he was talking about, and we confess to having had a fear that, whether he knew much or little, he would still talk on with equal courage. So far as an intelligent unscientific training enables one to judge of him at the times when matters pertaining to science are his theme, we should say that one distrusts the truth of almost every word he says, and wishes that he had said less and had said it in a less downright manner. There is, of course, the spiritual and artistic dissatisfaction besides; and also the dissatisfaction that is felt when a disputant whose ability to appreciate the value of evidence is not quite clear offers for consideration his substitutes for arguments and proofs.

Mr. Parton may not improperly be described as a highly magnified newspaper reporter. He has, in a greater degree than most of its members, all the good qualities of that respectable confraternity. His industry is exemplary; he knows with what seems an instinctive knowledge what the ordinary reader is momentarily interested in; he fastens on facts with an avidity which is not surpassed by any Washington servant of the telegraph; apparently, he spares no labor in collecting his materials; he is thoroughly at one, in feeling and opinion, with the public for whom he writes; his phraseology is, if not strictly classical, vigorous and taking; he is not the slave of qualifications and limitations; on the contrary, he puts forth without any fear whatever he conceives to be true; he is not only more industrious and intelligent, but he is better informed than his audience. But it is true, too, that some of the not altogether admirable qualities of the newspaper reporter are also his. Apparently it seldom occurs to him to think that possibly there may be, outside of his experience, beyond the bounds of his study, but within the lines of other men's experience and thought, truths which might, if he knew them and had carefully pondered them, modify half his opinions and keep him, even as a magazine writer, judiciously silent concerning many things. More than this even; it seems as if it had not occurred to him that a popular belief in the veritableness of particular facts very often says nothing, or not much, for their real veritableness.

We shall not be telling news to any of our readers when we say that the three articles before us—"Does it Pay to Smoke?" "Will the Coming Man drink Wine?" and "Inebriate Asylums"—belong in the front rank of things readable for once. They are almost totally without imagination, indeed, as all their author's works are, as even the best of them is—his book of brief biographies, namely; but they substitute for this quality a presentation in so vivid phrase of such facts as the writer wants to use, that while one is in the act of reading for the first time, he hardly perceives that he is assisting at a mere skilful manipulation of facts. We speak more particularly of this defect because it is a fruitful source of evils to Mr. Parton, as a worker in literature and as a thinker. It gives him his faculty of seizing separate views and theories with a firm grasp, and not seeing that they make only bits of the truth; it is the cause, we suppose, of that curiously contented contempt of others with which he seems to hold the opinion that what he does not know at the moment is not worth knowing; it is, therefore, at the bottom of his round assertions on all manner of subjects, from religions down to the complexions of the four thousand Bremen tobacconists. But, readable as they are, these articles are, as we have suggested, readable only for once. Dealing, as they do, with matters of opinion, and laying down, as they do, with little or no qualification, the notions on disputed matters of an unimaginative man, incapable not only of weighing and measuring and making allowances, but even incapable of stating such facts as shall not mislead—or of stating any facts in a manner not misleading—they are, on the whole, scientifically, artistically, and morally, pretty often unprofitable reading.

LIFE IN THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.*

The second, which was also the original, title of this work, "Civilization and Barbarism," expresses the motive of the author as the catch title by no means does. Señor Sarmiento proposed to himself to explain why the Argentine Republic had, up to the time of his writing (nearly twenty-five years ago), failed to become free, united, homogeneous, powerful, progressive; to maintain and develop in the New World the highest achievements of the Old. To do this it was necessary to describe the geographical position of the country, its physical features, its population and customs; and the picturesque manner in which the author has accomplished this portion of his task cannot be too highly praised, while at the same time it is subordinate to his main object, that of bringing into relief the "irrepressible conflict" between the pampas and the cities, the gauchos and the citizens. Nor is Mr. Seward's famous phrase inapplicable to the dissensions on the La Plata. We have been struck, in reading these pages, with nothing more than with the close resemblance of the gauchos, as a class, to Southern slaveholders as a class. The latter, to be sure, were purely agricultural, the former cattle-raisers only—yet almost equally scattered, equally idle and averse to profitable exertion, equally lawless.

"Imagine an expanse of two thousand square leagues, inhabited throughout, but where the dwellings are usually four, or even eight, leagues apart, and two leagues, at least, separate the nearest neighbors. The production of movable property is not impossible, the enjoyments of luxury are not wholly incompatible with this isolation; wealth can raise a superb edifice in the desert. But the incentive is wanting; no example is near; the inducements for making a great display, which exist in a city, are not known in that isolation and solitude. Inevitable privations justify natural indolence; a dearth of all the amenities of life induces all the externals of barbarism. Society has altogether disappeared. There is but the isolated, self-concentrated, feudal family."

This is not, of course, an exact picture of the South, yet it corresponds very nearly with Mrs. Stowe's account of Legree's plantation, with what Mrs. Kemble has told in her Georgia Diary, and with what we do not need to be told about Southern society. Let us pass to other common features. Sarmiento wrote at a time when Rosas, having, with the aid of the gaucho element, subdued the cities, ruled them with the most atrocious and humiliating despotism.

"He knew how to use words and forms which satisfy the indifferent, such as—the savages; the bloodthirsty creatures; perfidious, wretched Unitarios; the perfidious minister of Brazil; the dirty money of France; the iniquitous claims of England—words thus sufficing to cover the longest and most frightful series of crimes that the nineteenth century has witnessed."

Of the subserviency of the North to the South while slavery ruled the nation, we need not speak; the very memory is shameful. But the perversion of language which attended that demoralizing sway, and still lingers in the mouths of the Democracy, was not different from that induced by Rosas. Do we not seem to hear, for the words italicized, these phrases: the incendiaries, the fanatics, the cut-throat Abolitionists; British gold; the d—d black disunion Republicans!—words that sufficed to conceal the iniquity of human bondage and to cloak the purposes of conspirators against the Union? And, not to follow the parallel further, may we not, mutatis mutandis, apply this statement to the attitude of South and North before and since the war?—

"Two distinct forms of civilization meet upon a common ground in the Argentine Republic; one, still in its infancy, which, ignorant of that so far above it, goes on repeating the crude efforts of the Middle Ages; the other disregarding what lies at its feet, while it strives to realize in itself the latest results of European civilization: the nineteenth and twelfth centuries dwell together."

All of the author's own part in this volume is admirable reading; a more able pen never shed clearness and interest on the tangled history of South American politics. A few broad and charming touches, to make us familiar with the soil and its inhabitants, precede a study of Facundo Quiroga and the brothers Aldao—upland slopes to the pestilent volcano, Rosas—which leaves them vividly impressed upon the imagination as real characters, and yet suggests an artistic reserve in the painter, who cannot forget that he is coloring his enemies. This restraint, partly philosophical, partly magnanimous, is everywhere visible in Sarmiento's narrative. In revising his work he has pointed out, with the utmost candor—citing the severe criticism of another—passages in which imperfect knowledge and partisan heat made him do injustice to one portion of the Republic. On the other hand, in describing men whose laurels might have cost him his sleep, he is an unselfish witness to their merits. And fortunately the page which is stained with the record of the tyrants already named lights up with the mention of Rivadavia, Barcala, and Paz—counter-actors upon the checkered scene.

The translator leaves little to be desired in the performance of her special work. Her appendix, however, and preface are ill digested and unmethodical, though we cannot but thank her for all the information she has collected concerning the now President Sarmiento, and the extracts from his autobiography. His many-sided character, broad sympathies, and cultivated intellect not only elicit our deepest respect, but, in connection with those of his compatriots, fill us with encouragement as to the future of his country. After a thousand services in prison, in exile, in office at home and abroad, he now returns to receive a more spontaneous and unanimous suffrage than has fallen to most statesmen from any people. At the head of affairs we may be sure that his interest in popular education, as the basis of free government, will not abate, while we may hope that his present authority will last till the Republic is irrevocably established in ways of peace, order, and progress, according to the spirit of the age.

The Magic Spectacles. By Chauncey Giles. Illustrated by Chapman. (New York: Joseph R. Putnam. 1868.)—This is one of those utilitarian fairy tales with a moral and a plain interpretation, which he who runs may read, which are written by people without imagination for children who, having never known the dear delights of the Arabian tales, nor made the acquaintance of such pleasantly unmoral and unscientific fairies as Rumpelstiltskin, say, fancy they are being amused when they are only being insidiously instructed and preached to in the basest manner. It is rather a shame to practise in this way on the innocence of childhood, and it makes people who remember the pleasure they took in fairies, who cast no reflections on naughty boys, and would have scorned to inveigle them into long division or a comprehension of the nominative absolute, look with sincere pity on their own children, for whom so much improving reading is provided. The didactic fairy tale is a sorrowful failure as far as entertainment, which we take to be the legitimate business of fairy tales, is concerned. It might, however, be interesting to authors who have taken up this line of literature to consider some of the remoter consequences of their work. When children look up from a story like this of Mr. Giles's, and say, "Oh! but there are no fairies, you know—he means your brains," the little rationalists have hit on a method of interpretation which may some time lead them into thorny places. It is never safe to weight ethics with supernaturalism—to join fact and fancy in an unnatural union, even for children. The faith which accepts Bluebeard without scruple, and receives Aladdin's lamp as the most natural thing in the world, recoils and becomes scepticism in the presence of a magician who rebukes one's easily besetting sins and talks like a schoolmaster.

* "Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants; or, Civilization and Barbarism. From the Spanish of Domingo F. Sarmiento, LL.D., Minister Plenipotentiary from the Argentine Republic to the United States. With a biographical sketch of the author, by Mrs. Horace Mann." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1868. Pp. xxxv., 400.

The Unconscious Truth of the Four Gospels. By W. H. Furness. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—There is something almost touching in the persistency with which Dr. Furness returns to his favorite theme: The naturalness of the life and acts and character of Jesus. The present volume is the sixth which he has devoted to this subject. As its title approximates to that of the first, perhaps this is the last. The first was published thirty-two years ago, under the title "Remarks on the Four Gospels." Then came "Jesus and His Biographers," which, all things considered, will probably be regarded as the best expression of his thought. This was followed by "The History of Jesus," and this by "Thoughts on Jesus of Nazareth." Still later came "The Veil Partly Lifted," and now another volume is before us. The later volumes have been in the main called forth by a desire to reconcile his main idea with the results of recent criticism. The present volume does not seem to us to add enough to the force of his argument to justify its publication. Dr. Furness's conception of Jesus is unique, and it is beautiful, whether it can be established or not. His method is more akin to that of the German rationalist, Paulus, than to any other, but is more delicate and tender. A wonderful refinement characterizes it throughout. His confidence in the internal evidences to the truth of the Gospels is perfectly intense. He returns to it again and again. But if the credibility of the Gospels is to be established beyond cavil, it must be on less subjective testimony.

About Women, Love, and Marriage. By F. Saunders, author of "Salad for the Solitary," "Salad for the Social," "Mosaics," "Festival of Song," etc. (New York: G. W. Carleton & Co. 1868.)—The best we can say of Mr. Saunders's new literary venture is, that it violates few of the rules of syntax, and never counsels infractions of the rules of morality. But, considering how largely the book is made up of quotations, its unvarying triviality becomes rather remarkable. A quotation in Mr. Saunders's hands, drawn from what source soever, loses all its value—is at once "hidden under a bushel." To adopt one of his own most engaging pleasantries, we "file a bill of impeachment against him in the high court of" literature, "requiring him to show cause why sentence should not be pronounced against him" for committing high crimes and misdemeanors of which inanities like these are fair examples:

"Love has been compared to debt; it keeps its victim awake at night, or disturbs his repose with nocturnal visions; and, during day, haunts him with perpetual phantoms. Love has been appropriately named the tender passion, from its softening effects on the brain; some authorities, however, suppose it is so designated because its influence is derived from the softer sex. The disease is highly infectious—it attacks all classes alike, old and young, the poor as well as the wealthy; for Cupid is ever on the alert, seeking whom he may ensnare."

"The young are always enthusiastic on the subject, and entertain the most exalted ideas of the estate connubial. You may suggest to them that there are thorns as well as roses growing upon its banks and borders, and that its skies are not always bright, but your suggestions will be little heeded, for marriage is their bright ideal, their goal."

The Amazon. By Franz Dingelstedt. Translated from the German by J. M. Hart. (New York: G. P. Putnam & Son. 1868.)—One of his German critics says that Franz Dingelstedt is "not merely a poet by nature, but he is also a brilliant fellow." As to the validity of his claims to the poetical nature we have no means of judging, the "Amazon" offering no evidence that he possesses any. It deals in a clever but superficial way with certain phases of German society, with artistic and theatrical life principally—Dingelstedt being the director of the Court Theatre at Vienna, and writing in a style very suggestive of his thorough adaptation to his profession. As to his brilliancy, if the reader good-naturedly chooses he may concede it, but we fancy nobody finds it very dazzling. Certainly his brilliance is not that of the diamond; it resembles more that of those Japanese fireworks which, when one carefully extinguishes all the surrounding lights, coruscates, if one is fortunate, for half a minute and sputters out into darkness. It lies in his expression, not in his thought; for which reason we fail to see the resemblance to Heine which another of his critics has discovered. The "Amazon" does not compel perusal, but is clever enough to repay it if the reader likes to look at life under the glare of the footlights, and has plenty of otherwise unoccupied time on his hands.

The Week.

GENERAL GRANT may be fairly said to have entered on the duties of his office, although he has not yet been sworn in. The interval between election and inauguration has usually been passed by Presidents elect, since Jackson's time, in arranging the distribution of offices, and satisfying the "claims" of campaign orators, wire-pullers, bill-stickers, and the rest of the great army of patriots who do the work of the canvass. The usual flood of letters began to pour in on Grant as soon as he returned to Washington; and the "managers" and other wise men began to take the trains, in all parts of the country, for the purpose of showing the innocent soldier how the thing ought to be done. He has, however, proved not so very innocent after all, and has begun his work by a stroke which none of the "practical politicians" ever dreamed of. He has ordered all applications for office to be burned without being shown to him, and announces that whenever he wants anybody for an office he will be sure to send for him. We feel satisfied that politicians themselves will be the first to recognize in this arrangement both Grant's sagacity and goodness of heart. Persons who want office can now stay quietly at home following their usual avocations, if they have any, be saved all the expense and annoyance of a journey to Washington, and at the same time have the satisfaction, which they have never enjoyed before, of knowing that the minute places are ready for them they will be summoned to fill them. We have no doubt hundreds of thousands of dollars will be saved in this way, in labor and travelling expenses.

As important a piece of news as any from the South is to the effect that the committee of five whom the Mississippi Constitutional Convention made final judges of the vote have declared that the constitution at the election last spring was ratified. This, we suppose, gives the Republicans five new members in Congress. It is not explained, so far as we have heard, how it happens that it has been so long believed by everybody in Mississippi and out of it that the Constitution was defeated; yet, as things look now, a little explanation is desirable. Probably Alabama has been carried for Grant, which more than offsets the loss of Oregon; the white vote among the hill people must have been considerable, though in one of the northern counties—Marion—no election was held. At any rate, there must have been a pretty general refusal to vote for Seymour. This is the most encouraging sign that Alabama has made for some time, if it means, as we suppose it does, that some of the Conservatives are a little frightened at the excesses of some of the others. Louisiana, which apparently is content with her glory, has for the moment ceased killing Republicans. The Republican Committee are out in an address in which they fully account for the overwhelming Seymour majority. Just before the election the conservatives, having resolved on carrying the State, killed 200 negroes in St. Landry; in that parish, therefore, out of 2,000 registered Republicans not one voted. In peaceable parishes, "where employers greatly needed the labor of colored men," the Republicans cast nearly all their votes; in Saint James, for example, 2,389 Republicans registered and 2,161 voted. New Orleans was put under a martial law of popular manufacture (General Rousseau not objecting), and out of 18,000 registered Republicans 276 went to the polls ostentatiously protected by Democrats—who would have killed them if they had come in sufficient numbers to make killing worth while. If it seems unnecessary to talk about this, it should be recollected that our Minister to England writes to an English paper that Louisiana and Texas are quiet and orderly, and will find plenty of stupid people to believe him, and plenty of wilfully stupid people to pretend to believe him. Texas, like Louisiana, is, for the moment, at peace; but the Republicans are sighing for Sheridan, whom they believe Grant means to appoint.

After leaving the South-west, we find everything encouraging until we come to Florida, where factions of Republicans are squabbling with great virulence and noise. Florida was not lucky in her importation of political Northerners, though she got some very good non-political ones. We think nobody need care—so far as Reed or Gleason or Jenks or Alden is concerned—whether Reed beats them or they him. They are all "sound on the main question," of course. Florida, by the way, is soon to receive a colony of forty or more cultivators and mechanics from Auburn. Georgia talks, since the 3d of November, of rescinding the late disqualifying action of her Legislature, or at least submitting it to the judgment of the courts, and abiding peaceably by their decision. In South Carolina they have had the charter election at Charleston, and after a day of great excitement they elected, by a majority of 17, Mr. Gilbert Pillsbury to be the mayor. He is an old Bureau agent and he is a brother of the renowned Parker Pillsbury, who once used to be heard of as a political philosopher, but probably he was, personally, rather unobjectionable than objectionable to the white residents of the city. There is talk of contesting the result on the ground of frauds, but we do not understand that there is any intention of wading in vandal blood or doing any other of Mr. Gilmore Simms's things. North Carolina, it is believed, has sent to Washington one more Republican than was thought, it being now said that Mr. Jones has beaten his Democratic competitor. Virginia seems to be in profound peace.

We trust all our readers are familiar with the late Mr. Artemus Ward's account of a fearful thrashing which he once administered to a very powerful man with whom he had an unpleasantness at some railroad station. Mr. Ward grappled with his antagonist, and violently dashed him to the ground, himself underneath; then he got his enemy's hand firmly twisted in his hair; the foe still showing some signs of activity, Mr. Ward inserted a piece of his cheek between the foe's teeth, and kept it there some time; after which, if we recollect the affair in its details, his antagonist slunk off, having ineffectually, as a last resort, jumped up and down several times on the triumphant Showman's stomach. The horrible outrages committed by the negro at the South are done in plain imitation of Ward, and result in victories of an entirely similar character. At Huntsville, in Alabama, just before the election, a harmless band of disguised men rode into the town, round the square, and "disappeared without a word." There was a gang of negroes holding a Republican or Voudoo conclave in the court-house at the time, and they at once rushed out with hideous yells, demanding the lives of the "damned rebels," and urging a "charge on the Ku-Klux." They were completely successful: "Just as the negroes rushed through the gate, some one of them fired upon the crowd on the sidewalk, and in a moment as many as thirty shots were fired by both parties, when the firing suddenly ceased, the negroes running off"—in triumph—"in all directions." One negro was killed and three dangerously wounded. The defeated whites are dangerously unwounded, and greatly demoralized and much overawed, and great fears are entertained of another black outbreak, and the negroes are in the adjacent forest—probably planning a bloody slaughter.

The question of an increase of the President's salary has come up for discussion, and the increase, if made at all, for Grant's benefit, must be made by the present Congress. $25,000, the present rate, had about as much purchasing power in Washington's day as $100,000 now has, and the New York Times therefore proposes to raise the salary to that latter sum. Some papers oppose it on the ground that $25,000 is as much as any man needs to live decently—a proposition which depends for its value on the point of view from which you look at a man's needs, and who the man is; others oppose it on the ground that Grant knew what the salary was when he took the office, and, if he does not like it on the terms, somebody else can be got to fill it for the money; but this argument tells as strongly against $25,000 as against $100,000. We can get the office fairly filled for $1,000 a year by scores of "gentlemen of fine talents and dignified manners;" and Grant knew when he took the office that the present Congress might reduce his salary if they chose. The Tribune objects on the general ground that, to be just, the salaries of all officials would have to be quadrupled as well as that of the President, which the country cannot now afford; and the World points out that an increase of salary made for a determinate person—made, that is, for the benefit of a President elect—and not for that of unknown Presidents in general, is virtually, though it may not be literally, a violation of the Constitution, and would in practice produce all the evils against which the provision of the Constitution is intended to guard. Both these objections are weighty, and the last one, it seems to us, insurmountable.

A strange story is told this week of the condition of the "Civil Service," which we hope has not escaped Mr. Jenckes's attention, and the like of which, we venture to say, can only be found in the records of Oriental courts. First of all, a young man named Binckley, who has been various things in his life, but never a lawyer, appears on the scene as an assistant attorney-general, of all things in the world, engaged in the investigation and detection of frauds, but is withdrawn. Then a man named Belknap, who has been dismissed from the navy for defalcations in his accounts as paymaster, appears on the scene as a "Special Treasury Agent," accuses an ex-collector of frauds, but agrees to let him off for $30,000, and gets the money; then, emboldened by success, accuses another collector, Mr. Bailey, of a similar offence, and supports the accusation with a cloud of witnesses, but in Bailey catches a Tartar; for he turns on his pursuers, has the cloud of witnesses arrested for perjury, and in jail they confess their guilt and reveal the amount they received for their crime. The scales are now turned on Belknap, and the triumph of the righteous and the confusion of the wicked seem certain; but here some wizard touches a secret spring, and all again changes. The district attorney, Mr. Courtney, who is to bring the knaves to justice, finds his arm arrested by orders from Washington, and he himself summoned to that city to answer charges of fraud preferred by whiskey thieves whom he is actually at that moment prosecuting. The reports of the Divan of Haroun Al Raschid contain nothing like this; of the judicial records of Christian states we need not speak. Mr. Courtney has been honorably acquitted, but the tumult still rages, and every hour new thieves and perjurers, and new combinations of thieves and perjurers, appear and vanish like scenes in a diorama. The Civil Service Bill is clearly not a "practical measure." It would deprive us of as moral and edifying an entertainment as was ever offered to a civilized community. Barnum's "Christian drama" was nothing to it.

A correspondent, whose letter we have unfortunately mislaid, takes exception to the language we used three weeks ago in commenting upon the fact that during the great Erie Railway war last winter the company sought to engage the services of Mr. John B. Haskin, a particular friend of the hostile judge. Our correspondent thinks this action deserving of severe censure, because he can see nothing in it but an attempt to purchase influence over the judge. But this view of the case, if correct, would make it wicked to engage the services of any lawyer who was on terms of friendship with the judge before whom he was to practice. Such a rule would shut out the most eminent and honorable members of the bar from business, because these are on terms of comparative intimacy with every respectable judge. In the case now under consideration Mr. Haskin was asked to render a purely professional service, the nature of which was entirely unexceptionable, and such as the most upright lawyer might properly have undertaken. This service being ex parte, however, its success depended greatly upon the belief which the judge would put in the statements of fact made by the counsel. Mr. Haskin was not asked to state anything that was not strictly true, and therefore no attempt was made to abuse the judge's confidence in him. Finally, he was offered the lowest fee that was paid to any counsel engaged by either party to that suit—a fee so small that it would be absurd to look upon it as intended for a bribe to the judge. These are the facts, as stated by Mr. Haskin himself, at a time when he was anxious to put the worst possible construction upon them. No opportunity was given for any explanation or contradiction. Taking them, however, as true, but assuming, as it is only fair to assume, that they are stated in the worst form that could be given to them, it seems to us that there is nothing in them to warrant the censure of our correspondent. We were at the time liberal in our censures of the general course of the Erie Railway Company, and have seen no reason to improve our opinion of its managers; but indiscriminate condemnation destroys the value of all criticism.

One of those shocking scenes, "a dinner" to an infamous traitor, took place in this city on Tuesday evening. To use the language of the carnal heart, the bar of New York entertained Mr. William M. Evarts, the present Attorney-General of the United States, and it was one of the most hopeful and creditable things the New York bar has done for a long time, because, in honoring Mr. Evarts, they honored an honest man, a gentleman in the best sense of the word, and an able lawyer, whose career is, in short, one of the few remaining glories of the profession in this city.

The news from England is unimportant. The elections are literally "raging." The Liberals have, as far as known, gained 45; the Conservatives, 22; but Mr. J. S. Mill has been defeated. He will, however, doubtless secure a seat elsewhere. Mr. Reverdy Johnson continues his banqueting and speechifying. One of his latest wise acts was to give an emigration company a certificate that Texas was a quiet and orderly place. Mr. Bright is making a "progress" too, and now carries round his head the prospective glory of a cabinet minister. He, however, begins to be slightly suspected by the working-men of retrograde tendencies, which is partly the effect of his belonging to the employing class.

In Spain, the whole country is still occupied with the discussion of the form of government, but the monarchists gain most ground, though the republicans make most noise. Probably no new government was ever founded amid so much uproar. Victor Hugo has discharged at the Spaniards one of those humanitarian screams with which he loves to rend the air at great political crises, and which probably contain a greater proportion of sound to sense than the productions of any other stump orator. Nor are the other democratic chiefs and reformers silent. Mazzini gives the Spaniards the mysterious advice "to give the baptism of reality to the grand idea of the epoch, and achieve the most glorious of initiatives while making a large stride in the path of civilization." He adds threateningly, "that if she dares not do what the world" (i. e., Mazzini himself) "expects of her, she condemns herself to a period of inferiority and anarchy." M. Mazade says, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, that morning and evening the Spaniards receive republican advice from all quarters of the globe, "in historical consultations, dithyrambs, proclamations, manifestoes, and demonstrative allocutions;" but there is trouble amongst the counsellors themselves, for the democratic republicans are consigning the federal republicans to the infamy of traitors and idiots, and warning the Spanish nation against them.

In the meantime the Spaniards, we are glad to say, keep never minding their foreign counsellors. General Prim has declared for a monarchy, observing, in a heartless manner, that in order to make a republic you must have republicans. The supply in Spain is scanty. In fact, they are only found in the great towns, and are not very wise men. The professors in the colleges are amongst the leaders, and their type of republicanism is that which in Europe is known as "red." Marshal Serrano has declared for a constitutional monarchy also, and, what is perhaps of most importance, so has Olozaga, the most distinguished and influential enemy of the old dynasty, who has just come back after a long exile, and is now, after mature consideration, making monarchical speeches. The most complete order reigns throughout the country—the last and most dangerous "junta," that of Barcelona, has dissolved—and there is every reason to believe that the foundations of the new government, whatever it may be, will be laid broad and deep in the popular will, after a full, free, and fair discussion and vote. There is, as far as it has gone yet, no finer spectacle than this revolution in modern history. There is plenty of enthusiasm; but that glorious old machine, the human understanding, is kept working night and day, and with the best results.

The "Eastern question," which has given no trouble in Europe during the last two years, is once more looming up. There is trouble all over Turkey—an insurrection brewing on a great scale in Bulgaria, which the Porte accuses Roumania of fomenting, and Roumania, in turn, accuses the Porte of dreaming of the reannexation of the Danubian provinces, while Russia pleasantly encourages each party not to give in. Large numbers of alleged conspirators have been captured, and are to be tried by a semi-military commission at Constantinople; troops are hurrying up to the Danube, and Baron Beust says the Principalities are "a great arsenal." The supposed leader of the insurrection is Colonel O'Reilly, otherwise Hassan Bey, an Irishman, who was at one time a private in the Tenth Hussars (English), and went into the Turkish service at the outbreak of the war of 1863 with the rank of major, having evidently influence at his back in high quarters in England. He was commonly reported to be an illegitimate son of Lord Palmerston; every young man who had "interest" with the Government at that time, and of whose origin nothing was known, used to be fathered on the lively old lord, who accordingly had an immense family of dashing adventurers all over Europe.

The Government of the Czar proceeds with consistent earnestness and relentless vigor in its work of general Russianization. The Holy Synod of St. Petersburg having declared the use of the Russian language admirable for all purposes of Catholic worship, the Minister of the Interior has ordered the printing and distribution in the western provinces of Catholic ritual books in that tongue. That the Holy Synod, in its readiness to aid the civil authorities in denationalizing the Polish and Baltic territories, shows itself fearless of the spread of Catholic religious influences through Muscovite mediums, is owing to the fact that the Russian penal law has reserved some of its severest penalties for the slightest attempts to convert Orthodox Greeks to any other religious creed. The former kingdom of Poland, the "Vistula country," as the Russians now style it, remains stripped of its university. The Minister of Public Education, Count Tolstoy, however, at a late reception given to the professors and students of Warsaw, was magnanimous enough to console them with a chance of its restoration, as soon as the people of Poland will evince a sincere consciousness of the—to him—patent fact that the late changes, including the compulsory substitution of the Russian for the Polish language in all their educational establishments, are nothing else but benign measures of a really paternal administration—a consciousness which it will take a rather long lapse of time for the Poles to reach. In trying, by his exposition, to help his listeners to share his own long ripe conviction in the matter, Count Tolstoy alluded to the necessity of a deep insight into "the history of all the Slavic tribes, all now trembling with the expectation of the grand moment when their fate shall be decided by the Russian colossus among them," which, coming from the lips of a high Imperial spokesman, is a rather frank exhibition of official Panslavic sentiment. The Russian animosities against the Germans of the Baltic provinces, which generally vent themselves in the columns of Katkoff's Moscow Gazette, of the Moskva, and the St. Petersburg Golos, have recently found a more elaborate expression in a violent diatribe, in pamphlet form, by Samarin, entitled "The Coasts of the Baltic at the present moment," which is regarded as foreboding fresh persecutions of the Teutonic element.

The Austrians have surprised the world by the announcement that their army is to be kept up to 800,000 men; that is, that that number will be at the disposal of the Government, though only 600,000 will be actually under arms. When the announcement was first made there was an approach to a panic, but it was allayed by an explanation, October 26, from Baron Beust, before the Military Committee of the Reichsrath. He said that the relations of Austria with France, Italy, and England were excellent, and that she had abandoned all thought of taking revenge on Prussia, but that as long as there was a chance of hostilities between Prussia and France, Austria was bound to be prepared to protect her own neutrality. The news of what the size of the army was to be reached Paris before Baron Beust's explanation and caused a slight panic on the Bourse, which the Moniteur tried to stop by pronouncing the Austrian intentions pacific, and declaring that the debate about to open in the Austrian Parliament on the army would be one of "a purely technical character." The fears of the French public are, however, still not allayed, and even the new political "map" which the Government has got out, showing the present state of the Continent and the safety of France in spite of all that has happened, produces little effect. The Spanish revolution and the increasing political discontents are generally believed to be the only real guarantees of peace, as far as France is concerned. A new crusade has been begun against the newspapers in Paris, and the severity of the sentences passed by subservient judges is exciting an amount of feeling which causes the Government to take extraordinary military precautions. There is no danger of an armed revolution, but it seems as if all hope of the perpetuation of the dynasty was fast disappearing.

What is causing a good deal of the trouble is that the French Government, by its liberal tendencies a year ago, roused expectations which, now that it has got frightened and wants to retrace its steps, it cannot extinguish, and the feeling of discontent is becoming so general that it is even frightening the majority of the Corps Législatif. One of them, hitherto a devoted servant of the Government, M. Haentjens, in a recent speech expressed frankly his opinion that the personal government of the Emperor could not last much longer, and that the only remedy for the evils of the situation is a responsible ministry. But if the Emperor were to concede this, the great justification of the existence of his dynasty would be gone, for he himself would then be of no more value to the state than Louis Philippe was, and he is nearly twice as expensive.

The Secretary of the French Academy of Sciences, at a recent meeting, suggested the propriety of publishing once more the decision of the Academy in 1775, never to give any attention to solutions which might be sent in of the following problems: "The duplication of the cube, the trisection of the angle, perpetual motion by means of a machine, and the quadrature of the circle." It appears there is a popular belief in France that the Academy has at its disposal a large sum of money to be used in rewarding persons who may succeed in solving any one of these problems, and weak-minded persons, ignorant of mathematics, are thus frequently led to waste their time and even to destroy their reason in working at them. When one reads this one cannot help regretting that it is not easy to mark out the limits of the possible in the same way in sociology, and thus prevent the enormous waste of labor, health, and happiness which now takes place every year in the trial of political and social experiments, for some of which human nature is not yet fitted, and for others of which it never will be fitted. One hears every day of the trial of schemes of human improvement which rest on the assumption that certain human instincts can be artificially rooted out of great bodies of persons, and men and women made to "go" like clocks, and no amount of experience of failure seems to diminish the number of inventors and discoverers.

THE "GREAT CITY" QUESTION.

About this time every year the moral and political condition of this city is debated by the press with great vigor. Every fourth year the country press and the press of other great cities take part in the discussion, owing to the bearing of the New York vote on the Presidential election, and then the discussion takes a wider range, and the relation of all great cities to American polity passes under review. Every year the political condition of this city and of all the large Eastern cities, perhaps with the exception of Philadelphia, is admitted to be worse, and every year the critics speak about the remedy with less and less confidence. Every year one meets with a larger and larger number of thoughtful men who, having lost all hope of improvement, cease to trouble their heads about the matter any further, and let each day take care of itself, charge their taxes to the inevitable expenses of their business, like office-rent or coal, and if they are involved in litigation pay whatever is necessary to bribe the judge, with the same nonchalance with which they pay their lawyer his fee. The city press is agreed upon nothing, except upon the horrible nature of the situation. The Times apparently relies for improvement upon the general progress of society, but apparently entertains no expectation of any speedy change. The World thinks all would be right if the Republicans were overthrown at Albany, and the control of city affairs were restored to the city majority, a view in which the Evening Post partly concurs; but the World thinks the majority would do right from the first moment, while the Post thinks it would only do right after it had fully realized not only the misery of sin, but its own power to reform. The Tribune's views are not very clear as to the remedy, but they are substantially the same as those of other papers as to the cause.

A "Citizens' Association" has been laboring at the work of reform for a good while, but with very little effect. They now and then expose a fraud, but most exposures of this class of frauds are dull reading; therefore few read them, fewer still understand them, and those who alone could put an end to the abuses, the majority of the voters, neither read nor, if they read, would heed them. In fact, the public which is reached by our reforming newspapers, pamphlets, and speeches has no more influence on the government of this city than on the government of Cincinnati. The gigantic frauds at the late election have brought a reinforcement into the field in the shape of a committee of the Union League Club, which has been charged with the task of seeking out the perpetrators; and as these perpetrators are well known to be spread through every branch of the city government, including the judiciary, the enquiry must, if successful, lay bare the whole system of iniquity which pervades municipal administration. There are those, however, and we are of the number, who do not expect the committee to accomplish anything of much value. They may collect a good deal of evidence and lay it before the public, but it will share the fate of the documents of the "Citizens' Association;" that is, about twenty good citizens will make themselves acquainted with the contents of the report, while the knaves of the City Hall will laugh at it over their whiskey-and-water. The place, and the only place, in which these men can be reached is in the United States courts. The only thing they will feel is the policeman's hand on their collar; and the place of good citizens who want to stop election frauds is at the elbow of the United States district attorney and of the United States marshal. The knaves have at this last election violated a United States statute, and there is, therefore, now a chance, such as seldom offers, not of "exposing them"—for that they do not care—but of bringing them to justice.

The Union League committee have published a manifesto addressed to the people of the State, setting forth what they expect to accomplish, which is a very sensible document. It is apparent from it that as far as the late frauds are concerned they do not expect to accomplish much, but they certainly hold very just views as to the gravity of the crisis, with which not the good people of the city only but the good people of the whole country are called on to deal. They say in substance, and say truly, that the corruption witnessed in this city is but an aggravated form of a disease which pervades or begins to pervade the body politic everywhere. Their address mentions as one of their objects

"5. To awaken the people not alone of this State, but of the whole country, to the imminence of our danger from the increasing demoralization of our politics, and to induce good citizens of all parties to combine for the common protection against political fraud and corruption."

Now, the committee has our heartiest sympathy in their undertaking, but we must call their attention, and the attention of all reformers, to the fact that there is little or no chance of their efforts in favor of possibly producing any results, when put forward only after elections in which they have been defeated, unless they have been defeated as reformers. There is nothing mysterious about this matter of corruption. It is not a dragon or a wild animal or a bad man or a bad corporation, or even a self-existent or self-derived evil. When we say that corruption reigns in New York we simply mean that the public officers are thieves, and that the majority of the electors put and keep them in their places either because they do not care whether they are thieves or not, or because they place more value on other things than on honesty. Of some electors the one thing may be said; of others, the other. When, therefore, you begin to preach against corruption, what you really are doing, or ought to be doing, to make your preaching effective, is trying to convince the electors that the officials steal; that stealing is a bad thing; and that nothing is so important as an official's character. In this particular case, there is no doubt about the facts of the stealing. What is wanted is to convince the electors that his character, and not his political opinion, is the principal thing in a public officer; and in this work the Republican party will not succeed unless it applies to its own practice the rule it offers to the Democrats, and convinces the Democrats that it does so by striking examples. We say deliberately that it does not do this; it does not make character the first consideration in its nominations, and opinions the second; and the Democrats, and especially the corrupt Democrats, know and see this, and accordingly Republican homilies on purity, immediately after a defeat at the polls, produce no effect on them whatever. Republican labors in the cause of reform, to be effective, must be constant. They must be just as energetic before election as after it, and they must be as visible in their own caucuses and conventions as anywhere else. As long as they coolly tell the world that if "the Copperheads hate" a man charges of knavery against him are of no consequence, with what face can they ask the New York voters to disregard political opinion in the selection of the city officials?

As an illustration of what we mean, we will relate one incident within our own knowledge, and of no great importance except as an illustration. Two years ago the corruption on the judicial bench of the city was nearly but not quite as bad as it is now. It was certainly less bold and unblushing, but it was gathering strength. A bill was introduced and hurried through both branches of the Legislature putting the whole chamber business of the Supreme Court into the hands of one judge, leaving the governor to select the judge, and it was well known to those who watched the bill that its promoters intended that the judge selected should be the very one who is now accused of complicity in the late election frauds, and whose character was at that time every whit as well known to the bar and the newspaper world as it is now. The effect of the bill—which was, however, not apparent on its face, and which escaped the governor's notice—would have been to place about $20,000,000 worth of property and the personal liberty of everybody in the district at the judicial disposal of one man, without appeal—an amount of power such as has never, we venture to say, been confided to a single officer under any system of jurisprudence in any civilized country. In fact, it was a gigantic scheme of plunder of the worst kind. But this was not the worst of it. It was supported in an indirect way by the leading Republican paper in this city, and a large number of wealthy and prominent men—Republicans, too—signed a paper urging the governor to appoint the judge aforementioned to the place thus created, believing, with that silly confidence in other things than character, which is one of the curses of the time, that, owing to his having recently quarrelled with the "Ring," he might be depended on to use his newly acquired and enormous power against it and it only. The governor was happily made acquainted in time with the real character of the measure, and never signed it, but while it was lying waiting his decision, with this scandalous pressure in its favor weighing on him, the matter was brought before the Union League Club by the executive committee, and resolutions were introduced denouncing it in strong terms. They were tabled almost without debate. One speech—showing that the measure had Republican friends, that the judge had Republican friends, and that the subject was not a fit one for the club to entertain, and that the resolutions, if pressed, might divide the club—killed them. Two years have now elapsed; the corruption has increased; the condition of the bench has grown worse, the men who pollute it more audacious; and at last they have taken to the manufacture of fraudulent votes, by the help of which the Republican party is defeated, and forthwith the club takes the field against "the increasing demoralization of our politics." It is right that it should do so; it is for this end that it exists; but if its labors are to be effective, it must give people no reason for believing that its zeal is party and not patriotic zeal.

We believe, too, that the danger to the Government "from the increasing demoralization of our politics" is imminent; but we see no hope of improvement until "corruption" becomes "the main question" both in this city and elsewhere; until a party is formed which is determined to have reform in the administration and will accept nothing else in place of it, and drives into obscurity the thieves and brawlers on both sides whom the slavery controversy, like all long protracted controversies, has bred. As long as a man may be a scoundrel, and yet be "sound" and valuable to his party, whether Republican or Democrat, change for the better everywhere is hopeless; and change in this city is hopeless as long as "the city question" has not become the great question of State politics. The Evening Post's plan of remedying the evils of the municipal government, by giving more power to the authors of them, is simply an example of devotion to logic which in politics ought to have no place.

ONE OF THE QUESTIONS NEXT IN ORDER.

As the time for the regular meeting of Congress draws near, the public and legislative mind will revert to the consideration of several important measures left undisposed of, and some of which may not be entirely digested and agreed upon before the close of the coming short session. After the reconstruction question, the financial problem is probably the most important matter to be settled, and, next to the finances, the civil service is incomparably the most vital question now demanding the attention of the people and of the national legislature. As a branch of the civil service, that part of it embraced in the proposed regulations of Senator Patterson's Diplomatic and Consular Bill is not the least important, and it is possible that this bill and the Civil Service Bill reported to the House by Mr. Jenckes could be combined into one consistent and uniform system.

The principal object and policy of Senator Patterson's bill—the policy of making the diplomatic and consular service a more permanent office, and introducing a rational system of promotion, instead of the present system of appointments and rapid changes—would be such palpable improvements as to need no argument or defence with those who have paid any critical and enlightened attention to the nature and organization of a foreign service. The assured tenure of office and the hope of promotion, which must first be deserved, give to the foreign service of other governments an efficiency which ours has never attained, and would relieve our own of many of the official and social blunders, of some of the fussiness, and most of the bizarrerie which have so often disfigured it. American diplomats notoriously start off in their new career more awkwardly than those of any other nation. They rapidly acquire a good opinion by showing that they are apt learners, and are nearly uniformly relieved or forced to resign about the time they have acquired the ability to be useful to their Government.

Passing by a large number of little oddities far more amusing than important—at least only important in so far as they may have pictured our representatives to others in a light a little too green or imparted to them a social and official flavor just a little too fresh—it is nearly certain that the American diplomatic service is the only one in the world that could have produced the Ostend-Aix-la-Chapelle manifesto of Messrs. Buchanan, Mason, and Soulé, in 1854. More recently, it was reported, and we have never had any reason to doubt it, that one of the several gentlemen who have been successively appointed to Mexico said in a public speech that the French, then in Mexico, must be made to "get up and dust." Possibly the general was right. It may be that they ought to have been "cleaned up," or "shucked out," or "polished off," or "went for," or "put through," either in double quick or "so quick their heads would swim;" though there is at least room to doubt whether the final mode of doing it was not as well, and a good deal cheaper. The only point now made in the case is that the fact was not announced at the right time, or in the right place, or in the right language, or by the right man, whom all the world then thought about to start in search of his interesting and very important mission.

It has often been said, both in England and in the United States, in answer to all unfavorable comparisons of our diplomatic service with that of other nations, that the United States get as good treaties as other governments. In the main this is true, and it is susceptible of easy explanation. Our diplomats, whatever else may be said of them, have generally been shrewd politicians and good lawyers; and, at all events, they generally work by pattern, drafts and instructions, furnished from Washington. Indeed, since the Revolution, and a short period immediately following it, our treaties have, many of them, been negotiated at Washington; some of them, no doubt, under confidential senatorial influence; and the character of our Secretaries of State for learning and ability has generally been of a very high order. But treaty-making is only a small part either of the labor or the benefits of diplomatic representation. Franklin was a very great negotiator, and got good treaties; but it was his residence, his representation, and his reputation that gave him influence, and paved the way for those treaties which no mere skill in actual diplomatic controversy or negotiation could have achieved. Wheaton, who stayed abroad longer than any other American diplomat has ever done—some twenty years in all—and who left behind him a reputation for manners, social influence, scholarship, judicial learning, and diplomatic ability that makes it pleasant for other American diplomats to reside under the shadow of his fame at the same capitals where he lived, made but few treaties—only two which the writer can now remember; and one of them, that of the German Zollverein, was not ratified by the Senate on account of some of its commercial provisions. Mr. Wheaton, who had spent much of his time, labor, and skill in negotiating the treaty, is said to have felt keenly its rejection.

Turning to the extremely valuable services rendered by our late Minister to England, how much of those services consisted either in treaty-making or in the attempt to negotiate one? How much more we might have suffered, how disastrously, at the hands of rebel pirates and cruisers, but for the presence, influence, and protests of our ministers to the various maritime powers, will never and can never be known; but they made no treaties on that subject, and few upon any. Their incapacity for negotiating a treaty, and the vast labor often involved in such a negotiation—a labor never fully known but to the negotiators—we do not depreciate. On the contrary, we fully appreciate it; but we would insist that there is much diplomatic labor and duty besides this, and that it seems possible that the undue prominence held by this in the public mind has been in some degree reflected in the report before us. In the case cited of Mr. Bancroft's treaties with the smaller German powers, where we have no resident ministers, those powers are acting very much under the influence of Prussia's example; and in the case of Prussia the value of permanent diplomatic residence or missions and of accumulated diplomatic influence, has been illustrated. Most treaties and negotiations of importance have a private history which cannot be made public until the formal documents have themselves passed into public history—witness Lord Russell's admission, in a dinner-table speech, that Mr. Adams had converted him to Mr. Lincoln's policy of emancipation. The crust of centuries which had enveloped the feudal idea of indefeasible allegiance and obligation to military service was cracked, not quite smashed, in private informal interviews at Berlin, in which legal argumentation and diplomatic forms were not very closely followed, and in which allusions neither very faint nor entirely in jest to Monitors and Farraguts appeared more plainly than they could possibly have been allowed to do in a formal discussion. The assertion that the men about whom the United States felt so sensitive were nearly all "a set of d——d rascals," was found to be an argument not at all alarming—perhaps partly because not new—to a Western politician; and the assurance, "I tell you frankly, count, as a friend, and as the representative of my government, that you must not expect us to stand this thing any longer," called out Bismarck's proposition to compromise on half-way ground. If Mr. Wright would have accepted less than Mr. Bancroft obtained, he yet rendered very great service, and we were saved from the future embarrassment of having yielded a part of the principle by Mr. Seward's demanding all or none; and he in turn—so the private history runs, but for this we cannot vouch—was supported if not influenced in taking this stand by senatorial opinion and advice. Thus we are indebted to Mr. Wright, Mr. Seward, some senators, largely to Mr. Bancroft, and partly to the hard, practical sense and keen perceptions of the most potent of European statesmen, for an extremely valuable treaty.

Only one more example will be given. When Sir Charles Wyke, the British minister at Mexico, did the diplomatic part of splitting asunder the tripartite military treaty by which Napoleon tried to decoy his two allies into the forced establishment of his French-Austrian-Mexican Empire, a great diplomatic service was rendered to the whole world, but no treaty made. On the contrary, the very weighty responsibility was assumed, without waiting for instructions, of advising that a treaty lately made by his own Government should not be followed, even as far as the letter of it would lead, to say nothing of the spirit. In short, Napoleon thought the treaty was violated and himself abandoned.

The system of examinations, proposed as one of the means of increasing the efficiency of the service, is now adopted by most European powers, and is plausible and full of promise. It has not, however, been found, especially in England, to produce all the good effects which were expected from it. In the English service its substantial benefits have been, in great part, missed by the artifice familiarly known as "cramming." If the examinations are conducted, or can be organized, so as to avoid this cheat, and also to prevent favoritism, they would furnish a valuable safeguard against thrusting absolute incompetence into the service, and that would be much gained. But no examination can be relied upon to ensure the unerring and uniform selection of efficient and successful agents. Experience shows that passing the examinations is not an entire guarantee of future success; the elements of success are not gathered entirely or mainly from books—though books are so necessary they cannot be dispensed with—but consist more in tact, knowledge of the world, force of character, and the confidence of others; so that the greatest students and ripest scholars are not always the best diplomats. European diplomats admit that the examinations may be so conducted, owing to the influence of family, wealth, or political favoritism, as to let in an ass or to exclude a young man of superior parts, and they more than hint that this has occasionally occurred. Still, upon the whole, they prefer the system of examination, and their Governments adhere to it. Any man of experience knows how some very competent officers might be tripped on matters they had not turned their attention to. About the time the controversy between Congress and the President had culminated, Americans abroad were often asked by Europeans who had passed their examinations, and were serving their Governments successfully, why the President did not dissolve Congress and order a new election; and during our civil troubles, an Englishman who stands well with his Government, and justly, because he has filled well and successfully all the missions in which he has been placed, asked an American gentleman if Richmond was not in Georgia, and if the cotton and sugar States were not in the same latitude with Jamaica. The true test of worth is to be found in the sum total of the manner in which duty has been performed. In its larger, and not in its ordinary or special sense, success is the true test, and should be made at once the measure of the tenure of office, and the only foundation, coupled with the term of past service, of the hope of promotion. In the sense of success, as here used, Mr. Adams was eminently successful, though he did not prevent the building of iron-clads nor succeed in getting a dollar for the havoc they wrought. His success was in doing ably what he had to do, and in the general effect of his representation.

THE MOB SPIRIT.

We have received the following remarks on the election of Butler from one of the most thoughtful and acute men we know, a New Englander, and a Radical to boot, who has done better things for the negro than make stump speeches about him. We do not think them a complete solution of the difficulty, but they suggest many things which we feel sure the writer might himself have said had he pursued the subject further, and we are sorry he has not done so:

"The triumphant election to Congress of a demagogue of the worst type from one of the most intelligent districts in the country is an event so mortifying to our national pride, and so disheartening to a faith in genuine democracy, that its causes seem to deserve a more careful analysis than they have yet received. We know well enough the reasons why General Butler ought not to have been elected—we know his unscrupulous and selfish ambition, his disgraceful personal record, and the uncomfortable prospect of his future. Certainly it was not because of all these things that he was sustained by his constituents; it was in spite of them. They resolutely shut their eyes to testimony and argument against him. They were determined to elect him; and above all, it would seem, they were determined not to elect Mr. Dana.

"Primarily, of course, the cause of this was the conviction that Butler was sound on the one question which the people had at heart. In times of revolution this is the only test—who will help the great movement? And it is not always easy to judge when a revolution has been accomplished, or to recognize new issues as they arise. Here, now, is an issue that is past, settled, so far as politics can settle it, by the election of Grant. And here are new and most momentous issues plain in sight. If this man has given hard blows in the battle that is over; if he has been faithful, or at least zealous, in the great cause, it is certain that on these new issues he is not faithful—that in the new division of parties he will not be with us. But the people of Essex do not realize that the revolution is already accomplished—they do not comprehend that the next Congress will have totally different questions to deal with from the present.

"These are familiar considerations, and will perhaps account sufficiently well for Butler's being elected in defiance of all reason and honor. But they do not account for the spirit in which his constituents have supported him. There is another consideration, even less gratifying to the sense of right, but equally natural, and equally the result of a strained and imperfect perception of a real truth. The movement against General Butler grew out of criticism of his character, words, and deportment; and criticism—impartial criticism—is the one thing that zealots will not put up with. They can forgive any amount of intolerance, unfairness, even downright dishonesty, provided it is displayed towards the enemies of the cause; to object to these, while favoring the cause itself, is an unpardonable offence. It is a stab in the back, a secret blocking of the wheels, a piece of treachery.

"Even culture itself is looked on with suspicion, as we saw last year in the language of so eminent liberals as Mr. Bright and Mr. Harrison. These men certainly do not object to culture in itself. It is because culture often becomes fastidious, is often identified with 'a turn for small fault-finding, love of selfish ease, and indecision in action,' leads to lukewarm indifference instead of hearty co-operation, that they call it an enemy of progress. Genuine, sympathizing criticism is confounded with unfriendly and timid criticism, and any hesitation at the measures or the language thought most fit to advance the great movement is regarded with suspicion, is called cowardly and 'aristocratic.'

"This is the way that men of culture fall out of favor in times of very earnest political feeling. It is not because Mr. Dana is a cultivated gentleman that his long-tried faithfulness counts for nothing against General Butler's eleventh-hour repentance. Wendell Phillips and Charles Sumner are cultivated gentlemen, and they do not lose caste. But Mr. Phillips and Mr. Sumner do not criticise their own party—raise no objections, that is, to any partisanship which does not betray lack of zeal; while Mr. Dana has ventured to raise his voice against disgraceful performances in his own party, and for this he can never be forgiven. Just so, some years ago, Mr. Palfrey protested against what he conceived to be a dishonest coalition between his own party and the Democratic; and Mr. Palfrey was at once dropped from party favor.

"It is this impatience of criticism, even the most friendly and impartial, that has led the Republicans of Essex County to re-elect General Butler so enthusiastically, and we may say in so virulent a spirit. And there is nothing for it, for those who desire to see a calm, well-balanced, orderly democracy, but to continue just such criticisms, in the same earnest and sympathizing spirit, trusting that time and the education of events will teach a better wisdom. In the present case, indeed, there is every reason to believe that it will not take many months to open the eyes of these earnest men to the blunder they have committed; and it may well be that the election of General Butler will prove in the end a most salutary piece of political education."

There are three views of "the people" current in the world at this moment. One is the feudal theory, which prevails still amongst the Austrian and Prussian aristocracy, and which Count Buol expressed very neatly to Madame Bunsen, in London, in 1852, as recorded in the Baron's memoirs, when, speaking of Louis Napoleon's coup d'état, he said: "Enfin, c'est qu'on ne vient à bout de dominer cette canaille, qu'en leur inspirant de la peur; c'est là aussi notre politique, à nous en Autriche." In this theory the people is a fierce animal, only to be kept in order by stripes and imprisonment, and whose wishes are of no sort of consequence in politics. The second is that which has found expression in Cæsarism in Europe, and in what is called "democracy" here. In it the people is an animal with good impulses, and excessively fond of physical comfort, and caring little about anything else, and absolutely without knowledge or discretion or self-control, and too strong to be resisted openly, and which must, therefore, be humored, wheedled, kept partially or wholly in the dark about public affairs, and governed by a few men who have acquired the art of imposing upon it, and who, while ostentatiously calling themselves its servants, are in reality its masters. It is on one or other of these theories that the Old World has, down to the present moment, been governed. The basis of the one is force, of the other humbug.

The third is what we consider the American theory. Under it the people is a man not, indeed, remarkable for book learning, nor yet for angelic sweetness of disposition, nor for heroic loftiness of aim, but it is intelligent, amenable to reason, inclining, on the whole, to the right, and willing to make sacrifices in pursuit of it; loving justice, loving order, loving law, and believing that in justice and order only, pursued through law, national happiness can be secured; with plenty of impulses, and good ones too, but sufficiently trained in affairs and with sufficient knowledge of history to know that in politics the understanding is the principal thing, and that impulses uncontrolled by reason are like a steam-engine without a driver, a curious, complicated, even admirable instrument of confusion and destruction—a man, in short, to whom you can speak unreservedly, frankly, about his affairs, with the consciousness that whether your tale be pleasant or unpleasant he can bear it, and can face either fortune with a clear head and a steady hand.

It is on this theory that the American commonwealth has been built up; it is on the maintenance of this theory in the conduct of the Government that, as we believe, the preservation of the Government depends. What makes the New England town-meeting one of the "sights" which foreigners go to see, and are never tired of admiring, is not that it is an assemblage of peasants who want to have good clothes, good food, light taxes, and cheap justice, and have got together to see how they may secure these blessings—this kind of spectacle you might have an abundance of in every country in Europe. It is the character of the men who compose it and their way of reaching their conclusions which make the town-meeting singular and successful. A European mob, in the first days of its rising—say such a mob as that which threw up the barricades in Paris on those awful days of June, 1849—may have, and in nine cases out of ten has, as good ends in view as any New England meeting. It wants plenty to reign, the tyrants and oppressors to be punished, the poor to be succored, justice to be evenly administered. The hearts of the mass of the poor fellows who fell under Cavaignac's grape-shot doubtless were overflowing with the noblest emotions. Nay, even the Irish mob which ravaged New York in 1863 was at bottom actuated, at the outset, by the hope of bringing about what they considered on the whole a better social state than that they found around them. The cases are rare, indeed, where any large body of men set out to commit acts of violence through simple devilish love of mischief.

In what, then, does a mob differ from a New England town-meeting? In this: that the members of the town-meeting think more and know more about the means by which society can be improved. They are not governed wholly, or even in great part, by their feelings. No matter how hot their hearts may be with indignation or desire or hope as they hurry to the meeting; when they get there and begin to discuss the means of carrying out their wishes, their reason takes possession of the whole matter, their decision is reached through discussion. They consider, not as enthusiasts, but as men who have had experience of their own, and are more or less familiar with the experience of others, what they can and what they cannot accomplish, and what will be the effect, remote as well as near, of the employment of this or that instrument on the fortunes of the society in which they live—on its morals, its manners, and its material prosperity. In other words, they do not cheer as the mob does, and rush at the enemy with empty muskets. They organize, reconnoitre, arm and equip, choose fit officers, and get hospitals ready. It is thus and thus only that a popular government can be carried on. Go where you will in America, and you will find that just in proportion to the departure from this type of government is the badness of the government, the corruption, the abuses, the ascendancy of knaves. Prosperity is, in other words, in the ratio of the reason and self-control of the community and not of its warm-heartedness.

What we charge upon the Butlerites, and what we charge upon a large body of those who, though not Butlerites properly so called, have made themselves conspicuous as "earnest Radicals" during the last two or three years, is that they are doing much to bring the reign of intelligence and of sober-mindedness to an end all over the country; that they are trying to infuse into American politics the spirit of the European mob—that is, its childish eagerness, its childish indifference about means and about practicability, its childish forgetfulness of the lessons of history and of the nature of man, its childish admiration of noisy agitators, its childish readiness to rush head down at any obstacle it finds in its path, and its childish faith in fine "sentiments" as political forces. What makes us most of all regret Butler's election is the proof it affords of the amount of mischief they have already done, of the extent to which they have succeeded, the times and circumstances unhappily favoring them, in inoculating the best portion of the community with their poison. The selection of Butler, with his career and character known to everybody in the community, as the man and the only man whom New England could find in her borders to "watch" the President of the United States, his unscrupulousness and audacity being his principal recommendation, and the loud proclamation which was made throughout the canvass that he represented "the popular heart," the condition of the popular head being plainly considered of small consequence, are unmistakable symptoms of the growth of the mob spirit in places in which we should have least expected to find it; and with it naturally comes the growing ascendency in politics of party machinists, bitter and narrow-minded partisans, who love office and victory, but care really little about principles.

OUR CENSORIOUS AGE.

An acute social observer of our acquaintance remarked the other day that perhaps there was hardly a person within the range of his personal knowledge who was not, at least occasionally, denounced as a rascal of some sort—generally as an habitual liar. He has reasonably good acquaintances too. But the fact seems to be that there is a steady and considerable increase in the number of persons who find it necessary to do regularly what, we see, the editor of the [Kansas?] Owyhee Avalanche felt compelled to do not long since. "In a recent issue," that gentleman had occasion "to refer directly to a ruffian known as Captain Prescott, and incidentally to a guerilla named Al. Cage." He adds that "this we did in justice to ourselves, and to the community at large." It is hardly germane to our purpose, but we may say that the ruffian and guerilla appear to have taken a very different view of the editor's services. They probably would have described his conduct in much the same language as has recently been used by an editor further east than Owyhee, who, we observe, says of one of his contemporaries that he writes "with all the alacrity of a coward, the billingsgate of a fishwife, and the malice of a partisan." At all events, they called on him in his office at the earliest opportunity afterwards presenting itself, and violently assaulted him with a bowie-knife and a small hatchet. Apparently he is just the person for emergencies of this kind. He at once proceeded to possess himself of a long knife, which he customarily uses for cutting paper, and with this weapon—unless indeed he exaggerates his performances—he did signal execution. "They sued for mercy," if his account is correct, and he decided to spare their worthless lives. After a moment or two of deliberation he finally "told them to dust, and they got up and dusted"—a gratifying conclusion to one of the most savage attacks on the liberty of the press that we have lately had to record.

Still, no doubt the Avalanche was on that occasion very censorious; and as we have said, or suggested, the age generally may be described as being highly denunciatory, and as tending to become more so. We accept the facts of our social observer above quoted as regards the private walks of life, and what the facts are in regard to the ways of public life everybody is aware. So far as we know them, all the public men of any prominence in this country and Europe have, with a single exception, long been consistent and detected liars or villains of some description. Mr. Colfax is the only unstigmatized scoundrel that we can remember, and if perhaps there is another, or one or two more, we do not know where. Disraeli is a cheat; Gladstone is an ill-natured and greedy egotist, hungry for place; all the Adamses are always on sale; Grant lied to Johnson, and has frequently been seen drunk in the streets of Washington; Beecher is a soft-headed seller of innocent blood; Fessenden is a taker of bribes; Garrison is a lukewarm friend of the negro, whom now he abandons; Seward is a drunkard, and acts the scoundrel; Seymour is a frightful liar; McCulloch is confederated with thieves; Horace Greeley let his paper be sold to Fernando Wood, and is now letting it be published in the interests of a ring of whiskey thieves; Judge Read is a hoary old villain; and there is almost nobody else, big or little, who is not as accomplished in crime as any of the malefactors we have mentioned. Even Mr. Colfax does not know what morning he will wake up, and find himself stamped as a traitorous liar who, under implied pledges to Mr. Phillips to do it, does not put himself at the head of the loyal North and hurl "the sashed and girded sphinx" from the seat which he disgraces.

Perhaps just at present things look to an American eye blacker than they really are. We have just passed through a somewhat exceptional season of extreme tumult: a period when nobody of either party had a vestige of good character, and everybody was bandying severe charges with all the energy of his nature—when indeed a great many persons were held to be cotton-thieves, manifest stealers of Shetland ponies, stolid butchers, tyrants, forgers, hard drinkers, dictators, and, above all, fools and liars, who are now recognized as citizens of more than average respectability. But though the excesses of the campaign are excesses, there is enough of normal, chronic contumely, of abuse in constant use, to justify any one who sets down the age as an abusive one. Where are we to look now for any gentlemanly quarrelling? In old times, in some old times at any rate, people who had cause or wish to fight conducted themselves, up to the moment of drilling the hole in their friend the enemy, with great tenderness and suavity of manner. To kill the body was then considered sufficient; a man's reputation, and his wife's and children's feelings, were tolerably well secured against the valor of the tongue. There never was a time when the thing happened, but there once was a time which could invent and believe the story of the French and English courtliness at the famous Battle of Fontenoy; but it would be a wild humorist or a female novelist who should depict such an imaginary scene as of our day. We lie in the rifle-pits, we Americans, and bestow choice language on each other before we fire, and we are not desirous that the other one should do us the pleasure of firing first. So also, we fear, of the Italians and Austrians, and of the business-like Prussians, and others of our contemporaries; the perusal of French newspapers, or to hear the well-bred Pall Mall calling Mr. Odger Mr. *H*odger, will be apt to persuade sceptical persons that our American press and people are not alone in a willingness to vituperate, but that it is done by the politest nations.

There are many reasons why this should be so, or rather there are many causes which help to make it so. Here in the United States, for example, everybody owns a newspaper, or at least writes in one, and that always produces curious effects on a person's manner of speech. Ten to one the newspaper man becomes contemptuous, domineering, and truculent. This is for various reasons. He is under the constant necessity of holding up in their true light his political opponents—a class of people continually engaged in consummating the most nefarious designs. Then again he has to spin out of his own brain in the course of a year a vast amount of "matter," and at the end of ten months, in a majority of cases, is reduced to personalities, which, of course, must be either scurrile jests or violent abuse or else little impertinences, and the contumelious slander is not only the easiest but the best liked of these. The profession has its disadvantages. Let us say, too, that what has been called the "parliamentary" or Pickwickian way of viewing things, as distinguished from the truthful seeing of things exactly as they are, is very apt to become a habit of the journalistic mind, and affects the journalist's language; he gets into curious conventional ways of pretending this and that, and talking accordingly, as if he believed them. Of course it results from this that he loses something of his hold on facts, and finds it extremely easy to speak leasing, and to use words to which, as he himself attaches far less meaning than their sound warrants, he expects other people also to attach little significance. That again is a temptation to him to be violent.

Now, we are such makers and readers of newspapers that what our papers are we ourselves must all be, or strongly tend to become, and beyond a doubt a great deal of the savagery of private conversation is to be attributed to the effect upon us of our war-whooping editors. The evil perpetuates itself, for by-and-by men become entirely indifferent to repeated attacks, and almost everybody is as ruffianly as he pleases, and is in small fear of being brought to book. This may be because a good deal of the fighting spirit has gone out among all civilized nations, has at any rate gone out of fashion. To revive the duello or the prize-ring in this country or England would be an impossibility, though there is little doubt that were the duello to be made the fashion among us, its rough influence in bettering the manners of our less reckless generation would be considerably greater than was the case when its existence and glory were the direct results of the semi-barbarism which it was meant to check.

We have hinted at some of the bad effects induced by this ill custom of ours, and anybody can easily fill out the list, can easily see how surely the perception of good and bad is blunted in the individual, and what that leads to in the mass. It would be instructive, and it would not be difficult, to trace the chain which links together the vile repeater of the Sixth Ward, the 28,000 majority for Hoffman, and the bawling of partisan billingsgate—say gems like this one:

"The Saturday Landslide—the most impudent of the rascally journals which infest and infect our city groggeries—thus attempts to brazen out the villanies whereby the vote of our State was stolen from Grant and Colfax."

MADAME AUDOUARD'S "CONFERENCES."

What the difference is between a "speech" and an "oration" has, we believe, never been exactly defined. At all events we have never grasped this distinction clearly, and we are in much the same haze as regards the distinction in French between a "leçon" and a "conférence." A "leçon" is what in English we call a "lecture," such as professors give in colleges, or distinguished men give on any subject for purposes of instruction. A "conférence" is something, we imagine, more comprehensive, more elevated, more dignified—it is, in short, a "conférence." We should, for instance, if left to ourselves, describe Mr. Greeley's discourse on "Success in Life" as a "leçon," but the lectures which Mr. Emerson has just been delivering in Boston as "conférences;" but if, at that moment, an academician, or other enlightened Frenchman, should appear, and rap us over the knuckles, and assert that we were mistaken, and show wherein, we should at once succumb and never mention the subject again.

We have in our time attended both "leçons" and "conférences," and consequently it was not with the hope of getting any fresh light as to the distinction between them that we attended the opening of Madame Olympe Audouard's "conférences" the other night in the Union League Theatre. We went, of course, mainly to hear what she had to say of Victor Hugo, about whom, considered as a politician, our mind has for some time past been greatly troubled; but also to see in what way a cultivated and accomplished Frenchwoman, who has seen social life on its best side, practised the art of lecturing in public. In what way American women practise it, we know. The public appearance of women as orators may be spoken of as a new thing, and can be called common in the United States only. Those who have appeared among us have, therefore, not unnaturally thus far followed closely in the beaten male track; and, like all women who attempt any art or accomplishment supposed to be peculiarly masculine—such, for instance, as riding on horseback—aim to look as like and act as like men as circumstances will permit. When they appear on the platform, for instance, they carefully lay aside, as far as they can, everything which calls attention to the distinction of sex. They dress with exceeding plainness and in dark colors. They smooth down their hair till it is no longer their glory. They religiously eschew all the "little nothings" which, in the parlor or ball-room, help to heighten their attractions and secure for their opinions a favorable consideration. As far as externals are concerned, they do everything they can to prevent their influence being in any sense a female influence, and talk to the audience "as man to man." Moreover, in some cases, where their physical powers are good and their feelings strong, they approach more or less closely to masculine passionateness in delivery. But it must be admitted that, whether owing to their peculiarities of physique or their peculiarities of training or the prejudices of society, female orators do not succeed very well on the male model. They are not effective when vehement or declamatory; do not add anything, or not much, to the force of what they say by gesticulation; and, in fact, cut a rather sorry figure in the loftier flights of oratory. To sum up, they lay aside their own arts of persuasion, and have thus far not succeeded in completely acquiring those of men.

We have no doubt whatever that when Frenchwomen begin to give their mind to public speaking they will speedily fix the "style" for women on the platform; will decide what is the most effective dress, what the most effective attitude; in short, carry into the new field of activity that wonderful French taste which has done so much for art and for society. We therefore went to hear Madame Audouard in the expectation of getting some new light, and we were not disappointed. She dresses well, and in the last fashion; wears her hair, too, in the last fashion, which happens to be, in this case, becoming, and sits down at a desk and reads her paper with a rich, flexible voice, in the conversational tone, but with the greatest variety and skill in inflection. Nothing of literary value in the paper was lost, and yet she brought to its aid everything which makes or increases a woman's power in the drawing-room. We do not say to her American sisters to copy her; but we feel sure they might profitably get some hints from her.

Of the first lecture—the only one we have heard at this writing—there is really not much to be said by way of criticism. It consisted rather of an elaborate eulogy on Victor Hugo than of an account of him. For many, in fact most, of his recent political performances we think he needs an apologist. His screaming addresses to the radicals of the "wide, wide world" produce, we know, the same unpleasant effect on the best class of liberals in France that they produce on the best class of liberals elsewhere. Madame Audouard neither accounted for them nor defended them; and in fact seemed rather to suppose that what we consider his defects as a politician—and it is only as a politician she treated him—were amongst his virtues. She seemed to suppose, too, that it was of more importance to proclaim him and herself republicans, in order to secure a favorable hearing from her audience, than it really is. Few European radicals, especially Continental radicals, come here without the impression that Americans share their burning hatred of tyrants and aristocrats. But there is really no such feeling. People do not hate what has never troubled them, and the mass of Americans know nothing of kings and nobles except what they read in novels. They therefore, on the whole, rather admire them at this distance. Any unpleasant feeling they have about them is rather one of pity than dislike. There are few Americans who would not like to be dukes, but the idea that dukes might spring up on this soil and give us trouble is one that never enters their heads. In short, though they sympathize politically with foreign republicans, there is nothing they admire so much as sensible and good-hearted people of all political beliefs and social grades. But then, whatever one may think of Madame Audouard's opinions, the charm of hearing her utter them is undoubted, and anybody to whom it is a treat to hear a cultivated Frenchwoman speak pure French with a pure accent and a sweet voice, and see female lecturing treated as an art, cannot do better than go and hear her.

VENETIAN GLASS.

VENICE, October 29, 1868.

YOUR readers may remember a paper on Venetian mosaics inserted in the Nation towards the close of 1866, and I think it may interest them to learn the immense progress attained in this and the glass-blowing department of Signor Salviati's establishment since that date. This progress is owing in part to the intense devotion of the artists educated and trained on the spot; in part to the capital invested by what is called the Anglo-Italian Mosaic and Glass Company, but in reality by Mr. Layard and a few, very few, other English lovers of art, who, fired by the idea of the revival of these lost branches of ancient art, have spared neither pains nor expense nor repeated journeyings to enable the original author of this revival to carry out his conceptions and schemes to their utmost limits. Since I last wrote, the mosaic of the Lord's Supper, designed by Clayton and Bell, and executed in Venice for Westminster Abbey; a life-size figure on gold ground of Niccolo Pisano, from Leighton's design; Apelles and Benozzo Gozzoli, Giorgione, and William of Wykeham, for the new court of South Kensington Museum; the ornamentation on the ceiling of the exterior vestibule of the Mausoleum at Frogmore; the decorations for the spandrels and tympana of the National Memorial to the Prince Consort in Hyde Park, have been completed and despatched, and the English press is loud and unanimous in their praise. These I have not seen; but judging from the portrait of Marco Polo, completed, and that of Columbus, now being executed as a present from the municipality of Venice to Genoa, its one-time foe and rival, I can imagine no verdict too favorable. The same artists are at work as I saw last time in the studio; but practice is each day making them more perfect in the handling of the tiny fragments of enamel—the manufacture of which, especially in the flesh tints, leaves them nothing to envy on a painter's palette. Seen at a distance, but for the resolutely honest lines of the gold enamel background, you would hardly hesitate—not being a critic—to pronounce the portrait of Marco Polo an oil painting by an old master; the expression of the features, the flow of the beard, the folds of the drapery, are so natural and majestic that you can't resist the temptation of going up and touching the picture to be convinced that it is really composed of bits of colored glass. Passing to the private studio, where two artists are at work, one on the face and one on the drapery of the Columbus, you are compelled to admit that the beardless face is still more expressive and the tints still more perfectly graduated than even the Marco Polo. The artist himself is of this opinion, and confesses that he never hoped to attain to such results when he first manipulated the hard, unyielding fragments. One advantage in the present over the past is, that whereas Salviati's artists were, until the present year, entirely dependent on the caprices of that most erratic genius, Laurent Radi, English capital has enabled him to set up furnaces and a manufactory of enamels of his own. It cost him much to separate from the comrade to whose skill and perseverance the recovery of the art of making enamel he freely confesses is owing, but the interests of his establishment were at stake, and he could no longer hesitate. Two of his own workmen affirmed that both the chemical combinations and technical operations were known to them, so giving them carte blanche for material, and shutting them up in the new workshop at Murano, he left them to their own devices, and after several failures, all very costly, they turned out cakes of enamel of every shade and hue, and blocks of rich blooded agates and exquisitely veined chalcedony, which leave nothing to be desired, and, when the first expenses are covered, will be produced for about half the sum hitherto paid to Radi. This, of course, is an immense point gained, as, for an establishment with commissions pouring in from all quarters of the world to be dependent on the caprices of one man for the very dough of which its bread is made, was to run the risk of coming some day to a sudden stand-still. One paste only are Salviati's workmen unable as yet to master, that is the celebrated avventurino, a sort of gold-specked bronze, whose success depends on the paste being fused at the precise second when the gold crystallizes. Trial after trial has been made, but the block comes out of the furnace a solid mass of lifeless bronze; so that for the time being the artists are dependent on two firms who possess the secret of the useful and capricious avventurino. So satisfied are the Venetian authorities with these enamels that the reparation of the mosaics in St. Mark's is entrusted to his artists, and whereas formerly he was only called upon to supply the enamel, his men are now summoned to work them out, following the old designs when possible, and replacing them with new ones where no traces remain to guide the eye. The best praise to be given to this undertaking is that competent judges are unable to detect the new mosaics from the old.

I have given the mosaics the first place, as I suppose is their due; but I confess that the glass-blowing department is to me far more fascinating. On the very eve of our arrival I was attracted by the new shop at the corner of St. Mark's Square, under the Procuratie Vecchie, glistening and gleaming with colors as soft and varied and iridescent as the necks of St. Mark's own doves; chandeliers and mirrors, vases, urns, chalices, cups, bowls, and wine-glasses—each one seemingly of varied hue and form. Here, also, progress is gloriously evident; the vases of imitation agate, the exquisite blending of opal and ruby, the fiamma-smelze and avventurino, have all gained in purity and intensity; the old forms sought for with passionate eagerness all over Europe, cheerfully lent by the Brussels and Brescian Museums, are reproduced with perfect exactitude; and, in several branches of this art, even reluctant connoisseurs admit that the descendants of the old Murano glass-blowers have surpassed their ancestors. On the morrow I crossed the Grand Canal, and, landing at the mosaic and glass establishment, stood spell-bound at the entrance of the central room, where the largest chandelier ever produced in glass is hung, awaiting its four companions, ere it goes to decorate the ball-room of the palace of Giovanelli—one of the several millionaires of Venice. It consists of three tiers of transparent, ruby-tinted branches, each tier separated by exquisite leaves and flowers. The three flower garlands that hide the central arrangements are a perfectly new invention, and as perfect a success. Though seemingly one united whole, the chandelier is composed of hundreds of pieces, which are taken apart and packed and put together again with the utmost ease, thus rendering their packing for foreign parts safe and of small compass. The flower-garlanded mirrors are equally beautiful; the new lamps for gas are admirably adapted for the purpose, while their price brings them within the reach of all who have imbibed Ruskin's just horror of cut-glass barbarities. The workmen have attained to such deftness in manipulating their paste that the opal plates and central pieces for the dinner-table, the chalcedony urns and vases, which, owing to their size, were rarely completed without some blemish, are now turned out with a precision scarcely hoped for a couple of years since.

Quitting the establishment, I at once took a gondola for Murano; and, landing at a new and much larger building than that of 1866, found all the old artists at their posts—the best artist of that year promoted to the post of designer and director of the glass-room—together with half-a-dozen lads who promise in a very short time to become as deft and clever as their teachers. Five furnaces were alight; the head artist, a lineal descendant of the same Saguso who, four hundred years ago, was famous among his fellows as a glass-blower, was completing a table chandelier for the new Venetian Casino; the second was blowing flowers for the same; a lad of fourteen was manipulating a lovely opal vase; the rest blowing wine-glasses and chalices; the smaller urchins cutting and preparing the rods of aqua marina and smelze. Perfect silence prevailed, as usual; the bright, earnest eyes of each workman watching the forms that blossomed from their steady, delicate fingers, the director now and then suggesting the possible danger to an almost completed work, or a possible improvement in a second specimen. Although the process is now familiar to me, I cannot repress the wonder and admiration of the perfect results produced by this practised obedience of the hand to the color and form-appreciating eye; for it must be borne in mind that every object is formed by two men—the artist and his assistant. Let the assistant present his rod with the streaming metal at the end in too large a piece or too hot or too cold, let him withdraw it an instant sooner or later than he ought, and his master's work is spoiled; let the master himself blow too hard through his rod, or turn it in air a trifle too high, or manipulate it in the furnace too swiftly or too slowly, and failure is the result. With the best hands failure is now rare; with the lads, frequent; and years pass before they are able to make two objects of the same size and form.

The commissions in the glass departments are so numerous that the managers are at their wits' ends to get them executed, as they can take on no new hands, only the trained workmen and lads being up to the task. The pay is good—for Venice, immense—one hundred francs per week to the best workmen; twenty francs per week to even the lads of fourteen.

When I first heard of the Anglo-Italian Company I feared much that British practicality would subordinate beauty to utility; but when, on my second visit to Murano, I saw Mr. Layard as eager and intent as Salviati himself on the success of a new combination—a plate of milk-white centre and purple transparent border—my fears vanished at once. The object of this true and noble artist is simply and solely to enable the Venetians to recover, at least in this department, their lost supremacy. So far the British practicality enters that they have wisely separated the artistic from the administrative department, Salviati retaining the former and a new director the latter. The packing branch has gained considerably, as, in days gone by, purchasers of the fairy fabrics at the establishment were shocked and disheartened to receive a box of fragments packed with apparent care in sea-weed, or rather lagoon-weed, and wool. Breakages now rarely occur in the transport, so that foreigners may safely venture out orders from all parts of the world. The London trade is brisk. A branch establishment is now preparing in Paris and Vienna. Yesterday seven huge cases were despatched to Norton, in San Francisco, and I hear that the New Yorkers are beginning to appreciate Venetian enamel mosaics and Venetian glass at their full value.

"YORK, YOU'RE WANTED."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: Your correspondent, "C. J. H.," has pointed out an error of a word in my review of Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations," which I am glad to have corrected. Instead of saying "in 1832, when the Duke of York became insolvent," I should have said, "after the Duke of York became insolvent." The truth is, I was quoting from memory (always a bad practice), my authority being "Notes and Queries," 3d series, Vol. X., p. 355, where the editor says that the phrase, "York, you're wanted" was "in great request, in 1832, among the creditors of the late Duke of York." This assertion is confirmed by the enclosed note, just received from my learned friend, Mr. J. J. Reed, author of "Outlines of Universal History." The phrase in question is certainly a "quotation," and happening to be "familiar" to me, I mentioned it rather in the hope of affording material for a new edition of Mr. Bartlett's "attempts to trace to their source passages and phrases in common use," than with the desire to find fault with that excellent work.

The Editor of "Lippincott's Magazine."

Office of Lippincott's Magazine, Philadelphia, November 14, 1868.

(No. 2.)

Editor of Lippincott's Magazine:

Dear Sir: I observe in the Nation of November 12 a communication from "C. J. H." respecting the phrase, "York, you're wanted," in which he says that this "slang expression never had reference to the Duke of York." In this assertion "C. J. H." is wrong. I was in London from 1827 to 1834, and remember having frequently heard the expression, though not exclusively applied to the duke. It was, however, directly applied to his memory in several facetious ways on the occasion of erecting the granite column called the Duke of York's Column, at the top of the flight of steps leading from Waterloo Place to St. James's Park, which took place somewhere about 1830, as well as I can recollect, but I will not be positive on the point. The duke died in 1827, deeply in debt, and one of the current jokes of the day was that his friends had placed him at the top of the column to keep him out of the reach of his creditors, who might, therefore, shout out "York, you're wanted" until they were tired.

You are in error in saying he died in 1832, but in all other respects you are correct as to the origin and use of the expression in question.

Yours faithfully, Jos. J. Reed.

340 South Fifteenth Street, Philadelphia, November 13, 1868.

[We do not know what Mr. Reed does with "C. J. H.'s" statement that "York, you're wanted" became familiarized publicly from the musical drama of "The Slave," wherein it is applied to a knowing character, Matthew Sharpset, a wide-awake Yorkshireman. Apparently he believes the suggestion therein contained a mistaken one. Otherwise the magazinist cannot be "correct as to the origin" of the phrase. "C. J. H." should have given the date of "The Slave's" popularity. —Ed. Nation.]

LITERARY.

Messrs. Roberts Brothers have made arrangements with the conductors of Littell's Living Age under which Auerbach's new novel, "The Villa on the Rhine," will be reprinted in that magazine in weekly instalments. The best of all the eclectic periodicals is just entering on its hundredth volume. A better than ordinary taste presides over the selection of the articles, and one gets in it a tolerably good view of the whole field of English monthly, quarterly, and weekly literature; the Continental literature is not so well attended to. By the way, the Staats-Zeitung of this city, which is printing the original of "The Villa on the Rhine" in weekly instalments, pays Auerbach a handsome sum for leave to do so; the English audience of the novelist will not, we hope, be any less honorably purveyed for.

—The Detroit Post makes the mistake of saying that the following paragraph appeared in the Nation. It sounds like a precious bit of the dreariest of feeble imitations of the London Review's imitations of the Saturday Review's social articles. Who did it we do not know, but we know that we are not responsible for it:

"Money," says the Nation, "is rapidly growing to be our solitary social test: at once the corner-stone and coping of that gorgeous edifice which is known as our best society. We do not at all enquire whether a man or woman is virtuous or cultivated in order to admit them to the sacred circles of our élite, but only if they are rich."

In our opinion, we are not so far gone, socially or otherwise.

—Professor W. D. Whitney's "Language and the Study of Language," which is in its second edition in England, and its third or fourth in this country, has been, to a certain extent, adopted as a class-book. To adapt it more perfectly to this use its author has prepared an edition which consists of a sixteen-page synopsis or analysis of the work, and which cannot fail to be of considerable value to teachers and pupils, as well as to all general readers who read carefully; for it will, so to speak, emphasize the author's style, which, perhaps, needs a little emphasizing to suit general readers, who are but a lazy breed, although scholars delight in its perfect fitness for the subject and the spirit in which it should be handled. As a specimen of the character of the addition, we give a portion of the analysis of the sixth chapter:

"LECTURE VI.

"1. Review; survey of the branches of Indo-European language; our next task a more detailed survey.

"2. Divisions of Germanic branch; Low-German group; English and its direct ancestors; Frisian; Old Saxon; their fate; Netherlandish; Flemish.

"3. High-German group; its three periods; their date, ruling dialects, and literatures.

"4. Scandinavian group; Icelandic records; their date and importance; modern Scandinavian dialects.

"5. Extinct groups; Ulfilas's Bible-version; Mœso-Gothic; its importance.

"6. Slavonic branch; Church Slavic; Russian; other dialects of the south-eastern group; principal languages of the western group.

"7. Lithuanic group; its relation to Slavonic; source of its interest; its dialects.

"8. Celtic branch; its present narrow dimensions; its decay and probable extinction; Celtomania."

Of all future American editions this new matter will form a part, and persons owning a copy of the earlier editions can, of course, be supplied by Scribner & Co. with the analysis in its separate form.

—It appears that in June last a lady—a Briton, as we understand it—on a Boston steamer then on its way to England, declared to all on board that in her they beheld the veritable "Ouida." Still further to deceive, this schemer presented to her fellow-travellers many copies of "Under Two Flags." So Ouida herself says in a letter to her American publishers, a copy of which she sends by them to various American journals. She desires also to contradict a paragraph in a recent number of the Gaulois, to the effect that a celebrated mask—namely, that of the admired and mysterious Ouida—had fallen on the nuptial altar when Mrs. Montgomery Atwood was married to Mr. Home Payne, at the British Embassy in Paris. Mrs. Atwood is not Ouida, and Mr. Home Payne is consequently, and we may presume entirely to his satisfaction, not the husband of the mysterious authoress. Finally, any one who knows of other instances of "this form of literary larceny" will much oblige Ouida if they will send her a letter through Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. Ouida seems to be developing a talent for advertising, we should say.

—We have just received the last Annual Report of the President of the Michigan State University to the Board of Regents of that institution, in which he discusses two important questions: 1st, Shall a Professor of Homœopathy be added to the Faculty of Medicine? 2d, Shall women be admitted to the privileges of the university? As long ago as the year 1855 a law was enacted declaring "that there shall always be at least one professor of homœopathy in the department of medicine." This law remained a dead letter, the Board of Regents refusing to execute it, and claiming, we believe, that as an independent body corporate, deriving their existence from the constitution of the State, they are coequal with the Legislature, and therefore not bound to obey its behests. In 1867, the State Legislature failing to bring the university to terms by paper ordinances, tried what virtue there was in more substantial bribes, and offered pecuniary aid to the institution, on condition that the said law should be carried into effect. The Regents took the subject into consideration, but, owing to the violent opposition which it met with on the part of the medical faculty, attempted to compromise, but in reality complicated the difficulty, by establishing a homœopathic school "as a part of the university, but to be located in some other town than Ann Arbor." Even this concession did not satisfy the "regular physicians," who deemed themselves professionally contaminated by the remotest association with what they denounced as "dishonest quackery." The question, however, was finally settled by the Supreme Court, which decided that the arrangement contemplated by the Regents was not a compliance with the law, and would not entitle the university to the promised pecuniary aid. Thus the whole matter comes up anew. Dr. Haven thinks that the law of 1855 should be repealed, and gives several pages of reasons why the execution of it would be injurious to the interests of the university and also of true science; but, in strange contradiction to his previous argumentation, he concludes by saying "that the Regents ought to respect the will of the people, and must in the end accept the aid tendered by the State on the conditions insisted upon." Dr. Haven's discussion of the general topic we regard as far more ingenious than ingenuous. His statement that there is no such school of medicine as "Allopathy," but that this appellation is a nickname bestowed upon the regular medical profession by their enemies [see also his address, "Duties of the Medical Profession," p. 10], is not historically correct. Allopathy is only another word for contraria contrariis, an ancient dogma of therapeutics, which was the recognized rule of healing long before Hahnemann was born, and which suggested to him his formula of similia similibus. Stahl, in a treatise published in 1738, refers to the principle of healing by contraries as the regular medical practice, and we might cite hundreds of authorities in proof of our assertion, going back twenty-three centuries to Hippocrates himself. To speak of the regular school of physicians as "embracing the whole orb of the science and art of medicine and surgery" is as absurd as to say that the Church of Rome embraces the whole orb of theological truth and saving faith because it styles itself "Catholic." Would Dr. Haven be willing to accept a Romish priest's exposition of Methodism simply because the Papacy claims to be synonymous and coextensive with Christianity, and stigmatizes all sects as damnable heresies? And why should homœopathy be given over to the tender mercies of its avowed enemies to be interpreted and represented by them in our medical schools, merely because "regular physicians profess to embrace the whole orb of science and art," and "are, by their professed basis of action, forbidden to shut out light from any source?" Dr. Haven's own allusions (in his address) to "sweetened water as a medicine," to "the unintelligible and incredible dogma that infinitesimal quantities of our common drugs can perceptibly affect the human system," etc., indicate the spirit in which the homœopathic system would be expounded under such circumstances. We are not refuting or defending the doctrine of infinitesimal doses or any other theory of medicine; our object is to expose the absurdity and unfairness of insisting that homœopathy should be satisfied with having allopaths (or "regular physicians," if you choose; the name is of no consequence) for its authorized expounders. Such a plan would be scarcely more just or acceptable than the arrangement by which a Capuchin used to preach in the Ghetto on the wickedness and stiff-neckedness of the Jews.

— As regards the second question, Dr. Haven favors what has been called the "Epicene" system of education, or the admission of women to the university on the same conditions as men. We have always doubted, and still doubt, the wisdom of this movement, and the experience of those colleges where it has been tried is not very encouraging. Thus far it has succeeded better in Europe than in America, as regards the highest institutions of scientific and professional learning. This may be due to the smaller number of women there who enter upon such courses of study, so that the character of the university is not modified or in any way affected by their presence. In our country the applicants, being far more numerous, would give tone to the whole system of instruction. We believe that a young woman should have every possible opportunity of studying all the branches of knowledge to which she desires to devote her faculties. The only question at issue is as to the best means of attaining this end. In our opinion, the most satisfactory results can be realized by the liberal organization and ample endowment of separate schools. If there be one profession for which woman's peculiar tact and temperament render her better fitted than for any other, it is that of medicine; and yet it would be almost impossible for her to pursue this study in all its branches in the same auditorium and dissecting-room with the opposite sex. We have before us Dr. Haven's report for 1867, in which he takes very strong ground against the admission of women to an institution "originated and planned upon a different idea," and declares that it could not be done "without a radical revolution" which would "give a totally new character to the university, and infallibly be attended with a temporary breaking up of its prosperity and success." He also cites such authorities as Horace Mann and President Finney to show that the consequences of "so hazardous a step" would be "terrible." In the present report he says that "the most of what is urged against it is fanciful, and partakes of the nature of the thoughtless opposition made to what is new." If Dr. Haven has received any new light sufficient to account for his entire change of views on this subject, he certainly does not impart it to the public in his last report. We hope it is not a part of his new policy to metamorphose what has been so frequently called "the great University of the West" into a college like Antioch or Oberlin, in obedience to the clamors of "those who theorize on this matter without practical experience" (Report for 1867, p. 12). But we have no space for the further consideration of a topic which has been repeatedly discussed in our columns. As regards the literary character of Dr. Haven's report, we must say that it lacks the elegance and dignity which we usually expect to find in official documents emanating from such a source. "Matters have subsided into their normal condition" is not a model phrase; and the uniform orthography of "homœopathy," "homœopathic," etc., has not yet been naturalized by Webster.

—Mr. F. Kapp, in composing a work on the German emigration to this country, has judged rightly that without a knowledge of this and similar movements the history of America cannot be understood or rightly written,

To take the nearest instance: a little reflection will convince us that while the accessions to our population from Ireland added directly to the power of the Southern oligarchy, and enabled it, by means of the Democratic party, to extend its triumph, and apparently to render itself invincible, the same immigrants prepared the North for the ultimate trial of arms by helping to build up its material prosperity; and that, on the other hand, the Irish, Germans, and other European colonists together made it clear to the South that slavery must go to the wall by sheer force of numbers in the free States. Hence that methodical mania for acquiring fresh territory for slavery, and the increasing violence of the measures in support of the institution wherever planted and wherever carried or in transitu. Hence the rapid culmination of the conspiracy against the Union, which might have been delayed for half a century with a less populous and flourishing North. And again, thirty years ago, Brazil, which has attracted even Icelanders to leave their country, seemed likely to gather to itself an enormous immigration from Germany. Slavery and land monopoly, naturally attended by negligence and bad faith, in providing for the new-comers, caused this stream to be almost dried up; it was, in fact, diverted to the United States, and for like causes to the North only—showing what slavery in Brazil had to do with emancipation here. In this last movement one person has been especially prominent, as we once mentioned with due praise. This is Mr. Consul J. J. Sturz, of Berlin, whose life has been devoted to the welfare of his emigrating countrymen; who first led them to Brazil in good faith, then warned them against it while recommending the United States, and has never ceased warning and recommending. There is still a feeble German emigration to Brazil, for there are German colonies there; and the speculators most interested in keeping this up, meeting only with exposure and opposition from Mr. Sturz, have retaliated with personal abuse and misrepresentation. Both parties have resorted freely to the press with charges and rejoinders, and now we notice that Mr. Sturz, whose activity knows no limit, has summed up his own case in the controversy with Herr Blumenau in a book or brochure entitled "Die deutsche Auswanderung und die Verschleppung deutscher Auswanderer. Mit speciellen Dokumenten" (German Emigration and the Scattering of German Emigrants, with special documents). We have not yet seen it, but we venture to say that it is an authentic and valuable companion to any history of Brazil.

—The English lists are very full of new books. The Rev. F. Barham Zincke is one of the Queen's chaplains, we believe, and a good friend of America. He is to publish a book full of table-talk collected during a winter tour through the South and West. But Mr. Trollope's latest performance was not of a reassuring kind, nor Mr. Dixon's, nor is Mr. Arthur Sketchley's, which is worthy of his kind half a century ago. Professor Pearson has, however, been writing sensibly about us of late, and so has Mr. Leslie Stephen. But, unfortunately, men such as they are not of the tribe of bookmakers. Perhaps we should not talk; we have an ambassador in England worth a thousand of the readiest writers for bringing us into contempt. Another of Mr. Murray's announcements will be of special interest to Americans, namely, "Travels and Adventures on the River Yukon," by Frederick Whymper. Mr. Plumptre has translated the tragedies of Æschylus, which will be agreeable news to people who know his Sophocles. His publisher is Mr. Strahan, who also will publish "The Legends of King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table," a work by an anonymous compiler, and one which may be anything, but might very well be made in the interest of the public to whom Tennyson has made this great cycle of romance familiar. "The Great Russian Fabulist; or, Krilof and his Fables," translated by Mr. W. R. S. Ralston, will very likely be worth the attention of our publishers of "juveniles." Mr. Arthur Helps, we think we have said before, is at work on a "Life of Columbus," which is needed, but which he, for more reasons than one, is not just the man to give us. His "Life of Las Casas" is fair enough biography, but it is not more. Then, for another thing, he is so excellent a smallish Emerson—so far as Emerson is a "conduct of life" philosopher, a Yankee rather than a Brahmin—when he is writing "Friends in Council" or "Realmah," and is so agreeable a humorist, that we rather begrudge him to biography. Bell & Daldy are Mr. Helps's publishers, and also are Hans Christian Andersen's, who appears this time with his "Later Tales" (1867–68). "Old Burchell's Pocket" is a holiday book by Elihu Burritt, who doubtless had in mind his friend Goldsmith's Mr. Burchell when he selected his plan and title. The translator of "L'Oiseau" is going to give us "Mysteries of the Ocean," from the French of Arthur Nangin. What a "Book of Studies," by Mr. W. H. Dixon, is, we do not know, but probably it is a collection of historical sketches. We mention last some books of the special literature of sports and pastimes. They are published by Virtue & Yorston, and are by the Hon. Francis Lawley, who writes on racing and shooting; Mr. Leslie Stephen, who writes on Alpine climbing and rowing; Mr. Anthony Trollope, whose subject is hunting; Mr. Charles Mereweather, whose subject is cricket; Mr. Edward Pigott and Mr. James Bertram, who respectively treat of yachting and fishing. These will not be ordinary books of their species, but worth attention. A periodical soon to be issued some of our readers will be glad to hear about. It is to be issued intermittently by Messrs. Kent & Co., who publish it for certain club-room devotees of whist and chess. It will be mainly composed of games and problems, but not wholly so composed.

—For our religious, or rather for our clerical readers, we mention these works, not long since announced by the English houses: "The Metaphors of Saint Paul," by J. S. Howson; "Village Sermons on the Baptismal Service," by Keble; "Eleven Short Addresses" by Pusey, delivered during a "retreat" of the "Companions of the Love of Jesus engaged in perpetual intercession for the conversion of sinners;" "England's Antiphon," by George Macdonald; "Chief Lessons of the Epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Thessalonians," by J. M. Deniston; and a three-volume edition of W. Carpenter's "Introduction to the Reading and Study of the English Bible."

—Emanuel Geibel, the eminent German poet, having written a festal song for the late reception at Lübeck—the poet's native town—of King William of Prussia, in which he expressed the hope of a speedy union of the whole of Germany under the lead of that monarch, has been deprived by the young King of Bavaria of a pension of fifteen hundred florins granted him by the late King Maximilian. Geibel, in consequence of this, intends quitting the University of Munich, at which he has been professor of philosophy since 1852. The matter creates considerable indignation throughout Germany, and the Prussian Government is urged by the press to indemnify the writer for his loss, so patriotically incurred, especially as advanced age and feeble health would render it a hard task for him to sustain himself by his literary labor alone. The latest poetical production of Geibel is a tragedy, "Sophonisbe," which, a few weeks ago, was played for the first time at the Vienna Burgtheater, and received with great favor, the author, who was present, being hailed with applause on the termination of each act.—Dr. Streiter, the Burgomaster of the town of Botzen, and its representative at the Tyrolese Diet, has, under the title of "Blätter aus Tyrol," published a series of sketches of the recent political history and of the present condition of that highly interesting, but comparatively so little known, Alpine country. The book is said to shed a great deal of light on the system of clerical bondage by which the brave Tyrolese mountaineers have so long and so effectually been kept aloof from the intellectual movements of the rest of Germany, and to represent their hero, Andreas Hofer, not as a martyr to the cause of liberty and independence, but as a devoted tool of religious fanaticism. As soon as received in this country, we shall lay a part of its contents before our readers.

—The Italians appear to be less dissatisfied than we had supposed they might be with Austria's partial restitution of archives, etc., to Venice. Another city has also been fortunate in recovering similar treasures. By freeing the estates of the Duke of Modena from sequestration, the Italian Government has induced him to restore to his late subjects upwards of fourteen thousand medals and coins, mostly gold and silver; more than a thousand precious stones, of various sizes and values; and paintings which include a Giorgione, a Correggio, and a Raphael. These belonged to the Museum and Pinacoteca. The Library gets back much valuable property, fifteen volumes especially being precious; among them a Dante of the fourteenth century, admirably preserved, and adorned with a priceless miniature; three volumes of Tasso's autographs; an autograph album rich in the handwriting of ancient authors and distinguished men, embracing several specimens of Savonarola's; an ancient Biblia pauperum, of great antiquity and curiously illustrated; an Evangelario Greco of the tenth century, etc., etc. These and the Venetian materials together offer a fine field to aspiring historians. Trieste, which Italy is loth to consider foreign territory, has just bought of Dr. Peter Kandler, an eminent archæologist of the city, his manuscript history of the province of Istria, and of Trieste itself. It consists of three parts, and is in three huge volumes; the periods treated of extend (1) from the remotest times to Charlemagne, (2) from 789 to 1382, when the Commune of Trieste was surrendered to the House of Austria, and (3) from the date last mentioned to 1809. An immense number of tables and topographical maps accompany this labor of a lifetime, which sold for 7,000 florins. The city government was liberal enough to purchase at the same time, for 3,000 florins additional, a vast quantity of collateral and illustrative matter, such as parchments, diplomas, original statutes of the Middle Ages, etc., which comprised Dr. Kandler's collection. Every one will now wish that this history be printed to preserve it from the danger of being lost or destroyed.

THE LIFE AND VOYAGES OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.*

A NEW edition of Irving's Columbus has lately been presented to the public. A new edition, however, is not what the public want, but an entirely new book; another Life, by another American, is demanded. Forty years have gone by since Mr. Irving first published this work. Since then a generation has passed away, and the subject, meanwhile, has grown into colossal proportions, and into greater historical importance. It is not merely the life and adventures of the renowned navigator that attract, it is the age, with its incidents, in which he flourished that needs description. The tradition respecting the appearance of Washington Irving's work is, that it was not so much due to his desire to please readers as his wish to satisfy the interests of Mr. John Murray, the bookseller. Navarette, a Spanish writer, had recently brought out in Madrid some volumes of voyages and discoveries which contained many things new, interesting, and instructive about Columbus; and Mr. Irving proposed to translate these narratives if Mr. Murray would undertake the printing. The publisher, however, declined the speculation, but said that if Mr. Irving would write a Life of Columbus, incorporating Navarette's revelations, he would most willingly accept the manuscript.

From this negotiation sprang the Life now before us. Navarette's publication furnished the basis of the plan; the other portions were secondary, introduced to embellish the facts drawn from the Spanish source. Hence the paucity of historical illustration, but hence the elaboration in style and language. The haste in which the task was done is the excuse to cover a multitude of historical sins. The literary world was delighted with the Life; it was charmed with the new light in which Columbus was portrayed; but the entire insufficiency of the book has long been patent.

For example, the author has taken some trouble to present many instances of the ignorance existing among the monks of the fifteenth century on astronomical science and geography; but it was not the ignorance which required delineation; on the contrary, it was the true state of knowledge among the learned. This instruction might have been obtained from a careful study of the maps of Ptolemy, and from the expositions of physical philosophy as then taught by the mathematicians. It is true the manuscripts of the Egyptian were in some confusion, and the sciences, as taught by professors, were far from being exact. But Mr. Irving seems to have shunned the research, and consequently has left cosmography in as much confusion and uncertainty as he found it among the illiterate of that period. Whether the earth, in its configuration, was viewed as a plane or a sphere, the author does not undertake to decide; and yet no fact in the history of science is more easy of demonstration than that all persons of scientific attainments were then as confident of its being spherical as they are now. From this oversight or neglect in examination the author has been led into several serious mistakes.

The defective method on which the Life was constructed inevitably led to countless errors; it is only surprising that there are not more. For a proper understanding of the greatness of Columbus, and of his achievements, not only the progress of intellectual culture in Europe, but the political condition of Spain, and the general policy pervading Christendom, required a short consideration. These have been omitted. The consequence has been that the plainest facts are sometimes misstated or misunderstood. Ferdinand and Isabella have been presented as joint occupants of the same throne; whereas, although married, the one was in sole possession of the crown of Aragon and the other of Castile. No rights of survivorship could be claimed by either. When Columbus made his proposition to them to fit out an expedition, it might have been accepted on the joint account of both sovereigns, or on the separate account of one of them. At the time Ferdinand, King of Castile, by courtesy, was aiding his wife with his chivalry of Aragon to effect the conquest of the Moors of Granada. But the war was being prosecuted solely at the cost of the treasury of Castile. Aragon was too poor to afford financial assistance; and if a conquest were accomplished, all the territorial and other direct advantages would accrue to the queen's separate crown. Mr. Irving, however, states erroneously that it was a conquest by Ferdinand, and became his possession. Fortunately, by the royal marriage, the Christian realms of Spain were united in their councils and in their co-operation; fortunately, at the same time, the Caliphs of Spain were at discord and divided.

Columbus, under the circumstances, addressed his petition to Isabella while Ferdinand looked on approvingly, feeling an interest in the speculation; for if it resulted favorably in leading to important discoveries, he himself might not derive any accession of territory thereby, but his children would reap the profit by inheritance from their mother, the queen. Her royal council of Castile discountenanced the project; her kingdom was drained to the last ducat; and where was the money to come from? Nor was the news of the Portuguese explorations along the west coast of Africa encouraging. That nation had been expending funds for twenty years, their ships had reached the line, but where were the revenues in return? Nothing was to be shown for all their expenditures, and still further advances were called for. The council of Castile unanimously rejected the proposal, but they set it aside with reluctance, as business men would resist a rich temptation. Yet these are the persons who are represented in history as the mortal enemies of Columbus, and therefore bad men, while the courtiers who had no official responsibility at stake, and who encouraged him, are represented as his friends, and therefore all good men. Columbus, standing by in the suffering character of the mildest-mannered man and corsair that ever scuttled ship or cut a throat, hinted that if Castile would not hearken unto him, he must go elsewhere to close a bargain; to Portugal, to England, to France. Now, the truth was he had already tried them all, and failed. Portugal had enough of explorations on hand; England was too poor, Henry VII. pretended; and from France nothing was to be hoped for. But these facts in his frankness he somehow forgot to mention at the court of Isabella.

The queen pondered much, and was deeply perplexed what to do. There was no one she could call on to aid her. Her royal council was decidedly against the scheme; it was not within the province of her confessor to interfere; for his functions required him to be versed in casuistry and learned in civil and canon law, but not in matters of finance. A confessor to the queen was altogether another occupation from that of a confessor to a simple female communicant. In one capacity he supervised the condition of her soul; in the other he gave ghostly council of the just duties she owed to her people. In a word, he was her attorney-general. Isabella might indeed appeal for light to guide her conduct to his Holiness the Pontiff in Rome. But what advice would come of it her courtiers well knew before that step should be taken.

Alexander VI. then occupied the Papal throne. He was a Spaniard, he was a Borgia, and both Mr. Irving and Doctor Robertson before him have laid great stress upon the fact that he was also an atheist. But his theological opinions are as foreign to the question as his personal habits; whether he attended vespers with regularity, or dressed his evening salad with oil extracted from olives of his native Valentia or from the more distant fruit of Dalmatia, is an idle speculation. No one asserted that he was a saint, but no one denied that he was a statesman; and it was in his political character, not his religious, he was to be consulted. He was the great head of the Church, the guardian of civilization, the common counsellor for all Christian princes in authority, now menaced with destruction by the Turk, from the preponderating strength of his armies by land, and from the supremacy of his navies at sea. It seemed at the moment as if the sway of the Sultan would not be checked by the Balkan, but soon embrace the waters of the Biscay, the Baltic, and the German Ocean. The court of Constantinople had absolute control of the India commerce, and possession of the ports of the Levant through which that commerce had to pass in its transit to Western Europe. The tribute exacted from Christian shipping produced ample funds to support the barbaric armies and fleets. The balance of trade was decidedly in favor of the Ottoman Empire.

To counteract these advantages on the part of the infidel, His Holiness was intent on inculcating harmony and peace among Christian communities in order to ensure unity of action, and he was enforcing by vigorous measures the counsel which he gave. He was also encouraging those whose realms were in proximity with the Atlantic to seek for a new passage to the Indies by some new route, which would emancipate Christendom from the heavy taxation to Constantinople. The Pope was indifferent what kingdom should make the discovery; it was enough that it was made by a Christian potentate. Isabella therefore knew what was to be expected, and did not apply to Rome.

The queen finally referred the measure to an assembly of pious, God-fearing men convoked to meet at Salamanca. Columbus was ordered to attend to make all needful explanations. The author has presented a synopsis of the proceedings of these clergy, and of their ignorance as displayed in the discussion. They quoted from the Scriptures and from the Fathers to prove that Columbus did not understand his business. The navigator made suitable replies, and the sessions were protracted. The result was what the queen had anticipated; she would have been pleased if the priests, instead of citing passages only from St. Augustine and Lactantius, had proceeded to read the whole body of theology; her object from the first was to procrastinate, to keep Columbus in suspense until the siege of Granada was ended. Mr. Irving does not perceive that the council of Salamanca was a sham, but Columbus must have seen through the motive, and was much disgusted. Had Isabella seriously desired correct information, many persons in her own household, graduates of Padua, Pisa, and Salamanca, could have been found competent to give it.

Granada at last fell, and now the queen resolved to furnish the funds for the expedition. But the treasury of Castile was exhausted. In this exigency Isabella declared she would pledge her jewels rather than witness the failure of the project. The receiver-general of the ecclesiastical revenues of Aragon took her at her word. The money was forthcoming by him, and the jewels put up; for in those days the money-changer was as imperative in his demands for security from sovereigns as the tailor from Sir John Falstaff. The author represents this incident confusedly and incorrectly. It is hinted that the gems were not pledged and that the funds came from the treasury of Ferdinand. But no fact in history is better established than that of their being pawned and that the treasury of Aragon took no part in the transaction. Ecclesiastical revenues do not appertain to the state, they belong to the Church; sovereigns had no control over them. But Mr. Irving will insist that Ferdinand, the husband of the queen, was jointly interested with her in the discovery He had no more to do with it than Prince Albert of Coburg had to do with the Crimean war.

When Columbus returned from his first voyage to bring back intelligence of his success, the sovereigns took measures to secure the sanction of the Pontiff to the acquisition of the new lands. Ferdinand, says our author, despatched ambassadors to Rome to hint he was determined to maintain his title to the discoveries, and instructing them to state that, in the opinion of many learned men, the possession of the sovereigns did not require the Papal consent; still they supplicated His Holiness to issue a bull making a cession of sovereignty to the crown of Castile. A bull was accordingly issued of cession to the Spanish crown. It is difficult to imagine how Mr. Irving, the most elegant and careful of scribes, could have written a paragraph so faulty in its grammatical structure, of which the above is the substance. Nouns and pronouns are scattered, singular and plural, in admirable incongruity, as if stranded by a tidal wave in an earthquake. It is evident he never saw a copy of the bull, and quite possible he did not know of the existence of a written petition to the Pontiff. He was in as much blissful innocence of all knowledge about the contents of both as he was of Ptolemy's astronomical epicycles.

It was always customary for Ferdinand to sign state papers along with Isabella, even where the subject-matter pertained exclusively to the crown of Castile. They transmitted a petition through their ambassador resident at Rome, but they did not send a special embassy; history is explicit on this point. No "hint" was given of the opinion of learned men in the premises; but the fact that eminent jurists thought no confirmation of sovereignty requisite from the Pope was set out in the petition itself. It was not, however, stated as a hint, but by way of a legal protest. The occasion that brought it forth was this: For ages it had been conceded that under the power of the keys the Pope had authority to depose bad sovereigns and bestow their kingdoms on the good, to promote the spread of the Gospel and ensure the welfare of the Christian world. But Rome had so frequently abused this divine prerogative that the times seemed to demand the total abrogation of its exercise. Therefore, when a king sent a petition for the sovereignty of new lands discovered, lest it might be used against him thereafter as a precedent, the writing embodied a protest saving the right to question the power to grant what was asked for. In the present case Alexander VI. made the gift without a moment's hesitation; it was in conformity with the general usage; but it was made to the crown of Castile and Leon, not to the crown of Aragon and Navarre. It was for the benefit exclusively of the sovereign and people of Castile and Leon. The subjects of Aragon for more than two centuries were as rigidly prohibited from setting foot in Spanish America as Frenchmen.

And now were realized the dreams of Columbus and the hopes of Christendom. A new route to the Indies was opened. The face of Europe, religiously, commercially, politically, underwent an immediate change. The precious products of the East, freed from Ottoman taxation, fell to one-fourth of their former money value; the staples of the West, stimulated by the increased supply of coin from the mines of Mexico and Peru, more than doubled in price in the market. The line of travel for caravans by the Euxine and Caspian to the Orient was nearly abandoned; the ports of the Levant, deserted by Christian shipping, exhibited comparatively the solitude of the Dead Sea. Nations that had stood so long trembling on the defensive against the Turk took heart and became the assailant. The two most powerful states, and situated on the flanks, began the assault. Spain on the right, resting on the Pillars of Hercules, with her squadrons carried the war into Africa; Poland on the left, extending far into Scythia and the frozen ocean, poured her battalions down the Danube. In much less than a century the Mohammedan empire had sunk to a second-rate naval power, and was no longer formidable. In 1490 the Christian faith was in danger in Great Britain; in 1590 the Moslem was in peril on the shores of the Bosphorus. Such were some of the effects and mighty results of the genius, energy, and daring of one man. In this aspect his life, as written by Washington Irving, cannot fill the measure of just expectations. It may possess great merit as a book for ardent, ingenious school-boys, but it no longer serves as a history for men.

ILLUSTRATED LIFE OF KATHRINA.*

Dr. Holland's poem was reviewed in the Nation about a year ago, and now comes a new edition printed on tinted paper and in ornamental style, and illustrated by some seventy wood-cuts. It is the first gift-book of the year, and is probably as good—we do not speak of the poetry—as any of the year's books will be, in America at least. The illustrations are all new, and have been got up with more than the ordinary care. Mr. W. J. Hennessy and Mr. C. C. Griswold have made the drawings for this three-score-and-ten of little pictures. Mr. Griswold contributes only nine of them, all of landscape subjects, and all of a certain comparative dignity, square, firm-edged, and standing firmly between the lines of text, for the army of little vignettes and head-pieces is of Mr. Hennessy's mustering. Mr. Griswold's landscapes are the best engraved work we have seen from his designs; they reproduce his well-known and easily recognizable style; the general grace of composition which he possesses in so eminent a degree, his intelligent disposition of the masses of ground, hill and valley, slope and plain, and also that meaningless type of foliage and mannered rendering of its intricacy and its general surface, which his oil paintings exhibit still more forcibly. If one compares the foliage of the large wood-cut on page 259, where the leaves are near at hand, with Creswick's work in the Tennyson or, better still, in S. C. Hall's "Book of British Ballads," he will feel how poorly the American work renders the qualities of leafage, even as reducible to wood-engraving. Mr. Griswold's somewhat sculpturesque love of form takes him as far into trees as a sculptor could go, and gives him good ramification and modelling of tree trunks and branches, as in the admirable winter scene on page 52, where, also, the foreground detail is strong; and does well by him when his trees are far enough away to be mere masses, as in the afternoon picture on page 88. And in the Amherst College on page 37, the Road on page 71, and the winter piece named above, there is really skilful use of light. This last is probably the best of these cuts, and certainly gives Mr. Griswold high relative rank in this country as an illustrator of books.

Mr. Hennessy has no trifling skill in landscape; indeed, of late he shows great aptitude in that direction, and, whether in color or in black and white, he more nearly approaches complete success when his subject contains much reference to landscape effects. His figures go better into the out-of-door scenery than they stand alone. The night piece on page 144 contains a boat and man showing as a black shadow on the water, very well managed indeed, and the boy Paul on the top of Mount Holyoke, with the Arabian-Nights-ish lamb beside him, is somehow the best Paul in the book. For actual landscape work the slightly indicated trees on page 134 are very good.

The numerous vignettes and little pictures in circles and squares are nearly all clever, even a bit imaginative, some of them. Indeed, we find nearly all kinds of Mr. Hennessy's work better than his labored attempts at complete rendering of the human figure. Not that this is a surprising result to come at, but that we regret, in view of it, that he should seem to neglect other things for that one difficult and, for most men in most conditions, unattainable excellence. For instance, the scene on page 40, where the mother and son meet, is feebly conceived and not well rendered; the perspective of the room and of the figures is in every way mismanaged; the mother is rushing with outstretched arms not toward her son, but as if behind the door, and the door, the walls, floor, and furniture do not agree with each other, and must pass for a dissolving view of an interior.

travestie of a rather imposing (even judged by the earthly standard) ceremony. Let us acknowledge a little power in the melodramatic picture on page 252; but it cannot cheer us much with the hope that the artist wil rise with the tragedy part of the play before the hope is dashed by the bathos of the corpse-like angels on page 263. It is with regret that we remark Mr. Hennessy's descent below himself; but it seems that in the human part of this work he has adapted himself to the pseudo-humanity of the feeble poem.

But it should be always kept in mind how much the artist—nowadays and in the modern style of wood-engraving—depends upon his engraver. It is not careful following of lines that is alone needed; in wood-engraving, done according to the true and rational way, that is all it would need, but the engraver of our time has to express "effects" as he best can, and to change and spoil the artist's conception, if that should chance to be at all delicate and rather evanescent. It is in vain, wholly in vain, for the critic to try to separate the original designer from the modifying middleman. Mr. Hennessy's drawings may have been better in spirit and in form than the engravings show—or they may have been worse—for all that the engravings can tell us about them; it is a chemical union between the artistic elements producing a new thing different from either.

COX'S MANUAL OF MYTHOLOGY.*

The treasures of imagination contained in the Greek mythology have in all ages furnished rich material to poets, philosophers, and men of letters, whether they chose to regard it as pure fable or as the mystic embodiment of deep truths. But it was not until the creation of a scientific philology within the last century that a scientific treatment of mythology became possible; and when comparative philology became a firmly established science, comparative mythology was not long in following its lead. When one considers that the ancestors of the vast family of nations known as the Indo-European must at one time have been one united community, dwelling together under the same laws and customs, it follows, as a matter of course, that we have a right to look for tokens of this community of origin in the fundamental religious conceptions as well as in the language. It is not too much to say, therefore, that the demonstration of this intrinsically probable theory is the greatest service that has ever been rendered to the scientific study of mythology. It has at last placed that study upon a sure foundation of fact; and, next to the discoverers themselves, we owe Mr. Cox a debt of gratitude for placing Max Müller's discoveries before us in a systematic and accessible form.

It is not to be wondered at, however, that in so new and so fascinating an investigation the explorers should be carried in their zeal beyond what is reasonable and probable. It is always so with the originators of new ideas, and even more with their discriminators than with their originators. Mr. Cox would almost give us to understand that the whole system of Greek mythology was imported from the distant cradle-land of the race, somewhere in Asia. Now, surely, if the first fathers of the race possessed this creative imagination, some touches of it may be supposed to have survived in their scattered descendants—especially in a race so wonderfully endowed as the Greeks. Granting all that is fairly shown to be identical with Indian, Persian, or German myths, we still believe that the great body of Greek fable—not merely in the embellishment, but in the material—is of pure Greek origin. At all events, we should be slow to accept such far-fetched etymologies as many of those given by Max Müller and Mr. Cox as proof to the contrary.

After all, it is hardly more in the identity itself of the mythologies than in the support incidentally gained for a sound philosophical analysis of primitive religious ideas that these new discoveries have at last reduced mythology to a science. To take one example, the most familiar of all, to which we shall recur presently for another purpose: the identification of Jupiter and Zeus with the Sanskrit Dyaus, the sky (Max Müller, 2d series, Lecture X.) demonstrates, what had been before held only as a hypothesis, that the primitive worship of the Aryan tribes was that of the spiritualized powers of nature. It was a spirit, dæmon, possessing every animate being, nay, every inanimate object, every action and every operation of nature, that the primitive man worshipped. It is this spirit, not the block of wood or stone, that the fetish-worshipper adores; it was this spirit, not the bull, cat, or crocodile, that the Egyptian held as a god. It is hard for us, at our stage of intellectual advancement, to conceive adequately of this living belief in dæmons which exists in all uncultivated communities. Hartung, in the preface to the second part of his "Religion der Griechen," quotes an illustration from the newspapers of the day—an effigy of the Cholera, "an ugly figure with coal-black face," burned at Marseilles during the prevalence of that pest.

The vivid imagination of the Greeks led them very early to individualize these dæmons and clothe them in human form; the Romans, on the other hand, until their native religion was invaded by Greek anthropomorphism, retained the more purely spiritual conceptions in full activity. Very late in their history, indeed, we find this same mode of conception, not merely in their temples to Honor, Pudicitia, Pavor, and Pallor, nor in the recognition of the numerous spirits who presided over classes of actions—such as Ossipaga, who strengthened the bones of growing children, and divus Catius pater, who made them shrewd; but still more in such things as the temple erected to Aius Locutius, the "asserter and discourser," who warned them of the approach of the Gauls, and that to Deus Rediculus—the "god who caused to retreat"—which was erected on the spot where Hannibal pitched his camp in sight of Rome.

The examples given here from the Roman theology prove the inadequacy of the natural phenomena alone to explain mythology. "We have no reason," says Ottfried Müller, "to exclude in advance any class whatever of ideas and thoughts from mythical representation, if it is any way conceivable that it may have lain within the sphere of the spiritual activity of those earlier men." But Mr. Cox narrows down the entire Grecian mythology to the operations of nature, and, for the matter of that, almost entirely to the one fact of the succession of day and night, with its sun, moon, dawn, and clouds. We have, it is true, many startling corroborations of this view in unquestionable etymologies; one cannot but admit the truth of most of the following passage (Pref., p. 17): "Phœbus (the shining one) is born in Delos (the bright land); he is the son of Leto (the darkness); he slays the children of Niobe (the clouds which are dried up by the sun). Europa (the broad shining morning) is the daughter of Telephassa (who gleams from afar). The cattle of Helios (the sun) are driven to their pastures by Phæthusa and Lampetiê, the bright and glistening children of Neaira (the early morning). So, as the sun goes from east to west, Europa is carried westward, and Telephassa dies on the western plains of Thessaly, just as the twilight dies out in the western sky." Even here some of the etymologies are left unexplained, and in many instances throughout the book one is left to guess whether an interpretation is given on authority, from a certain proof in the meaning of words, or whether it is not Mr. Cox's own hypothesis. Especially, however agreeable the earlier stories are, one tires of the everlasting repetitions. Are all heroes nothing but the sun? Are all fair maidens the dawn? It may be the whole thing will eventually be proved; but we hope not, for we confess that, so far from gaining in beauty, the stories weary us with their prosaic monotony, and that we have no taste for the detailed identification of every incident in the life of Hercules, for instance, with the course of the sun during a day. And as to the heroes, we are much more inclined to see in many of them, with Ernst Curtius, "the actual events of primeval times embodied and made living."

There is one assumption in Max Müller's system, as laid down both by himself and by Mr. Cox, which seems to us entirely inconsistent with the fundamental principle upon which the whole really rests—that "as the Indian word Dyaus seems originally to have been a name for the one only god," the Greek polytheism, as we have it, is descended from a primitive monotheism by gradual deterioration. But what right have we to assume that this word did originally mean "the one only god?" We are told that sky is its primary meaning; and it is easy to see how the spirit that inhabits the firmament, that lofty, pure, and all-embracing region, from whence proceed all the operations of nature, should come to be regarded as the highest and most powerful of all gods. Nor is it hard to understand how his name became generalized into deus, a god (or rather, in its primitive meaning, a spirit). But it is not easy to reverse the process, and derive the meaning sky from the name of the supreme god, or even the general appellation for gods. We believe, on the other hand, that polytheism was an outgrowth of fetichism, and of the faith in dæmons—spirits, genii, fairies, brownies, elves, gnomes, and by whatever other name they may be called; in other words, that the religion of the Greeks was the result of growth, not of decay. "Even of the monotheism of the Hebrews," says Hartung, "it is maintained with justice that it was the result, not the beginning, of Hebrew history."

Upon the whole, we would say of Mr. Cox that he has done the work which he set himself to do admirably well, but did not have a sufficiently broad conception of what that work ought to be. In the "advertisement" he quotes Grimm's remark: "I shall indeed interpret all that I can, but I cannot interpret all that I should like." But in his preface he forgets this modest sentiment, and tells his readers "the key now placed in your hands will unlock almost every door;" and in the body of the book he shrinks from no puzzle, but applies his one almost unvarying interpretation to each. His book is, therefore, not a complete and adequate account of Greek mythology, as it is claimed to be, but a skilfully compiled statement of that system of mythology which may now fairly be considered the prevailing, and perhaps the accepted, one. Take, for example, the section upon Dionysus (Bacchus), which one would think, from the peculiar relations of this god to nature, would present a peculiarly rich and attractive field to an interpreter of the religion of nature like Mr. Cox. But inasmuch as the history of this god contains very little that can be forced into an identity with Vedic theology, it is dismissed in less than four pages. Ariadne is not mentioned at all in connection with him; his thiasos is not mentioned; there is not a word of nymphs, satyrs, or bacchantes; there is no allusion to the connection of the worship of Dionysus with that of Demeter. Under the head of Roman mythology, there is no account of the introduction of the worship of Bacchus, and of those orgies which are so important and significant a fact in Roman history. Strangest of all, in a "comparative mythology," nothing is said of the substantial identity of Dionysus with the Egyptian Osiris, nor of the connection of his worship with Asiatic rites.

* "A Manual of Mythology, in the form of Question and Answer. By the Rev. George W. Cox, M.A., late Scholar of Trinity College, Oxford." First American, from the second London edition. New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1868. 16mo, pp. 300.

Indeed, of all facts of comparative mythology, except these most remote and ancient ones which rest upon comparative philology, Mr. Cox appears utterly ignorant. Later points of identity, familiar as they are in other systems, are wholly ignored by him. No doubt these have been grossly exaggerated by many writers; but surely a connection of Greek mythology with Egypt, Phœnicia, and Asia Minor, lying almost within the range of history, is of no less importance than those relations with India which lie far back beyond the memory of man. For the matter of that, grant as much as we please to both—grant that the Greeks owed all the material that is claimed by most enthusiastic partisans to Africa or Asia, and we still believe that Ottfried Müller laid down the true principle in his "Prolegomena zu einer wissenschaftlichen Mythologie," where, after admitting in prophetic anticipation the principle which lies at the bottom of Max Müller's system, that "not merely the language remains from the common culture" of the primitive Greek, Indian, and German nations, he adds: "But the gods, forms of worship, and myths of the Greeks certainly belong, in their determined form, to a quite different age—a period of individual development."

The Indian Dyaus is the sky itself, or at most the spirit who inhabited the sky, as vague and impersonal a deity as the Greek Uranus. The Teutonic Tyr has become a god of war. The Latin Jupiter is a distant, majestic being, far removed from the passions and weaknesses of men—a true supreme god of heaven and earth. Each of these is significant of the national character which conceived and developed it. Zeus is equally peculiar to the Greeks, having nothing in common with Dyaus, Tyr, and Jupiter except the name, or rather combining all their attributes in one complex self-contradictory nature; the good god to whom Achilles prays, and whose children all men are; the being with all the commonest passions and appetites of men; and not seldom the mere dæmon of the firmament, who thunders, lightens, rains, hails, and snows. In all this he is—and every other Grecian divinity as well—completely a creation of that marvellous race which adored him.

PHYSICAL SCIENCE IN ITALY.*

THE popularization of physical science—by which is meant the general diffusion of an acquaintance with the ascertained truths of material nature by methods attractive in form, and expositions couched in terms familiar and intelligible to persons who have not enjoyed a philosophical, and especially a mathematical, training—is one of the most marked movements of the intellectual activity of our age. It is a natural and necessary consequence, on the one hand, of the rapid spread of a desire for a wider culture, and, on the other, of an accumulation of newly discovered facts and newly deduced laws, so vast and so various as to compel men to choose between a superficial view of many branches of enquiry and a relatively complete mastery of a single one. The days are for ever gone when one human intellect could compass all recorded human knowledge; and the memory of the comprehensively learned man of the nineteenth century is less a repository of knowledge than an index to its archives.

The majority of even educated men have not the will, the ability, or the opportunity to make themselves accomplished specialists in anything, unless it be the arts de pane lucrando, and for the more general purposes, for even the intellectual culture and the refined enjoyments of ordinary life, it is better to taste a variety of scientific and literary viands than to confine ourselves to a single dish of stronger meat. The man who has made himself familiar with the contents of the latest Conversations-lexicon is, on the average, both a more agreeable companion and a more versatile actor than he who has devoted a life to the study of a particular science, just as he who has mastered the ordinary use of a wide vocabulary is, other things being equal, a better speaker and even writer than the profoundest theoretical grammarian.

Students who have become adepts in this or that science by laborious and exact processes are apt to denounce as quackery every attempt to make common to the many a less systematic and thorough acquaintance with the phenomena and relations of organic and inorganic being, and to deny all theoretical, if not all practical, value to knowledge communicated by more compendious methods, and acquired at comparatively small cost of time and labor.

The question of the relative worth of methods and results is as old as the most ancient Greek philosophy, and, like very many other abstract problems, is idle, because it does not admit of an abstract solution. We are, in this world of conditions and limitations, usually obliged to enquire what, under given circumstances, is practicable or expedient, and seldom left to choose what is in itself desirable. Doubtless the strong man will find the climbing of an Alpine height worth more than the view from the summit; but the weak-kneed lover of nature who could be safely whirled to the dome of Mont Blanc in a balloon would be unwise to scorn the opportunity because hardier mountaineers think it more profitable to scale the peak by the aid of hobnailed shoes, ice-axe, and alpenstock.

In the meantime, the age has dropped the argument and adopted a practical conclusion. Science, or at least the results of scientific investigation, the leading facts and laws which make up the body of our knowledge of the working of material nature, have been popularized to an extent which the last generation would have thought impossible. The demand for cheap and easy knowledge has created a supply, and the ablest theoretical and experimental philosophers have not disdained to minister to the popular craving, and to aid in the great work of leading the intelligence of the masses up to the comprehension of their own specialties. The aristocracy of science, like all other aristocracies, is divesting itself of its prerogatives and privileges, and the world of mind, like the world of politics, is becoming a democratic republic.

The conviction that a nation can become truly great and powerful, still more emphatically the belief that states which have achieved a commanding position by warlike exploits, can retain their power only by the general culture of their people, is a truth now questioned by none but the partisans of the doctrine of ecclesiastical authority; and the diffusion of such culture now absorbs the attention of statesmen in a scarcely less degree than the improvement of the cannon and the rifle.

Doubtless in this striving for culture the aim at a tangible result in the practical applications of science is very conspicuous; but all modern systems of popular education involve the recognition of a common bond and a mutual relation between all branches of positive knowledge, and there are few non-professional schools whose course of instruction does not consist, in the largest proportion, of studies which, to the majority of those who pursue them, are valuable rather as sources of general intellectual power and pleasure than as means to lower ends.

The Italian philosophers were among the earliest, and have been among the most eminent and successful promoters of the sciences of observation, and if they were not the first to formulate the rules of the experimental, or, as it is too exclusively called, the Baconian philosophy, they were scarcely anticipated by any in the practical application of them. But the power which compelled, if not by actual torture, at least by the threat of torture, Galileo to retract his stupendous revelations, has always been and still is the deadly enemy of the diffusion of all instruction which tends to make the layman a thinking being, and until the late revolutions in Italy the priesthood had influence enough to prevent the adoption of systems of popular education in all the states into which the Italian soil was divided. It is not strange, therefore, that up to 1848 Italy should have been intellectually and politically, perhaps, behind all other European countries, with the exception of Russia, the Spanish Peninsula, and Greece. Since that day she has made great strides, and if not now the most advanced, she is certainly the most rapidly progressive of the Continental states. Until recently, indeed, Italy has looked to oexclusively to a foreign people for example and instruction in all that concerns the promotion of her higher moral and even material interests; but she is now asserting her mental as well as her political independence, and her leading minds are inspired by the conviction that self-developed power is the only power which can entitle a people to be respected, or even to respect itself. The system of popular instruction in Italy is yet unhappily very defective and very partial in its application, but it is becoming more comprehensive and efficient, and contributions to the means and methods of the diffusion of knowledge are flowing in from many domestic sources.

Of these, one of the widest in its scope, as well as most satisfactory in its plan and execution, is the work the title of which is placed at the head of this article. The author, Professor Boccardo, of Genoa, has been hitherto known chiefly as an able expounder and illustrator of the laws of political and commercial economy. But while engaged in investigating and promulgating the principles of this great science, and their working in actual practice, he has devoted his leisure hours to the pursuit of those various branches of natural knowledge, an acquaintance with which is essential to a general comprehension of cosmical, and more especially terrestrial, physical law. The volume now under consideration is accordingly, to use the words of the writer, "not a patchwork of hasty compilation, but the meditated and laborious fruit of long and patient researches, of reflection, and of personal experiment and observation."

The work consists of lectures, forming part of a series delivered by four able professors, under the patronage of the Ministry of Agriculture, Commerce, and Industry, at the Royal Institute of the Mercantile Marine at Genoa, the whole constituting a normal course of instruction for commercial shipmasters and navigators. The lectures of the professors embrace a full course of instruction in nautical astronomy and navigation, mechanics and the steam-engine, commercial and maritime law, and geography and meteorology. It is much to be wished that our great maritime towns would supply to their skilful practical seamen the means of acquiring as complete a theoretical professional education as these lectures and the special schools of Genoa afford to the countrymen of Columbus and Garibaldi, and as, in fact, is required by Italian law of every seaman who aspires to rise to the first or even the second rank in the commercial marine.

Professor Boccardo's valuable work consists of a general introduction and a summary view of the progress of geographical knowledge, followed by more detailed expositions of the conclusions thus far arrived at by science upon the figure, magnitude, and movements of the globe; its geological and geographical revolutions; its waters, its sky, and its climate, including the laws of oceanic and atmospheric motion, a knowledge of which is so important to the interests and the security of the navigator; the theory and principal phenomena of electricity and magnetism; the relations between the internal constitution and the external condition of the earth, embracing what we know of volcanoes and earthquakes; superficial chorography and hydrography; mineral, botanical, and zoölogical geography; and, finally, the relations of action and reaction between man and the planet he inhabits.

This, it will be seen, is a comprehensive plan, and, of course, it cannot be exhaustively carried out in a single octavo. But the aim of the author was not to train specialists in any single branch of physical science, but to furnish the men engaged in an active and absorbing profession the means of acquiring some of the subsidiary knowledge which they need for the intelligent exercise of the more strictly technical duties of their important vocation. This task has been ably and satisfactorily performed by Professor Boccardo, and it would be difficult to find a volume better calculated to aid the navigator in familiarizing himself with broad views of the sciences illustrative of the principles involved in the practice of his daily duties, or at least collateral to the theory of them.

The work is, however, by no means designed exclusively for seamen, nor is it even so far professional in its character as at all to unfit it for general use as a convenient and comprehensive manual of the physics of the earth, so far as science has yet revealed the mysteries of that most important and most interesting study. It is true that a volume of this character, in a language so little known among us as Italian, cannot expect a wide circulation in the United States, but it will merit the attention of American scholars, both for its intrinsic merits and as an interesting evidence of a largeness of comprehension among Italian physicists which is another token of the vita nuova now rousing itself to full consciousness in the Italian peninsula.

Outlines of General History. By W. F. Collier, LL.D., author of "History of the British Empire," "A History of English Literature," etc. (New York: T. Nelson & Sons. 1868.)—This is a very unpretentious and at the same time a very useful manual. In very small compass it contains "a connected narrative of the principal facts in the history of the world," from the earliest times down to 1867, grouped in a manner apt "to indicate their relative importance, and show the bearing which one event or age has upon another." In this grouping, however, which is indeed no slight task, the author has not been in all parts uniformly successful. The principal merit of his book consists in the correctness of its facts, dates, and spelling of names—a merit which cannot fail to be appreciated by those who are in any way familiar with a more or less great number of similar productions in our language. It is the greater as the book, in spite of its smallness and the unavoidable incompleteness of some of its parts, contains a very considerable number of well-selected dates. The style is plain, perhaps a little too simple. Slightly incorrect expressions or statements occur here and there, such as "the relations between President Johnson and certain leading members of the state;" "an insurrectionary movement of the Republican party, headed by Juarez" (against Maximilian); or "the ancient empire of Germany was then merged in a new empire—that of Austria" (under Francis II.) So also, in an ample narrative of our civil war, Atlanta is always called "Atalanta;" Hood is made to evacuate it on "Sept. 3," and Lincoln to issue his first emancipation proclamation on "Sept. 23." These errors are likely misprints, as are undoubtedly "Grouchow," "1862," and "Gagocire," in the concluding part of the Polish history; but even such misprints or misspellings are rare in the text. The separate chronological tables, however, admit of improvements by a critical revision. But whatever its slight defects may be, we wish and expect to see this manual widely used in our schools.

The Occupations of a Retired Life. By Edward Garrett. (New York: George Routledge & Sons.)—This story has been appearing for several months past in Littell's Living Age, which borrowed it from one of the English magazines. It is a very pleasant story, written in an easy, graceful style, abounding in good sayings, in charity, in common sense. There is nothing in it that can properly be called a plot, and very little incident, but a good deal of character-drawing very well done and a good deal of sound reflection on manners and life. Edward Garrett is only the author's fictitious name. The story is, in a manner, the autobiography of this imaginary person, an old bachelor who has lived in London long enough to get rich, and then retired into the country and gone to housekeeping with his maiden sister, who is the character of the book, a somewhat shrewish person in appearance, but in appearance only, her outward sharpness masking a world of inward tenderness. She is the author of most of the good sayings in the book, Edward Garrett using himself as a dark background against which to display his sister's superior virtue and intelligence. He and his sister are no sooner settled in their new home than they begin to devise little schemes of social improvement, in the course of whose development the Ritualistic controversy is gently but firmly touched, and the author's Low Church proclivities are unmistakably revealed. Persons interested in practical village charity (the city is a different matter) may find very useful suggestions in these accounts of Mr. and Miss Garrett's refuge and hospital. Some of the minor characters of the book are very pleasant, and one of them, at least, Ewen McCallum, the proper hero of the book, and a real hero, is made by a few stray touches to stand out vividly. It is a pity that we do not see more of him. The book as a whole is calculated to do good, but less here, perhaps, than in England, because the relations of rich and poor in the two countries are so different. The patronizing attitude which the Garretts everywhere assume is one which hardly the poorest American would tolerate. But the main point, that two people bent on doing good, in almost any community, accomplish a vast deal, derive much enjoyment, keep themselves superior to ennui, rob "single blessedness" of its sarcastic sting, and make it blessedness in deed and truth—this may hereafter be considered an established fact, if it was not so before this book was written.

The Teacher's Guide to Palestine. By Henry S. Osborn. (Philadelphia: J. C. Garrigues & Co. 1868.)—This little manual contains an alphabetic list of all cities, villages, mountains, etc., of the Holy Land, mentioned in the Scriptures, "whose sites are actually known," with the approved pronunciation and signification of their names, with notes of historical interest, references, and moralizing illustrations. A colored map, which is the reproduction, on a small scale, of a very comprehensive one by the author, is prefixed. This contains all the names given in the book, the size of the type, or of the mark which represents a place, being in proportion to the importance of the latter. Unfortunately, however, most of the names, being reduced, by a photographic process, to one-fortieth of their original size on the large map, have become almost entirely illegible by the naked eye. The print of the text, on the other hand, is very well done. The contents of the brief geographical articles are "prepared from the best and latest authorities, and from personal travels and explorations," and are, with slight exceptions, correct. The names and their pronunciations are given according to the English Biblical usage, and not in accordance with the Hebrew original. Thus, the Beth-Hakkerem of the Hebrew text becomes "Beth-Haccerem (Beth-Hak-se-rem)." The significations are attached with rather too much positiveness—as if they were well established in every case—and often very strangely, probably after poor authorities. Thus, Ashdod is rendered "a wild, open place;" Jordan, "river of judgment;" Lachish, "who exists of himself;" Shunem, "their sleep"—while Gesenius translates the same names by "fortress," "river," "unconquerable," and "places of rest," respectively, and Fürst by "fortress," "river," "hill," and "uneven place." How Pas-Dammim can be made to signify "the hand of astonishment" we are at a loss to guess. Judah is rendered "the praise of the Lord," and Judea "praise," although the Hebrew name is the same in both cases. In the main, however, this little work is carefully elaborated.

The Table-Talk and Opinions of Napoleon Bonaparte. (London: Sampson Low, Son & Marston. 1868.)—This is a pretty little book of the "Bayard" Series, and appears in this country under the auspices of Messrs. Roberts Brothers. The material of it is collected from all sources, and by older readers than this series is intended for will be found familiar. The editor, in the notes appended, contradicts the Emperor whenever contradiction is necessary, and especially, of course, whenever he permits himself to tell conspicuous inexactnesses about the English. Napoleon's innate ruffianism and vulgarity are not so well displayed in either the notes or the "Table-Talk" as they might have been; but even the youthful reader will hardly go through the book without getting some glimpses of these traits of his character. It might have been well, too, to have told possible young enthusiasts that Marie Louise had, in her husband's faithlessness, quite a reasonable excuse for not cheering "his lonely exile" in Saint Helena. The Emperor's intellect is, of course, well exhibited in these pages, and in its weakness as well as in its strength.

The Week.

THE last of the squabbles arising out of the elections seems to have disappeared from the newspapers, and the journalistic as well as the political world is at this moment in the enjoyment of most extraordinary peace. There has not been a new President for a long time who has seemed to command so much respect from friends and foes as Grant. The Copperhead papers have either taken to praising him or letting him alone. The stolen tea-set and Shetland pony, and the proceeds of the cotton frauds, and the street drunkenness, all seem to be buried in oblivion. The worst charge we have seen against him of late is that he went to see a pantomime. His atrocious conduct in attending the Evarts dinner has, so far as we know, passed without notice. Even Wendell Phillips seems to feel the gracious influence of the time, and talks of Grant as of one from whom it were still possible to expect something good. He even finds that Grant may yet cover himself with glory, and proposes to pay the bonds in gold and issue a new loan at a low rate of interest, based on honor and fair dealing. But then he shows that his feet do not often lead him into the devious ways of the economists, for he produces a little plan of taxation which we fear will not "take" outside the Anti-Slavery Association. He wants to have capital made to pay off the national debt and labor allowed to go free; but he surely ought to know that these schemes of putting the public burdens on the rich and holding the poor harmless occupy very much the same position in political economy that the squaring of the circle occupies in mathematics and perpetual motion in mechanics. You cannot put any tax on capital that labor won't feel; and nothing can be more mischievous than telling poor men, as Mr. Phillips is doing, that the thing is possible, or, if possible, expedient.

We have in another column endeavored to make plain the nature and extent of the recent enormous frauds in Wall Street. When it is remembered that some of the leading "financiers"—men, too, foremost in works of charity—are to be found amongst the ringleaders in this tremendous swindle, and in corrupting the judges in support of the swindle, and that several of the banks have aided and abetted in it, and that it was continued through two long weeks without shame or pause, in the presence of an indignant and astounded public, it will be admitted that it is a social phenomenon of no ordinary importance. There is nothing local about it either. However unimportant New York city may be politically, it is unquestionably the commercial capital of the country, and the commercial honesty of the country is not likely to remain very long much above the standard in use here. The Erie conspirators are not the products of the foreign vote; they are the products of decaying morality—a morality which is careful only about one small spot in the character. Every one of these rogues has a "main question" on which he is "sound" as a bell. With some it is the education of the young; with others, foreign missions; with others, negro suffrage. In fact, there is not one of them who will not adopt any "main question" you please, provided you let him indulge freely in his "partickler wanity," as Sam Weller said. But no sociologist can successfully study these occurrences in the commercial world apart from "Butlerism" in politics. They are both branches of the same tree. One Butlerite—an active and prominent Republican—announced during the past week, in the New York Tribune, that "any person the rebels hated for services during the rebellion would do for him." In other words, on receiving proof of this, he asks no more. Yet one has constantly to listen to these disciples talking of "the purification of our politics."

---

Governor Powell Clayton, of Arkansas, has issued his private proclamation to the county officers, to the effect that the Northern elections have shown that reconstruction must stand, and that as for Arkansas she needs no outside help to maintain her present constitution, but can do it herself with her own troops. He therefore urges it on the sheriffs to see that their authority is respected, and to that end advises the immediate organization of the reserved militia. He keeps still under martial law the southern counties in which the widespread disorders of some months ago took place. On the 11th of the month a small fight took place at Sevier between a battalion of the State troops and "a body of Ku-Klux," in which the latter were defeated, with a loss of twenty or thirty in killed, wounded, and prisoners. It now looks very much as if the Arkansians would have a state of things in their country very similar to that which exists in Tennessee, the Unionists holding their own pretty well, but there being plenty of neighborhood hostilities and local disturbances and single assassinations. The troubles in the Southwest are by no means confined to Arkansas. The Homer (Louisiana) Iliad, a Republican newspaper, having been too free in its expressions of opinion, its printing-office was sacked by a mob, and much more effectually "cleaned out" than when it was first broken into a few weeks since. It is an instance of the influence of "the craft" feeling overpowering political feeling that the conservative "shop over the way" allowed the "scallawag who edits the Iliad" to use its press and type, in order that he might, before he left the town, announce the destruction of his office, and his determination to return at some future time and see if he could not say what he liked in Louisiana. The office of the Rapides Tribune, also, was destroyed on the 15th instant, and in that case, too, the assault was the second that had been made.

From Alabama we get accounts of a roadside attack on two Republican members of the Legislature. It seems to have been a capital illustration of this peculiar variety of rural murder, which has always, both before the war and since, flourished luxuriantly in the South. Mr. Crossland, his fellow-member of the Legislature, Mr. Bronson, and Mr. Bronson's father, ride toward Montgomery. They reach a certain swamp, Gipsey Creek's swamp, in Tuscaloosa County, and the younger Bronson and Mr. Crossland fall a little behind their companion. Suddenly the father hears a volley, and, turning, sees that his son and Crossland have fallen from their horses. He hurries on to the town of Tuscaloosa to inform the authorities, and, having done so, is about to return to bury young Bronson, but the town officers tell him that it will not be safe for him to do so—"against the sentiments of our people, sir," probably. As for the rest of the South, there is nothing to say, except that the excellent Radical politicians of Florida are still honoring their party and themselves; that Georgia and South Carolina accept the situation with a good deal of apparent equanimity; and that in Virginia an agitator of the first class, H. Rives Pollard, has been killed in the street, because of a scurrilous article, which, by the way, he did not write. It is not surprising, we suppose, that he had three pistols on his person when he was murdered.

The female suffrage movement has received a new impetus during the week by the formation of a "New England Woman's Suffrage Association," by a convention which has sat for some days in Boston. There was nothing remarkable about the convention, however, except the appearance on the scene of some new and able advocates. But the speaking was not good; in fact, if we may judge from the reports, it was poor; and the argumentation rather thin. The preamble to the resolutions contained the assumption, which ought not in these days to be found in any political document, that human beings in society have certain "inalienable rights"—such as the rights of life, liberty, and property. There are no such rights known in any civilized community, never have been, and never will be. If there were, we could neither force a man to serve in the army, put him in prison for crime, or levy on his property for taxes. We do all three things; and the right of doing them is essential to the existence of a civilized state. All agitations which have for their object the persuasion of the public are injured by being saddled with these empty and utterly useless generalities. The report of the committee on a constitution and organization was, however, a very practical document; the first section putting woman's suffrage on ground on which it can be successfully defended, and on which Mr. James Freeman Clarke urged it—that of expediency—which in politics is worth all the "inalienable rights" ever romanced about. Women ought to vote because they and the country would be the better of their voting, and for no other reason. Whether they have an "inalienable right" to vote, nobody knows or can learn except through dreams and visions. It hardly reflected credit on the chairman, or helped the cause, that a notorious lunatic was twice allowed to address the meeting for its amusement. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe did good service in "deprecating the war on males" as unnecessary, if not cruel.

Judge Barnard says that he has been subjected to great annoyance by writers in the newspapers, who now, for eleven years and more, have been bringing against him all sorts of accusations. Hitherto he has refrained from noticing them, but now, if a grand jury will aid him, he will ferret out his traducers and bring them to justice. As a general thing, it is better, perhaps, to let one's life refute the slanderer and backbiter; but, on the whole, we think the judge is to be pardoned for departing in this instance from his usual custom. He himself is persuaded that he has arrived "at a period of life when his usefulness is impaired by such charges." That may be open to question, perhaps. However, it is not unnatural that a man's feelings should get the better of his judgment when it is openly said by his enemies that he is worth five millions; that he has at one time and another possessed shares in stocks of various kinds; that he has not been so vigilant as he might have been in preventing election frauds. As the jury did not need to be told, the judge had never, he said, owned a single share of any kind; and he is so far from being wealthy that he is dependent for the means of subsistence on the charity of his wife and his stipend as a judge. Dignity is well enough in its way, but it is almost too much to ask human nature to put up in silence for much more than eleven years with such allegations against his character as those just mentioned; or such as this, that he has bought and sold voters; or this, that he has manufactured fraudulent naturalization papers by the thousand, or that he has abetted a scheme of kidnapping one of the suitors in his court, or has solicited and taken bribes, or has disgraced the bench by almost inconceivable insolence and the most cynical contempt for all decency.

General Sherman has made a long report on Indian affairs, which is not particularly encouraging. The troops, it appears, can effect little or nothing against the Indians in summer, because, grass being plenty, their ponies strong and hardy, and the Indians' knowledge of the country perfect, it is impossible to catch them. Moreover, the origin of an Indian war is almost always unknown, and it is, therefore, almost impossible to take precautions against an outbreak. The white population is scattered over such an immense area, and touches the Indians at so many remote points, that nobody can tell where, when, or how the collisions take place which bring on hostilities, and the Indians never declare war or make complaints before beginning to slay and plunder. Besides all this, there does not seem to be any possible modus vivendi between them and the whites. They cannot have what they want in the way of hunting-grounds without staying the march of colonization on the plains; so there is nothing for it but to gather them up by force and shut them up in reservations, to be supported by Government, or else to kill them. Either is difficult. Whether we want to exterminate them or plant them on a reservation, we have first to catch them, and this, it seems, must be done in winter, when they are collected in villages, if at all. Sheridan is now starting after them for this purpose, and will probably destroy a great deal of their stores and villages, and send them out to perish on the plains. Mr. Paul Janet, the well-known French metaphysician, has recently been arguing ably, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, in support of the moral unity of the human race, and of an absolute moral sense, existent in all ages and more or less clearly apprehended by every race. Some of his illustrations drawn from the history or manners of savages are singular and interesting. The Indian outbreaks on the plains would furnish some others, and more comical ones. Though the Indians do not declare war, they hardly ever begin to ravage without offering some show of moral justification of their conduct. For instance, they entered a settler's house peaceably at the beginning of the present outbreak, clearly with the intention of burning it and killing the inmates, but behaved with perfect propriety till they got a fair casus belli, which consisted in their hostess serving their coffee in tin mugs instead of crockery-ware. This satisfied their moral sense, and they forthwith began to ply the hatchet and the torch.

The truth about the condition of the Alabama negotiations is out at last. Mr. Reverdy Johnson and Lord Stanley have persistently given out in their late after-dinner speeches that the whole controversy was as good as settled; that all important points had been agreed on, and that it only remained to deal with the details. This was followed up by an announcement in the London Times that it had been determined to refer the whole matter to a mixed commission, with the King of Prussia as arbitrator to decide points on which the commissioners could not agree, which, it appears, is true. It is now declared, however, in Washington, that Mr. Johnson has not been authorized to agree to refer anything to arbitration, and that, if the commission sits, it will simply be to hear and pass upon claims on both sides for damages, English liability for Alabama damages being previously admitted. There is not much likelihood that the Senate will confirm Mr. Johnson's convention, whatever Mr. Seward may think of it. It is very difficult to extract anything definite enough to be called either truth or falsehood from Mr. Johnson's speeches. He still continues them.

The great diorama known as the "Whiskey Frauds" is still on exhibition, and the last dissolving view shows Belknap, the defaulting ex-paymaster of the navy and ex-special Treasury agent, as well as Mr. Fullerton, a counsel learned in the law, also recently employed by the Government in bringing the wickedness of the whiskey world to light, under indictment for conspiracy to extort money. Up to this point there has been something strangely oriental about the whole business; but now it begins to have a cold, hard, western look. The criminals, it is now to be hoped, will be brought to justice and get their deserts. It seems to be the most natural thing in the world for a "civil servant" under the present régime to rob right and left; and when he finds nobody else to rob he robs his own colleagues, as in the present case.

It is not perfectly easy to make out the exact degrees of blame to apportion to Lopez and to Mr. Washburn in the Paraguayan difficulty, and there is little reason to say anything about it at present, for we shall not have a full and fair presentation of the facts till our squadron collects them. Mr. James Watson Webb is not likely to give it to us; and people who have read Mr. Washburn's letters are not going to look to him for it; and the newspapers seem to be talking without knowing very clearly what they are talking about. One thing seems to be clear, and that is, that, whether Mr. Washburn is an honest man, or has been selling himself and his flag to the revolutionists; whether he was or was not engaged in one or more conspiracies against the dictator, he at least made a bad failure in respect of that neutrality between Paraguay and her enemies which it was a principal duty of his, as our minister, to maintain. Moreover, he has not succeeded, since he became a voluminous public character, in persuading anybody that he is a man of sense, whatever his character for integrity may be.

Mr. Gladstone's overthrow in South Lancashire was something for which the Liberals were hardly prepared. It is a county to be sure, and in all counties the territorial interest is strong, but it is a manufacturing county. He will, of course, be returned elsewhere; there is always some member patriotic enough to make way for the party leader when all else fails. He is, however, doing what appears to be a foolish thing in publishing a pamphlet to explain his change of opinions touching Church establishments. There is really nothing wonderful in a man's thinking differently on any subject at fifty-five from what he thought at thirty, especially on a subject like this, on which the current of popular thought everywhere has changed so much. But we presume no explanation of a change of opinion is ever thoroughly satisfactory. Nobody's mental processes look well when they are closely analyzed, especially when they are analyzed by himself; and there is in all changes of opinion an implied confession of fallibility which people do not notice if you do not dwell on it; but if you talk much about the matter, they notice little else.

Mr. John Stuart Mill has been defeated for Westminster, but will probably reappear in the House of Commons from Greenwich. This disaster—for so far as the Liberals are concerned it is a disaster—is due to a variety of causes. His views on population, which were used against him at the former election, have been used against him in this, and, perhaps owing to his being better known to the common herd of voters, with more effect. The charge of atheism has also been again brought up, and he very properly refused to refute it, on the ground that no voter had a right to ask what his religious opinions were, and he would not, even to secure his seat, encourage the practice of putting such questions. In fact, the putting of such questions to politicians, editors, and other candidates for office or popular favor, is simply like the old test-oaths, an ingenious device for filling all places of honor and profit with canting hypocrites, who would as soon be Buddhists as Christians if it paid as well. Mr. Mill advised the elector who applied to him for information on the subject, to ask, in reply to any one who made the charge, in what passage of any of his works the foundation for it was to be found. The most potent cause of his defeat has, however, doubtless been his support of Bradlaugh, and what has been considered his rather too frequent interference in the canvass in other boroughs. Mr. Roebuck has been defeated at Sheffield, but rather, we fear, on account of his hostility to the trades-unionists than for being generally foolish and ruffianly. The working-men's candidates have not been successful, the constituencies apparently caring little as yet for making the House of Commons "reflect the opinions of all classes." The Cable newsman solemnly announces that "two fortunate results are considered to have been secured [by the election]—the displacement of the Conservatives, and the acquisition of power sufficient to exert a decisive pressure on the House of Lords for pushing through the measures for the disestablishment of the Irish Church." This information is actually paid for by the press here at the rate of about two dollars a word.

There has probably been nothing more amusing in the history of the Second Empire in France than the recent attempt of the Government, which we mentioned briefly last week, to convince the public that the relations of France with her neighbors are satisfactory, by means of three colored maps showing the political divisions of the Continent under the Restoration, under Louis Philippe, and under the present Emperor. No. 1 reveals a sad state of things—Holland and Belgium forming one kingdom, and Germany one confederation; No. 2 shows Holland and Belgium divided, but Germany still intact; No. 3 shows Holland and Belgium divided, Germany split into two, and Savoy and Nice annexed to France. The trick consists in the attempt to persuade people by the use of two colors on a sheet of paper that the old German confederation was a more formidable thing than the two German confederations of to-day—one of them controlled by Prussia completely, and the other holding its forces at Prussian disposal under a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance. The map, or rather three maps, have been hung up all over Paris—after having been anxiously looked for for several days—with the legend attached, La France satisfaite. There is also an explanation or commentary, said to be the work of the Emperor. What is most singular about the contrivance is the contempt for the popular understanding which is revealed in it. But it has not succeeded, and the semi-official papers have found it necessary to deny that any importance has been attached to it in official quarters.

There is little news from Spain, and doubtless will be but little until the Cortes meets. The monarchists and republicans are still agitating vigorously, the weight in ability and influence being, as we intimated last week, still on the side of the former. Rumors that Prim is working for his own elevation to the throne are kept in circulation, but thus far they appear to be simply rumors. The only means we have of judging of their value is furnished by Prim's character, which of itself goes far to refute them, for he is unquestionably a shrewd man, and can therefore hardly hope to seat himself permanently and securely on the throne, while if he aids in the accession of any royal personage he will be sure of the lasting gratitude of the new dynasty, and therefore to a high place in the government; and certainty in a country like Spain is a great thing.

The King of Prussia's speech from the throne at the opening of the second session of the Prussian Diet evidently shows that the prolonged absence of Count Bismarck from the seat of government—he is still rusticating at Varzin—has caused no retrogressive change in the internal or external policy of Prussia. On the contrary, some of the features of the royal address seem to prognosticate a more decidedly liberal advance, owing perhaps to a quickening impulse exercised by the recent events in Spain. The way King William speaks of the Spanish revolution is a novelty in the history of the Hohenzollerns of this century. "The events in the Western Peninsula of Europe," he says, "can inspire us with no other feeling but the wish and the confident hope that the Spanish nation may find in an independent organization of her affairs a guarantee for her prosperity and power." After "independent" we have, of course, to understand "of France," which makes the passage, whether read in German, in French, or in Spanish, the more interesting. The King mentions with approval the progress in "civilization and humanity evinced by the International Congress assembled at Geneva," in "improving the established principles for the treatment of wounded warriors, and extending them to the navy." The measures which he recommends to the Diet almost all reveal a sound reformatory spirit. Provincial and communal self-government is to be extended, by turning over to the respective corporations all that is not necessarily "linked to the guidance and care of the state authorities," though "it cannot be extended to shake or break the institutions to which Prussia is, to a great extent, indebted for her prosperity, before other institutions promising vitality and success are created."

THE ERIE SWINDLE.

THE Erie Railroad Company, which once more, during the last three weeks, has furnished the occasion and the means for very remarkable events, is a striking example of the evils resulting from a large bonded debt upon any railroad property. The interest on the mortgage bonds of almost any decently managed road is pretty certain to be paid, hence the owners of the mortgage bonds, who are in reality the principal owners of the property, have little interest in its management, and are indeed legally excluded from all control over it. The management of the property thus falls to the control of those who have really the smallest interest at stake. At the same time, the principal portion of income from the property is pledged to pay the interest on the bonds, and on the magnitude of the then remaining balance of net income depends the ability of the company to pay a dividend on its share capital. The price of the shares in the market depends mainly upon the probability of their realizing a dividend to the holder, and the more that probability fluctuates, the more the market price of the stock will fluctuate. The more the price of any stock fluctuates, the more speculation will there be in it, and this is the reason why for years past Erie shares have been the most speculative stock on the list of the New York Stock Exchange, its price ranging at different periods from five dollars a share to one hundred and twenty-five dollars a share. As there are at the very lowest two hundred and fifty thousand shares of stock rightfully issued, worth at par twenty-five millions of dollars, the possibility of loss or gain by such great fluctuations is perfectly enormous, and the power to produce such fluctuations gives to its possessor the means of reaping an immense fortune in a day. According to the degree of honesty, economy, and skill employed in the management will be the probable earnings of the company, and according to its probable earnings will be the value of its stock. A skilful, honest, and economical management will cause the stock to advance; an incompetent, dishonest, wasteful management will cause the stock to decline; and it is for this power over the market price of the stock that the management of the Erie Railroad Company has for years past been sought by the most unscrupulous gamblers and rogues that the financial history of the world has any record of. The men who at the last election of directors have thus succeeded in obtaining the control of this enormous property have as far surpassed their last predecessors in villany as their last predecessors had already surpassed any that had gone before them; and their exploits during the last few weeks have brought to light such helpless incompetence and pusillanimity on the part of leading financial men, such reckless bank management, such deep-seated judicial corruption, and so low a fall in the pervading tone of commercial morality, that the calmest spectator stands by in amazement and can only wonder when retribution will begin.

On the 1st day of July last the one hundred dollar shares of the Erie Railroad were selling for about seventy dollars a share. The best-informed dealers in railroad stocks and other securities very generally believed that the abundant crops would cause largely-increased railroad earnings, that the election of General Grant would restore a feeling of security and confidence to business, and that a large advance would speedily take place in the value of investments of every description. Everybody was buying stocks, and there was no difficulty in selling almost any amount of shares in all reasonably well-established railroad enterprises. At or about this period the leading directors of the Erie sold large amounts of the stock of the road; sold not only the shares which they actually had on hand, but sold a large amount of shares "short," as it is called in Wall Street—that is to say, sold for future delivery shares which they did not possess, but which they expected to buy at a lower price whenever the time came for delivering them. Under these large sales the market gradually declined, but so great was the general confidence in the ultimate advance in stocks that at each decline fresh buyers came into the market, until the Erie directors had been enabled to sell very large amounts of the stock without the public becoming aware of their intentions. Their next move, of course, was to depress the price of their stock as low as possible, so as to buy back the shares which they had sold. What they had done so far, if not in accordance with the ideas which honest men have of the duties of directors and trustees, was at least legal and not altogether dishonorable, according to the prevailing Wall-Street code. But from this point forward their actions entitle them to the open support of the New York courts and to the undisguised charge of fraud from all honest men.

Under the by-laws and charter of the Erie road all powers of the Board of Directors vest, between the meetings of the board, in the Executive Committee. At the present time this committee consists of three of the most noted stock-jobbers in Wall Street. This Executive Committee, acting under the advice of one of the ablest, most unscrupulous, and most designing legal counsellors of this city, and relying beforehand on the well-tried and fully-trusted support of the New York courts, undertook, without the slightest shadow of right or power, to make and issue fresh shares of the Erie to an amount almost doubling the capital stock of the company. These shares were secretly but rapidly sold in Wall Street for cash, and the proceeds, supposed to amount to about ten millions of dollars, were thenceforth used as additional capital to carry on the campaign. The sale of such large amounts of stock naturally depressed the declining prices still further and caused alarm among the dealers, while the sudden appearance in the Street of the newly issued certificates led to an official enquiry on the part of the New York Stock Exchange, which was met on the part of the president of the company by a brazen-faced acknowledgment of the entire fraudulent issue, accompanied by a disguised threat that still further fraudulent issues were in preparation. The alarm in Wall Street was of course great, and a further decline in Erie shares was the immediate result. Not only did most of the holders of the stock sell their shares at whatever they would bring in the market, but so strong was now the belief in the utter worthlessness of the stock that all the dealers and speculators in the Street were led to follow the example of the Executive Committee, and sold large amounts of stock for future delivery. Foremost among these sellers is said to have been a wealthy gentleman of advanced years, of eminent piety, a builder of churches, a founder of colleges, a former treasurer of the Erie Company, and a fit colleague of the speculative Executive Committee, with whom he now joined hands for the great culminating blow of the whole conspiracy.

The price had not yet fallen low enough, nor was the panic sufficiently great, to enable this combination to buy back all the shares which they had sold without causing the price to advance materially. They therefore commenced a series of manœuvres which at once removed their operations from the mere Wall-Street arena and gave them a national importance. It is well known that the National Bank Act makes it obligatory upon the national banks of the city to hold (in general terms) a reserve in greenbacks and other legal tenders equal to twenty-five per cent. of their indebtedness to depositors and others. In the fall season the greenback reserve is always disposed to decline, owing to the shipments of currency South and West to move the crops, and the banks are generally obliged to reduce their loans to their dealers, in order to keep their reserve up to the legal limit. Any additional loss of greenbacks compels them to still further reduce their loans, in the ratio of three dollars of loans for every dollar of greenbacks lost; and so well balanced are our financial machinery and our financial requirements that a sudden, even slight, change of one or the other will cause widespread disturbance.

In this condition was the money market when the very heavy sales of the fraudulent issues of Erie stock had depressed the price from seventy in July to forty at the close of October. These sales had produced, it is supposed, about ten millions of dollars, which, together with the four or five millions more obtained from other sources, the combination had deposited to their credit in some of the city banks. Checks were now drawn on these banks for the amounts so deposited, and the checks were presented for payment in greenbacks, which the banks could not refuse, and the greenbacks so obtained were suddenly withdrawn from the bank reserve. The effect was electrical. Every bank in the city saw its greenback reserve in danger; no one could tell what the next step might be; there was a mystery about the operation that added to the terror which its boldness had inspired; everybody thought only of strengthening himself; the banks and private bankers called in a large portion of their loans; money became almost unobtainable, and whoever had borrowed money on stocks was compelled to sell to pay off his loans.

Trade throughout the country was brought to a perfect stand-still; as high as one-half of one per cent. a day interest was paid for money, and even at that figure it could only be obtained against the very choicest kind of security; merchants were entirely cut off from bank facilities, and for one moment it seemed as though many of the banks themselves would be obliged to succumb. It required the strong arm of the Treasury to prevent the panic from spreading all over the country, and the Secretary, who had been misled into official expressions sound enough in themselves but tending at that particular moment to increase the excitement, hastened to assure the community that his action, if needed, would be calculated to bring relief. But in the meantime the whole community had become involved in loss; the bonâ fide holders of railroad and other stocks had seen their property reduced in value by one-third or one-fourth, and had, in many instances, been frightened into selling at a ruinous sacrifice; Government bonds had fallen five or six per cent. in a day; on the Stock Exchange the panic had been complete, prices had declined ten, twenty, thirty per cent.; Erie had fallen to thirty-five dollars a share; and in the midst of the panic and excitement the authors of all the mischief had been enabled to purchase back, at an enormous profit, all the shares they had before sold, and indeed a great many more. They had successfully accomplished the first part of their bold game. They had sold an enormous number of shares at high prices for future delivery, they had bought back these shares at a large profit, and they had induced a great many of the principal Wall-Street dealers and their customers to believe that prices were going still lower, and in that belief to sell large amounts of shares at low prices for future delivery, and these contracts to deliver Erie shares at low prices the very combination themselves had purchased and held ready to use whenever the fitting moment should come.

The panic produced by the extreme scarcity of money had depressed the price of gold the same as the price of everything else. The comprehensive Erie combination, flushed with money and success, proceeded to buy up immense sums of gold, and then withdrew from the market the whole amount purchased, as they had done before with the greenbacks. The immediate effect was to make gold so scarce that one per cent. a day interest was paid for it, that the price ran up four per cent. in two days, that the whole export and import trade and the foreign exchanges were brought to a complete stop and many foreign merchants involved in tremendous losses.

After thus whirling like a tornado through the gold market, spreading ruin everywhere, and gathering up a fresh addition to their previous profits, this extraordinary army of freebooters turn to the stock market once more. They had purchased almost all the shares of Erie that were in the market, and they had purchased the contracts of many persons agreeing to deliver them certain amounts of shares at low prices, notably the contracts of the former treasurer of the road, whom we have seen joining them as a confederate some little time back, but who had, as is apt to be the case among thieves, attempted to betray their schemes. All those who, like him, had sold stock for future delivery—many of them foreign banking-houses, who had legitimately sold the stock for account of their customers abroad, but had not yet received the shares from Europe—were now called upon to make their deliveries, and as all the stock was in the hands of the combination, who of course would not lend it, thousands upon thousands of shares had to be bought of the combination at fifty-five and sixty, to be delivered to themselves at thirty-five and forty.

Never was a bolder scheme planned—never one, so far, more successfully executed. By a fraudulent over-issue of stock these men had depressed the price of Erie stock twenty-five per cent., reaping an enormous profit; and with the money so obtained they had run up the price of gold and made another large profit; they had then again advanced the price of Erie stock twenty-five per cent., and made a larger profit than ever. In the course of these operations they had ruined hundreds of men in and out of Wall Street, had arrested the whole business of the country for nearly two weeks, had brought the banks to the verge of suspension, and seriously threatened the national credit, yet, excepting the menace of the Secretary of the Treasury, not a hand had been raised to check their wild career.

At last, a wealthy foreign banker, Mr. Belmont, had the courage to bring a civil suit against them, and obtained from the courts an order enjoining them from further evil-doing. But, alas for his innocence! such simple contrivances do not catch Erie directors. As soon as the injunction was published, it appeared that steps had been taken by the rogues to obtain a similar injunction against themselves, but with the difference that they themselves were appointed respectively receiver and custodian of the funds they were enjoined from further misappropriating! This extraordinary judicial proceeding emanated from a judge who has already become unpleasantly notorious in connection with Erie Railroad suits, and who has on more than one occasion been openly, in his own court and to his face, charged with collusion and corruption. But even this outrageous caricature of justice does not close the case. It is true that these conspirators had, to all appearances, realized an enormous fortune from their nefarious scheme, but it was evident to the careful reader that they were now the holders of very large amounts of fraudulently issued Erie shares, and it might be just possible—to say nothing of criminal proceedings—that they might lose a large portion, if not the whole, of their profits by the inevitable decline in value of this really worthless paper. But whoever expected such a result little knew the capabilities of the New York judiciary. The same judge who had appointed the conspirators against the Erie Railroad receiver and custodian of the Erie Railroad's property, also issued an order authorizing the said receiver to buy, at his discretion, for account of the Erie Railroad, the whole or any part of two hundred thousand shares of the company's stock, at the regular market price, not to exceed par. On the Saturday following the publication of this order the stock closed at forty-one. It is pretty evident that the conspirators are not likely to lose much on the stock they now hold.

It is possible that the perpetrators of these outrages cannot be reached through our criminal courts; it is possible that the financial community will continue to allow itself to be dragooned and plundered by these organized robber-gangs without being driven to some deed of desperation; but it cannot be that respectable men outside of Wall Street will countenance such deeds by social recognition of the doers. It makes but little difference whether the fortunes thus acquired are spent in social and literary dilettantism, or in boisterous festivities, or in the building of churches and endowment of colleges—all good men should unite in treating the owners as infamous.

THE POLITICAL RESULT IN ENGLAND.

It seems now tolerably certain that, as a result of the election in England, Mr. Gladstone will reappear in the House of Commons with a Liberal majority which will certainly amount to over one hundred and thirty, and may reach one hundred and fifty. In estimating the strength of parties in the English Parliament a considerable margin has to be left for doubtful cases—that is, for men nominally Liberal, or nominally Tory, who cannot be depended on with perfect certainty at great crises, and carry their votes from one side of the House to the other as momentary passion or prejudice may dictate. Party discipline is not as strict as it is here, and there are a good many country members to whom the opinion of their constituents is not of much consequence. But it is quite certain that the Liberals have a powerful majority, and as the result of this Mr. Disraeli will probably be driven from office by a vote of want of confidence some time before Christmas. A vote of want of confidence means the return of Mr. Gladstone to power, pledged to disestablish the Irish Church, the exclusion of the Tories from office for an indefinite period, and the introduction into the Government of an entirely new element in the person of Mr. Bright, and perhaps one or two other Radicals.

What has made Mr. Disraeli's overthrow so complete and easy—although there has been really no striking change either in the temper of the constituencies or the character of the members manifested in the working of the new Reform Bill—is that his manœuvring, after he first took office, made it clear that his zeal in defence of the Church was a sham and pretence. While he was still in uncertainty as to what ground Gladstone would take as to the Irish Church, he deliberately proposed, through the mouth of Lord Mayo, the abandonment, in Ireland, of the principle of mixed education on which the Queen's Colleges are based, and the endowment of the Catholic Church. After this slip, Gladstone openly declared himself for the destruction of the Protestant establishment, and to this Disraeli had nothing to oppose but the "no-popery" cry, which of course, coming from his lips after this, fell flat. Neither the friends of the Church nor the enemies of Catholicism could possibly trust him or give him more than a half-hearted support. Moreover, as the author of the new Reform Bill, and of the reduction of the franchise to a lower level than any Radical in the House of Commons had dreamed of seeing it reach in the lifetime of the present generation, he had natually excited the distrust, if not disgust, of the main body of the Tory party proper. How he managed to lead the men who drove Gladstone out of office for proposing a £7 franchise, and who cheered Lowe's abuse of democracy to the echo, to vote for household suffrage within one session of Parliament, is one of the greatest mysteries in political history. Disraeli's own share in the transaction can be accounted for, or is accounted for, by attributing it to his total want of political principle. He has never yet succeeded in convincing any large number of persons, either in or out of Parliament, that he has ever been either a sincere Tory or a sincere Radical, or that in his heart he really considers it of any importance to the country which party is in office. But this cannot be said of his followers. The great body of the country gentlemen, who constitute the bulk of his supporters in Parliament, did hate and fear democracy, and did really believe that to lower the electoral qualification was to "degrade" the franchise. How was it, then, that after getting them to turn Gladstone out of office for attempting to lower it a little, he got them to help himself in lowering it a great deal? To this question, though it has been discussed in yards on yards of newspaper and review articles, no satisfactory answer has ever been returned.

It is quite certain that Disraeli owed much of his success in attaining office—whatever may have been the cause of his success in passing the Reform Bill—to Gladstone's defects as a leader; and Gladstone's enemies now count on those defects to prevent his success in his assaults on the Irish Church, even with the majority which the Liberals have now secured. But there is every reason to believe that these defects will not prove as serious in the future as they have been in the past. Of course, no matter what may be the character of the House of Commons, it is the premier's business to manage it, and so far as he fails to do this he fails in his duty. Statesmen, like other men, have to work with such materials as present themselves, and not such materials as ought to present themselves; but there is every reason to believe that the House of Commons just elected will be a much easier one for Gladstone to manage than the one which has just been dissolved. The latter had been trained by Palmerston into what is known in England as the "gentlemanly" way of looking at things; that is, into treating all displays of earnestness or deep feeling on any subject as ridiculous and absurd, into considering politics as literally a "game" to be played by gentlemen, in which "questions" and voters were mere counters, and over which all excitement was ill-bred and disgusting. The Palmerstonians were Liberals, both in home and foreign policy, not from sympathy with the people, but because liberal government was, within certain limits, the only workmanlike and successful government. Palmerston himself hated and despised the Rechbergs and Bombas on the Continent, and threw his weight into the scale against them, not so much because they were tyrants and oppressors as because they were bunglers and blunderers who did not know their craft. His own plan was not to shut vulgar brawlers and demagogues up in jail or put them in the pillory, but to meet them in the market-place, as he did Rowley the butcher, and "chaff" them into powerlessness and insignificance.

Considering how many personal attractions he had, and how many social advantages, what a good fellow he was, how pleasant a house he kept, and what a ready, jolly debater he was, and how much experience of men and things he had at his back, it is not wonderful that he managed to infuse his temper into the House of Commons. There was always one set of Liberals who looked on him as a charlatan, and another who considered him a son of Belial, but they rarely ventured to assail him, and when they did they always came off second-best. The great majority followed him in treating the England of 1856 as being probably as good a social state as the nature of man and the designs of Providence would permit to appear on this globe. It may be imagined, therefore, how offensive Gladstone's Puritan tone was when he began to take the reins up after Palmerston's death. He has little tact at best, and he is devoured by "earnestness," and earnestness was the one thing the House of Commons could not stand. When in the earlier debates on the Reform Bill of 1865 he took office, and asked indignantly whether the working-men of England were not "the same flesh and blood" as the members of the House, and announced his conviction that it was not for the working-men to prove their fitness for the franchise, but for those who denied it to them to prove their *un*fitness, he produced a sensation amongst many of his hearers not far removed from physical nausea.

The new House of Commons will not differ materially from the old one, as far as its composition is concerned. The members are very much the same persons, but there is little question that its temper will be very different. The Palmerstonian influence has nearly died out. The working of the "philosophers," and the appearance of the artisan class amongst the constituents, have convinced legislators that politics are, after all, not a laughing matter; that the questions of the day are serious things, to be dealt with by serious men. This will unquestionably make Gladstone's task much easier, even if, as is very likely, his own faults, which are not trifling, have not diminished in number or gravity. The task before him is not slight, and the exultation of his enemies over his difficulties is not groundless. The disestablishment of the Irish Church means a good deal more than depriving it of state patronage and of official precedence. It means the seizure and distribution, in some way that will be satisfactory to the public, of about $100,000,000 of property, and the disturbance, more or less deep, of the lives of thousands of excellent persons who are in no way responsible for the abuse of which they unfortunately form a part. These difficulties are by no means insurmountable, but they are difficulties into which the feelings, habits, traditions, prejudices both of the English and Irish public enter much more largely than any other problem with which Mr. Gladstone has ever had to deal, and in which, therefore, his great intellectual power and dexterity will need to be largely supplemented by tact and sympathy and forbearance—qualities for which he is not remarkable.

A NEGLECTED SIDE OF THE WOMAN'S RIGHTS QUESTION.

The woman's rights movement is receiving a fresh impetus from the formation of a new association in New England, which seems to be enlisting a good many men and women of real influence and energy who have hitherto stood aloof from it or else have only given it a very lukewarm support. During the past year it has made considerable progress both here and in England. In England it has secured a firm footing in politics, and is now one of the questions on which Liberal politicians, at least, feel bound to declare their sentiments, and this of itself indicates a marked advance; because a mere declaration of hostility to a measure from men in public life proves that it has taken hold of the public mind in some degree. Moreover, it has been brought before the courts, and although the decision of the courts has been against woman's right to vote under the existing law, as everybody who knew anything about the law expected it would be, the defeat of such a movement on a point of law is sure to be but a temporary check. Mr. Gladstone, it is said, already concedes the expediency of conferring the franchise on spinsters and widows holding property in their own right; and if this concession be embodied in legislation during the coming session, the bestowal of the franchise on married women holding property in their own right cannot be very far off. This last class is at present a small one in England, owing to the fact that the rule of the common law which gives the husband uncontrolled possession of the wife's property can only be barred by a deed of settlement, a clumsy and expensive process which is only resorted to by heiresses. But the proposed assimilation of the English law to that of many States of the Union, leaving the woman's interest in her possession unaffected by her marriage, promises before long to make it a very large class; and this done, the probabilities are that every woman who cares to vote, whether married or single, will endeavor to secure, either by her own exertions or the gift of her male relatives, the necessary property qualification.

In the United States, the adhesion of professional politicians to a movement does not materially increase its strength; but it is a sign that its strength is increasing, and this sign the female suffrage movement undoubtedly exhibits. The arguments adduced against it on grounds of expediency have all been of the thinnest texture; they could not have been otherwise in a country in which men vote en masse, without, or almost without, restriction or qualification. It is useless to talk of the bad influence women will be likely to exert on political affairs through ignorance or passion, in the presence of the crowds of males who throng to the polls in the large cities and the darker country districts. Nearly all the weapons which are now used against female voting were used twenty years ago to defend the barriers which, in nearly all the States, prevented the indiscriminate voting of males, and were all then disposed of. There are no women more ignorant, none more venal, none more selfish than, very few so reckless and improvident and brutal as, a vast number of men whom the democratic movement of that period admitted to a share in the government. The fresh weapons brought into play against female voting are that it is ridiculous, and that it will divert women from more pressing and more sacred duties. But there is no such thing as absolute ridiculousness. In fact, there is nothing more relative. It is composed in large part of strangeness. Nothing is ridiculous with which we are very familiar, and women's voting is hardly likely to form an exception to the rule. You can no more laugh at female politicians after you have got used to them than at old jokes or twice-told tales.

The probability that their giving their attention to politics will cause women to neglect their domestic duties, or any duties peculiar to them as women, is only to be used as an argument by people who have never made a serious effort to define the limits of the legislator's province. It ought not to be heard from anybody who is opposed—as most of those, nevertheless, who use it are—to excessive government interference with the conduct of life. A legislator has no right to exclude any class of persons from the enjoyment of privileges possessed by all other classes, from the mere fear that the concession of them would interfere with the proper performance of duties of imperfect obligation—that is, of duties of which the law does not and ought not to enforce the performance. He ought not to restrain particular men of their liberty lest they should not prove industrious, or take charge of their affairs lest they should not prove charitable or economical, though he may forbid them to carry deadly weapons in cities, or walk the streets after midnight with bundles without being questioned. The proper apportionment of his time and attention between his various duties of imperfect obligation, such as his duties as a husband, father, philanthropist, church member, and citizen, is left, and properly left, to each individual man. It is a condition of sound progress that it should be so left. There are social penalties, far more effective than any legal penalties could be, for the neglect of any one of them by men, and yet men neglect them. There are thousands, nay hundreds of thousands, of men whose devotion to politics makes bad fathers, husbands, and citizens of them. The large band of persons known as "professional politicians" are as worthless a class as ever existed. To many of them individually it would be unquestionably a boon if they could neither vote nor hold office, but nobody dreams for that reason, or any other reason, of disfranchising them. So also, the possible effect of female suffrage in drawing away women's minds from their duties as wives or mothers or daughters, is not a question for legislative consideration. There doubtless will be large numbers of female voters on whose character politics will produce a bad effect; but there are women on whom idleness, wealth, fashionable society, hot bread, thin shoes, late hours, pie, and novels produce a bad effect, but then nobody for this reason proposes to regulate their lives by act of Congress.

We do not believe, therefore, that the friends of the movement have anything to do but to keep talking in order to carry it to a successful issue. But then the rapidity of their triumph will largely depend on the way they talk, and it is greatly to be desired that they should, as far as possible, show that they perceive those divisions in their subject which are palpable to the rest of the world, and act as if they perceived them, and that they should show that they give due attention to the considerations which weigh most with other people. It is only in this way that they will earn the character for good sense and thoughtfulness which is essential to their success. In most agitations of this kind the mass of the public is much influenced by confidence in those who are conducting them, and this confidence is the result, in a large measure, of the display of candor and perspicacity. For instance, the cause is not helped but hindered by the pretence which is constantly put forward at woman's rights meetings, that the lowness of women's wages is the consequence of their exclusion from the electoral franchise, or in some way connected with it. It has in reality no more to do with it than with their complexion or height. The reason why women's wages are low, why they get less for doing the same work than men get, is that the supply of women is greater than the demand in those employments for which they are fitted. You can no more raise their wages by giving them votes than procure for hod-carriers by giving them votes the same wages as carpenters. The number of women who want work is numerous; the number of occupations for which they are as yet fitted is small, and therefore employers of labor have their own way with them. Of course their physical weakness, and timidity, and inability to combine, do something to keep their rate of remuneration down; but we cannot remove these things by legislation or by the ballot.

There is one other point which we should like to see the woman's rights advocates face frankly and boldly, and which they now shirk most discreditably and injuriously, and that is, the existence and enormous influence on life and manners, and, above all, on the social position of women, of the sexual relation. We have read over with care such reports as we have been able to procure of their recent discussions in Chicago and Boston, in the hope of lighting on some speech or resolution in which women were not talked of as if they were simply small, weak, gentle, and refined men, whom the rest of the world had been treating unhandsomely for some thousands of years, apparently through "pure cussedness," and as if the passion of love were a figment of the poet's or novelist's imagination which was never met with in real life, and never was known to exercise any disturbing influence on anybody's conduct; but we have looked in vain. If any allusion is made to it at all, it is spoken of as if it were a weakness peculiar to a small body of ignorant people, and to be removed by common schools, lyceum lectures, and monthly magazines. Now, the fact is that the sexual instinct is one of the most tremendous of social forces, that its regulation is one of the most delicate and difficult tasks of the legislator and moralist, that you cannot seriously diminish its activity without touching the very fountain of national life. It is to its existence and to its strength more than anything else that women have in all ages owed the artificial disabilities inflicted on them by society. What the world is waiting to hear from the woman's rights advocates therefore is, how they propose to deal with this in the new régime for which they are preparing, in which women shall work side by side with men without any of the preventive barriers which society has hitherto erected between passion and weakness—and on this point we think they have thus far been much too reticent. When they get up and tell us, as one speaker did in Boston the other day, that there need be no fear of love-making bet ween young people of different sexes if educated together in the same colleges, because they will be too busy with their studies to think of love, the natural man feels a strong inclination to fling a book at his head. Nor is there much use pointing to Oberlin or any other place in which the experiment of education in common has hitherto been tried, because these experiments are always tried at first by what may be called a corps d'élite. The spectacle of men and women working side by side on the anti-slavery platform or the social-science platform proves little also, because it will hardly be maintained that the passions are strong or the moral culture low amongst the ladies and gentlemen who figure on them. The women, too, who first enter the medical and other professions are not apt to be fair representatives of their sex. They are sure to be persons of strong will, of more than usual intellectual power, and to exhibit, in fact, rather what is considered the peculiarly masculine than the peculiarly feminine type of character. What the public would like to have shown it is, not how the experiment has worked amongst a few hundred come-outers, but how it is likely to work in society at large, taking men and women as they are, and as they are likely to be for the next century. We do not mean to insinuate that the woman's rights party cannot make out a good case on these points; all we say is that they ought to discuss them more fully, and, in discussing them, manfully acknowledge their difficulties.

MY NEW FRIEND.

A SHALLOW voice said, bitterly, "New friend!"
As if the old alone were true, and, born
Of sudden freak, the new deserved but scorn,
And deep distrust.
If love could condescend,
What scorn in turn! Do men old garments mend
With new? And put the new wine, red at morn,
Into the last year's bottles, thin and worn?
But love and loving need not to defend Themselves. The new is older than the old:
And newest friend is oldest friend, in this,
That, waiting him, we longest grieved to miss
One thing we sought.
I think when I behold
Full Heaven, I shall not say, "Why was this never told?"
But, "Ah! this is not new. From first I saw this bliss."

THE RELIGIOUS CONDITION OF ENGLAND.

(FROM AN AMERICAN CORRESPONDENT.)

LONDON, September 25, 1868.

I HAVE just read in the Nation of September 10 the statement that "no one whose reading of the newspapers is supplemented by trustworthy private information can doubt that England is on the verge of the most tremendous crisis in her history, and that the Irish Church question is simply the precursor of others which will not be settled without recasting English society and giving a new order and direction to the tide of English history." Strong as these words are, they seem to me, from personal observation, not to be exaggerated. But at the same time it is possible to read the signs of the times in a different sense, and to come to the conclusion that the organic changes required in the constitution of English society to set it upon a sound footing may be even yet indefinitely postponed, and that the nation may yet have to pass through a period of political apathy and external quiet before the tide of revolution shall gather strength enough to overbear the immense forces which oppose a true social reconstruction. Such, at least, is the opinion of some of the acutest observers of the course of affairs. All that can be affirmed positively is that the present moment is one of doubt and expectancy. The old fetters of prejudice and routine are giving way on all sides. No doctrine and no institution is safe from the attack of criticism. The test of utility is mercilessly applied. In a recent private letter Mr. Mill writes: "All the great subjects —political, social, and religious—are brought into question; and there is a preparation going on in England, as there is in the United States, for a much better settlement of them than the world has yet had; but naturally the evidences of this are not so obvious on the surface as are those of the breaking up of old doctrines."

The extent of the change in modes of thought, the progress in the liberalizing of opinion during the last few years, is not less striking to Englishmen than it is to a foreigner who comes back to the country after an absence of considerable length. The change is not to be measured by the public exhibitions of it in the tone of the press. Even the most advanced journals fail to represent it fully, partly from the reserve imposed upon them by the necessity of their position, partly because many of the evidences of change are indefinite, casual, and private—of a sort that become impressive only by repetition and through their cumulative effect. The usages of society, the established habit of conformity, nowhere stronger than in England, keep many things from appearing on the outside which are moving within and it is consequently difficult to estimate the active force of principles held in theory by large numbers of persons but not openly professed. Moreover, as in all periods of change, so now there is, on the part of the bigoted adherents to things as they have been, an eagerness in the support of established notions or institutions proportioned to their sense of alarm, and productive of a factitious appearance of strength.

Among the intellectual class, and even in the Church itself, there is much more or less definite, and more or less open, scepticism; not merely disbelief in the doctrines of the Church, but doubt concerning the objects of faith, leading in some instances to the rejection of all supernaturalism, in others to the acceptance of a stoical philosophy, in others to a mere epicurean indifferentism. The sect which adopts the religious scheme of Comte, in all its baldness and with all its trivialities, numbers several really able men, and seems to have an influence quite out of proportion to its numerical strength. The remarkable address which Dr. Hooker delivered the other day at Norwich, as President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, expressed without reserve the contempt of its author for metaphysics and for natural theology, which he aptly termed "the most dangerous of two-edged weapons." There was even an unscientific and dogmatic temper manifest in his words. Science—the scientific mode of thought—is, however, so plainly getting control of the thought of England that bigotry in its behalf is unreasonable. Even at Oxford it is predominant, and religious scepticism is common. The teachings of Mill, of Comte, of Herbert Spencer, of Lyell, of Darwin and Huxley, and other such men, are having their effect on methods of enquiry and modes of belief, while the recent destructive historic criticism, especially that of the various German schools, has done much to weaken faith in the evidences of Christianity. The religion which is taught by the ablest and sincerest of the official teachers is mainly undogmatic, and a doctrine of active life, of virtue, of high morality. "We have lost, for the present at least," said recently one of the most eminent clerical teachers at the university,—"we have lost the definition of God."

The moral position of men who, holding sceptical opinions, still retain place in the Established Church, cannot be satisfactorily defended, and is felt by many of them to be indefensible. They would welcome any change which would deliver them from the necessity of stifling their real convictions. The religious life of England, like that of the rest of the modern world, must first gradually divide itself into the camps of authority represented by the Roman Church, and of absolute freedom of individual opinion. The half-way houses of orthodoxy—whether of the Church of England or of Unitarianism—cannot long maintain their present importance.

But the chief interest, at least at this moment, of the decline of traditional religion in England is in its connection with the political condition of the nation. It is a portent of no mean order. The state of religious belief and of philosophical opinion in England to-day is strikingly similar, not in aspect only but in essence, to that in France a hundred years ago. There is great difference in moral tone; but there is little difference in the solvent effect upon society of the destruction of the foundations of faith. The spirit of criticism is not embodied in a Voltaire, nor the sentiment of humanity in a Rousseau. Each is diffused, and perhaps not the less powerful for diffusion. Here, as in France a century since, the scientific or philosophic spirit—the spirit of scepticism, by whatever name it may be called—is incapable of supplying the place of religion with the mass of the people, either in the way of sentiment or of moral control. So far as its influence extends outside of the intellectual and cultivated classes, it tends to promote mere irreligion, and to excite a blind aversion to the restraints which the Church imposes.

But high morality—the morality of character and of self-support, of which true scepticism is often the source—proves too abstract and intellectual for attainment by any but enlightened and cultivated minds. On the other hand, and also as in France, the Church in its moment of supreme need proves itself incapable of meeting the demand upon it, and of supplying spiritual guidance and help to the mass of ignorant, benighted, and wretched souls who, surrounded by all the display and luxury of modern material civilization, live as outcasts and drag out their lingering days in poverty, toil, and vice. There are millions of men, women, and children in England destitute of religion, and with no share in the prosperity of the country. This is the dangerous class—a class that increases rapidly. The worst sign of the times is the deadness of the upper classes to the meaning of this terrible fact. I shall have more to say of this in a subsequent letter. But what, asks the Times in a recent article,—"in the face of such a fact as this, what can we think of all the metaphysical quibbles, the vestment squabbles, and the gratuitous innovations which are now distracting the attention of half our clergy, and which they think, and are sometimes encouraged to think, the great questions of the day? It is worse than Nero fiddling while Rome was burning. While they are compassing sea and land to make one proselyte to lighted candles, there are thousands of people around them ignorant of the very alphabet of morality and reason. While a gross pollution is spreading under the cognizance of their very senses, they must needs spend their own energies and waste the energies of others upon embroidered dresses and incense, and hymns to the Virgin Mary, and associations for promoting the unity of Christendom."

RUSKIN AND HIS WRITINGS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

The Nation in No. 165 has a notice of the "Modern Painters" which states so many of the commonly received and utterly erroneous dicta concerning the ideas advanced in that book, and its general theory of art-study and criticism, that I am induced to ask room to controvert it in the interest of art-education, not to say of the Nation, whose critical authority should rest on better premises.

The "Modern Painters" was published at intervals extending from about 1845 (having no copy by me, I cannot be precise) to 1859, the first volume, and the only one known in popular reading, being put out when the author was about twenty-seven years of age; and being, as might be expected, a work of intense enthusiasm and immature thought, it was no exception to the dictum that books which acquire rapid and general success are superficial and probably unworthy to occupy permanently the place at first assigned them. While no other book can be quoted so full of intense perception and rapturous appreciation of nature and her claims on the artist, no other can be found which, with such thorough and conscientious seeking for art, manifests so little attained knowledge of its real character and uses. Ruskin's nature was over-freighted on the moral side (using that word in its general acceptation with us), and ran too strongly into the devotional-didactic to be able to explore the sister but independent realm of artistic development.

The public in general knowing nothing of art as distinguished from pictorial representation, the young and reverent painters, still warm with that passionate love that makes a religion of anything and makes anything it loves religious, adopted this first volume as the canon of criticism; but so universal was the dissent of the older artists and the deeper students that I should not have thought it necessary ever to controvert the popular opinion had I not found it expressed in a journal of the gravity and justice of the Nation.

Your critic's assertion that "the general tendency of Ruskin's teachings in art is always right," is just the contrary of what I believe to be the truth. I believe (and I have known him and his book for many years, and regard him as the most unhesitating lover of truth I have ever known) that Mr. Ruskin's art-teachings are utterly wrong, based on an entirely erroneous estimate of the position of art in the intellectual system, and calculated to bewilder most and to lead the most widely astray—and to lead them to a greatest loss of time and heart—the most reverent and earnest of those who study his works. To show just wherein he is wrong in the abstract would require an exposition of what art is, which would demand space you could not spare and time I cannot now devote to the subject; but I can illustrate just as well by examination of his concrete judgment.

The first volume of "Modern Painters" recognizes insight into nature as the great gift of the painter, and, with the third and fourth (the second being an episode of great value, but foreign to art), goes to prove that Turner possessed this gift more than all other painters, and that the English school possessed it in a degree far beyond the older schools; in the fifth he recognizes the claims of the great technical qualities, previously overlooked in his system and never fully appreciated, since he has no sense of the value of Greek art, in which they attained their greatest development. He seeks to establish by his researches and demonstrations that Turner is the greatest of landscape painters because of his greater insight into nature, and that Stanfield, Harding, et id genus omne, are greater artists than Claude, because they have clearer eyes, while in point of fact Turner's insight into nature was incidental to his genius as an artist, and Claude was an artist, though feeble; while Stanfield, Harding & Co. are only clever painters, with scarcely the most hazy and incomplete perceptions of what art is.

To speak of Turner as the greatest of landscape painters because he told the most truth is an egregious non sequitur, for no other painter ever told so many falsehoods on canvas. I do not believe he ever gave a thought to truth either of detail or color; forms and motives of color that pleased him by their expression and fitness to his moods he retained and reproduced in a more or less exact degree. I have seen many of his studies of nature, and never saw an attempt to reproduce the actual truth of landscape. I do not believe that his feeling would have permitted him to sit down to match-trials with nature any more than Beethoven would have sat down to write a score of the modulations of voice in a drawing-room conversation. He defied all the actualities; he put rainbows at right angles to the sun, threw shadows across clear water, gave tints of purple, scarlet, and gold in skies when the sun was yet an hour high, mixed shadows of moonlight and sun light, put his lights on the opposite side of the objects from the sun, relieved verdant mountains in light against a blue sky, painted pictures in which scarcely the most fanciful resemblance to natural objects can be discerned, and which are yet as great art as anything he did.

His great artistic gifts were the intense fusion of his perceptions into conceptions (a quality different, I believe, from either idealism or creative imagination, or even imaginative conception), and his unapproached and almost unsuggested orchestration (if I may borrow an analogic term) of color, which alone would have placed him in the front rank of artists of all time. Titian's color-harmony was as faultless as Turner's, but compared with it as a vocal quartette with the most elaborate concerts.

Ruskin's ends of art are only its means; its most characteristic and noble revelations of ends are expressive, not representative; what is in the artist, not the language borrowed from nature in which he tells it.

I do not set Mr. Ruskin too low; his value is other than the usually accepted one. He belongs to the school of noble speculative minds, teeming with suggestions of the highest value, and this especially in his sociological and socio-political works, but by his inevitable limitations is forbidden to prescribe rules or organized systems. His political economy is not of the school of Adam Smith but of Plato, with an infusion of sorrowing, heartaching philanthropy, of human love and despair at human folly and shortcoming (to him madness and wickedness), which the "Republic" would never admit nor its author have felt. Similarly, his artistic studies were dispersive, analytic, iconoclastic; what he pulled down was in the main well pulled down, but what he built was builded of bricks without mortar. His instincts went to the heart of a falsehood as a surgeon's knife to its work of extirpation, but he would no more make or guide an artist than an anatomist a human body.

Yours respectfully, W. J. Stillman.

Athens, Greece, October 28, 1868.

[We are very glad to give Mr. Stillman an opportunity of stating his opinions about Mr. Ruskin and his teachings, but an adequate defence of our position or an adequate attack on Mr. Stillman's would take more space than we can spare, or are likely ever to be able to spare. We have the consolation of knowing that should the above letter fall under Mr. Ruskin's eye he will avenge us.—Ed. Nation.]

LITERARY.

D. Appleton & Co. announce "Prince Eugene of Savoy," which is, of course, by Miss Mühlbach. We shall give pleasure, we fear, to many persons when we say that Miss Mühlbach's labors have not yet made her wealthy. They may moderate their joy by reflecting that probably she will go on writing till they do.——Messrs. Nichols & Noyes announce "The New England Tragedies in Prose," by Mr. Rowland H. Allen. Whether Mr. Allen has written a travesty or has been working in earnest we do not know. In earnest, most likely; the titles of his pieces are "The Coming of the Quakers" and "The Witchcraft Delusion."——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt announce "Problematic Characters," a translation of a novel of Spielhagen's; "Madame de Beaupré," by Mrs. C. Jenkin; and Taine's "Florence and Venice," which follows after the "Rome and Naples," which we have already noticed.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton will publish "How Not to be Sick," by Dr. Albert J. Bellows; it is an appropriate sequel to the same author's "Philosophy of Eating." We may as well mention here—not on the publishers' account, but to direct into a new and unobtrusive field the labors of the genial critics—that Messrs. W. E. Simonds & Co., of Hartford, propose to issue The Traveller's Friend and The Gas Light, and that they intend to deal largely in book-notices. "We shall not assume to be critical," they say, "and will publish such notices as publishers may furnish, if entirely satisfactory to us." First these reviews will be printed in The Gas Light; afterwards their sphere of usefulness will be widened, and they will be placed in the columns of The Traveller's Friend.

—Mr. J. W. Bouton, of Broome Street, has issued a new catalogue of rare and valuable books. Two or three of the number are remarkable instances of private illustration on a grand scale. The Bible, in ten volumes, described on the first page of the catalogue, is the most elaborate piece of work of this kind that has ever come to our notice. Every book-lover has heard of the process of "inlaying," by which pages are enlarged to any desired size. Your little engraving on a scrap of paper may lack four inches on each side of the size which other engravings have fixed for your book. The collector who undertakes to illustrate extensively a quarto Bible will find that he has pictures and maps of every imaginable size but the size he has been compelled to take for his book, as, for instance, the size of the quarto printed page. This inlaying process is a wonder of nice handling. The little scrap of thin grey or yellowish-brown paper, with perhaps a cut on both sides of it, will be found occupying the centre of a broad sheet of strong white paper, with which it is inseparably united, as if the two had become one. The junction is marked by nothing more palpable than the sudden change of thickness and color. This delicate work is needed only when both sides of the page are to be shown. An engraving showing only one side, with much less trouble can be mounted upon a large sheet of paper, and rolled into it until the added thickness is hardly perceptible. In the case of this Bible there has been a most unusual amount of the finest work done; for the richly illustrated New Testament published seven or eight years ago by the Longmans having been taken for the work, every page has had to be inlaid, so as to show the text and wood-cut borders on both sides. The large-paper edition of this Testament would have lacked about an inch all around of the size of the book, so, as this would have been an awkward job to do, a small-paper copy was taken, allowing a wider and stiffer margin. Although it is chiefly as a unique curiosity that we have spoken of this compilation, there is, of course, much good art scattered through it, and an examination of it is very interesting.

—We have before spoken of volumes made up of Cruikshanks; selections from this and from that, mounted or inlaid to a certain fair size, and bound up in great square volumes. Mr. Bouton's catalogue offers two of these, altogether similar to those we have previously mentioned in noticing Scribner, Welford & Co.'s stock. The enormous number of George Cruikshank's works, etchings, engravings, and woodcuts, and the scattered condition of such of them as do not form part of permanent volumes, make them peculiarly suitable for the purpose of collecting into these glorified scrap-books. This is the good side; the bad side is that the temptation is considerable to break up pamphlets and books, and use the cuts to help out the scrap-books. Sometimes this is almost excusable. For instance, anybody whose means or whose space is limited may hesitate to give house-room, and, in general, to possess, the endless file of Bentley's Miscellany. The delightful Cruikshank illustrations of the Miscellany are all, or nearly all, in the first six volumes. Possibly one might show good sense by taking out the pictures, and either binding them up with copies of the books they belong to—"Oliver Twist," "Jack Sheppard," "The Ingoldsby Legends," and others—or putting them all into a scrap-book with what separate plates one might happen upon. So it might be not amiss to use the whole of a pamphlet of a few pages to enrich a fine collection, as is done in one instance in one of the books before us. But in other cases, even when the letterpress is very worthless, it is better to keep the whole work together in its original form. We should bind up the books as Cruikshank himself saw them first, keeping their old paper covers, which, indeed, often contain designs by the artist.

—Doctor Samuel Gregory, who is the Secretary of the New England Female Medical College, has written a small pamphlet in which he argues that it is right for female physicians to style themselves "Doctress" instead of "Doctor." In the abbreviated form, by the way, as the title should appear on signboards, he would write it "Drss." There is no philological reason why not; and, as a philological reason why, we may remark that it is better to have as few words of doubtful gender as possible. And for business purposes the distinctive title seems to be for several reasons preferable. As Doctor Gregory remarks, a man in search of a physician for special consultation does not wish to be ushered into the presence of a lady; so also with women; nor could a servant sent in haste to "fetch a doctor" tell when she pulled the bell whether she was going to bring out a practitioner of the right or wrong sex. But apart from the natural human slowness to adopt new things, it will be from the doctresses themselves, we suppose, that the chief opposition will come. They cling to the old-established, long honorable designation.

—A gentleman writes to the editor of the London Times for the purpose of putting in print three statements which shall correct three common errors in regard to the early history of newspapers; and first he says that the very earliest of daily newspapers in the world was not the daily Courant of Wednesday, the 11th of March, 1702, three days after the accession of Queen Anne. In point of fact, there had been an English daily journal forty-two years before that time. In 1660, on the 8th, 9th, and 10th of March, appeared three numbers of A Perfect Diurnal. Then, in the second place, the seventh number of the Impartiall Intelligencer, a paper started in 1649, and generally thought, by those who think about such things, to have contained the first of all British advertisements. But on the first page of the "first of all English periodicals"—a weekly, not a daily, paper—the Newes of Nathanael Butler, our Times correspondent has discovered this advertisement, bearing the date of February, 1625:

"Here is this present day published an excellent Discourse concerning the Match betweene our most Gracious and Mightie Prince Charles, Prince of Wales, and the Lady Henrette Maria, daughter to Henry the Fourth, late King of France, &c., Sister to Lewis the Thirteenth, now King of those Dominions: Manifesting the Royall Ancestors of both these famous Princes, and truly explaining the severall interchanges of Marriages which hath beene betweene France and England: with the lively Picture of the Prince and the Lady cut in Brasse."

In the third place, it is a popular error that the Mercurius Civicus of 1643 was the first English illustrated paper; for in the Weekly Newes of the 20th of December, 1638, is an account of "a prodigious eruption of fire which exhaled in the middest of the Ocean Sea over against the Isle of Saint Michael, one of the Terceras, and of the new island which it hath made." It would have been too much to have expected Mr. Butler to describe this valuable convulsion without depicting it in the liveliest possible manner, and accordingly we have a full-page engraving, showing "the island, its length and breadth, and the places where the fire burst out," though we dare say the enterprising journalist would have been as much puzzled to tell how he happened opportunely to have an artist on the very spot as would be some of the editors of our degenerate days. So far "G. H. C." Then, in a day or two, in another letter, comes "T. W." and says that A Perfect Diurnal is merely "A Perfect Diurnal of the daily Proceedings in Parliament, published according to order;" that its contents were merely the orders and resolutions of the days above specified; that its publication would be contingent on the meetings of the House, would be daily only while the meetings were; would be interrupted by an adjournment, and would cease at the close of a session. He adds that the "votes" of the House are still so published, and concludes by asking if "G. H. C.'s" Perfect Diurnal can be called a daily paper? The answer seems to be that it can be so called when Parliament can be considered a newspaper editor, but hardly before. "T. W." also remarks that almanacs are surely periodicals, and that almanacs long preceded newspapers. He remarks, too, with justice we should say, that the chance publication of one cut does not give the Weekly Newes any very good claim to the title of an "illustrated paper." We may suggest, too, that as for illustrated periodicals the almanacs were, in a sense, illustrated. In conclusion, "T. W.," who seems to have a systematic or scientific knowledge of a subject of which "G. H. C." has only a scattering knowledge, says that it is remarkable with what slowness daily journals made their way abroad. The earliest French periodical, published daily, was, he says, on the authority of Barbier, the Journal de Paris, which was born in 1777, long before which time, as we all know, we American-English had set the daily press in motion in New England and Pennsylvania.

—Not only the British artisan is having his education looked after by the English reformers, but the British merchant also. Professor Leone Levi has been lecturing at King's College, London, on the proper course of studies for a youth intending to enter the mercantile profession. He should begin, it appears, by laying in his English, one or two foreign languages, Latin, arithmetic, and mathematics. The technical demands of trade, however, would demand that the intending merchant should not rest content with these general acquisitions, but that after perfecting himself in them he should go on to acquire many more branches of knowledge. The study of statistics, the professor says, is important for the merchant should be able to procure, understand, arrange, and publish facts relating to trade. We suggest that perhaps he would hardly in all cases see the necessity of publishing such facts as he had procured, understood, arranged, and added to his capital. Mathematics the professor would have the mercantile student thoroughly study, and algebra—both of them in connection with the doctrines of probabilities, as these doctrines considerably affect the business of insurance. Accountancy is of practical use, since a good knowledge of it often acts as a safeguard against commercial disaster. The very elements of commercial knowledge the merchant will, of course, not neglect. These are "the principles of commerce and banking, including the history of our commercial policy, a knowledge of facts relating to the articles of trade, the foreign exchanges, and the funds, as well as a good portion of political economy." Physical geography also is of great value, and, in connection with mining and manufacture, chemistry and geology are of primary necessity. Of still greater utility to all merchants is an acquaintance with the commercial laws of all countries and of international law and the laws regulating the tariffs of all countries, and also all countries' weights, measures, and coins. How much more is necessary for the merchants we shall perhaps learn in others of Professor Levi's course of lectures, which we fear are attended by not many youths destined to become great merchants. There is a story, which we have heard, of a young man who took so high a view of the duties devolving upon a minister of the Gospel that he laid out his studies on a plan of such dimensions as was honorable to himself and may be said to have magnified his office to a very high degree. Unfortunately, when he got ready to preach his first sermon, if he had ever preached, it would have been his own funeral sermon, for by the time he thought he had studied nearly enough he was well stricken in years. There is no doubt that all the knowledge Professor Levi desires for them would do the merchants good; it is possible that a man even sweeps the streets or engineers a scavenger's cart all the better for having been liberally educated before he bought his broom or his shovel. But then, too, there is a question if, while he is being made better as a man, he is not being spoiled for a crossing-sweeper or collector of muck. We have a notion that Professor Levi's merchants would ten times be seen in laboratories, newspaper offices, professors' chairs, and similar places for one time that they would be seen on 'change or loading fleets of clippers or running factories.

—Emanuel Geibel has actually broken his connection with the University of Munich and abandoned that city, and the King of Prussia has not hesitated to reward his devotion to the cause of German unity by bestowing on him a pension somewhat larger than that of which the displeasure of the King of Bavaria deprived him. Another German poet, Paul Heyse, who fully shares Geibel's sentiments concerning the future of their fatherland, is reported to have voluntarily resigned his Bavarian pension. On their part, the German people are by no means indifferent to the fate of their patriotic poets. The subscriptions for the relief of their long-tossed-about favorite, Freiligrath, have risen to the amount of 54,000 thalers. Neither is the memory of the eminent writers of the past neglected, as the preparations for the centenary celebration of Schleiermacher's birthday show. We are glad to see that our liberal theologians, this side of the Atlantic, have not forgotten to pay their tribute of gratitude, jointly with their German brethren, to the memory of the noble thinker and warm-hearted orator, who deserved so well of his time and country.

—Our last German literary bulletins, as usual, contain many attractive titles of new publications. Baxmann's "Politik der Päpste von Gregor I. bis auf Gregor VII." (Policy of the Popes from Gregory I. to Gregory VII.), of which the first volume has appeared at Elberfeld; the third volume of Von Reumont's "Geschichte der Stadt Rom" (History of the City of Rome), which concludes the work, embracing the history of the last fifty years (Berlin); the "Mittheilungen aus den nachgelassenen Papieren eines preussischen Diplomaten" (Communications from the Papers of a late Prussian Diplomatist), published by a nephew of the author, L. von L. (1st vol., Berlin); and, possibly, Haeckel's "Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte" (Natural History of Creation), in popular lectures (Berlin), will be found interesting by the general reader. Friends of Biblical literature cannot fail to be interested by Nöldeke's "Die alttestamentliche Literatur in einer Reihe von Aufsätzen dargestellt" (Old Testament Literature, presented in a Series of Discourses), published at Leipzig. E. Gerlach has issued a commentary on the "Klagelieder Jeremiä" (Lamentations of Jeremiah), and J. C. Füller a commentary on the "Prophet Daniel." From Adolf Jellinek, Jewish pulpit orator at Vienna, and brother of the martyr for German liberty, executed at the order of Prince Windischgrätz in 1848, we have the first part of "Studien and Skizzen" (Studies and Sketches), containing an ethnographical study on the Hebrew race ("Der jüdische Stamm"). One of the most conspicuous publications in the field of Biblical criticism is Noack's "Von Eden nach Golgatha" (From Eden to Golgotha), in two large volumes (Leipzig). Fürst, the author of the Hebrew Dictionary, has published at Leipzig "Der Kanon des alten Testaments nach den Ueberlieferungen in Talmud and Midrasch" (The Old Testament Canon according to traditions in the Talmud and Midrash). Of Brugsch's grand publication, the "Hieroglyphic and Demotic Dictionary," the thirteenth number has been issued (Leipzig).

—Of late publications in the languages of Eastern and Northern Europe we may, for the benefit of some few of our readers, mention these as being a few of the more important. The academic "Dictionary of the Hungarian Language," edited by Czuczor and Fogarasi, has been brought down, in its fifth volume, to the syllable "Por." Of the "Collected Works" of the veteran literary historian in the same language, Francis Toldy, the first two volumes have been issued, containing biographical sketches of "Hungarian Statesmen and Authors." A work crowned by the Academy of Pesth is "The History of the Development of Politico-Economical Ideas," by Kautz. From the Russian historian, Bogdanovitch, we have the first volume of a "History of the Reign of the Emperor Alexander the First." Giller, a Polish emigrant, publishes "Poland in her Struggle: A Collection of Reminiscences." In Dutch we have Kroon's "Jan de Witt contra Oranje, 1650–1672." In the same language appears a history of "The North American War of 1861–1865," by Obreen.

MRS. CRAIK'S NEW NOVEL.*

Some years ago Mrs. Craik wrote one or two very good novels, which were preceded by some well-meaning, but, on the whole, unsatisfactory attempts in the same direction as that in which she finally achieved her success, and which have of late been followed by three or four more which make one regret that she did not lay aside her pen before her hand began to tire. "John Halifax" was certainly pleasant reading, and so also, though in a lesser degree, were "The Head of the Family" and "Agatha's Husband"—so pleasant that one's dissatisfaction with "The Woman's Kingdom," and "Mistress and Maid," and so on, wears an almost remorseful and guilty aspect. Her successes, however, were never gained by virtue of any wide or assured knowledge of life, or any profound sense of the requirements of art. They were emphatically what they have been very well called—"the work of a good heart"—and among female novelists a good heart is apt (is it not?) to be almost rarer than a good head. These novels had all that is best of that which is exclusively feminine. They voiced in a modest and pure-minded way the feeling of sex which is the motive power of so many of the novels written by women, and which is often expressed—unconsciously, we must believe—in a manner to make one doubt whether there are not two sides worth considering in the old question, Ought women to learn the alphabet? To decide it practically in the negative would, of course, have its disadvantages—the sentimental men could no longer expatiate on the luxury of having wives who can "understand" them, and there would be no talk of female suffrage; but then, on the other hand, we should have no poetesses complaining,

"How dreary 'tis for women to sit still," or weeping publicly melodious tears over their "lips unkissed;" no Hesba Strettons doing social articles on such delicate topics as how to know when a man is paying "serious attentions." Those earlier novels of Mrs. Craik's could hardly be said to sin in that direction, though they were full, too, of the distinctively female sentiment, and regarded the world only as a stage on which men and women play the parts of lovers and sweethearts, husbands and wives, and found the chief duty of man on this planet to consist in the establishment of the truly Christian home. But they told the story of young and innocent love in an unaffected, pleasant way; they contained a good deal of clever realistic work; they drew very delicately the one kind of woman in whom Mrs. Craik delights; and if her good men were apt, by a not unpardonable error, to be women also, in rather transparent disguises, it still was not amiss to show how a good-hearted and pure-minded woman reconstructs the world in her imagination. Nor were they so depressingly monotonous in tone as her later books have become. There was, to be sure, always a gentle pathos about them which irresistibly inclined the reader to sympathize with some half-guessed trouble of their author, as much as with the deliberately unfolded troubles of her characters, but she had not yet fallen into that "plaintive minor key" which one of her recent critics finds so soothing. Her power was never the power of genius, however, and it was evidently on the wane when she wrote "A Life for a Life." Her women began then to be too absolutely female, and she showed a tendency to sentimentalize as extravagantly about love as some French writers do about religion. But she has a substratum of sense which generally, though not always, prevents her from violently outraging one's sense of propriety and fitness; and as, in "Le Récit d'une Sœur," one quarrels only with the theory on which such lives are based, but does not deny that the lives themselves may be thoroughly consistent and charming, so, in these later books of Mrs. Craik's, it is the exclusive sentiment which underlies them—it is, in fact, the author herself whom we criticise, and not, at any given chapter or paragraph, her statement. It is absurd to say that a woman can be too womanly, but surely it is possible to dwell too fondly, in books at least, upon her strictly feminine aspect; love is a very beautiful and natural thing, and so is the religious sentiment, but the people one meets are neither, as a rule, revelling in an excess of ill-concealed connubial bliss, nor, contrariwise, are they constantly afflicted with dull heartaches, nor plunged in mad excesses through disappointed love, and they are neither ecstatic devotees nor scoffers at everything sacred. To dwell persistently on exceptional cases as though they formed or ought to form a universal standard is only to write one's self down a specialist.

It was in "A Life for a Life," too, if we remember rightly, that Mrs. Craik began to delineate a type of woman different from any she had previously essayed—the woman of great beauty, weak mind, and cold heart, whom she supposes to entrance men, and obscure the merits of the good, tender, domestic, plain little women who are in reality so preferable.

Lisabel Johnston was her first effort in this direction, and Letty Kenderdine in her latest novel is an improvement on the same idea, being, if possible, more beautiful, more silly, and still colder-hearted. But it is extremely doubtful if a woman like Mrs. Craik can deal at all justly by the Lettys and Lisabels of this world. They are made just a trifle sillier than is quite necessary, and their beauty disappears utterly under a cloud of purely feminine phraseology. Hardly any woman, unless George Eliot is an exception, shows in her writing any adequate perception of the real value and charm of a woman's beauty. Hetty Sorrel was delightfully drawn, but even in that portrait there was evident a judicial coolness of appreciation which of itself betrayed a woman's workmanship in a book which in so many other points left doubtful the sex of its author.

Mrs. Craik's character-drawing seems to us, however, always faulty, inasmuch as it presents types rather than individuals. One of these types, the "womanly woman," is a fair success; but one affirms even that success of the aggregate of her efforts, not of any special character. Ursula, Agatha, Dora, Edna—one says of them all that their author does that kind of woman very well; but in them she has delineated class traits, not individuals of a class. So when one speaks of the excellence of "John Halifax," it is the novel itself that one thinks of, and not of its hero. The rest of her characters—the weak but not wicked woman, the upright, tender-hearted man, the man led astray by disappointed love, but still retaining traces of original capabilities to have become that highest type of man, the good husband—all these must be counted as failures. Our author drew them from the depths of her consciousness, and they do not quite tally with real life; they are shadowy and unsubstantial. The same thing is to be said of her attempts to describe children. Not one of them succeeds in setting a genuine child, like Totty Poyser, or the little Tullivers, before the reader. Her children are small men and women, in whom their author's prophetic eye already discerns the germs of capacity or incapacity for that one engrossing business of maturer life, the making of sentimental love.

Miss Mulock, then, although she has for a long time given great pleasure to many varieties of novel-readers, and although a number of her novels are very good in their way, is not to be called a good novelist. A good novelist does not moralize exclusively from the chimney corner—is not so specifically a good man or woman that goodness and sex together prevent any satisfactory conception of the totality of things and their general interdependence from entering his mind, and thence escaping into his work. She is simply a very excellent woman, who writes in a pleasant way, and who believes ardently in the religion of love. She begins, though, to show a lack of power to set even her favorite and well-worn ideas attractively before the public. Her "Woman's Kingdom," displaying as it does all her characteristic limitations, and made wearisome by its monotony of tone and its tediously close analysis of subjects with whose morbid anatomy her readers were already too familiar, is the least successful thing she has done for several years.

THE MAGAZINES FOR DECEMBER.

Mr. John Neal—not talking, we should say, for the art-critics of our generation—gives us in the December Atlantic his opinions of "Our Painters," or of some of them, and this time discourses of Stuart, Jarvis, and Rembrandt Peale. It is worth while to compare Mr. Neal's writing with the similar work of the present day and to note the difference in tone and style. The old school dies with courage, however; no one writes more bravely than Mr. Neal. The editors are certainly to be congratulated on the possession of their new Paris correspondent; the lady who writes "Our Paris Letter" tells well and merrily a pleasant story. "Co-operative Housekeeping," having ceased from general remarks and taken to specifications, becomes more interesting, and deserves the attention of every one who desires the amelioration of the condition of the housekeeper. Its earnest and painstaking character commands respect, even if the plans it puts forth should seem not practicable. That they will be severely criticised by the majority of readers, and condemned outright by many, especially by "old housekeepers," is certain. But it may be permitted to younger and more enthusiastic heads of families to indulge in the visions of hope. Old housekeepers—or, we will say, women generally—have grown a little depressed over the peculiarly irritating nature of their troubles, and would be inclined to be very sceptical of any proposed cure for them which did not bear on its face an assurance of success. As to this particular panacea, we suppose the comment of the discouraged multitude of "the suppressed sex" upon the scheme of this irrepressible member of it will be, "If she says that, then she does n't know anything about it," or some such ill language. But the housekeeping class will not be the first oppressed class which had to be coaxed and persuaded into self-improvement and comfort, and if our author succeeds no further than to provoke the discussion that her performance and the subject deserve, she will have done something to rejoice over. It is almost a pity that the Anglo-Saxon is so individual a person.

Mr. Swinburne contributes a rather remarkably bad one of his poetical pieces. His freedom-shrieking vein is, on the whole, considerably his worst one, and a "Watch in the Night" is a freedom-shrieking piece. Then again he puts in some little indecency, but it is in a crude state and without that artistic management of it which constitutes his best claim to consideration. So then we get a successful conjunction of the poet's faults. Possibly his metres may prevail on the readers of the Atlantic; but we doubt it, and rather imagine that one-half his wage expended for the poetry of two or three persons of lesser name would be riches less unprofitably bestowed. Besides these papers the number contains two good literary notices; an account of the beginning and ending of the slave-trade—a very readable and agreeable account, too, Mr. Edward Everett Hale being the writer of it; a paper on Hooker—not very new, but, as each generation rises up, these things have to be done over for it; "A Day at a Consulate," which will be found pleasant reading, as also will Mrs. Austin's sprightly little piece; "A Gothic Capital," by Mr. Theodore Bacon; and some anonymous verses—to say nothing of two bad book-notices, and the fearful and wonderful "Atlantic Advertiser," in which we advise our readers to put implicit confidence.

Harper's for the coming month begins with four illustrated articles, the most important of which seems to be Mr. Moncure Conway's—we suppose it is his—"South Coast Saunterings in England." It contains some personal gossip of a rather better than ordinary kind and some tolerable criticisms, which would be better if Mr. Conway could be less of a partisan, and worse if his temper were better. Half of it we can generally recommend as to be taken; but one has to know which half, or our advice is dangerous. Major De Forest is at his best in "A Report of Outrages," which everybody ought to read who, not being a semi-barbarian himself, has had his doubts whether the North has n't been watching the Southern whites a little too sharply. Mr. Texas Brown and his congeners strike us as persons who will bear about as much watching as can be done for them, and the communities which shelter them are, for nearly all practical purposes, as bad as they. Nor need anybody in reading Major De Forest's sketches of them fear that he is not getting the real thing; but, as for that, Major De Forest's sketches always carry with them conviction of their truth. "The Confessions of a Reformed Planchettist" begins with a very ingenuous confession from that former impostor—"I am not wicked; at the worst I am but weak"—and proceeds in a lively manner to detail its author's successes in leading captive silly women, and certain others, with the most tiresome of modern toys. We commend his experiences to the attention of the writer in Putnam's who devotes so much philosophic speculation to the subject. Whoever desires it may now read Lord Lytton's "Rightful Heir"—which was Bulwer's "Sea Captain"—and, the Harpers having reprinted it entire, its noble author may now very probably derive some benefit from its reproduction on the stage in this country—if, indeed, we are going to take delight any more in such holding the mirror up to nature as this:

"Fortune stints gold to some; impartial nature
Shames her in proffering more than gold to all—
Joy in the sunshine, beauty on the earth,
And love reflected in the glass of conscience;
Are these so mean? place grief and guilt beside them," etc., etc.

It is amusing to see Mr. E. A. Pollard's childlike belief in the authenticity of Bulwer's genius. That writer appears in Putnam's as the author of an article on Stonewall Jackson. He takes a fair view of Jackson so far as he takes a view at all, or so far, perhaps we ought to say, as we can see what his view is. He has peculiar habits of composition, which, however, seem of late to have less full control of him than formerly, and he now appears to be, as a writer, the remains of a rather more endurable man than is usually left over after a Southern literary training. Still, however, he does remember his haunts by the majestic James, and "Richmond La Pucelle"—that was. It is funny to hear him, when he speaks of Goethe, informing us that that obscure person was "the acute German philosopher," which hardly seems a safe thing to say. The connection between the literary conditions which enable a man to talk in that way, and the religious conditions which permitted Jackson to be a stupid bigot—and one of a vast number of such—and the political conditions which permitted the lamented Davis to figure as a statesman, and the social conditions which justified a recent cowardly assault on an innocent historian—of all this Mr. Pollard is perfectly unconscious. Still, as we have said, the essay seems to us to give a pretty fair estimate of the Southern hero's character—the estimate made by most intelligent Northerners who took the pains to wade through Dabney's biography, which, by the way, absurd as it is, is not so bad a book—if one wants to get at the man himself—as our pictorial and magniloquent historian thinks it is.

For its most important article Putnam's has "No Love Lost," a poetical romance which, not by its hexameters alone, reminds the reader of Clough's charming "Amours du Voyage." We have found "No Love Lost" very pleasant for several reasons. We enjoy Mr. Howells's Venice whenever he takes us there, to that

. . . . "Lingering waste that is not yet ruin in Venice, And her phantasmal show, through all, of being and doing"— and her

"Days without yesterdays that die into nights without morrows"— and all her charms that plead with the beguiled imagination. We always enjoy, too, the little sarcastic returns upon his sentimentality which Mr. Howells is sure to make, and which make the sentimentality twice blessed. And we never fail to enjoy thoroughly—at least we hope we lose none of it—his humor, in its other and utterly unmorbid phases, whether the subtle, the slightly malicious, or such as this, of less than ordinary delicacy to be sure, but full of fun, and with a natural girlish archness, too:

"One thing: I 've bought you a chain of the famous fabric of Venice—
Something peculiar and quaint, and of such a delicate texture
That you must wear it embroidered upon a riband of velvet,
If you would have the effect of its exquisite fineness and beauty.
'Is n't it very frail?' I asked of the workman who made it.
'Strong enough, if you will, to bind a lover, signora,'—
With an expensive smile. 'Twas bought near the Bridge of Rialto.
(Shylock, you know.) In our shopping, Aunt May and Fred do the talking:
Fred begins always in French, with the most delicious effront'ry,
Only to end in profoundest humiliation and English.
Aunt, however, scorns to speak any tongue but Italian:
'Quanto per these ones here?' and 'What did you say was the prezzo?'
'Ah! troppo caro! Too much! No, no! Do n't I tell you it 's troppo?'
All the while insists that the gondolieri shall show us
What she calls Titian's palazzo, and pines for the house of Othello.
Annie, the dear little goose, believes in Fred and her mother
With an enchanting abandon. She does n't at all understand them.
But, she 's some twilight views of their cleverness. Father is quiet,
Now and then ventures some French, when he fancies that nobody hears him,
In an aside to the valet-de-place (I never detect him)."

In the sad parts of the tale we do not know that we suffered deeply; and we can say—and defy contradiction from any quarter—that we early knew that Philip was not really killed in battle, but safe to turn up again. Still, though, as regards the plot and the passion, the story does not call for much commendation, our readers will see from the extracts we have given, and from this one which follows, that little matters of that sort may be forgiven. Miss Fanny, let us premise, ought by good rights to have been proposed to several hours before the proposal actually was made; the gentleman was apparently on the point of doing it when he caught sight of another woman in another gondola:

"White, and estranged as a man who has looked on a spectre, ne mutely
Sank to the place at my side; nor while we returned to the city
Uttered a word of explaining, or comment, or comfort, but only,
With his good-night, incoherently craved my forgiveness and patience,
Parted, and left me to spend the night in hysterical vigils,
Tending to Annie's supreme dismay and postponing our journey
One day longer at least; for I went to bed in the morning,
Firmly rejecting the pity of friends, and the pleasures of travel, Fixed in a dreadful purpose never to get any better.

"Later, however, I rallied, when Fred, with a maddening prologue, Touching the cause of my sickness, including his fever at Jaffa,
Told me that some one was waiting; and could he see me, a moment?
See me? Certainly not. Or, yes. But why did he want to?
So, in the dishabille of a morning-gown and an arm-chair,
Languid with eloquent wanness of eye and of cheek, I received him—
Willing to touch and reproach, and half melted myself by my pathos,
Which, with a reprobate joy, I wholly forgot the next instant,
As, with electric words, few, swift, and vivid, he brought me,
Through a brief tempest of tears, to this heaven of sunshine and sweetness."

Perhaps it is no more than fair to say that in all probability the author would not now write just such poetry as "No Love Lost;" it is newly published, but not, we believe, very newly written.

Hours at Home contains one article with a good deal of fun in it. It is by Mr. Charles H. Webb, and is composed of the sayings of children—not all of whom, we are happy to say, are of either of the common printed types, some of them being neither "bright" children nor saints on earth begun, but bad boys and girls, regardless of the truth, full of vindictiveness, irreverent unconventional, shameless—in short, like boys and girls in families. There is one story of a young gentleman who had trouble on his mind "which alone is worth the price of the magazine." The Rev. T. De Witt Talmadge makes a lively essay on "Hobbies" of various kinds, and writes as if he had not only a great flow of animal spirits, but also some wit and humor and much sense. Less robustness and a little constitutional caution would be a good thing for him if it would save him from such utterances as this one—he has just, by the way, been asseverating his love of humor and its superiority to wit, and then he says: "Theodore Hook and Charles Lamb grinned themselves into hypochondria." We never say a good word for Hook; but as to Lamb, Mr. Talmadge has been badly imposed upon by somebody. Mr. James Greenwood gives in his December contribution a graphic description of the London money market and its frequenters; "An Interview with the Emperor of Russia" is good magazine reading; and so might "A South American Statesman" have been if Mr. Benjamin had depicted the brutal, degrading tyrannies against which Sarmiento has all his life been fighting. Of some of the Gaucho chiefs of South America there are stories told that almost give new ideas of the violence of human passions and of the possible inconsistencies of human character. Among the more important of the other articles in Hours at Home there are the novels, or portions of the novels, of the author of "Mary Powell," of Miss Yonge, and of the author of "Storm Cliff"—who all, we dare say, find due acceptance among the novel-readers.

Lippincott's novel is a new one by Mrs. Harding Davis, who is too old to change now, we suppose, and we may tell the less fearless novel-reader that there is nothing new for him in "The Pearl of Great Price." "Songs of the Slave" seems to have been written by some one not familiar with his subject at first hand, and also in ignorance of the best literature pertaining to it. Professor W. F. Allen's "Slave Songs" contains more and better information, so far as we have studied the negro and his poetry, than can anywhere else be found. The essay before us gives, however, two or three of the "fiddlesing" variety of songs, which are rather less numerous, we should say, in Professor Allen's work than they might have been; but none of Mr. Brown's "fiddlesings," or religious songs either, is of any value, and "The Songs of the Slave" are not properly to be represented by that collection. Louis Blanc's letter from England is this month devoted to showing, which it pretty conclusively does, that England is paying very dearly (in the cost of armaments) for the evil she did eighteen years ago, when by her alliance she aided Napoleon to fasten himself firmly upon France. Mr. Amasa Walker's valuable series of papers on financial topics is increased by the addition of an essay on the "Claims of the Anti-Bondholders." "A Terrible Voyage" describes a voyage that was truly terrible down the Grand Cañon of the Rio Colorado, a tremendous pass five hundred miles in length, where, between walls of unbroken rock, the river flows over hundreds of cataracts. Caught in this trap, because his raft was insensibly drawn into the irresistible current above the first cataract, unable to escape on either hand, James White, an unfortunate gold hunter, whose party had been murdered by the Indians, was last year compelled to make the journey to the southern end of the Cañon. He reached the point where he could first hope to see white men in about ten days, and was picked up by a boat's crew, who saved his life. "My God, Captain Wilburn," exclaimed one of the crew, "that man 's a hundred years old!" In years he was in the prime of life, but every hair of his head and beard had turned white, and he was battered almost out of the semblance of humanity. Miss Emma Lazarus, a very young poet, whom we have not met for some time, contributes to Lippincott a poem, "The Garden of Adonis," which, as we remember her early volume of poetry, shows marked improvement. "A Contribution to History," by Mr. W. I. Paulding, puts it beyond a doubt that Washington was very active and urgent in persuading Chief-Justice Marshall to leave the bar and enter public life, which he did in 1798. "Charles Loring Elliott," by Mr. L. Gaylord Clarke, does justice to the artist's wit and amiability, but is not so good as an article on the same subject in Harper's; and neither Mr. Clarke nor the other writer shows any critical discrimination in the valuation of Elliott's pictures. Nor does any one of his recent biographers do justice to his noteworthy independence of character—a trait of his of which some curious stories might be told.

The Catholic World prints the first half of an admirable article on Galileo, which discusses with great fulness and fairness the question whether or not Galileo, as an astronomer, was persecuted by the Catholic Church; whether there is any truth in the famous e pur si muove story which, even to this day, the little Protestant is taught by his school-books to believe, although Protestants of a larger growth have now for some time abandoned it. It will, however, be soon enough to speak at length concerning this essay when it is finished; meantime we advise the perusal of its first part. Another good article in this magazine is one of rather loose manufacture, but interesting, on some of the folk-songs of Brittany, and a third is a review of Dr. Schaff's Church History. We believe we need not speak of "The Invasion," which we have not examined, except to express a hope that there will be no tampering with the text so as to make it more Catholic than Messrs. Erckmann and Chatrian made it—which was, to some small extent, the case, we believe, with the "Story of a Conscript," the last Erckmann-Chatrian story published in the Catholic World. Lovers of pure truth will be glad to hear that one of the writers in this December number was brought near to a solution of the problem of the universe by "the first wave of genuine affliction" that gave him considerable uneasiness of spirit.

The various minor departments of the Galaxy—the "Miscellany," the "Driftwood," the "Nebulæ," and "Literature and Art"—have all been well attended to this month; though we imagine the easiest thing to do would be the right thing to do, in the case of Mr. D. H. Jacques—namely, dispute his facts and deny his inferences; and also that much the same thing might profitably be done with a good deal of Mr. R. G. White's article on "Horace Greeley." But Philip Quilibet is good in his discourses on "Presidents and President-Making," "Something New in Advertising," and "Reverdy Johnson in England;" although, as the title of the last little essay reminds us to say, there is something of a tendency in the writer of "Driftwood" to treat of matters that have become very hackneyed. "Who Took Ticonderoga?" is a question which is very well discussed by an anonymous writer, who handles his subject very well, and gives a quietus to another of our heroes of the school-books. "Boys," by Mrs. H. P. Spofford, is pleasant reading, as talk—with quotations—about Mr. Hope's book could hardly fail to be.

About the main body of the magazine we do not know that we need say much. What Mr. Benson is likely to say about Poe, whom Mr. Baudelaire liked, and Hawthorne, who may be suspected of taking an interest in those dreadful Puritans, every person who has read Mr. Benson's things will know without our, or Mr. Benson's, telling him. Yet "H. H.'s" poetry is one more presentation, not without force, of the "Love-shall-still-be-lord-of-all" view of life and the world's business which she too exclusively offers us. As for Mr. Stoddard and Miss Lily Nelson and Mr. Cranch, who are three out of four of the other poets of this month's Galaxy, they none of them seem to have greatly exerted themselves on this occasion; the anonymous author of "Ebb Tide," however, may fairly be congratulated on her first two stanzas. "Cipher;" "Tied Up by the Thumbs;" "Words and their Uses;" "One Too Many;" "Mrs. Frances Anne Kemble;" "The Confederate Congress," by Mr. Pollard, who despised it—all these we can commend as good light reading.

COUNT DEUX-PONTS' CAMPAIGNS.*

We have already mentioned the fact that Dr. S. A. Green, of Boston, who is a zealous student of American history, last year chanced to find, at a second-hand book-stall in Paris, a manuscript volume, handsomely bound. It purported to have been written by Comte G. de Deux-Ponts. Dr. Green purchased the book, which proved to be a diary kept by Count William de Deux-Ponts, during his campaign in America with our French allies in 1780 and 1781.

The writer and his elder brother, Christian, were the sons of Duke Christian, Count Palatine and Duc de Deux-Ponts (Zweibrück) Bickenfeld, and of a danseuse named Fontenay, with whom the duke had formed an alliance supposed to be a morganatic marriage. On the duke's death these sons were not recognized, and the dukedom passed to his two nephews successively. Both brothers, however, married into the French aristocracy, and held a high position at the Bavarian court, where they resided after the French Revolution. The writer of this journal was born in 1754, and entered his brother Christian's regiment in the French army when he was twenty-four years old. In 1780 he married a cousin of Prince Jules de Polignac, and two months later, in March, the young husband sailed for America with the army of the Comte de Rochambeau. His journal covers a period from March, 1780, to November, 1781. Dr. Green has now published this from the French original, without any changes whatever, with a preface from which the above facts have been taken, and with the addition of an elegant and accurate translation, enriched by historical notes.

Our hero's voyage was tedious, and it was not till the evening of July 11 he entered the channel of Newport. The count seems to have been not overmuch pleased with his first view of the Yankee. "We did not meet with the reception, on landing, which we expected, and which we ought to have had. A coldness and a reserve appear to me to be characteristic of the American nation. They appear to have little of that enthusiasm which one supposes would belong to a people fighting for its liberties, and to be little suited to inspire it in others."

After a dull winter, spent in winter quarters, the army was transported to Providence early in June, and on the 19th of that month started on its long march southward. "On the 3d of September we marched to Philadelphia," writes the count. "Congress was in session as we passed through the city. We paid it the honors which the king ordered us to pay. The thirteen members took off their thirteen hats at each salute of the flags and of the officers, and that is all that I have seen that was respectful or remarkable." This apparent coldness on the part of the Americans, and which does not tally with other accounts, is probably due to the author's French enthusiasm, his youth, and his own naturally demonstrative disposition. His description of Washington's reception of the news of the Count de Grasse's arrival with a large auxiliary force is one of the most noteworthy and attractive passages in his book:

"I have been equally surprised and touched at the true and pure joy of General Washington. Of a natural coldness and of a serious and noble approach, which in him is only true dignity, and which adorns so well the chief of a whole nation, his features, his physiognomy, his deportment, all were changed in an instant. He put aside his character as arbiter of North America, and contented himself for the moment with that of a citizen, happy at the good fortune of his country. A child whose every wish had been gratified would not have experienced a sensation more lively, and I believe that I am doing honor to the feelings of this rare man in endeavoring to express all their ardor."

The count took part in the campaign against Yorktown, and distinguished himself for courage and conduct. On the surrender of Lord Cornwallis, young Deux-Ponts was detailed by the Comte de Rochambeau to take the welcome news to France. He embarked on the frigate Andromaque, "and on the 24th of November," he writes, "I enjoyed the inexpressible pleasure of embracing, at Versailles, those persons who are to me the dearest." He closes with this sentiment, which, though trite enough, has never, we dare say, been much more sincerely uttered. We give it in his own words:

"La vie de l'homme est mêlée de peines, mais on ne peut plus s'en plaindre quand on a joui des moments delicieux qui en sont le prix; un seul instant les fait oublier, et cet instant bien senti en fait même désirer de nouvelles, pour jouir encore une fois de leur recompense."

Count William seems to have had no great qualifications for book-making, and whether he was a good observer or not his story got little benefit from his observations. We could have spared some of his philosophical reflections if he had filled their place with some remarks on society at Newport when the Frenchmen made it gay, on life in Virginia while the gentleman was still in the land, on the British soldiery among the people, on his Yankee ally fighting in homespun beside the good blood and good clothes of France. He is chary of such matters though, and gives us mainly names and dates and figures, his excuse being, perhaps, that it is not his fault that he gives us anything, and that he was keeping a diary for himself. We may properly be glad, however, that Dr. Green has been at the trouble of editing so carefully a work which the historical student who loves exactness will find of a certain value.

The Flower and the Star, and Other Stories for Children. Written and illustrated by W. J. Linton. (Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1868.)—Mr. Linton has made the best child's book we have seen this year. But that, after all, is not saying much—not nearly as much as this book of his deserves. In the first place, it is very pleasant to the eye by reason of its pretty title-page, its clear large type, and its graceful illustrations, which will help to educate the children's tastes as well as to gratify their elders with that too unusual spectacle—a nicely illustrated juvenile. But that was to be expected from Mr. Linton, and therefore his success in the letterpress of his volume is all the more gratifying, since there was, we suppose, no especial reason beforehand for thinking he would give us anything better than the ordinary holiday work provided for the children's entertainment—and that is generally very sad work indeed. Mr. Linton's stories, however, are very cleverly adapted to the taste and comprehension of children, and are written so simply and gracefully, and with such a delicate perception of the fitness of means to ends, that reading them aloud to the little folks is quite as pleasant to the reader as to the listeners; and that is no small merit when one considers how uncritical children are, and yet how insatiably eager for stories—how much more important the incidents of a tale seem to them than the way in which the tale is told. Parents are, after all, the greatest immediate sufferers from the imbecility of children's books; the children pay for it later. What a pity it is that the making of all their books could not be done by people like Mr. Linton, who seems to know precisely how to talk to them, who never vitiates their imaginations by absurd or hideous fancies, who is always graceful and poetic and charming, and does for his special audience the same kind of honest work that is done for us older people by the best literary artists. The natural next step from many of the juvenile books would be to "Beadle's Dime Novels," or something worse, while Mr. Linton's book is a fit introduction to the better class of maturer reading. But as his success only offers another illustration of the certainty with which the really artistic mind seizes the true relations of things to each other, and as real artists form a sorrowfully small minority of the workers at art, it is to be feared that the children will still be fed pretty much upon husks; and meantime let us all be duly grateful when they are occasionally offered a kernel of wheat.

There are half a dozen stories in this volume, and they are all very pretty. "Jack the Giant-killer" is the least successful, because the fancy in it is a little too subtle for small readers. "Jack and the Bean-stalk" is very good; and one which pleases us a good deal is called "Willie's Dreams." The dreams have the merit of being real dreams—not moralizing allegories, but pretty, aimless rambles into fairyland. "The Kitten's Growlings" is the best of them, though. It has the true kittenish mixture of fun and malice, and is so amusingly suggestive of claws and fun that we must give ourselves the pleasure of quoting it for the benefit of such people as are not apt to see children's books. Pussy has overheard her little mistress wishing that she too were a kitten, with nothing to do but lie before the fire, with no lessons, no chilblains, no cross governess. The kitten, however, has her own ideas of the evils which feline flesh is heir to.

"All very well, Miss Nellie! but you 're not a kitten, or you 'd not like it so much. I don 't care if I do get mice. I want birds. I want all the birds I see. I want to eat your canary!"

"Oh! you wicked, wicked kitten."

"And I want to eat it with the feathers on!"

"You silly thing!"

"And the feathers choke me. I want all the birds and all the butterflies. They are such pretty things, and I 've never tasted one yet. When mother brought me a nice young thrush she would not let me eat the feathers. And they were such pretty feathers. And I wanted to eat them. And the squirrel's tail choked me. And I can 't get the birds in the trees, nor even the great sleepy moths. And the little black house-flies, when I can catch them, are nasty; and I do n't like them when I eat them. And then mother scolds me for it, and says they make me thin. But she eats them herself, and I heard your papa say she eats black beetles, too. What are black beetles? are they nice? Oh! I do n't care about thrushes and mice; I should like to have black beetles. I want black beetles. I am sure there are some up high in the kitchen cupboard, if mother would let me have them. But she keeps them all for herself."

"But they do make mother thin, kitten dear, and you ought not to eat them."

"But I want to. And then they 'll not let me get under the grate, and they knock my nose against the bars if I do. I like getting under the grate, and I 'd like the red coals to fall on me, that I might play with them. Red coals are prettier than butterflies. Nasty butterflies! they never come near enough to be caught. I was turned out of the fender twenty times yesterday. And I must not run up-stairs into the bedrooms, nor sleep on the beds. And they whip me off the stairs and off the chairs in the drawing-room, and won't let me climb up the curtains. And I must not go on the table, nor put my tongue in the cream-jar, nor lick the bread and butter. Fresh butter is so nice. I must n't do anything. . . . What 's the good of nibbling your pa's waistcoat buttons when I can 't even get a taste out of them? Why can 't I eat them? What are they made of? Horn! Why do n't they make buttons of butter? I should like then to climb up your pa's waistcoat. It 's only a little fun now. And mother 's jealous of me. She wants to sit there instead of me!"

But all the book is good reading, although the other stories are marked by other qualities than the pleasant humor which this one is full of. The children who make Mr. Linton's acquaintance in it will be fortunate children indeed.

Lessons in Political Economy. Designed as a basis for instruction in that Science in Schools and Colleges. By J. Champlin, President of Colby University. (New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1868.)—Mr. Champlin has produced a very good little book, in which all the leading principles of the science are stated clearly and succinctly, and illustrated with a good deal of aptness. But when he declares, as he does in his preface, that his book is intended for schools as well as for colleges, we think he overestimates its simplicity. There is no school in the Union, we venture to say, in which the chapters on finance would not be found abstruse, and, indeed, we doubt whether even students of colleges who happen to have no knowledge of political economy except what they get from the rest of the book will not find them somewhat difficult of assimilation. Lesson XVII. ought to have been rewritten, particularly that portion of it in which the author finds fault with the Government for not having carried on the war by taxation only, inasmuch as he here intrudes upon another field of political science for which the student who has not got beyond this book is not ready. The same remarks apply to the attack on the national banking system; it is all out of place in an elementary school-book.

REPRODUCTIONS OF DÜRER.

It is pleasant to see a gift-book that one can respect. The reproduction of Dürer's "Lesser Passion of Christ" is not in all respects what one means when the epithet "gift-book" is used in its general sense. A good deal of slightness, evanescence, lack of permanent value, is implied in the words, and a good deal of such quasi-contempt as would make it out that the sight spoken of in the first sentence above is not a pleasure that this earth is likely to afford. But the publication before us is a book eminently fit to give away, and it appears just a month before the Christmas holidays; and if the edition is limited to five hundred copies, it is only the better fitted for presents. Where is the lady, even though enough of a woman to have such books as this one offered to her, who would not value it a little more highly because it could not become common upon the parlor tables of her friends?

Common in that way it never could become, however. Its very outside prevents the possibility of any such popularity. Its grave cover of dark-red, varnished paper and white parchment cloth will put it at once into the bookcase or on the tables of people other than those who buy the usual gift-books of commerce. Its full morocco dress also is plain and rather aristocratic looking. On the whole, it is a book for the shelf, and Mr. Bouton should have had its top edge, in the cloth clothed copies, cut and gilded, to keep the dust out of its ragged edges, for good half-binding is hard to get done in New York, and excessively dear; and there is a large premium offered on keeping your books as you buy them the longest time possible.

But we began by saying, or implying, that the book is a worthy one. It is a reproduction of a series of thirty-seven wood-cuts by Albert Dürer, which illustrated the history of the redemption of mankind according to the teachings of the mediæval church. Its Latin title is always given as "Passio Christi," and the title of the second edition, which was accompanied with verses printed upon the backs of the woodcuts, bears the general title, "Passio Christi ab Alberto Dürer Nurenbergensi effigiata cum varii generis carminibus Fratris Benedicti Chelidonii Musophili." "The Passion of Christ, figured by Albert Dürer, the Nuremberger, with the Poems of divers kinds of the Benedictine Brother Chelidonius, the lover of the Muses." The same Chelidonius had, a short time previously, compiled from other authors an explanatory text to Dürer's illustrations of the "Life of the Virgin," and to the same artist's former series of eleven wood-cuts illustrating the "Passion." This latter is one of the most important of Dürer's works. The pictures are about eleven inches by fifteen, and crowded with incidents, and are in Dürer's best manner, if we except two or three of his unparalleled copperplates. This earlier and more important series of wood-cuts might be called from its Latin title, "The Passion of our Lord Jesus," and so distinguished from the other, which is called "The Passion of Christ." But Dürer himself, in his journal, set the example which the moderns have followed, in calling the two works "Die grosse Passion" and "Die kleine Passion."

The woodcuts of the "Little Passion" are three and three-quarter inches wide by five high, except the title-page vignette. This represents Christ wearing the crown of thorns, and marked with the stigmata, his head surrounded with a cruciform aureole of rays, weeping, with bowed head, over the sins of mankind—a noble and touching figure. The second picture begins the series by "The Temptation of Adam," the third is "The Expulsion from Paradise," and the fourth is "The Annunciation to the Virgin," and is one of the most truly artistic and lovely of Dürer's smaller compositions. From this the series goes to No. 35, "The Ascension;" No. 36, "The Epiphany;" and No. 37, "The Last Judgment," a comparatively slight and unimportant design. The designs are very variable in power and in value. Some of them are in Dürer's strong manner, while others seem to be hardly the work of his hand who drew the "Flight into Egypt" or the "Life of the Virgin," or the "Christ Bearing the Cross" of "The Greater Passion." As a series of unusual extent, they are of very great and permanent interest, and it is very desirable that good fac-similes should be made of all copiable works of art which, in their original form, are so generally inaccessible as this one. To have five hundred copies of this work scattered over the land is to make us appreciably richer in works of art.

The reproductions, by some new photo-lithographic process, are generally very good; they are of the same size as the originals, and most of them are reasonably clear and sharp. It is altogether impossible that an impression from a lithographic stone should resemble that from a wood-block—and that for a sufficient reason: the black line printed from a block is made by the pressure of a raised edge or ridge, which stamps the paper down, and leaves its ink lines with edges as sharp as those of the wood. But the stone presses upon all parts of the paper alike, and the ink line merely transfers itself from the crayon which has attracted it before to the more attractive paper, so that unevennesses of surface, little ridges and hollows upon the paper, alternately catch and miss the ink, whose edges have therefore that downy softness which we associate with the lithograph. But it is doubtful if anything can be made to imitate a wood-cut in texture, unless the carbon process in photography may bring us to some such result, as it now imitates almost to deception chalk and pen-and-ink drawings.

But, after all, the copies are very close. We have compared carefully those of the original woodcuts which are within our reach with the reproductions, and find them very perfect, except in the case of those which are obviously blurred and so far failures, as, in the copy of the book which is before us, Nos. 19 and 25—"The Scourging" and "The Crucifixion."

Mr. Prime's introductory essay is the right one for the place and the purpose, and does well its obvious duty of explaining the relation of the designs to art in general, and of claiming for them the merit they deserve. It is unfortunate that his essay, in its praise of the new process of photographic reproduction which he has employed, should include the incredible assertion that if Dürer had only known of this process his work would never have been engraved on wood. When the time comes that pictures shall be made without any reference to beauty of texture and of tone, then wood-cutting will be abandoned for a cheaper process; but assuredly not before. We cannot agree with the other statement (page 24), that "the artist can throw his soul into the picture far more in wood engraving than in copper or steel engraving;" for we remember Dürer's own "Knight and Death," and the "Melancholia;" but at least it is a first-rate and independent art, nor is there reason to suppose that any modern process will ever approach it in the beauty of result.

It is with great pleasure that we accept Mr. Bouton's publication as an important contribution to education and enlightenment in America.

The Week.

FLAKE'S BULLETIN, which is a sound Republican paper published in Galveston, Texas, thinks it cannot for the life of it make Northern men understand clearly the real state of things in Texas, and then proceeds to make one more attempt at making the Nation comprehend the situation. It appears, then, that a large portion of "our 150,000,000 acres are substantially in a state of nature; civil government has never been actually administered over their soil. Every man is a law unto himself. He administers justice for himself"—a fact to which we may properly call the attention of Mr. Reverdy Johnson and the "Texas Steamship and Emigration Company." "The revolver is the only executive, and a man's conscience, if he has any, the only judiciary. Therefore it comes that deeds of violence take the place of judicial executions"—only it is of very frequent occurrence that the gentleman who in decent communities would adorn the gallows, in Texas momentarily mounts the bench and passes sentence on the other party. "But this wild state of nature," the Bulletin goes on, "is taken advantage of by roving bands of outlaws," and these bands, being composed of "old Confederate soldiers," "naturally oppress, maltreat, and murder Union men and negroes. . . . . Let them murder a Confederate, and the public conscience would be outraged;" but the political feeling of the people permits the murder of the black or white loyalists. Besides these chronic murderers and pillagers, there is another excellent class of persons who inhabit the more settled portions of the State, and whom the Bulletin describes as "friends and acquaintances of the regular banditti," and "who will do killing on very small provocation, and, in many cases, without provocation at all." Finally comes "Galveston, and places situated like it"—and exceedingly few such places there are—where the negro has "every protection, privilege, and immunity that he has in Boston." We will not say that we doubt this statement; indeed, without putting it quite so strongly, we have ourselves said that in Galveston, and we believe we spoke of the German districts too, there is probably safety for the negroes and the Unionists.

Two or three counties of Arkansas are a little Texas. We spoke last week of the defeat of a gang of outlaws by a body of State troops in Sevier County, not far from Centre Point. The militia probably had the best of it, and the enemy were thought to be a good deal demoralized. They have, however, recovered courage, and on the 10th instant a company of two hundred of them marched into Centre Point, impounded all the inhabitants in a field outside the town, and rifled every house. The next day, there being a mass-meeting of the citizens of the town and its neighborhood, the same men reappeared and fired on the crowd, dispersing it. Three of the principal citizens were then taken out and shot. So says the Memphis Appeal. What General Catterson was doing all this time, we are not told; but from his own account of the force at his command, the rebels are stronger than he. From Louisiana the news is that Mr. Menard, a negro, is elected to fill out an unexpired term, and will take his seat in this present Congress. He is elected to represent the Second District—a great part of his opponent's vote having been thrown out by the canvassers on the ground of fraud. Apparently the other four districts will be represented, for a time at least, by Democrats. General Rousseau has sent in his report to General Grant. He says some undoubtedly true things, though he does not say them without some indications of bitter feeling, concerning sundry persons of the "carpet-bagger" class; and he is at pains to excuse himself, on the ground of the smallness of the garrison, for standing by and seeing the election made a farce; but we must say we are not willing to accept his excuses as sufficient. Doubtless, he had too few troops. Grant says, in his brief report to Secretary Schofield, that more troops will be needed at the South; and if Louisiana does not need more, no part of the South does. Yet we shall believe that, even with the small means at his disposal, General Rousseau might have done more by a good deal than he did. As he says himself "Officers of the army generally, and my staff especially, always found their uniform ample protection against either violence or the slightest disrespect." So efficacious a uniform might profitably, we should say, have been shown on a few files of soldiers at the principal polling places of New Orleans.

General Meade's Department furnishes what other Southern news there is. Governor Scott has just sent a very cheerful message to the South Carolina Legislature. The receipts of the State for the six months just ended were $435,573, while the expenditures for the same period were $409,688, and the governor thinks there is no State which has a fairer prospect of meeting all its liabilities—a prospect the fairness of which is not diminished by the fact that Mr. R. Tomlinson has been made auditor. In conclusion, Governor Scott expresses a belief that, in view of the assurances of prominent Conservatives that they intend to submit willingly to the popular voice, the Legislature should deal generously with the men now under political disabilities. General Meade makes his annual report, a cautious and clever document, which seems to be a very satisfactory vindication of the military rule in Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and the Carolinas, which during the year have been under his and General Canby's control. He justly says: "No army in previous history was ever called on to discharge such delicate and responsible duties, involving powers that if abused might have led to the most serious consequences; and yet the transition from military to civil power was so imperceptible as to have passed unnoticed but for the special means, by way of proclamations, orders, etc., employed to make it public." By the way, during the entire civil administration of General Meade, a period of eight months, there were, in our American "Poland" and "Ireland" put together, exactly thirty-two persons tried by military commission. Of these the commissioners themselves discharged seventeen. As for the remaining fifteen, the sentences of four were disapproved, those of eight were remitted, those of two were referred to the President for his action, while that of just one man is now being served out. This is heartrending, when we think that the population of General Meade's district is only some millions, and we can fancy the feelings of Mr. Anthony Trollope when he hears of it.

Mr. Attorney-General Evarts, who is a master of the art of chaffing, has recently been giving a sardonic opinion for the enlightenment of certain printers, out of whom he must have got nearly as much amusement as he got from the Chinese ambassadors or the managers in the impeachment trial. The printers, who are employed by the Treasury Department, and are getting ten hours' pay for eight hours' work, wish to know whether the Secretary of War is justified in making a reduction of wages when his employees shorten the length of their working day. "The conclusion, then, to which I come," says Mr. Evarts, "is that the recent act does not require that the wages for the shortest day of Government labor should be reduced in proportion to the hours of labor, and that the act as little requires that the wages of the shortened day should be as large as the wages of the longer day of private employment." However, the Attorney-General concedes, seriously, no doubt, that when Congress passed the eight-hour law "the theory appears to have been that the laboring man or mechanic . . . . would be enabled to accomplish daily as much upon an average in eight hours' constant labor as he formerly did in ten or even a longer period, while he would enjoy a longer season for mental and moral improvement." Apparently there is still a chance for Mr. Banks to signalize his devotion to the true interests of the laborious men who toil and sweat while people like the Evartses drone away their time in idleness.

We suppose there were very few respectable men in the city who were not greatly rejoiced last week at hearing that Judge Barnard had got a grand jury to indict the editor of the Times for libelling him, simply because the trial of the indictment would in reality have been the trial of the judge himself, the editor, though nominally the defendant, appearing as prosecutor on behalf of a long-suffering community. Mr. Raymond, however, was guilty of the unpardonable indiscretion of expressing his satisfaction at hearing of the indictment, and announcing his readiness to prove everything he had ever said against the judge's reputation—the fact being, as everybody who knows anything about the matter at all knows very well, that he could have proved five times as much as the Times or any other newspaper has ever said. Of course it was useless to hope after this that the case would be brought to trial, and the last news is that it has been dropped. The judge's complaint in his charge, that the attacks on him were "impairing his usefulness," and his allegation that, so far from being enriched by corruption, he was dependent on his judicial salary and "the charity of his wife" for his means of subsistence, were capital specimens of the coarse humor with which the City Hall politicians lighten the tedium of their business hours. We doubt if anybody will ever succeed in getting the accusations against His Honor judicially investigated, and the present, or any probable, composition of the Legislature renders impeachment hopeless.

Another excellent illustration of the condition of the administration of justice in this city, and of the condition to which the administration of justice tends in every city in which the judges and the public prosecutor are elective, was afforded on Saturday evening last by the speech of District-Attorney Oakey Hall, the Democratic candidate for the mayoralty, and who, on Tuesday, became mayor elect. He declared to a crowded meeting that one reason why he wanted to keep his present office (that of district-attorney) was that he might "stand as a barrier between the liberties of the people on one side and the despotism of Radicalism on the other," and he went on to explain what he meant by this by saying "that, although they had passed a great many bills up at Albany about boards of health and boards of excise," "somehow the press of business in his office was always so great that he had never yet found time to prosecute a man for taking a drink after twelve o'clock"—a statement which naturally excited "prolonged cheering and considerable merriment." In other words, the public prosecutor here openly avows that he takes it on himself to decide what laws ought to be executed and what not, and makes a special boast of suspending the operation of a law which, in a great city swarming with ruffians, makes it penal to keep grog-shops open after midnight or to drink in them.

Most of the phenomena attendant on the spread of Butlerism are saddening, but some of them are very comical. Mr. G. W. Curtis is just now delivering a lecture on "Morals in Politics" which is a really admirable delineation of the greatest danger of democratic societies, and of the straight and narrow way through which salvation must be sought. It was composed and first delivered in this city long before the new sect took its rise in Massachusetts, and contains a mention, by way of illustration, of the renowned pirate Captain Kidd. Mr. Curtis has recently been repeating the lecture in Salem, and the depreciatory use made of Kidd's name so provoked the Butlerites who were present that they hissed violently, evidently feeling that anybody who spoke disrespectfully of Kidd must have their own master in his mind. Mr. Curtis has since explained that Kidd was in the lecture from the beginning, and was not introduced for the purpose of discharging a dart at any local idol; and that the application of the illustration to their prophet was the Butlerites' own doing. We advise the leading members of the denomination to fight against this really morbid sensitiveness, because it will give scandal if one cannot speak disapprovingly of Dick Turpin or Sixteen-string Jack, and the like, in mixed company at Salem or Lynn, without giving offence or creating a disturbance.

In our article of last week commenting on the recent performances of Erie Railroad directors their counsel, who is supposed to have advised them, when preparing their plan of operations, was spoken of in terms in which we freely admit no lawyer ought to be spoken of on account of the discharge of strictly professional duties. We may add, that, although we have received no remonstrance from anybody in the present case touching anything we have said, this portion of our criticism appeared through an oversight. The only portion of a lawyer's career which is a proper subject of newspaper criticism is that which the public witnesses. His private advice to his clients is something about which neither the public nor the newspapers are likely to be well informed, and it therefore did not form in the present instance a proper basis for strongly worded and hostile comment such as ours was.

The Journal des Economistes for September contains a singular piece of correspondence, consisting of a letter from Mr. Henry C. Carey, of Philadelphia, asking for the grounds of the charge made against him in a late number of that periodical of having been the partisan or apologist of slavery, followed by a letter from the author of the charge, M. Benard, justifying it. M. Benard says he is unable to cite any passage of Mr. Carey's works in support of his accusation, but he alleges "that at two meetings of the Political Economy Society in Paris Mr. Carey offered a complete apology for slavery, and even went so far as to maintain that the old states of Europe would be compelled to adopt that deplorable institution." On the first occasion his theories were combated by one of the vice-presidents, who defended the freedom of the laborer. On the second occasion when, M. Benard says, Mr. Carey set forth (exposa) his ideas on the same subject, he was met in debate by M. Benard himself, supported by Messrs. Paul Coq and Villiaume, and their defence of freedom against the American economist was applauded by the whole meeting. This is a strange story, and we find no contradiction of it in the October number of the Journal. The last has not yet reached us. M. Benard adds an insinuation that Mr. Carey's protectionist ideas have a close connection with his hostility to free labor, and that a man who won't let people sell or buy where they please cannot have much scruple about making them work where he pleases; which is, however, absurd. There are but few protectionists who do not really believe that both capitalist and laborer are benefited by the artificial raising of prices.

The argument and judgment in the English Court of Common Pleas on the women's claim to vote reached us by the last mail, but neither is in any way remarkable. Mr. Coleridge, on behalf of the women, made a brilliant display of lore and ingenuity, but made no impression on the court; and his junior, who had probably prepared himself elaborately, and enjoyed his novel relation to the whole female sex, was about to argue the case all over again, doubtless with the addition of some such flowers of rhetoric as adorn discussions of these questions at conventions, but the court, being old and heartless, snubbed him. The judges were unanimously of opinion that "man" in the act of Parliament did not mean "woman"—women being "legally incapacitated" at common law for voting, Mr. Coleridge having failed to produce anything better on the other side than very old and doubtful cases of what might be called her semi-discharge of political functions. In fact, he was obliged to admit that for hundreds of years there had been no case of her exercise of the right to vote; and this the court held to be equivalent to proof that the right did not exist. Mr. Justice Byles, in delivering the closing opinion, expressed the hope that the unanimous decision of the court would "for ever exorcise and lay this ghost of a doubt which never ought to have arisen;" a piece of judicial emphasis which was received by the bar with "laughter." The claim has, however, brought the fact to light that a great many women do want to vote. In Manchester alone 5,346 claimed registration, and thousands more did so in other places, and we may be sure the number will grow.

The French Government has been madly and furiously prosecuting a batch of Paris editors for being mixed up in what is called the "Affaire Baudin"—that is, for going to Baudin's tomb and laying immortelles on it on the anniversary of his death, or for delivering a speech over it, or for having published lists of subscriptions for the erection of a monument to his memory. The courts have gravely decided that no one of these acts taken separately is criminal, but that taken together they constitute a "manœuvre" calculated to excite "hatred and contempt of the Government." Baudin was a deputy of the National Assembly who, on the 3d of December, 1851, when the Assembly had outlawed the President, and called on all good citizens to take arms in defence of the constitution, went bravely to the barricades and encouraged the working-men to fight. One of them replied jeeringly that they were not going to risk their lives to save for him his twenty-five francs a day (official pay), and he, in reply, with that strange French heroism which in its highest manifestations is literally the most resplendent form of courage, replied that "he would show them how a man could die for twenty-five francs a day," and, mounting the barricade, fired on the advancing troops, and fell riddled by a return volley. One of the last acts of old Berryer, who has just died full of years and honors after one of the most brilliant forensic careers of modern times, was to subscribe to Baudin's monument. He was one of those who encouraged him to take arms, he said, in defence of the law, and he was bound to honor his memory. Nevertheless, the sudden display of affection for Baudin after seventeen years of semi-oblivion is rather a sign of hostility to the Empire, we fear, than of reverence for a martyr to liberty.

The French press sometimes gives itself airs with regard to that of the United States, and holds up its hands in horror over the violence of the language used by American editors in political discussion. We, therefore, have highly enjoyed the following, which comes from the Pays in reply to the Cloche. The Pays is a Government paper, and the editor-in-chief, M. de Cassagnac, is, if we are not mistaken, a senator and a man of the world. His son, M. Paul, the "managing editor," is reputed to be the best swordsman in France, and is a noted duellist. The latter is probably the author of the following gem, which no Northern editor, we venture to say, has ever approached, though some of the "lively" correspondents of the "wholesome and independent family papers" will probably grow green with envy when they read it. It is the kind of stuff some of them would like to produce, but cannot. Ferragus had expressed his astonishment that Cassagnac should call himself an "independent journalist," he (Ferragus) knowing well that the wretch drew pay from the Secret Service Fund. To which Cassagnac:

"There are people with whom nobody discusses, but who are merely chastised. Ferragus, the editor of the Cloche, is of the number. This man, whom we all know, who exhibits himself comfortably in his fauteuil on the first representation of pieces in the theatres, is one of the most repugnant members of the press. He exhibits in his greasy person at once the wretched undertaker's man, the wretched doctor, the wretched advocate, the wretched Jesuit. This periodical and weekly abscess comes out every Saturday in the Cloche; and, what is unheard of for an abscess, though pierced, remains not the less swollen and tumefied. He wished to take the place of Rochefort. But those who employ a lantern and a crook at night (rag-pickers), and creep along the walls, are not Rocheforts. He carries on opposition as another sells groceries, because it is profitable, but without conviction, ardor, or enthusiasm. It is all a matter of traffic: so much the heap, and thirteen make the dozen! It is a mere mercantile opposition—a retail trade—an opposition that makes money, and speculates in 'liberty, equality, and fraternity;' an opposition which defiles the temple. Away, away, or beware of the lash! The actor Garrick said one day to a comedian of enormous bulk—more enormous even than the body of Ferragus—'You are so fat that nobody can beat you in one day.' Au revoir, we shall return to you."

Mr. Layard tells, in a letter to the London Times, a story of the revival of art and industry at Venice which is really wonderful, if true. We gave some account a fortnight ago of the resuscitation of the glass manufacture. He shows that the imports in 1867 amounted to $26,000,000, as compared to $23,000,000 in 1863; the exports in 1867 to $20,000,000, as compared to $16,000,000 in 1863. The tonnage of vessels leaving Venice increased by one-third in the same period. Venetian steamers begin to run once more, as the galleys did of old, to all the great ports of Europe; and—though last, not least—there are now 224 district schools where, in 1866, there were only eight; and manufactories of silk, cloth, cotton, paper, and fire-arms are springing up in all the cities of the mainland. The nobility, after eighty years of eclipse and two hundred years of sloth and degradation, are throwing themselves once more into politics, art, industry, and commerce with much of the old energy which built the city and made it famous.

The new electoral law in Spain, under which the Constitutional Convention is to be elected, gives a vote to every citizen over twenty-five years of age who has not been deprived of his political rights by judicial sentence. The republicans seem to be gaining in strength, for the obvious reason that they are strong in the great centres of population, and therefore are able to make more show in agitating than the monarchists. They are stronger, too, as might b expected, in orators, and a good deal more fervid; but there seem little doubt that if it came to a counting of votes, or a trial of physical strength, they would be worsted. The monarchists, on the other hand, have the middle classes an the peasantry and the army, the last being the most important of all. No European army is republican, and the Spanish army as little as any; and it, like the Roman army, has unfortunately got used to being called on to decide the fate of the nation. But the monarchists have lost enormously by their having no candidate ready when the throne was vacated. The process of casting about for a king not only chills enthusiasm, but is ridiculous, and, if long protracted, is enough to make monarchy impossible. The candidate most spoken of at present is Espartero, who, being childless and seventy-six years old, would fill the throne just long enough to give the monarchists time to look about them. The title mentioned for him is something which "Greece and Rome in their palmiest days" never dreamed of—"Baldimero I." One of the best signs of the times is the rapidity with which the popular loan is taken. But the excitement is running so high in the cities that fears are entertained of a bloody collision between the two parties; and should this occur, on ever so small a scale, all hope of a rational revolution would be gone.

While Prince Charles of Roumania, in opening the session of the Bucharest Chambers, declares the foreign relations of his country to be on an excellent footing, evidences of grave complications on the Lower Danube are daily becoming more numerous. A despatch from Pesth announces that M. Orczy, in addressing, in the name of the Imperial Chancellor Von Beust, the united delegations now assembled at Pesth, of the Austrian Reichsrath and Hungarian Diet, declared the relations of Roumania both with Turkey and Austria to be unfriendly, and requiring "a careful watch" on the part of the Vienna Government, "in common with the other great powers." The Bulgarian disturbances, it is true, are rather of an imaginary kind; the late attempts at insurrection in that province have proved a total failure; but, on the other hand, there is no longer any doubt that they have been the offspring of machinations fostered within the limits of Roumania, and that the Government of that state, openly instigated by Russia, secretly encouraged by Prussia—Prince Charles is a Hohenzollern—and led by reckless politicians like Bratiano, is ready at the first opportune moment to enter upon a career of aggression, with the aim of achieving both total independence of Turkey—to which very little is wanting even now—and the annexation of Transylvania, the Wallach population of which is being stirred up by emissaries against the Hungarians. Our "latest," by telegraph from Bucharest, however, announces a change in the Roumanian cabinet and "the displacement of the war party." But this is likely to prove but a momentary change of attitude.

GRANT AND THE CIVIL SERVICE.

THERE are rumors afloat already that the Jenckes Civil Service Bill begins to find unexpected favor in the eyes of politicians at Washington, and we have little doubt that the number of its supporters will—now that it is plain that Grant does not intend to work under the old system—grow every day, and that the measure will, early in the Forty-first Congress, become a law. Not that we should have despaired of success even if Grant had not been elected, and his place during the coming four years were to be filled by one of the regular party hacks. It would have taken more time to bring about the desired result, but the result would still have been certain; the outrageous misconduct and incompetency of the present tribe of office-holders would have made the necessity of the reform plain to the public, even without the aid of set expositions from its friends or the active support of the new President. But without the aid of the President the task of "educating" the regular politicians "up" to the change would, we admit, have been difficult. They themselves enjoy, mightily, "educating" the people "up" to the level of their own crazes, but they are extremely chary about receiving ideas that seem likely to lessen their importance to the state. There is probably nothing in the whole political field more provoking, and at the same time more amusing, than the air of drunken doubt and disapproval with which "the men inside politics," as they call themselves, look down from the stump on all reformatory labors out of which no "capital" is to be made. Any change which seems likely to lessen the number of things they can promise—and therefore their weight with their followers—or the support of which involves the denial of something to somebody, or the utterance of unpleasant speeches about the machinery of their own party, they endeavor to treat as visionary, and laugh over it as long as they dare. But the minute they find that it is to be, that there are influences working for it against which they cannot make head, their conversion becomes so rapid that the difficulty is to baptize them fast enough. Had they succeeded in putting one of their own number in the Presidential chair, they would, owing to the enormous amount and value of the patronage now in the hands of the Government, have offered a resistance to any change which nothing but an overwhelming outburst of popular indignation could have overcome, and we should probably have witnessed four years of corruption in every possible form, which would compare with the corruption of the last eight years as the finished work of a man compares with the tentative efforts of a boy.

It must be remembered that "the whiskey thieves," which now seems to be the generic name of that vast and growing class who devote themselves to plundering the Government as to a profession, have been, until now, comparatively unskilled in their work. It took some years to discover the various devices by which the Government could be cheated, officials bribed, evidence destroyed or covered up, and to draw into the business the leading rogues of the country and the vast body of capital which is now literally invested in the robbery, just as it has taken ten years for the rogues of this city to find out the use for their purposes that might be made of an elective judiciary. It is no exaggeration to say—as those who know most about it assure us most earnestly—that there is no "interest" in the United States so strong, so compact, so well organized, with so much money and so much skill and ingenuity at its command at this moment, as the body of persons who are engaged in defrauding the public treasury. Their creatures swarm in every department of the public service, except the army and navy, and do their bidding without hesitation. Their "lobby" is so powerful that they find no difficulty in arresting and delaying any piece of legislation that seems likely to diminish their profits. Nay, they are strong enough, as we have recently seen, to stay proceedings in the courts, close the lips of the public prosecutor in the very midst of a process, and hurry him away to become himself a culprit elsewhere. Moreover, there is no chance whatever of bringing the party machinery into play against them, because they take care, we need hardly say, to commit no breach of the party canons. They are all, or nearly all, "sound on the main question;" in fact, in the matter of orthodoxy, they usually outdo everybody else, and are as intolerant of heresy as the grand inquisitor himself. With one of themselves in the Presidential chair, or with any man in it who was thoroughly broken to the party yoke, they would have proved for the present invincible, and they would, on the opening of the new term, have gone to work with all the advantages of eight years' training and experience.

Grant comes, therefore, into the civil service of the country as he came into command-in-chief of the army, after three years of blundering and disaster, literally as a saviour; and in the former as in the latter case, he comes to meet a crisis for which his career and training seem to have especially prepared him. Had he reached his present elevation, as most of his more recent predecessors have reached it, after having "filled every office in the gift of the people, from village alderman," etc., or after having begun his political education in ward caucuses and worked up into State or national prominence through the hidden and crooked ways in which so many so-called statesmen lay the foundations of their fame and earn their reputation for wisdom, he would have learned, as most of them have learned, to look on party usages, the most debasing as well as the most useful, as part of the organic law of American society. He would have learned to regard the best places in the public service as the "inalienable right" of those who do the work of the canvass, and the party managers as the heaven-born dispensers of the public patronage, and resistance to their will or disregard of their advice as at best a sort of mild lunacy, if not downright treachery. Luckily he has learned his duty to the country in a school in which truth and courage are still the highest virtues, in which the public money is held sacred, and in which the habit of looking on the sacrifice of life for the country as an obvious duty makes defrauding the country seem one of the meanest of vices, and in which the political art as practised in caucuses excites only disgust. Although the political tone of the American army is not, owing to the social influences by which military circles were governed before the war, perhaps all that could be desired, it is permeated by a morality which we shall have to infuse into the civil service if we are to save the Government.

Moreover, Grant has not been chosen by the party, in the sense in which candidates for the presidency are usually said to be chosen; he has been, in a measure, forced upon it; no other nomination was possible without almost the certainty of defeat. He did not seek the nomination either, and during the canvass refused steadily to contract obligations to anybody for helping to get him elected. Anybody who "worked for Grant," therefore, did so on his own responsibility; so that Grant can now meet all Republican orators, writers, and bill-stickers, drummers, scene-shifters, stage-carpenters, and rollers of thunder-barrels, with an unclouded brow and a sense of perfect independence. The result is that there is an extraordinary and almost unprecedented absence of rumors about offices; an almost unprecedented scarcity of office-seekers in Washington. In the course of the next year we confidently expect to see the theory that the present system of appointment to office has anything peculiarly "American" about it, or that any considerable portion of the public is attached to it, proved to be a fallacy and thoroughly exploded. The number of persons who take any real interest in the present system, or would mourn for one hour over its destruction, is in reality exceedingly small, and it forms a class without the least weight in the community, either as regards character or ability. The doctrine, too, that there is something peculiarly democratic in rotation in office—that is, in the periodical dismissal of one set of public servants for the purpose of giving a fresh batch of citizens a share in the profits of politics—is one which has equally little hold on the popular mind; and the success which those who live by it have had in persuading people that the country was attached to it is simply a striking illustration of what may be done by noise and impudence. This success thus far has been due simply to the fact that the exceedingly small amount of work which fell to the share of the Federal Government before the war prevented the abominations of the system from staring people in the face as they do now, though it did not prevent people from considering office-holders and office-seekers as on the whole a shiftless class.

The only argument we have seen anywhere put forward against reform is that it will ruin the Republican party, by leaving them nothing to offer those who do the work of electioneering by way of reward. We believe, on the contrary, that it will simply substitute a good class of workers for a very bad class. It will cause, no doubt, the retirement in disgust of a large number of wire-pullers and orators of the baser sort; but, on the other hand, it will bring into the field a larger and larger number of the men who built up the Republican party and who now keep it alive—those who have faith in its ideas, and who belong to it not as an end but as a means—and a larger and larger number of men devoted to practical legislation, who, like Mr. Jenckes, have made a conscientious study of subjects, and want to use the party as a means of putting their conceptions into practice. The men, even now, who do the party most service during a canvass are not men who entertain any expectation of reward in the shape of Federal offices. They are either men who have already won, or who are seeking by honorable acts, such honors as the people can bestow by election, or else men for whom no office whatever has any attractions, and who serve on the stump, as many of them had served in the field, for the sake of the famous "Old Cause" for which Sydney prayed on the scaffold, and which in our day seems to run as much risk from knaves and blatherskites as in other days it ran from kings and priests.

THE FUTURE OF THE FAMILY.

The effect of the divorce laws, as they exist in various Northern States, on morals and manners and on the family, has, during the last month or two, furnished matter for a good deal of discussion to various religious bodies, and, if we may judge from the articles in religious periodicals, is constantly occupying a large share of the attention of clergymen and reformers. It seems to be supposed that religious denominations may diminish the frequency of divorce by providing penalties in church discipline for light, thoughtless, or licentious resort to it, or by forbidding clergymen to re-marry persons who may have been divorced under certain designated conditions. The pictures which have been drawn during these discussions of the havoc which the divorce laws of various States, as administered by the courts, are playing with the family relation, are tolerably alarming. Statistics on such subjects, just like the statistics of female drunkenness, are not very reliable, however. We know, with a fair approach to accuracy, what proportion divorces bear to marriages in a given State, but the effect of divorces on morals and on children is a point on which figures tell us little that can be depended on, and yet this is after all the important point. What most concerns society is not the number of couples who have separated, but the probable effect of their separation on other couples still living together and on future marriages. About this our information is necessarily somewhat vague; and though the subject has been handled by one or two writers—President Woolsey, of New Haven, for instance—in a scientific spirit, most of the talk about it is too general, and has too much of the platform tone, to help us very far toward a conclusion as to what ought to be done. Certain results of the working of the divorce laws, or at all events certain phenomena closely connected with the divorce laws, are, however, too palpable to be overlooked or misunderstood. The sense of the sacredness of the marriage tie is unquestionably declining. The number of men and women who have separated from their wives and husbands is increasing, and the discredit of such separations is diminishing; and we are assured there is now to be found in some of the Western States a large and increasing class of children whose position may be called absolutely novel in modern society—that is, children who, without having been formally and clandestinely abandoned by their parents, are nevertheless in a state of doubt as to who are their mothers. The doubts of persons about their fathers have furnished material for coarse comedy in all ages and all countries, particularly in licentious ages and countries, but the increasing freedom of women in our age seems likely to furnish fresh materials for the jester's workshop.

The Catholic theologians and sociologists, who are now engaged in bringing back the United States to the bosom of the Church, make a great deal of the frequency of divorces amongst native Americans as an argument against Protestantism, and boast with more zeal than discretion of its rarity amongst foreign-born Catholics. But whatever frequency of divorce may prove as to the immorality of any given community, its infrequency, we fear, proves nothing as to their morality. Catholic writers seem to live in the same pleasant and somewhat infantile delusion on this subject that Southerners live on the subject of "miscegenation." Southern philosophers have always maintained that by making the marriage of blacks and whites illegal, you can prevent the mixture of races; and Catholic philosophers just as stoutly maintain that by declaring the marriage bond indissoluble you can keep vice down to a minimum, and perhaps even prevent children being born out of wedlock, just as if marriage were not a conventional arrangement for the preservation of the family, but a natural means of perpetuating the species. The fact is, we suspect, that there are as many separations amongst Catholics who have lived long enough in the country to be Americanized as among Protestants. Whether they are formally divorced or not, concerns theologians more than jurists. There are also now, undoubtedly, more children to a marriage amongst foreign immigrants, at least in the Eastern States, than among Americans; but we must wait and see at what rate the second generation will multiply before we can draw conclusions of any value as to the effect of religion on population.

The mistake the Protestant clergy and the churches are falling into, as it seems to us, in their treatment of the question, consists in their overestimating their own power. The classes in which the marriage tie is treated most lightly, and in which divorces are most frequent, are not composed to any great extent of persons who are in formal relations with any ecclesiastical organizations, or who care anything whatever for ecclesiastical censures. Therefore, we do not believe the churches or the clergy will ever be able by direct action to produce any perceptible effect in diminishing the number of divorces, particularly as clerical disapproval cannot prevent the marriage of divorced persons. What has done most to uphold the strength of the marriage tie in all countries, this as well as others, amongst the great mass of people—the great mass being in all countries only slenderly influenced by moral or religious ideas—has been habit and public opinion. Everybody in the old society was more or less the slave of custom, and it was the custom to live with one wife; and what with the female custom of submission, and the male custom of enforcing obedience by blows and abuse, "incompatibility of temper," which troubles so many households in our day, troubled few households in former days. It was one of the unknown diseases. Moreover, when men usually lived and died on the spot where they were born, the opinion of their neighbors acted on them with a force of which we have now little idea. A man who formally broke up his family, or a woman who formally left her husband, had to face a frowning world, and the world frowned in those times so as to kill.

We have now entered on a period of general migration. Hardly anybody passes his life amongst those who knew him in his childhood. The Western States may be said to be largely peopled by persons of whose antecedents their neighbors are entirely ignorant. The Eastern States are largely peopled by persons who are ready to move at a moment's notice, and to whom their reputation in the locality in which they live is of very little consequence. Moreover, there is a large body of persons—how large few people imagine who have not given attention to the subject—who are literally rovers, and pursue fortune incessantly in railroad cars and stage coaches. The same phenomena begin to show themselves in Europe, though for obvious reasons with less prominence. In such a state of things as this, marriage has naturally lost one of its strongest supports. The married relation is one in which real permanence and strength can never be looked for amongst average men and women in the absence of high moral and religious culture, unless it has a "home" as a basis, and homes in the crisis through which the world is just now passing are necessarily less numerous than they used to be. We are witnessing the greatest movement of population that has ever taken place—a movement, including migration from Europe and the peopling of the West, compared to which the irruption of the Northern barbarians into the Roman Empire was a trifle—and as long as it lasts we must be prepared to see the very root of civilized society, the family, threatened with destruction. Towards teaching the marching columns to revere and uphold it, little can be done suddenly, but those who look on it as the most precious possession of civilization can do much to uphold it by their example not simply in living with their wives or husbands, disagreeable as this may be in many cases, but in taking pains and making sacrifices to have a home of their own and teaching their children to love it. The married couple who, being pecuniarily able to avoid it, deliberately and permanently "board" in order to save trouble or expense, may safely be pronounced enemies of society, and deserve clerical reprobation in almost equal degree with the purchasers of Indiana divorces. All the arts which make housekeeping easier and less expensive help to make the marriage relation more secure, and at this moment and in this country there are no arts more useful to morality and social order.

It would be useless to deny, too—and we can make the admission with the better grace because we consider the present condition of women as unsatisfactory as can well be—that the woman's rights movement, or rather the set of ideas which find a limited expression in the woman's rights agitation, is doing much to weaken the family bond. One effect of it is undoubtedly to make women more and more unwilling to accept the theory of their position taught by the church and held by men, and to make men think more and more lightly of the responsibility of keeping the family pure and intact. It has undoubtedly weakened, and is every day weakening more and more, the husband's sense of accountability for the wife's conduct, and the belief, so many thousand years old, that her honor is his honor and her good name his good name. The extent to which the new ideas on these subjects already affect people who never go near a woman's rights meeting, or perhaps never heard of the movement, is greater than most of us imagine; and their first results will undoubtedly be the production of a state of things in domestic life somewhat resembling anarchy. But then, anarchy has never lasted long in any community of the Aryan race. Its societies have often gone to pieces, but out of the ruin something better has invariably grown up; and we do not doubt that the family of the future, having a better basis in justice and reason, will be a more permanent and stronger structure than the patriarchal or feudal family, which is evidently passing away. But in reconstructing the domestic relations, as in scientific research, the understanding, as Bacon says, needs not wings, but weights. Dreams and visions and flights of fancy will not help us. In deciding on what terms men and women shall live together in wedlock, as in framing the organic law of political societies, we have to remember that, no matter what views we may entertain of the ultimate destiny of humanity, man remains man, and woman woman for the present, and that the force which brings the two sexes together, though a noble passion, it is true, is also an animal passion, and a passion which influences human conduct probably more than all other agencies put together.

"THE ASIAN MYSTERY."

We have forgotten which of Mr. Disraeli's novels it was in which he announced the Asian Mystery to the world. We think, however, that it must have been "Coningsby," as "Codlingsby" is certainly that one of Punch's "Prize Novelists" in which Thackeray so admirably burlesqued the manner of the coming premier in general and of the Israelitish phase of his writings in particular. We remember that we were all amazed to learn to what an extent the children of Israel had beguiled the hours of their exile from the Promised Land by taking possession of the highest places in the literature, the arts, the state, and even in the church, of the Gentiles among whom they were scattered. Some of the greatest Continental authors are claimed as the successors of the prophets, and many of the crucifixions and martyrdoms which make hideous the walls of Christian churches are due to the cheerful hands of concealed Jews, who thus crucified the Lord and persecuted the saints afresh under the show of burning zeal for the Holy Catholic Church. Almost all the immortal music of modern days is due to descendants of those sweet singers who sat by the rivers of Babylon and wept when their captors required of them a song. All along, the proscribed race has furnished ministers of state, and notably ministers of finance, to the Catholic powers of the Continent, and, if Mr. Disraeli is to be believed, not a few archbishops and inquisitors and, we rather think, a Pope or two. And these Jews who all the time held to their ancient faith in secret hated and despised the superstitions and idolatries, as it seemed to them, in which they found it for their worldly advantage to take a part. Far be it from us to justify such duplicity, but we can imagine the unction with which a Jewish Grand Inquisitor might superintend the roasting of a heretic Christian, and how sweet the savor of that burnt-offering must have been in his nostrils.

Mr. Disraeli is certainly the first man of Hebrew descent who has reached the high places of political power in heterodox England, and of the many obstacles which he had to surmount during the forty years since the boyish dream of "Vivian Grey" that he had had his eye fixed on the supreme prize of English ambition, that descent was by no means the least formidable. A middle-class origin, slenderness of fortune, the want of powerful connections, at least at the beginning of their career, had been overcome by Addington and Canning, and by them only, of all the prime ministers that England has known. The taint of Hebrew blood aggravated these other difficulties of Mr. Disraeli's career, and would have made them insurmountable had it begun a half-century earlier. And the fact of his success is one of the most striking proofs of the Horatian apothegm, that men change with the changes of the times. We need not go back to the good old days of Lord Mayor Fitz-Richard, in the reign of Henry III., who let loose the populace of London on the Jews there commorant, who sacked their houses, spoiled their goods, and put some five hundred of them to death, for it is not much more than a century ago that all England was turned topsy-turvy by a simple proposition to allow Jews to be naturalized by Act of Parliament, like other aliens. The Lord Mayor of London, the Aldermen and Common Council, petitioned against the measure as destructive to trade and subversive of religion. It was urged in Parliament that, if the law passed, the Jews would get possession of church and state, and that Judaism would become so fashionable that the church would be deserted for the synagogue. The mob were excited by a senseless cry of "No Jews, no wooden shoes!" and the act had to be repealed the next session.

But we need not go back for a century to show the mighty change which time has worked in the prejudice of England against the Jews. London has undergone such a change of heart in that line that the citizens insisted on electing Baron Lionel de Rothschild one of their members for the very purpose of breaking down the bar which kept Jews out of the House of Commons. This bar consisted of the oath of abjuration of all the descendants of James II., "on the faith of a Christian." As there had not been a descendant of the last Stuart king since the death of the Cardinal of York, about sixty years ago, there could be no object in keeping it on the statute-book excepting for the purpose of keeping the Jews out of Parliament. It took years to overcome the prejudice which yet lingered in the higher classes; but at last the obstacle was removed, and M. de Rothschild, his son and brother, Mr. Alderman Salomans, and several other of the children of Israel, entered into Parliament and possessed it, with no apparent detriment either to church or state. There have even been Jews so unmindful of their long descent as to marry their daughters to sprigs of the mushroom aristocracy of England. Knights and baronets there are good store of Hebrew race; but none of that lineage has as yet entered the House of Lords. Mr. Disraeli is the first Jew who has had a chance of taking his seat by the side of the barons whose ancestors used to draw the teeth of his by way of prevailing upon them to part with their money. But he has refused, like Pulteney, "to sink into insignificance and an earldom."

Now, we are not much perplexed in this country by an Asian Mystery; but we have an African one that has answered the same puzzling purpose quite as well. It is not too much to say that the prejudice against the Jews all along up to a comparatively recent period was no less bitter and malignant than that which has distinguished the Universal Yankee Nation against the negroes. Indeed, more so, for it was aggravated by a superstitious dread and detestation which we have never felt as to the race of Ham. It used to be regarded as an insult to the Founder of Christianity to show kindness or even justice to the descendants of the men who cried out, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" And it is observable that during the Middle Ages it was believed that an offensive smell proceeded from the persons of the Jews, such as is attributed to the negroes, and is our main proof that nature intended them to be slaves. Sir Thomas Browne, indeed, regards this as a vulgar error, and affirms that the statement that "an unsavoury odour is gentilitious or natural to the Jews is a fraudulent illation." Pellew, a traveller in Northern Africa, relates that when a drought prevails there the Moors, after having exhausted all Mohammedan methods for moving Heaven, set the Jews to praying, because God, however unwilling to hear their prayers for their own sakes, may yet grant their request "to be rid of the stink." And Sale tells us that the way in which the Mohammedans account for this unpleasant physical peculiarity is this: The Jews, say they, had so provoked the Lord by their stubbornness and hardness of heart in the wilderness that one day he slew the entire nation, and they remained dead for eight days before Moses could prevail on him to bring them to life again, and they and their posterity have ever since retained the look and odor of their incipient putrefaction. Now, it would have seemed as preposterously impossible for the Lord Mayor of London in 1753 to believe that Jew after Jew would sit on the civic throne, or for the Earl of Egremont and the other furious opposers of the Jew Bill to conceive that Jews would fight or buy their way into Parliament and rub shoulders there with Christians, as it would ten years ago to the slaveholders and the Northern Democrats that the question on which the Presidential election was to turn was not whether the negroes should be free from slavery, but whether they might vote and be voted for like white Christians.

The power of a gradually changing public sentiment in overcoming the rooted prejudices and overbearing the organic persecutions of the Jews being made thus evident, a like purifying process may deliver us also from the unjust and cruel prejudices, the dregs of slavery, which so extensively prevail even at the North, and which mainly encourage the passionate violence at the South aroused by the prospect of that equality of political rights on which alone public tranquillity and general prosperity can rest. The Asian Mystery having solved itself thus peacefully, we may reasonably hope that time, and no long time either, may bring a solution to our African Mystery so easy and natural that we shall wonder that we ever thought it a mystery at all.

THE PROVINCIALISM OF SOUTHERNERS.

THE murder of Pollard, the Richmond journalist, is in several of its details a curiously exact reproduction of a famous historical murder. Young Grant, like the assassin of the Regent Murray, ensconced himself in an upper chamber which commanded his victim's route; both criminals fastened themselves into the room; both made use of fire-arms, and both perfectly executed their scheme. Indeed, it is not at all difficult to believe that our American murderer was a conscious and deliberate imitator of his Scotch forerunner. The Southerner has always exhibited, if not a genius for the melodramatic, an un-Saxon or rather a childish love for it, and it would be by no means surprising if it should turn out that this Grant when he laid his seemingly cowardly plan was thinking less of saving his own skin than of the notes to Scott's novels. But the striking difference between the two crimes is that the Linlithgow tragedy is three hundred years old. People who had been indulging a hope that the South had got into the neighborhood of the nineteenth century must have been shocked to find, so far as concerns the public opinion of assassination, the Scotland of 1570 on an equality with the Virginia of 1868; to find the Southern people applauding a crime obsolete throughout all the rest of civilized Christendom; to find that apparently the South is as far from the main current of civilization as it ever was before the coming of the war, which has done so much to break up and destroy Northern provincialism that the times before 1860 seem separated from the present by a generation or two, instead of by a period of less than a decade.

It is not uninteresting to look a little into the causes of this inveterate provincialism of the South, which displays itself now in the fashion of a murder, now in the spelling of a word (the murdered man used proudly to spell publick with a k), and which, in fact, is never wanting in Southern speech or action of any kind. A Southern essayist, speaking the other day of Goethe, thought it necessary to explain that Goethe was "an acute German philosopher." Another one, a college professor, not long since announced his intention of making some remarks on an interesting book he had recently read—Buckle's "Introduction to the History of Modern Civilization"—which is an able work, he thinks, and one likely to attract some attention, as it had then—in the summer of 1868—already been criticised in two English periodicals, the Presbyterian Review and the North British. Southern novelists still write feeble imitations of the Waverley novels; Southern scientists hold in reverence Mr. Maury and Messrs. Nott and Gliddon; Southern journalists speak with respect amounting to awe of the National Intelligencer, which for years has been of not the least influence in politics, and, as a newspaper, has been inferior to the Congressional Globe; the criticism of Jeffrey or of Doctor Johnson furnishes the Southern critic with his final standard; in theology, the exploded dogmas which the severest of the orthodox churches of Connecticut long since practically discarded are still preached from Southern pulpits; the long-winded, empty political disquisitions of the metaphysical Pogram school of orators still satisfy the Southern taste in oratory; the trivial and stupid "tournament" gratifies the Southern desire for athletic sport, while the North has invented base-ball, popularized the gymnasium, and carried rowing near to perfection; the black broadcloth coat is still the only wear for the true Southern gentleman; not yet does he entertain historic doubts concerning Captain John Smith's Pocahontas, nor disbelieve in Wilkes Booth's chivalric heroism—in short, in all things, small and great, he is a long, long way behind the age. A good book, a good poem, a good actor, a sound theory in science or a display of a thorough acquaintance with any branch of it, a tolerable newspaper, a good picture, a good statue, no one but a Southerner would expect from any Southern man or woman much sooner than he would expect ice from Key West or oranges from Labrador.

Of course slavery is at the bottom of this state of things—in many ways obviously operative in producing it, but working, too, in some ways not so obvious. No one could miss seeing how naturally and unavoidably the slaveholding South clung to the past in literature and science, and angrily rejected the present; the new order was hostile to the perpetuity of the peculiar institution which it was the whole business, and a life and death business, of the South to keep in existence. A man who depends on "cursed be Canaan" to justify him in whipping a man or selling his children is not going to take very kindly to any but the oldest Biblical criticism, nor to look in a very scientific spirit on Mr. Darwin and the development theory, nor to regard geology in its relations to Genesis with anything less than fright and horror. What else can positivism and humanitarianism be but Yankee "isms" to be denounced, when a gentleman is relying for the title to his human and other property upon the fixity of some semi-Jewish creed of cast iron? If free discussion, the indispensable guarantee of just thinking and sound conclusions, is punishable by a ride on a rail out of Macon—if one resides in Macon—there clearly are not going to be many profound sociologists, to say the least of it, in that part of Georgia. When pistolling or the penitentiary or social ostracism is customary criticism, other sorts of criticism will certainly not flourish, and there is a heavy premium on stagnation of mind.

Nor is any one likely to miss perceiving that the mere physical conditions of society in one of our agricultural slaveholding States were fatal to a high degree of intelligence among the people. Small cities at great distances from each other, plantations far apart, miles on miles of desert land abandoned for newer soil, made it physically impossible that schools should be attended, even if they had existed; even if the whole system had not, whether commercially or morally considered, imperatively demanded a foundation of dense ignorance on which to rest. And inasmuch as the generality of men learn what they are compelled to learn and little or nothing more, even the educated classes at the South, preparing themselves to satisfy the wants and the public opinion of a people principally composed of the ignorant whites and more ignorant blacks, felt the full influence of the natural tendency, and, tried by the average Northern standard, were usually half or one-fourth educated. The young student of medicine came to Philadelphia knowing that the "Old House" niggers, or "the Fripp people," and his own or his father's gang, were to be his patients, and of course he did not put himself to great exertions to learn the latest word Paris or Edinburgh had been saying in surgery or medicine. In like manner, law students living in a country where every lawyer was a possible Congressman, whose commerce was simple and not great, where business was despised, where a patent office was by no means indispensable, where the bench before which one practised was a Southern one, was in the habit of paying more attention to the Constitution of the United States and the Virginia Resolutions and his speeches thereupon in the debating-rooms, than to labors on the general body of the law. It was not otherwise with clergymen. When has the South had a distinguished divine? It has produced in great abundance that variety of clerical reasoners who could explicate "cursed be Canaan," and who, "though kind, yet were they conscientious where chastisement was needed;" and, for a non-political pulpit, the Southern pulpit was a full fountain of secession; but, in the matter of adorning the annals of the church with great names of eloquent preachers of the Word, and ministers learned in the Scriptures, the church has no very great reason to be either thankful to it or satisfied with it.

Less obviously, slavery produced provincialism of culture by encouraging all the haughtier and more unteachable elements of character. Open-mindedness is not a probable intellectual trait of a man who, from his youth up, has been accustomed to say yes and no, and enforce his word with whip or musket. The pride of the master race; the contempt for the abject instruments of his will, the slaves of his whim; the seclusion of the plantation, with its temptations to degrading ways of life—all these helped to keep the minds of the better class of Southerners closed against those humanizing and liberalizing influences without which provincialism of thought and feeling is inevitable.

The remarkable lack of the humorous element in the Southern character, preventing, as such defect must, self-criticism, and thus making it easier for the Southerner to be provincial and, consequently, in many ways ridiculous, may also be traced to the influence of the social system under which he has been living. Not merely self-reliant, but arrogant and of an aggressive and domineering will, as he had to be to maintain his position as master, it was habitual and necessary with him that he should himself be the centre of his own regards, and that not in the sentimental manner as humorists may easily be, but with self-satisfaction and self-conceit, in an egotistical way. Egotists are not humorous—so that we may say, by the way, that as a rule humorists have been poor; not many rich are called; few aristocrats of any description have been men of humor. This egotistical habit of mind is, then, a habit unfriendly to humor, which—it is a truism, but yet has provoked much wonder that seems not very necessary—is nearly allied to pathos. For the sentiment of pity regards others rather than one's self, and so, surely, does humor, the one not less than the other, though the one smiles and the other weeps, being tenderly regardful of the object with which it deals. How, then, can it be expected that vigilant, unsparing masters of slaves should find their occupation conducive to a love of the humorous? But the Southerner was peculiarly a slave-master, having been strenuously maintaining himself as such through two generations of bitter attack from every quarter. It is this want of a sense of the humorous that makes criticism avail so little with our Southern brethren. They cannot see when they are absurd. If Mr. Edward Pollard struts in the cast garments of Hume and half his disciples, and talks of "Richmond on the James," he cannot be made to see that he is laughable, and there is no hope of his reform. Mr. Gilmore Simms is absolutely incapable of learning how amusing his war poetry is. One might break one's heart, but would never teach a Southern gentleman in bombazine that tournaments are not for these days. What Southern young lady could be persuaded that she was not making an impressive display of dignity when she made faces at a Yankee? To tell the truth, one needs a tolerable supply of humor to endure them at all without extreme exasperation. It is pushing provincialism to excess when people so far forget the world at large and the opinions of mankind as to tolerate for months a most scurrilous slanderer, and then cheer his cowardly murder.

HOMŒOPATHY AND WOMEN IN THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: An incorrect or ill-considered statement is so seldom found in The Nation, that when one does occur it is a matter for special comment. For this reason, I beg leave to call your attention to a statement in your "Literary Notes" of the issue of Nov. 19, which, it seems to me, is both uncandid and ill-advised.

In the comments upon the report of Dr. Haven to the Board of Regents of the University of Michigan, with reference to the admission of women to the University, there is this sentence: "If there be one profession for which woman's peculiar tact and temperament render her better fitted than any other, it is that of medicine; and yet it would be almost impossible for her to pursue this study in all its branches in the same auditorium and dissecting-room with the opposite sex." Now, it seems to me that the writer of this sentence, instead of seeking after exact truth, was looking for a special plea. What he wanted was an argument against the propriety of admitting women to study in the same institution with men. Their common pursuit of law or theology would furnish him with none, but he believed that he could present insurmountable objections to their association in the study of medicine.

Does it not rather appear that many of the objections to the epicene study of medicine would prove equally strong against the admission of both sexes to the practice of medicine?

Furthermore, is it true that "woman's peculiar tact and temperament render her better fitted" for the profession of medicine than for any or even many other professions? That women are admirably adapted for the practice of one of the medical acts (the obstetrical) is readily apparent, and is proved by the illustrious French accoucheurs, Madame Boivin and Madame La Chapelle; but I think that it is equally apparent that woman is not "peculiarly fitted" either for the arduous and indiscriminate labors of the general practitioner or for the herculean tasks of the surgeon. I believe also that while women could or would be employed only to a limited extent in the diseases of men, women themselves, in the great majority of their ailments, naturally look to the other sex for aid, counsel, and support.

Hence, it seems to me that woman cannot justly be considered as "peculiarly fitted" for the practice of medicine.

If I might be allowed a small extension of space, I would say with reference to the comments upon the homœopathy question, that it is not strictly just to say that Catholicism from its name might be claimed to represent Methodism as well as allopathy, or the regular practice, could be said to represent homœopathy. Catholicism and Methodism are both founded upon very sharply defined dogmas and tenets. On the other hand, no intelligent physician claims or will admit that his practice has for its sole basis any factitious theory or dogma whatever; while homœopathy is absolutely nothing without its precept of similia similibus.

I freely admit that there is an immense amount of prejudice, ignorance, and obstinacy in what is termed the "regular" profession; but I hold that the enlightened members of that profession make use of whatever is established by "human reason and human experience" (phrases I have learned from the Nation), without reference to any theory or dogma, and whatever part of homœopathy "human reason and human experience" have succeeded in establishing, that part has been duly incorporated in the teachings and practice of the regular profession.

Very truly yours, Richard S. Dewey.

[Mr. Dewey really must not beg the question at the very opening of a controversy. That our remarks on Dr. Haven's address were "uncandid and ill-advised" is the very thing he ought to have proved; but instead of doing this he assumes it, and then proceeds to administer a reproof. The writer of the sentence quoted in his letter was seeking not the "exact truth," for that he well knew was not to be had in such matters, but a reasonably close approximation to the truth. The objections to admitting young women to study medicine with young men are not based on the same facts, and are not of the same character, as the objections to their admission to study theology and law with young men. The distinction between the two cases is, in fact, so obvious, that we ought not to have to point it out. Until the physical fact of sex ceases to affect the mind, imagination, and character of young persons any more than the color of hair or the shape of the nose, it will always be difficult for average young women to dissect a dead body or listen to teachings on anatomy in company with young men, without considerable disturbance and distraction. No doubt there will be, and are now, plenty of young women as well as young men possessing the power of abstraction in such a high degree that they would have no eye and no ear for anything on such occasions but science itself; but both "human reason and human experience" justify us in believing that for a long time to come at least such cases will be comparatively rare. Nobody who has any familiarity with the mental condition of the average youth of both sexes at the age of nineteen or twenty really believes in the possibility of making the common run of students completely insensible, on such occasions as medical lectures, to the presence of persons of the opposite sex.

It is true that some of the objections to the epicene study of medicine would prove equally strong against the admission of both sexes to the practice of medicine; but they are the feeblest and least important. The main objection would, as regards the practice of medicine, have no force whatever, inasmuch as doctresses need never meet doctors at all unless they pleased, and anybody needing a physician could choose whether he or she would have a man or a woman. Moreover, persons engaged in the active pursuits of life are supposed to possess maturer judgment and stronger will than students at college, and there are many snares and temptations to which the latter would do well not to expose themselves, which the former may affront with impunity. How is it "apparent that women are not peculiarly fitted for the arduous labors of the general practitioner or the herculean task of the surgeon" when they are fitted "for the practice of obstetrics?" What has a general practitioner to go through in the way of hardship that an obstetrician has not? and how can the tasks of the surgeon be termed "herculean," when what they call for is notoriously not muscle, but dexterity, coolness, judgment, tact, and knowledge—qualities which an average woman may possess in a far higher degree than five surgeons out of every six? How much of them does an average medical student possess when he begins his cutting and carving? How many women are there who will seek "aid, counsel, or support" from unmarried doctors? Does not the fact that doctors have to marry in order to get into general practice prove that their sex is per se a hindrance to their usefulness as far as women are concerned? The employment of male physicians by women "in the great majority of their ailments" would be a strong argument if they had any choice. But inasmuch as at present they must employ them, or go undoctored, it seems to us to prove nothing.

As regards the homœopathic controversy, Catholicism and Methodism are founded, it is true, on "sharply defined tenets or dogmas," but the tenets or dogmas of both are, up to a certain point, the same. Methodism has been formed by rejecting a large portion of Catholic doctrine; so that Catholicism does in one sense include it, and might as fairly presume to speak for it as allopathy for homœopathy. In other words, the Catholic might say, Hear me, and not the Methodist; I believe all he believes, and more; I know all he knows, and more. The majority of Christians too are with me, and I have what he has not, the traditions of the Church in my keeping. This is just what the allopath says of the homœopath. The homœopath says that his theory may differ from that of the allopath, but that every allopath nevertheless practises on some theory, and not one uses any other test in his experiments—for all medical practice is simply a series of unconnected or very slenderly connected experiments—than the one homœopath uses. Both proceed by what Bacon calls "simple enumeration." One says he has known of a good many cases in which castor oil did good, but why he cannot tell; the other says he knows a good many cases in which two globules of ipecac. did wonders, but why he cannot tell; and, case for case, we believe, wherever the trial has been made, one system has come out about as well as the other. In fact, the claim of any school of doctors to represent a science is at present simply preposterous; and in the field of empiricism all properly educated men of good character, and professing to practise a system, are entitled to a fair and respectful hearing and trial.—Ed. ## LITERARY.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers, besides their usual number of English novels, have in press Whymper's "Alaska;" Mr. Wentworth Dilke's "Greater Britain"—a somewhat affected title, which means the English race in this country, Australia, New Zealand, and elsewhere outside of Great Britain; "The Adventures of Hans Sterk;" and "Smoke," which we take to be a translation of Turgenef's last novel, and which, if it is as good as the same author's "Fathers and Sons," is a novel very well worth reading indeed.——Messrs. Scribner & Co. announce "Graffiti d'Italia," by Mr. W. W. Story, whom readers of his agreeable "Roba di Roma," will be glad to meet again.——Messrs. Roberts Brothers will publish the "Euphues" and "Euphues and his England" of John Lyly; Poems by Catherine Barnard Smith; "Realmah," the latest work of Mr. Helps, and full of excellent matter; "Kitty," by the author of "Doctor Jacob;" and "Studies in Early French Poetry," by Walter Besant. This last work is in thirteen chapters, and deals with writers who flourished before the Renaissance, in the days when Italian influence had not been felt in France, and her poetic literature was still the ballad, chanson, rondeau, and virelay. Froissart, who wrote much verse, is the earliest writer treated of by Mr. Besant, and the last is that dissolute psalmist and hymnist, Clément Marot, who was getting born just as our continent was discovered. The Bookseller gives the names of these other poets in Mr. Besant's list: Alain Chartier, Charles of Orleans, Oliver Basselin de Vire, Guillaume Alexis, Guillaume Coquillart, Pathelin, and, greatest of all, François Villon, who bids fair to be again a favorite in his native country. We know of but one other English collection of this nature, and that but a small one, so that Mr. Besant's book will, very probably, command a good deal of the attention of a certain class of readers. We observe that Messrs. Roberts Brothers also make announcement of two of Auerbach's works.

—Our magazine publishers have lately adopted a custom, which seems to be an absurd one, of getting out their periodicals a long while before the nominal time of publication. For example: on the tenth or twelfth of December we shall be reading the magazines of next year; the printers were at work in October and November on the January numbers. Of course, there is no reason why this should be so except such reasons as spring from the competition of publisher with publisher. One firm, say, puts its Monthly in the market in the middle of the month preceding its date; next month the publishers who address a class of readers not dissimilar to the circle addressed by the first offender feel obliged to be ready as soon as he, and the Galaxy or Hours at Home or Lippincott's is hurried out two or three weeks before people expect them. The second time, then, no one of the competing magazines has the advantage over the others in the matter of alone attracting to itself casual readers who may see it lying on news-stands. Within another month, one or two more houses resolve to be on even terms with the rest, and one or two more magazines are born prematurely. After a very short while nobody is a gainer, and, indeed everybody is a loser; the publishers are made anxious, being in fear of some rival publication making its appearance twenty-four or forty-eight or seventy-two hours before they are prepared for it; this, of course, tends to make publishers, editors, and contributors unnecessarily ill-natured, and finally the reader is displeased rather than pleased to read last month's matter in what pretends to be this month's magazine. It may be said in favor of the present plan that it enables the press to give timely notices of the various claimants for patronage, and, further, that the reader beyond the Plains gets his December periodical literature early in December, instead of waiting for it till January or till the latter part of the month. But readers on the Plains and the Pacific coast and in the rural parts of Texas are not so numerous that New York publishers need sacrifice to them the interests of their Eastern readers. For all the purposes of the publisher, the reader living in Chicago—"Chicago, thirty-six hours from New York,' as a nineteenth-century Homer might say—or a reader resident in New Orleans, which is but three or four days' ride from Boston, are certainly Eastern readers, and it is thinking of this fact that we speak of Western readers as numerically of no importance. As for the notices which the press give of magazines—we might make some remarks about their value; they may as well, however, be left ti another time. But this is true, that if the magazines all came out on the same day or nearly on the same day, whatever good should be done them by newspaper reviews would be shared equally. Why, then, the half-dozen houses that own periodicals should not come to some amicable agreement in regard to publishing day, or at least in regard to publishing week, it is not easy to see; in fact, we dare say each one of them would thank the others, as for the removal of a disagreeable little trouble, if by mutual agreement the present state of things were altered in the way we have indicated. While we are speaking of this matter a word may properly be said on a kindred one. There seems no justification for the custom of falsifying a book's account of itself—which is what every book's title-page should be—by giving to publications of this year the date "1869." This is very often done, especially in the case of gift books; but we do not see that any good is thus got which can be held to counterbalance the evil just mentioned.

—Among English books which have been recently issued or are to be issued we notice these: Mr. Valentine Cox, now for many years Esquire-bedel in Oxford, makes a garrulous but very readable volume of his "Recollections" of matters and things in that University. His memory runs back to 1789. The work has two kinds of interest: it talks about many men whose names have become historical, and also it enables one to bring before one's mind a lively picture of the Oxford and the England, now so largely passed away, of the evil Hanoverian days. Mr. Cox reflects bitterly that the office of Esquire-bedel, like many other old-time things, has now departed, and that on his retirement comes to an end a long line of more than six centuries of magnificent ushers. An ecclesiastical Freemason, the Rev. Augustus C. L. Arnold, has written a work, which should be in all the lodges, entitled "History and Philosophy of Freemasonry and other Secret Societies; or, The Secret Societies of All Ages considered in their Relations with and Influence on the Moral, Social, and Intellectual Progress of Man." It is to be hoped that he can write a more readable sort of English than he has put into his title-page. Mr. George Macdonald's "England's Antiphon" is a review of English religious poetry, more particularly of the lyrical religious poetry of England—"the antiphon or responsive song of the choir." Part first introduces the poets of all the centuries from the thirteenth to the middle of the seventeenth. William of Shoreham, a pious Kentish singer of the reign of Edward the Second, heads the list, and it closes with George Herbert. The compilation is pretty sure to be well done, Mr. Macdonald being himself a poet of no mean order and a devout Christian. Mr. C. M. Yonge and Mr. G. M. Sewell, in a volume of Historical Selections, have laid under contribution E. A. Freeman, Thomas Roscoe, John Lingard, Professor Pearson, Dean Milman, Sir James Stephen, Dean Hook, Sir Francis Palgrave, Hume, and other historians, and have constructed a history of England from the earliest period to the famous Battle of the Standard in 1138. They propose to do the same thing—and it seems to be a very good thing to do—with all the rest of English history, and are said to have shown in this first volume their fitness for performing the whole task. Such of our readers as have waded through any of the works of Mr. J. E. Carpenter, author of two thousand songs, will shun his latest production, which is nothing else than "A Hand-book of Poetry; being a Clear and Easy Guide, divested of Technicalities, to the Art of making English Verse." Whoever recollects Mr. Carpenter's sentimental and patriotic songs will see with what appropriateness this hand-book might be its author's last as well as his latest work.

—The "Holbein Society," just formed in London, proposes to publish, by subscription, fac-simile reprints of some of the many books of the early days of printing which engaged the skill and genius of artists and engravers, in which literature and art were united, and which are now, of course, excessively rare. Most of the books which it is proposed to reproduce were originally written in Latin; still, of these there are also in most cases English translations of nearly equal antiquity, and the society intends, whenever it can, to give, along with the original text, an English or other version. One guinea entitles a subscriber to two publications. Among the works selected are these: First, Holbein's "Dance of Death," with a French text; "Les Simulachres et Historiees faces de la Mort avtant elegammēt pourtraictes, que artificiellement imaginées" (1538, Cologne) An English translation will be appended to this as to all the volumes, which will be beautifully printed small quartos. Second will come Holbein's "Figures for the Old Testament," or "Icones Historiarvm Veteris Testamenti, Ad viuum expressæ," with an exposition in French. Next year there will be a reprint of the "Quatuor Alciati Fontium," or "Four of the Fountains of Alciati," whom we take to be Paolo Alciati, the heretical Piedmontese jurisconsult who was so impartially hated by Protestants and Catholics about the middle of the sixteenth century. It is probable that among the works republished by the society will be these others: La Perrière's "Théâtre des Bons Engins" (Paris, 1539); Horapollo's "Hieroglyphica" (Paris, 1551, having for appendix the French version of 1553, and an English translation); Aneau's "Picta Poësis" (Lyons, 1552, accompanied by a French version, "L'imagination poétique"); Coustau's "Pegma cum narrationibus philosophicis", (Lyons, 1555, with De Romieu's French translation, 1560); Faerno's "Centum Fabulæ," or Hundred Fables (Rome, 1565, with a French version by M. Perrault, and some English translations); Giovio's "Dialogue des Devises d'armes et d'amours" (Lyons, 1561, preceded by the original "Ragionamento di Mons. Paolo Giovio," Venice, 1556); "The Mirrovr of Maiestie; or, The Badges of Honovr conceitedly Emblazoned with Emblems annexed, poetically vnfolded" (London, printed by W. I., 1618—a work of extreme rarity, only one perfect copy known); and, finally, another work of almost equal rarity, "Ἡ Παρθενη, Partheneia Sacra; or, The Mysteriovs and Deliciovs Garden of the Sacred Parthenes; symbolically set forth and enriched with piovs devises and emblemes, etc." (printed by Iohn Covstvrier, 1633).

—When Doctor Johnson made Doctor Goldsmith declare that kings or laws can cause or cure only an inappreciable part of human misery, the great science of statistics had not been invented. A tolerably good sociologist—and for perfectly good ones it is not time even yet—finds nothing easier than to show that not only "the kingdom is in the cottage," in the sense in which Mr. Bright declares it to be, but also is unavoidably there in other senses than that; that the daily life of the cottager's child is happier or unhappier accordingly as the legislation of the state is wise or unwise; in short, that countless evils are cured or caused by laws and kings, and that statistics can best tell legislators when they have done right and wrong. It is an encouraging thing, then, to see that modern rulers pay more and more attention to the new science which lies at the bottom of good government. In 1871 we are to have a census of the whole of the British possessions in Hindostan and the adjacent countries, or rather of three-fourths of that empire, for the feudatory states are not covered by the enquiry. Even now there is in existence a recently prepared census, accompanied by a vast mass of various information, of the north-western and central provinces. It is made in accordance with the basis recommended some years since by the International Congress, and will be in five great divisions, namely: Geographical Statistics, including Physical, Political, and Fiscal Geography; secondly, the statistics of Protection (courts, army, police, and so on); thirdly, of Production and Distribution; fourthly, of Instruction—and in this division we shall undoubtedly get a good deal of very interesting information concerning various religious teachers, both native and foreign; and, finally, we come to the division of Vital Statistics. When these returns are published, there will have to be, it is said, a general overhauling of cyclopædia articles on Indian geography, commerce, agriculture, religion, habits and customs, and what not. For example, all existing geographical accounts of India are so defective that the Government has been obliged to make new local gazetteers for its own use. When these statistical labors are given to the world, India as it is will be for the first time visible—to such, of course, as have eyes to see through figures; though for the matter of that there is to be a good deal of interesting writing, and not merely tables of bales and acres and millions in parallel columns of numerals, and showing India as it is comes very near to showing the Englishman at his best—as man of affairs, administrator, merchant, colonizer, soldier, and ruler of men.

—Helen M'Dougal has a right to a small place in literature, or on the outskirts of it, as having assisted in the making of that word in our tongue which has, perhaps, the most horrible associations connected with it, and which, doubtless, will last as long as the language. She was one of the gang of kidnappers and murderers who infested the West Port of Edinburgh about forty years ago, and gained their living by the "resurrection" of the dead and the "burking" of the living. She was the paramour or left-handed wife of the chief murderer, Burke, and was indicted with him, but, in spite of her complicity with him and Hare, she was saved from the gallows by the skill and eloquence of her counsel, Henry Cockburn. After the trial the miserable woman went back to her old neighborhood, but was driven out by a furious mob, at whose hands she narrowly escaped death. Next she sought a hiding-place in the village where Burke first met her, and where she had previously lived in tolerably good repute; but she was at once driven thence also, and it was not known where she afterwards went. Her name dropped out of public memory, and she had been for many years forgotten, when the other day word came from Singleton, New South Wales, that Helen M'Dougal had been burned to death in that town, where she had long been living. Apparently, some one had taken pity on her and sent her out of Scotland. She must have been more than seventy years old at the time of her tragic end.

—W. Marr, a writer in the Berlin Post, has advanced the proposition that the day of the theatre is past ("das Theater hat sich überlebt"). He contends that so long as the theatre flourished it was as a mirror of high and low life to those classes of society to which the one or the other was unfamiliar—"relatively a terra incognita." With the growth and culture of modern society our daily life has come into competition with that depicted on the stage, from which we derive no instruction not already afforded by our own experience. With the decline of the drama the popularity of the opera has sprung up, as it caters to the excitement which we crave from both. The ballet having been converted into an immodest, acrobatic display, the opera must not lag behind. Hence the present triumph of Offenbach, the real predecessor of whom and of Mlle. Thérèse and the cafés chantants is, in the critic's belief, Richard Wagner. "His musical assault on the melody of the earlier opera," it is wittily, if not justly, declared, "is the stone with which the bear killed the fly on his master's forehead." Herr Marr's argument touches the novel not less than the drama—at least at some points; and it is noticeable how much the sensational dramatist nowadays depends for material on the sensational novel.

—A dramatist whose popularity on paper will probably long outlast that on the stage is Schiller; and that he will now be read more extensively than ever is certain, inasmuch as the monopoly of his works, held till last year by the house of Cotta, has been dissolved. The dispossessed publisher, however, has still an advantage in the market, and at the bookstore of Mr. L. W. Schmidt may be seen a very remarkable proof of this. One may buy there a complete edition of Schiller's works—no more and no less—in one volume not too bulky, and yet containing 1,124 octavo pages, for one dollar and fifty cents currency, in paper covers, and one dollar and sixty cents in boards. The print is perfectly legible, and the paper though thin not transparent. The shilling Shakespeare almost pales before this enterprise.

—"Mercadet" having been revived, the Parisian feuilletonistes have just been having a fresh opportunity to recollect or to invent stories about Balzac. Théophile Gautier, for his contribution, relates this veracious tale: Balzac, being at the moment as deeply in debt as his own Mercadet, comes to M. Gautier and proposes to write in one day and night a five-act drama, which on the second day shall be sold for much money to M. Harel, of the Porte Saint Martin. "'I have arranged it in this way,' he says. 'You do one act, Ourliac will do another, Laurent Jan will take the third, De Belloy the fourth, and I myself the fifth. There are only four or five hundred lines in an act, and five hundred lines of dialogue can be written in a day and a night.' 'But,' says Gautier, 'relate the story; sketch the plot; give me some idea of the characters.' 'Oh!' says Balzac, with an air of magnificent superiority to this dull dog of a Gautier,—'Oh! if I am to relate the story we shall never be done.'" The fact, however, is well known—and might be learned from his books alone, if we had no other evidence than is afforded by them—that Balzac was not at all a rapid worker. "He experienced a great deal of trouble," says Gavarni, "in getting to work, and would draw figures and write sentences for half an hour or an hour before he could begin." He could, however, write for ten or twelve hours at a stretch, until he completely exhausted himself. M. Monselet gives a list of the works which Balzac did not write, but was going to: "Life and Adventures of an Idea;" "The Modern Phædo;" "The Philanthropist;" "The Justice of the Peace" (Le Juge de Paix); "Anatomy of Modern Scholastic Bodies;" "Wrinkled People;" "Sons-in-Law and Stepmothers;" "The New Abelard;" "Scenes of Military Life," for the sake of which he had visited nearly all the French battle-fields; "The Environs of Paris;" "History and Novels;" and one more volume of the "Contes Drolatiques." Some of these, it will be seen, are books that he might very probably have written had he lived long enough; others would seem to represent the momentary willingness of a man to step into fields in which he could hope to do little.

—A sixteenth-century forgery, remarkable both for its importance and for its having passed so long unchallenged, has been exposed in the most thorough manner by Wilhelm Bernardi ("Matteo di Giovenazzo: Eine Fälschung des XVI. Jahrhunderts." Berlin, 1868). The said Giovenazzo has hitherto had the credit of being the first Italian chronicler who made use of his native language, and as such has enjoyed great repute among the Neapolitans. His diary ("Diurnali") has passed through many editions, more or less critical, in France and Germany, and has been relied on for its contributions to the history of Southern Italy under Frederick II., Manfred, and the Duke of Anjou. The crucial examination to which Herr Bernardi has subjected the original text discloses almost incredible anachronisms and blunders, and proves conclusively that the diary could not have been composed by a contemporary of the events recorded, and consequently that Giovenazzo is a myth. Not content with this, the critic traces the diary to its first appearance (towards the end of the sixteenth century), and fixes upon Angelo Costanzo, author of a history of Naples, 1572, the introduction of it to the world and its undoubted invention. Still further, he lays bare the motives which led to such a forgery, which consisted chiefly in the desire to flatter certain noble families and to put down his rivals in historical writing; and finally, he names the authors from whom Costanzo borrowed, with too careless an eclecticism, the substance of his "Diurnali." A better unmasking of literary fraud has perhaps never been performed than this, especially when we consider that it is a German who has done it for the Italians. All that is left to Costanzo is a certain imaginative skill which enabled him to invest the characters he presented with a good degree of naturalness and plausibility.

MR. KINGLAKE'S SECOND VOLUME.*

Mr. Kinglake in his second volume resumes his narrative at the close of the battle of the Alma, and pursues it through "the famous flank march to the south side of Sebastopol, the opening of the siege, the first bombardment of the place by the allies," and finishes with the two famous charges of the English cavalry on the memorable 25th of October, 1854. Probably no historian has ever taken more pains to furnish "the key" to the events he describes than Mr. Kinglake, and none certainly has ever given stronger proof of his own belief in his success. He endeavored to show in his first volume, that England was seduced into the war by the machinations of two arch-villains, the Emperor Napoleon, and St. Arnaud, "called Leroy," aided by a commercial company, composed of widows and elderly squires, commonly called The Times newspaper. Our readers may remember with what assiduity he worked this theory up; with what care he made nearly every little incident of contemporary history support it from the coup d'état in Paris, in 1851, down to the napping of the members of the British cabinet on the warm summer afternoon on which the despatch was read to them, which was to put an end to negotiation and light the flames of war.

In this second volume he endeavors to show that it was owing to the obstinacy of St. Arnaud, and the irresolution of Canrobert, his successor, that the allies did not advance immediately after the battle of the Alma; that had they advanced and assaulted the north side, the fall of the place was inevitable; and that it was owing to the failure of the French fire in the first bombardment that the town and forts on the south side were not assaulted and carried. In his account of the battle of Balaclava, he is simply a describer—that action having been an episode with no bearing on the siege operations, except in so far as Leprandi's appearance on the Tchernaya proved the folly of the failure to assault the north side. His hero in this volume, as in the first—the man who is always right, who sees through everybody and everything, and whose very weaknesses are virtues—is Lord Raglan; and the way in which he paints him furnishes, as perhaps nothing else could, the measure of Mr. Kinglake's capacity as a military historian. One or two hundred years hence, it might be possible to make Lord Raglan out a great military leader. Mr. Kinglake's misfortune has been that he has produced his history in the middle of the generation which saw the English commander-in-chief; and therefore, although Mr. Kinglake has produced one of the most readable books of the day, there is hardly anybody who will put it on his shelf with the feeling that he has a real history of the great siege. That is still to be written; but nobody will ever write it without laying himself under heavy obligations to Mr. Kinglake for his diligence in accumulating materials. That he has not succeeded better in producing either a striking picture or a faithful chronicle, is due simply to the superabundance of passion with which he has done his work.

On the authority of a memorandum of a conversation between Sir Edmund Lyons, the second in command of the English fleet—(another of his idols; the corresponding marplot being Admiral Dundas, the commander-in-chief)—and Mr. George Loch, written a year and a half after the event, he builds up the theory that Lyons urged Raglan to assault the north side immediately after the battle of the Alma, and that Raglan concurred, and in vain urged the cowardly "Leroy" to join him in it. Hence, he maintains, a brilliant opportunity of bringing the war to a sudden and glorious close was lost and the army involved in the horrors of the lingering siege which followed; this makes one more point against the French marshal. All the other evidence, however, and there is a great deal of it, shows that both Raglan and St. Arnaud contemplated a movement against the south side from the first; that some passing thoughts of attacking the north side were dissipated by the discovery of fresh works thrown up across the neck of the peninsula at the head of the harbor; and that Sir John Burgoyne, the English chief engineer, reported against it from the very first day, and was sent with his memorandum down to St. Arnaud by Raglan, and found the marshal inclined to try his luck on that side, but won him over, telling him of the new fortifications. Moreover, Mr. Kinglake reports all this evidence himself; and to crown all, since the present volume appeared, Sir John Burgoyne has written to the London Times, denying that Lord Raglan ever entertained the idea of an attack on the north side, expressing doubt whether Sir Edmund Lyons ever did anything so "unbecoming" as to offer any advice about it, and pronouncing the Loch memorandum worthless. There was one other fact which nobody for one minute forgot, in discussing the subject at the time, and the most tremendous fact of all—though it seems to have exercised no influence on Mr. Kinglake's conclusion—and that is, that a great fleet lay in the harbor, which could, at a moment's notice, have covered the slopes by which an army would descend on the north side with the fire of five hundred guns of the largest calibre—a fire under which the allied armies could not have lived for an hour.

Mr. Kinglake's description of the flank march is, as usual, very vivid; but, as usual, in trying to make Lord Raglan out imposing, he makes him ridiculous. Lord Raglan had as a young man served under Wellington, but had passed the forty years of peace in the Horse Guards as Military Secretary, without ever seeing a shot fired in anger. He was a favorite at clubs and in country-houses and London drawing-rooms; a polished, kind-hearted, fastidious, plucky gentleman whom everybody loved and respected, but he was not in any sense of the term a man of war, and nobody supposed he was. He was selected for the command in the Crimea when it was supposed the expedition would prove simply a demonstration in support of the negotiations, because he spoke French well, was suave, facile, and had lost an arm in the old wars, and would, therefore, be likely to get on well with the French. When he became actually engaged in hostilities, he was probably as much out of place as any human being ever was; and there is something almost pathetic in the story which Mr. Kinglake tells, in his first volume, of the way in which the commander-in-chief and his old friend, Sir George Brown, admitted to each other that, when they found themselves in military difficulties, it was their custom to ask themselves, "what would the great Duke have done in similar circumstances?" In fact, Lord Raglan went to the Crimea in the character of a fine old English gentleman, never forgot it for a moment, and closed his blameless life in it and in no other. What is oddest in Mr. Kinglake's history is, that he too seems to consider this the principal thing in a commander, and the want of it in the French officers a constant source of trouble and misfortune. It is this which prevents the historian seeing the inherent absurdity of Lord Raglan's riding into the midst of the enemy's lines to see what was going on during the battle of the Alma; of his riding in advance of the troops during the flank march, coming on the enemy's rear-guard, without other escort than his staff, and having to hide in the bushes till the cavalry were brought up; and, still more, of his being so disgusted when a Russian artillery captain was brought before him drunk at seeing "an officer and gentleman" in such a humiliating condition, that, although he was in sore need of information as to the enemy's movements, he refused to examine the man, and rode off with a feeling "hardly short of distress." This is very pretty, but it is not war.

When the army descended from the Mackenzie Heights—the plateau on which the flank march was performed—the English took Balaclava as their harbor, and the right of the line as their post; the French the left, and Kamiesch as their port. The latter were thus in actual contact with their ships and supplies, while the English were separated from theirs by from three to four miles, a fact soon to prove of dreadful moment. Fire was opened on the 17th of October from the siege batteries on the place, which Menschikoff and the army had evacuated, leaving it to be defended by the sailors under Korniloff and Todleben. It was tremendously effective, in spite of Todleben's genius and energy, and all bid fair for an assault, when the French magazines exploded, putting a stop to the fire on that side. The English kept it up, and reduced the Redan to a mound of earth, silencing all its guns, but were unable to go further alone. The Russians recovered their courage, and the troops began to show themselves in the rear of the allies on the heights above the Tchernaya river. On the 18th of October, Mr. Cottley, the English consul, late of Kertch, warned Lord Raglan what the winter in those regions would be, and his lordship directed him to draw up a report on the matter, and send it home with a letter of his own, showing that he was really alarmed. By the 24th the bombardment was confessedly a failure, and the army knew it was in for a long siege. On the morning of the 25th, Liprandi came down from the heights and struck the English rear, on the plains of Balaclava, before daybreak, and stormed the redoubts garrisoned by the Turks, under the eyes of the English cavalry, 1,500 strong, who, however, fearful of worse things to come, looked calmly on. It was characteristic of the condition of the service, that the commander of the light cavalry brigade, Lord Cardigan, was, when the alarm was given and the outposts driven in, in bed in his yacht at Balaclava, three miles away, being in the habit of sleeping there every night with Lord Raglan's permission.

Before saying anything of the engagement which followed, we must mention a matter of which Mr. Kinglake will probably treat in his next volume, but which, in the order of time, he ought to have taken up in this. The question of winter-quarters for the English—that is, the question, whether they would perish of cold and hunger, or pass their time comfortably—was simply a question of transportation between Balaclava and the heights of Sapoune, a distance of nearly four miles to the extreme right. For about half this distance there was a good macadamized road, known as the Woronzoff Road. But between the nearest point on this road and Balaclava, there was an interval of about a mile and a half of common country highway, which it was patent to everybody would, as soon as the rains began, become a quagmire, and cut off communication, as far as supplies were concerned, between the camp and the port. In spite of the warnings given to Lord Raglan by Mr. Cottley, and in spite of the prospect which was opened up to all eyes by the failure of the bombardment, nothing whatever was done to connect Balaclava with the Woronzoff Road, and when the winter finally set in after the battle, the extraordinary spectacle was presented of an army perishing by inches for want of food and clothing within a mile and a half of its storeships; for everything abounded at Balaclava. In accounting for the want of a road, General Airey, the Quartermaster-General, who was also a gentlemanly man, and who, as Mr. Kinglake relates, regularly dressed for dinner every day when he was farming in the backwoods in Canada in early life, said that he had relied on the Woronzoff Road, and that the disasters of the winter were due to the Turks having allowed Liprandi to seize this on the 25th of October. The fact was, though we believe it has never been fairly brought to light, that Liprandi never touched one rod of the Woronzoff Road of which the British would have made use. He never, in fact, came near their line of communication, except with the cavalry, which Scarlett so spendidly defeated.

Mr. Kinglake's account of the four engagements which made the 25th of October memorable, shows all his faults and all his virtues as a narrator. Where the incidents he describes are simple, the actors in them not numerous, few surpass him as a painter. His picture of the morning alarm on the Tchernaya, when the Turks were swept away in the grey dawn, and the Russian cavalry poured toward Balaclava, till they were arrested, almost at the head of the gorge, by Sir Colin Campbell and his handful of Highlanders, has rarely been surpassed for vividness. But when he comes to deal with that most extraordinary episode which followed, in which the heavy cavalry, under Scarlett, not over six hundred strong, rode straight into a dense mass of Russian cavalry, supposed by some to number 3,500, and by none less than 2,500, tore through and through them, the supports entering on both flanks, and meeting the first line in the centre of the mass, and driving it, after eight minutes of fierce sabreing, in wild confusion off the field, under the eyes of nearly 20,000 delighted spectators swarming on the heights above, he so loads himself with details that it is impossible, even with the help of his maps and plans, for anybody who does not know the ground to get from his narrative a clear idea of what happened. It must be admitted, too, that he sometimes draws largely on his imagination. The feelings of nearly every British officer who was in the fight, and survived it, he can of course describe, as he does, on the authority of the officer; but when he tells what was the moral and religious condition of the Scots Greys, and of the Inniskilling Dragoons, when they struck the Russian column, and tells of the "zizz" which came from the Russians, and the "low moan of desire" uttered by the English dragoons during the fray, he attempts something to which mortal powers are not equal. He saw the combat a mile away, through a field-glass, but it was at that distance a very simple matter, as all surviving spectators of it will remember—two red lines in rapid succession striking against a dark mass, breaking inside of it into red spots, the spots traversing it in every direction in zigzag, a flash of steel over head in the morning light, and in a few minutes the dark mass dissolving and rolling away down the hill from the red spots, which gathered rapidly into a line once more—and all was over. The account of the charge of the Light Brigade an hour later is better, because the phenomenon was simpler. Mr. Kinglake seems to make it clear that when poor Nolan received his death wound in riding across the English line, he was really trying to show Cardigan the way to the guns, which Lord Raglan meant him to assail—the guns lost by the Turks in the morning, and which the Russians were removing, and which might have been easily captured without the "wild charge" which closed a glorious day in disaster and defeat.

MR. BRIGHT'S SPEECHES.*

This selection from the speeches of the greatest of living English orators may be read with different purposes. We may consider it as a full exposition of the views of one section of English Radicals, or simply as a specimen of literary composition. Perhaps it is from this last point of view that it will be chiefly interesting to Americans. Mr. Bright is an eminently plain-spoken man, as beseems his country and his sect; and few people can require to be told what he thinks of Parliamentary reform, of the Irish Church, of the American rebellion, or of the Crimean war. Upon these and other topics he has expressed himself with such energy and emphasis, and has left so unmistakable a trace of his action, that no one can be in want of much information as to his views. Mr. Bright's opinions are set down in plain black and white, not in mysterious and shifting neutral tints. It may, however, be more interesting to discover what is the secret of his singular power as an orator. Those who have read his speeches in the papers, or have had the better fortune to hear them delivered, will be anxious to know how they read at a considerable interval from the time of delivery, and deprived of the aids of voice and manner. How much of the charm remains, and to what qualities is it owing?

* "Speeches by John Bright, M.P. Edited by J. E. T. Rogers." London: Macmillan & Co.; Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Two things might have been said of Mr. Bright a few years ago with equal truth. First, that he was, perhaps, the most cordially hated man in the House of Commons; and secondly, that he was the one who could most perfectly command its attention. The country gentleman element regarded him as an embodiment of the evil principle in politics; yet country gentlemen jostled each other for a place to hear him speak, and listened with rapt attention to his assaults upon their dearest principles. When he was expected to deliver a great speech, even the sacred hour of dinner failed to empty the benches of the House; and when he rose, a deep silence hushed the usual murmur of conversation. The House of Commons, in truth, is a tolerant assembly to any one who will amuse it; yet there was something singular in their marked toleration for one who gave the freest utterance to the sentiments of its least popular minority. Even that most dreadful accusation against Mr. Bright, that he was "un-English," failed to shake his power as the greatest master of the English speech.

First in the list of the qualities to which this power was due, we should naturally mention his charm of voice and manner. Of these we need only say that Mr. Bright's manner would probably be remarkable in any other assembly for its repose; and even in so phlegmatic a body as the House of Commons, it does not rise above the average in energy of action. It is thus well calculated to give full play to an eloquence which rests in a singularly small degree upon any ambitious flights of imagination. Mr. Bright seldom, if ever, attempts any of those purple patches which are common with ambitious orators. His opinions are strong enough, and are expressed with remarkable vigor; but they are never draped in high-flown or figurative language. His sentences are almost always short, and even studiously simple in their construction. There are few metaphors or apostrophes; and scarcely one of those passages which would be selected for declamation by school-boys. The great popular orator instinctively avoids the bombast and clap-trap generally thought suitable to the popular taste; and with a severity which might sometimes be thought overstrained, relies more upon the force of his arguments and the skill with which his ideas are marshalled, than upon any special tours de force. In short, his oratory is of the Quaker variety, simple, masculine, and hard-hitting; never flowery, or what is generally called rhetorical. Even where he rises to the highest flight, he seems to feel the need of self-restraint most keenly. Take, for example, the following instance of pathos, which produced an extraordinary effect at the time. He was speaking of the disastrous Crimean campaign in 1855:

"Many homes," he says, "may be rendered desolate when the next news arrives. The angel of death has been abroad throughout the land; you may almost hear the beating of his wings. There is no one, as when the first-born were slain of old, to sprinkle with blood the lintel and two side-posts of our doors, that he may spare and pass on; he takes his victims from the castle of the noble, the mansion of the wealthy, and the cottage of the poor and lowly, and it is on behalf of all these classes that I make this solemn appeal."

The words we have italicized produced a strikingly solemn effect at the time, as though an invisible presence had been actually felt in the room; and Mr. Bright, having called up the sentiment, scarcely dwelt upon it for a sentence; but just touching a thought which an inferior speaker would have expanded, and probably vulgarized in the expansion, passed on to develop his argument. Or, again, those who heard the great speech which he delivered on the bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland in 1866, will remember the effect produced by one or two single sentences. We may quote, for example, this: "I believe that if the majority of the people of Ireland, fairly counted out, had their will, and if they had the power, they would unmoor the island from its fastenings in the deep and move it at least 2,000 miles to the west." Or this: "There is an instructive anecdote to be found in the annals of the Chinese Empire. In a remote province there was an insurrection. The emperor put down the insurrection, but he abased and humbled himself before his people, and said that if he had been guilty of neglect, he acknowledged his guilt, and he humbled himself before those on whom he had brought this evil of an insurrection in one of his provinces." Taken by themselves, there is nothing very new in these remarks, nor in the language in which they are expressed; but the skill of the orator is shown in the power with which, taken with their context, they bring out the precise point to be made. They tell like a single blow struck in the right place at the right moment, without any blundering in the aim or unnecessary flourishing of the weapon. The humorous passages are equally indebted to this absence of unnecessary verbiage; Mr. Bright makes his point without boggling, with the certainty of hand of a practised master, and passes on, as it were, unconsciously. Take, for example, this neat thrust at Mr. Disraeli's political charlatanism. A feeble remedy suggested by the premier reminds him, he says, of an anecdote related by Addison. "He [Addison] says that in his time there was a man who made a living by cheating the country people. He was not a cabinet minister—he was only a mountebank—and he set up a stall and sold pills that were very good against an earthquake." Even Mr. Disraeli's own party could not but laugh at this delicate description of their leader.

The admirable conciseness and vigor of Mr. Bright's language make them an excellent study for young men who are under the usual temptation to florid rhetoric. It will do them good to see how much can be done by the utmost simplicity. They will observe, however, that the simplicity is of very little use unless there is something to be said. The nobler the thought, the plainer the dress which it will bear; and Mr. Bright's eloquence is really admirable because the ideas expressed are always broad and generous, and the policy defended is sufficiently large-minded to require no special pleading. No orator makes more frequent appeals to motives of justice and humanity; and it is the best proof of his merit that they never sound in his mouth like mere clap-trap or commonplace. In some respects to which we need not now refer, there are obvious limitations to Mr. Bright's field of intellectual vision; but his opinions, if sometimes based on rather narrow grounds, are never based on mean or selfish grounds. He has been frequently accused of setting class against class; people who have got a large share of political influence being of opinion that no one can propose to weaken their exclusive rights except from motives of the meanest jealousy; but readers of this volume will be inclined to acknowledge that a desire to break down class distinctions may be at least compatible with a lofty standard of political morality, and it is this constant appeal to lofty motives in simple language which gives Mr. Bright his peculiar oratorical power.

The Story of a Regiment: A History of the Campaigns and Associations in the Field of the Sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry. By E. Hannaford, formerly a member of the regiment. (Cincinnati: Published by the Author, 38 West Fourth Street. 1868.) — This is a good-sized, well-printed book of over six hundred pages, and it is an extremely good book in its way. But a book so large in proportion to its subject is hardly within the domain to which criticism belongs. It will be read by few besides those who are interested in the regiment of which it is the story. The Sixth Ohio seems to have been a favorable specimen of the Western contingent, a plucky, well-drilled, intelligent, independent, not over well disciplined, remarkably healthy set of men. It campaigned in West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee; did a vast deal of marching and some hard fighting. It was present at the battles of Shiloh, Stone River, Chickamauga, and Mission Ridge or Chattanooga. Its loss was trifling at the first and last of these, and heavy at the other two, though not equal to the losses sustained in great battles by many other regiments in the late war. It took part in no other serious engagements, and it was mustered out of service in June, 1866. It is impossible to construct with the materials supplied by such a record a book so large as this that shall at the same time be interesting and valuable to the general public. And yet it is an excellent thing that it has been written, and it is much to be desired that every regiment that took a creditable part in the late war should find so competent and faithful a chronicler as Mr. Hannaford. Besides the interest it must possess for the members of the regiment and their friends, it contains many valuable bricks for the future builder, and will be found by all who love to read about the daily life of soldiers to contain much pleasant reading. The biography with which it abounds is limited in its interest, but any reader will note with satisfaction the modesty of the book, its manliness, good sense, and honesty, and will find his attention agreeably kept alive by its pleasant sketches of country, its life-like details of insignificant fighting, and the infinite minuteness and fidelity with which it records the experiences of every hour of the camp, the march, and the bivouac; and there are a few passages of description in it which deserve high praise. Among these we would note particularly the excellent account of the Brown's Ferry expedition, in November, 1863, just before the battle of Chattanooga, by the success of which the first step was taken toward raising the siege of that place. Many people know that the leading feature of this admirably planned and managed enterprise was the movement of troops down the Tennessee in boats by night, but the details are not generally known. Mr. Hannaford has supplied the want. It is not easy to doubt that he was one of the party, though he modestly refrains from saying so, and he has told the story so vividly yet so simply that he might well base upon this alone a claim to a good place among the painters of pictures of the war.

State partialities are apt to be so strongly reflected in books of the class to which this belongs that we are prepossessed in favor of an Ohio soldier telling the story of an Ohio regiment when we find him saying, in his first chapter, "We have seen how grandly Ohio responded to the demands upon her, and yet she had no pre-eminence. The whole nation brought its best gifts. . . ." This is not a solitary instance. The moderation which it indicates is observable all through the book.

Handbook of the Stars, for School and Home Use. By W. J. Rolfe and J. A. Gillet, teachers in the High School, Cambridge, Mass. (Boston: Crosby & Ainsworth.)—If the authors of this work had adhered to their original design, as it is stated in the preface and suggested by the title, of confining their attention to the fixed stars, their book would have been less open to criticism; or if, moreover, they could have been induced to omit even the chapters on the fixed stars, publishing only the star maps which are now found at the end of their book, they would have done a useful work. But the work is issued as a text-book in astronomy for school use, and as such we regard it as not only defective, but positively injurious. It is destitute of any logical arrangement of subjects, and the discursive, careless style in which the nature and motions of the solar system have been disposed of seems to imply that "the urgent call for an astronomy without mathematics," to which the authors claim to have responded, has been understood to be a demand for an astronomy without logic. The greater part of the book is occupied with a description of the physical constitution of the heavenly bodies. Very little space is devoted to their motions, or to the laws which regulate these motions. Thus, the discussion of "spots on the sun" occupies seventeen pages, while all that, in the body of the work, relates to the true shape of the earth, proof of the diurnal motion of the earth, astronomical instruments, annual motion of the earth, precession and nutation, change of seasons and twilight, is comprised within sixteen pages. The chapter on comets is remarkable for containing no allusion to the parabolic form of their orbits. The law of universal gravitation is referred to neither in this chapter nor in connection with the planets. Indeed, although some six pages on the history of astronomy are inserted under the head of "the real motions of the stars," in a most inappropriate place, the name of Newton is found only in the appendix. After having referred to the planets as wandering stars, the authors proceed to justify the assertion that the earth is included in this class by a long account of its original igneous condition. The logical connection between the fact that ages ago the earth was "a blazing star," and the propriety of now regarding it as a planet, seems to us somewhat obscure. Such is the superficial and almost childish treatment of the phenomena of astronomy; such is the disregard of any proper division of the subject; and in such an indefinite and vague manner is the necessary terminology presented to the reader, that we would far rather leave the scholar to his own unaided reflections than place this text-book in his hands.

Ab-sa-ra-ka, Home of the Crows. Being the Experience of an Officer's Wife on the Plains. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—This book gives an account of the expedition sent out in May, 1866, under command of Colonel H. B. Carrington, for the purpose of establishing forts along the line of the new route to Montana through Wyoming. One object it has in view is the suggestion of a new name—Absaraka—in place of Wyoming, with which designation there is now some talk of afflicting the Territory. The region was originally possessed by the Crow Indians, who have been partially dispossessed by the Sioux and Cheyennes. Ab-sa-ra-ka, signifying "The Home of the Crows," was the name by which it was known to them, and as the Crows have always been "good" Indians, it seems reasonable enough that the name should be retained. It has the merit of sounding well, and of having a definite and appropriate meaning—merits to which the present title lays no claim.

The chief purpose of the book, however, is the clearing of Colonel Carrington from the imputations of cowardice and incompetency cast upon him at the time of the massacre of December 21, 1866, when eighty-one men of his command were killed by the Sioux and Cheyennes, at a short distance from Fort Phil. Kearney. The defence seems to show, conclusively enough, that the colonel was in no wise to blame in the matter. He had been sent out while the Territory was in a state of profound peace, with only men enough to build and garrison Fort C. F. Smith and Fort Phil. Kearney, and when the Indians became troublesome, as they did even before these forts were fairly completed, his requisitions on the Government at Washington for more men and more ammunition were not attended to. He managed, however, to keep his command tolerably unbroken—although the Indians were constantly harassing the wood trains, and picking off stray men and horses—until the 21st of December, when one of the trains was attacked by a very large body of Indians, and a party was sent out with strict orders, often reiterated, to do nothing but defend the train, and in no case whatever to attempt a pursuit. These orders were disobeyed. The Indians made a feint of retreating, and succeeded in drawing the party a good way out of reach of the fort, whereupon it was at once surrounded and every man was killed—the two officers highest in command having, it is supposed, committed suicide. Exaggerated accounts of the affair got into the Eastern papers at the time. It is seldom enough that an Eastern paper talks sense about the affairs of the Plains. The massacre was said to have occurred within sight of the fort, and Colonel Carrington with two full companies was said to have been inside, too much terrified to venture out to the rescue or even to open the gates to admit the soldiers who fled to it for refuge. This narrative before us asserts—and with every appearance of telling the truth—that a second party was sent out to the assistance of the first, but arrived too late to do anything. The unfortunate men were already murdered, and the Indians, in a body of fifteen hundred—more or less—were dancing and yelling around their mutilated corpses, and beckoning to the rescuing party to come down and be served like their predecessors. The author, whom we take to be Colonel Carrington's wife, seems, although she expresses herself with a good deal of moderation, to have felt very deeply the injustice of the blame thrown upon that officer, and seems to show clearly that it was altogether undeserved.

The book contains, also, some incidentally given information about the contemplated route, and about the nature and resources of the Territory. The author is, however, very evidently unused to writing, and not only expresses herself in a roundabout and most confused way, but is as unliterary in all other respects as she is in mere expression; for this reason the facts of her book constitute its only claim to consideration.

Fine Arts.

SECOND WINTER EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

THE galleries are about half full, as the exhibition opens. The catalogue contains three hundred and fifty-three numbers. The walls are more poorly furnished than they have been at any time before when the rooms were open at all. Not because the pictures are too few in number; to give each picture the chance which the painter would ask for it, to surround each with its proper wall space, to hang each in the best manner for itself alone, would require even a smaller number of pictures or a larger place of exhibition. But this care which, when we become civilized, we shall take for our works of art, we shall take for better pictures than these. Is this exhibition open because the time was set beforehand and must be kept? Might we not have gone without it until the Water-Color Society should be ready? A notice on the back of the title-page of the catalogue announces that their exhibition will open in January. There is reason to hope great things of that; for the society's first show, which took place last winter, promised well for the future, and they are strong enough to turn out well every year. There is, moreover, a raison d'être for their collection which guarantees a certain number of good drawings, a larger number of attractive and interesting ones, and, for the whole collection, a self-illustrative and educational character; qualities which this dreary November exhibition wholly lacks, having been devoid for its part of any raison d'être.

It is not to be supposed that fall exhibitions are bad in themselves. It has been well suggested that these should be of the summer sketches of the artists, their out-of-door work and their studies of detail and of effect; while the spring exhibitions should remain nearly what they now are, a collection of finished studio-pictures. But what use in suggesting this or any such possible good, as long as nobody takes any interest in the thing? Who has sent to this exhibition? Few of those whose work is valuable have sent anything; of the few, all but two or three have sent old pictures, and not those old pictures which one cares the most to see again. Mr. Page's portraits, Mr. Colman's "New York Bay," Mr. J. F. Cole's pictures of pastoral subjects, Mr. Boughton's "Flower Girl," Mr. Lay's "Portrait," Mr. Weir's landscape, and in water-color Mr. Newman's peaches and Miss Wenzler's cranberries, are the only new works we notice of any peculiar interest. There is nothing new from Mr. Griswold; but his grey picture of two years ago, "The Last of the Ice," appears again, and has been repainted or retouched, we think, and for the better. Mr. Farrer, besides two slight sketches, one of which contains a suggestion of a not often painted cloud effect, sends a picture of the exhibition of 1859, "Gone, Gone." Mr. Brevoort sends an interesting last year's picture, one of his Farmington studies. Among the minor matters in the Corridor are interesting little drawings and proofs of new engravings, of which at another time, if at all.

Some slight attempt has been made to collect for exhibition the works of three painters who have died since the spring exhibition opened—Leutze, S. A. Mount, and Elliot. One end of the South Gallery is given up to Leutze; there are to be found six of his pictures of historical subjects, and four portraits, one of them of the painter himself, and seemingly by himself. At the time of his death this artist was fifty-two years old, of German family and German birth, and, although an American resident from his childhood, a German painter as well, and under the influence of the Düsseldorf School of Art. His best known works are large historical or romantic pictures, containing many figures; and of these several have been devoted to important events in American history, or to symbolical subjects connected with American life and nationality. His pictures have brought high prices; he has had, what comparatively few painters in this country have had, an opportunity of doing national work on a grand scale, and his reputation as a historical painter is pretty well established among the present generation of connoisseurs and picture buyers. Such success as ambition, energy, and constant diligence, joined to personal popularity, could give him, he has not failed to attain.

The influence of the Düsseldorf school upon American art is rapidly passing away. It was never very profound, and has been superseded by other influences, far more powerful and more likely to endure. The influence of that school over Leutze is deeply to be regretted; it failed to supply the needs of his nature, and it set up before him a false and artificial standard which he, not so richly gifted with the artistic sense as with mental qualities, followed but too closely. His defects as a painter are those which, with other teaching, he would have avoided or have amended. As a draughtsman of the figure, for instance, he is said, and with evident truth, to have sought to found his style rather upon the works of Kaulbach than upon any of the art produced in Düsseldorf itself. But Kaulbach's drawing, often facile, often swift and dextrous, often deceptive for a moment, is almost never right; that is to say, it never reaches great excellence. Difficult attitudes of the body he has never rendered with success, and he often tries, only to fail. Rapid motions of the body, swift movements of the limbs, muscles in violent action, constantly occur in his pictures, only to ruin the pictures that contain them. In the Nibelungen frescoes at Munich the javelin does not fly, the sword-stroke does not descend, nor the arm move to impel the weapon; all is fixed and frozen into the semblance of a group of wax figures. But these words, which we use only to convey our meaning to those who are not familiar with the originals, mean only that the drawing is bad. It is not only inferior to the best work of the great Italians; not only inferior to the best work of the great moderns, of Gainsborough and Le Sueur, Delaroche and Herbert, it is even bad within the critical knowledge of a beginner, and within the amending power of a pupil of the life class. Nor can it be said that the historical pictures of Kaulbach have any of the excellences of high art, of art on a great scale, and of ambitious subject.

The unfortunate influence of pretentious, mannered, and unreal art never left the work of Leutze. His pictures of the largest size and greatest pretension are the least admirable; the smaller ones are better, and of these the "Image Breaker" in this exhibition is perhaps the most natural, the most possible, and the best drawn. Both the figures in it are well conceived and well rendered up to a certain point, and, without great merit as a work of art, it is yet a well-told story.

The works which have been brought together of Elliot's pencil are thirty in number, and are grouped at the east end of the South Gallery, not in the West Room, as stated in the catalogue. These portraits show forcibly what was best in his practice—a certain freedom in the rendering of modern costume, removed at once from affected grace and from unsubdued stiffness and formality. In this respect he was almost unrivalled; nor is it a little thing to have done, to so far subdue the modern dress to the purposes of presentable painting. Of his power of portraiture, of seizing the likeness, it is, of course, excessively difficult to judge. Some painters have it largely, who have little other artistic power; but in others it is united with the highest excellence in other departments of art; nor is there any other means offered us of judging in any case than the slow taking of the census of portraits made. What Elliot most lacked as a painter was skill in painting; his color was not badly intended, but it was not well laid nor skilfully managed. In this respect, however, we compare him with the better workmen among his contemporaries—there are many of them worse painters than he was.

In the West Room are grouped a few pictures by Shepherd Alonzo Mount, who also died during the year. Since the exhibition was arranged on the 19th of November, Wm. S. Mount died as well; a few pictures in this exhibition represent his work, but they are not arranged together. It is probable that, in some of the changes which are pretty sure to take place in the arrangement of the pictures this winter, the works of each of these painters will be increased in number and hung together. We defer notice of them for the present.

The Week.

ON Monday the Fortieth Congress entered upon its third session, with 48 Senators in their places and 164 Representatives, all the States being represented except Virginia, Mississippi, Texas, and Arkansas. In the Senate Mr. Sumner brought in a bill which has for its object the bestowal, by act of Congress, of the right of suffrage upon all male citizens of the United States who are more than twenty-one years old. "It is plain," Mr. Sumner says, "that inequality of rights is inconsistent with a republican form of government;" but Congress is empowered and enjoined to see that the States have governments republican in form; therefore Congress must give the right to vote to everybody old enough and of the right sex. Where he got his definition of "republican" Mr. Sumner did not inform the Senate, which ordered the bill laid on the table and printed. Senators Cragin and Pomeroy want to do the same thing, but propose to do it by amendment to the Constitution, as undoubtedly it will have to be done, if done at all. Mr. Sumner also offered a bill which looks toward the resumption of specie payments at once, that is to say, on the 4th of next July! Senator Yates and Senator Frelinghuysen each had a bill to regulate proceedings in the naturalization of aliens. How Mr. Yates's scheme is better than the method now in vogue nobody can see; Mr. Frelinghuysen's looks far more promising, as it puts the business into the hands of the United States judges; that we are going to have some kind of a general enactment on the subject seems to be perfectly certain.

The only other business of importance done by the Senate was its disposal of Mr. Hill's case. He claims to be a Senator from Georgia, and his credentials were presented on Monday by Mr. Sherman. Senator Drake objected to their reception; Mr. Hill, he said, had been elected by a Legislature which afterwards expelled all the colored members; what he wished to know was, whether Congressional authority over a lately rebellious State is at an end as soon as the State is reconstructed? Without discussing this question—which goes pretty deep—Mr. Sherman argued that inasmuch as Mr. Hill was elected by the Legislature before there had been any expulsions, he ought to be admitted. Mr. Thayer took the sensible ground that both before and after the expulsion of the colored members the Legislature contained a certain number of men who are by act of Congress disabled from acting as legislators, or even voting. In the course of the proceedings a letter was read to the Senate, written by Governor Bullock and addressed to Congress. It will be remembered that there has been something like a quarrel between the Governor and General Meade ever since the latter declined to purge the Georgia Assembly, and this letter gives some indications of the trouble between them. Both seemed to have been, from different points of view, perfectly right in the matter; though legality appears to have troubled the general more than was well.

In the House it was very noticeable that when Mr. Schenck offered his resolution respecting the naturalization of foreigners, not one Republican voted against referring it to the proper committee, while every Democrat voted with Fernando Wood in favor of laying it on the table. Mr. Broomall had a similar measure in hand, which also was referred. Mr. Archer introduced a resolution to give Mr. Johnson $50,000 in payment of his expenses at the impeachment trial—a proposition that will undoubtedly make Mr. Wendell Phillips nearly speechless. Mr. Broomall, Mr. Stokes, and Mr. Kelley, all had ready an amendment to the Constitution providing for universal suffrage without distinction of color in all the States of the Union. Mr. Menard, by the way, the first colored man to claim a seat in Congress, was present on Monday, but his chance of getting his seat appears to be slight. To admit him is to admit that the late election in Louisiana was a valid one, and that the four Democrats then elected were really the choice of the people, and this not many people feel inclined to do. Mr. Dawes offered a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to report whether or not more legislation is needed in order that persons in the pay of Government may receive ten hours' wages for eight hours' work. Mr. Morrell expressed very well the popular feeling in regard to Mr. Reverdy Johnson by offering a resolution censuring that minister and requesting his instant recall. Mr. Banks got it referred to his Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Freedmen's Bureau is to be continued for another year in Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas. Mr. Schofield wants Georgia put once more into the hands of the Reconstruction Committee, and is not unlikely to see his wishes measurably gratified.

Secretary McCulloch's report—the most important of all the annual reports—has appeared. He argues strongly against an irredeemable paper currency, making the usual points, and recommends that the greenbacks should cease to be legal tenders after January 1, 1870, on any subsequently made contracts, and after January 1, 1871, for any purpose whatever; and that he be authorized to issue a new loan of $500,000,000, at not over five per cent. interest, to be employed in meeting in specie the various engagements of the Government. He refers to the approaching decision of the Supreme Court on the constitutionality of legal tenders, and quotes Webster in support of the suggestion that the court will probably pronounce them unconstitutional. He thinks the quantity of American securities held abroad stimulates the importation of luxuries, which he considers ruinously excessive, but fails to supply any good reason for believing that people who import luxuries, on the whole import more than they can afford to pay for. He recommends that the annual outlay of the Government be reduced to $300,000,000; that the tariff be made simply a revenue tariff; that Mr. Jenckes's Civil Service bill be passed as an essential part of all revenue reform; that Congress help the public credit, preparatory to a new loan, by explicitly declaring the five-twenty bonds payable in coin; that the taxes on sales be made uniform on all classes of dealers. He says the public debt between November 1, 1867, and November 1, 1868, was increased by $35,625,102, owing to Pacific Railroad advances, the Alaska purchase, payment of bounties, and accrued interest on compound interest notes. Had the money not gone in this way, the receipts would have exceeded the expenditures by $33,787,912. But the debt due on November 1, 1868, he says, is less than the debt due at the close of the war by $470,256,062. He is especially severe on the Butlerites for their attacks on the public credit, and intimates pretty strongly that in his opinion the fulfilment of the pecuniary obligations of the nation is "the main question."

The President, with unusual reticence, kept his message pretty much to himself until the meeting of Congress; and as we go to press nothing but a synopsis of it has appeared in the public prints. Doubtless it is like most Presidents' messages, of no special interest or importance. Everybody was aware that this Government has disapproved some part of Mr. Reverdy Johnson's Alabama arrangements; that there is, as yet, an absence of official details concerning the Lopez-Washburne affair; that the Government has failed, so far, in its negotiations for purchasing the Bay of Samana; that official facts show enormous frauds in the revenue service; that fears are entertained of a largely increased military expenditure on the Plains, etc. It is not very novel either to hear from Mr. Johnson that the South is in a deplorable condition—so many of her States being kept under military rule; so many inalienable Constitutional privileges being withheld from her citizens; so many alienable privileges being conferred upon an inferior race; so many of her inhabitants being disfranchised. It is not new either to learn that the President is in favor of a gradual contraction of the paper currency, and a return as speedily as may be to specie payments.

The farce known as the trial of Jefferson Davis has reached a new stage during the past week. To a proper understanding of the performance, it is as well to remember that it has been known from the beginning that his conviction in the district in which he must be tried—that is, the district in which his acts of treason were committed—was not possible, without packing a jury, or, in other words, without so conducting the trial that it would have no moral weight. But nobody seems to have had the courage to look this fact in the face, and either push the affair to a conclusion or drop it. Accordingly it has been used as "a little game" to fill up the vacant hours of the bench and bar, Horace Greeley and his brother bondsmen opening it by a magnanimous bailing of the prisoner, including a grand "reconciliation tableau," in which Mr. Greeley shook hands with the culprit, just as Reverdy Johnson shook hands with Roebuck and Laird. Then there came a variety of minor tricks, in the shape of "motions" by distinguished counsel, every one of which was supposed by the innocent public to be paving the way for the great crisis. During the past week we have had a motion, which certainly indicates the near approach of the end, to quash the indictment, on the ground that the fourteenth constitutional amendment, in prescribing the disfranchisement of all persons who, having held offices under the United States Government, shall have committed treason against it, does away with all other punishment or pursuit. Chief-Justice Chase held the point well taken; but Judge Underwood, who sat with him, dissented, so it goes up on appeal to the Supreme Court. That a difference of opinion on a point of law between the Chief-Justice and Judge Underwood should form the groundwork of the appeal, gives the finishing touch to the affair. Judge Underwood is a perfectly honest man, but he draws his law, like the original impeachers, in all political cases, from the recesses of a loyal and generous heart; and if he were to sit on Davis's trial a hint from a prayer-meeting would probably not come amiss or be disregarded. We think this is a fair deduction from his charge to the grand jury two years ago.

An agitation has been going on in this city during the greater part of last week—including public meetings, speeches, and resolutions—the conductors being ladies prominent in the woman's rights movement, to secure a pardon for a young English girl, named Hester Vaughn, lying under sentence of death in Philadelphia for infanticide. The Philadelphians kept very quiet, so that our orators had things all their own way. The case was worked up till it began to wear the appearance of the utmost barbarity—reflecting the greatest discredit, first on modern civilization; next on the male sex; next on Pennsylvania law; next on the governor of the State; and next on the Philadelphian public; finally, the girl's counsel was accused of pocketing her money and then professionally betraying and deserting her. The requisite amount of speaking having been done, and the bearing of the case on woman's rights having been fully pointed out, a deputation of ladies started for Harrisburg to see the governor, with a petition. It then came out that there was hardly a single fact connected with the trial which had not been misrepresented or distorted at the meetings; that the orators had kept themselves in such blissful ignorance that they did not know till they got to Harrisburg that thousands of persons in Pennsylvania had done in the matter what charity required of them, and that the governor had not the least intention of sending the girl to execution; that nearly all the picturesque parts of the New York narrative were pure fiction; and that by the testimony of the judges who tried the case, and of lawyers who witnessed the trial, the prisoner's counsel had defended her to the last with zeal, skill, and ability. Now, there is one thing which the ladies owe it to modern civilization, the male and female sexes, and the cause of charity and the cause of morality and of woman's rights, to do—and that is to call another meeting, with Mr. Greeley in the chair, and then and there pass resolutions, with appropriate speeches, apologizing to Hester Vaughn's counsel for the attack on his character, expressing sincere regret for it, and pledging themselves individually and collectively to be more careful in future.

---

We recommend this all the more earnestly because the loss of reformatory power caused by the growing tendencies of reformers to use reckless attacks on private character as one of their favorite weapons is enormous. The custom of imputing the greatest personal baseness to all persons who happen to differ from them in opinion, or who for any reason seem to stand in the way of "a cause," is rapidly depriving, if it has not already deprived, that class of persons who do most of the preaching against abuses of all weight or influence. Of the generally demoralizing effect on the community of the display of unscrupulousness by such persons we have often spoken. Its practical, palpable evils may be seen every day. For instance, when a great body of well-meaning people wildly accuse men like Fessenden and Trumbull of having sold themselves in their judicial capacity to the "Whiskey Ring," and accuse Chief-Justice Chase of having invited senators to dinner at his house for the purpose of inducing them to give a corrupt verdict, of course the really corrupt judges—of whom we have already some, and whose number is increasing—who do sell their judgments in private causes for cash down, can afford to laugh at the denunciations of reformers, and they do laugh. If, too, a number of women who occupy themselves incessantly with the work of reform in the press and on the platform wildly and recklessly accuse a lawyer like Hester Vaughn's counsel, who has done his work well, of the last degree of personal and professional iniquity, and, when the falsehood of the charge is exposed, take no more notice of it than if they had only made a slight error in a date or in the name of a place, of course that large band of legal scoundrels who cheat the friendless—who, for instance, make a trade of getting fraudulent divorces, of which women are almost invariably the victims—will bid defiance to the exposures of women's rights agitators and all other kinds of agitators. In fact, there is nothing more admirable in the moral order of the world than the inefficiency of falsehood, on the whole and in the long run. What is gained by it this year or in this place, is sure to be lost next year and in some other place. The liar, no matter what the cause he serves, holds only the ground he camps on. The great and permanent conquests for justice and humanity are made by truth only.

There appears to be a good deal of opposition in Michigan and elsewhere to the re-election of Senator Chandler, whose term expires next year. It is based on objections to his personal character. Of the nature of these objections some idea may be formed from the allusions to the "wine-cup" which accompany them, and which are not always either delicate or distant. Moreover, the admiration of him as a legislator seems to be neither general nor deep. He defends himself, however, and his friends defend him, on the broad Butlerite ground of "soundness on the main question," which his adversaries—and amongst them appears the Hartford Post, General Hawley's paper—declare to be no longer sufficient, its saving grace having been exhausted in General Butler's case. He has, however, one other entrenchment to retreat upon, viz., the "hatred of the Copperheads." Do "the Copperheads hate him for his course during the rebellion?" If they do, why ask any more questions? We venture to suggest for his consideration also the suspicious circumstance that this opposition to him springs up not many months after his noble defence in the Senate of our naturalized citizens now or lately immured in British dungeons, by the introduction of his great bill directing the President to lock up one British subject sojourning in the United States for every naturalized American restrained of his liberty in British dominions. Now, we do not say that British gold is at the bottom of the present opposition to him, but we do say that it is very odd that the opposition to him should appear so soon after the introduction of the measure above mentioned. Should he be defeated, one War Horse more will have disappeared from the stud which, three short years ago, made the Republican party the dread and envy of the world, and filled the land with neighings, snortings, and kickings for the rights of man.

General Butler, after a short period of what the French call recueillement, a word for which there is no precise equivalent in English, has reappeared in public, and made a short speech to some colored Zouaves who serenaded him in Washington, promising them a very bright future for their race, in which equal rights, equal burdens, and equal powers are to form the principal blessings. He sketched in glowing terms the industrial future of the South, and hinted that the material prosperity of the negroes would not begin till they had been put in possession of farms, which they had indeed paid for, but which other people had been compelled to sell them. The best way of getting at this result, however, because the way least likely to create bad blood, is to tax uncultivated land so heavily as to make it unprofitable to hold it; and then let negroes and white men take their chance of getting it in the market on equal terms. To force men to sell to negroes directly, or to any determinate class, would be a modified but very offensive form of confiscation. General Butler's statement, that the great subdivision of the soil in France was the only permanent result of the Revolution, has, as we pointed out when Wendell Phillips made it, no foundation. De Tocqueville disposed of this delusion ten years ago in his "Ancien Régime," a book which it would do no orator any harm to read. The subdivision of the soil in France came about before the Revolution in the ordinary way, by the sale of estates of impoverished nobles. The Revolution produced hardly any perceptible effect on the number of farms.

The authorities in South Carolina seem to have singular notions as to how to strengthen the credit of their State, if we may judge by the following passage of the governor's message:

"I recommend to the Legislature that some early action be taken to prevent the courts and officers of the Bank of the State from wasting and misapplying its assets to the payment of costs of courts, attorneys' fees, and the salaries of officers and agents. If the holders of the Fire Loan Bonds are determined to pursue the policy of disparaging the credit and resources of the State, when it must be apparent to them that no State of the Union is more solvent, or has a fairer prospect of promptly meeting all her liabilities, they should be compelled to carry on this litigation at their own expense. I have reason to believe that not less than sixty thousand dollars in gold has been squandered and made away with for salaries of officers and agents who are performing no necessary duties, fees of attorneys who are employed for the purpose of bringing the credit of the State into disrepute, and for other objects of equally questionable propriety. The holders of the Fire Loan Bonds should be placed on the same footing as other creditors of the State, and they should be held accountable for all damages the State has sustained, or may sustain, by their unwarrantable litigation."

One is surprised, after reading this fulmination, to learn from the statement of Mr. Hayne, the counsel of the party attacked, that the State is a debtor in default with its debt past due; that the Fire Loan Bondholders are creditors entitled to certain collaterals pledged by the State when the contract was made in 1838; that in 1865 the Legislature —the Bank being insolvent—confirmed the pledges of 1838, and appropriated the assets of the Bank of the State of South Carolina to the holders of the bonds, and, finally, that all the litigation that has ensued grew out of a suit instituted by the billholders of the Bank, brought in 1867, seeking to set aside the act of the Legislature in favor of the bondholders, and claiming for themselves these assets which the bondholders of the Bank simply defend, and that it has cost little over $30,000, instead of $60,000. In 1868 the Legislature passed an act disregarding the act of 1838, and repealing that of 1865, and requiring the governor to seize the whole assets of the Bank, then a deposit in equity, and to place the funds in the State Treasury. In the same act, satisfactory provision was made for the billholders who began the litigation, and none for the bondholders who are defendants.

It does seem rather hard, on these facts, that people who advanced their money thirty years ago to help rebuild the city of Charleston should be threatened with being made accountable for "all damages the State has sustained by their unwarrantable litigation." We do not pretend to go into the merits of the case, but suggest that these merits be left to the courts, and that common prudence would suggest that distant bondholders, waiting for their money, long past due, at a time too when the governor tells them that "no State in the Union is more solvent," should be made to feel that every facility is afforded them by the State to defend rights which they at least believe to be undoubted. South Carolina cannot afford, either as a matter of money or of character, to damage its opening career of prosperity by any other course. The fact is, too, that the holders of the bank-bills, for whose benefit this extraordinary interference with the action of the courts is talked of, have bought them up for about eight cents on the dollar, and, we fear, are adding another to the number of "rings" by which the country is now infested.

The bar is taking a more active part than usual in the agitation now raging in Paris. In the trials of the editors for their participation in the "affaire Baudin" the speeches of the counsel have been exceedingly bold, and have handled the origin of the dynasty in a way that horrified the court and delighted the audience. Many of the leaders, including Messrs. Crémieux, Marie, and Jules Favre, have given formal opinions maintaining the legality of the demonstration in honor of Baudin's memory. To deny it, they say, would be to sanction the doctrine that in France resistance to law is "sacred and holy," if it should happen to be successful. No "plebiscite" taken subsequently could make Baudin's armed resistance to the coup d'état other than lawful and honorable. There has been a report of a widespread conspiracy for the overthrow of the Government, spread, if not invented, by the Gaulois, a new paper in the confidence of the Government; but, owing to some misunderstanding, probably, on the part of the police, the story was no sooner set agoing than the publishers were threatened with a prosecution. It was, perhaps, at first thought desirable to have a conspiracy to justify the fuss made about Baudin, and afterwards it was thought undesirable to seem afraid. The Emperor's unquestionably declining health, as well as advancing years, increases the prevailing anxiety, and a telegram announcing his death found its way over the Atlantic on Saturday, but was speedily contradicted; but on the same day there was almost a panic in London, owing to reports of street-fighting in Paris.

Von Beust, the Imperial Chancellor of Austria, like Von Bismarck, the Chancellor of the North German Confederation, has been made a count. The Prussian statesman has founded an empire, the adviser of Francis Joseph has perhaps saved one. The Hapsburg has indeed every reason to be satisfied with the work achieved by Von Beust on the basis prepared by Deák. The machinery of the dualistic—Hungarian and non-Hungarian—empire works, on both sides of the Leitha, as smoothly as possible—in the year III. after chaos. The new army bill, which secures a total of eight hundred thousand men in time of war, has passed both the Vienna Reichsrath and the Diet of Pesth. The united delegations of the two assemblies have voted the budget for 1869. The difficulties between Hungary proper and Croatia have been adjusted; the Croatian representatives have occupied their seats in the Hungarian Assembly, and a mixed commission is soon to remove the last point in dispute, that concerning the city of Fiume, on the Adriatic, which is claimed by both parties. The work of liberal reform proceeds in both halves of the empire. Friendly relations have been maintained with the German States, entangling alliances avoided, and the machinations of Russia, both in Galicia and on the Lower Danube, checked by a firm attitude. The Cechic agitation proves powerless. In a word, the reconstruction of Austria might be called a perfect success, and Count Beust could look Count Bismarck boldly in the face, if he had what his rival has, a sound currency.

THE RETURN TO SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The present session of Congress is likely to become memorable for its attempts to legislate the country back to specie payments. The leading features of the principal plans about to be proposed have for some weeks past been fully and ably discussed by the public press throughout the country, and have at the same time elicited the usual number of crude, silly, and impracticable suggestions, which pert ignorance is on such occasions only too ready to pour forth, and editorial good-nature too ready to print. While the discussion has been useful in proving the earnest desire of the people to return to a sound currency, it has not, so far, accomplished much in pointing out the way.

What is the meaning of "specie payments?" Simple as the question may seem, yet, ask twenty different persons, and you will get twenty different answers. Specie payment means—the redemption in gold of a promise to pay gold, the redemption in specie of a promise to pay specie. There must first be a promise to pay specie before there can be a specie payment in any sense applicable to national finance. Specie payments prevail in those countries in which everybody's promise to pay specie on demand is habitually redeemed in specie, or at least can be redeemed in specie if demanded. Specie payments prevailed in the United States previous to 1857. The banks throughout the country had issued a great many "promises to pay specie on demand," and had always redeemed them promptly when required. Almost the entire currency of the country consisted of these bank-notes, or bank promises to pay specie on demand, and as they were everywhere promptly redeemed in specie, they were everywhere considered equal to specie, and "specie payments" prevailed throughout the country. But in 1857 a great financial disturbance occurred. The foreign trade of the country required an unusually large export of specie at the very time when the unsettled condition of the domestic trade was calling for a large employment of specie at home. This double demand for coin exhausted the supply in the banks; they had not coin enough to redeem all the promises to pay coin which were presented to them for redemption. They stopped redeeming their promises in specie; in other words, they, the banks, suspended specie payments. Specie payment means the redemption in specie of a promise to pay specie. Suspension of specie payments means the temporary failure to redeem in specie a promise to pay specie. In October, 1857, the banks suspended specie payments; all through the winter of 1857 and spring of 1858 they continued unable to redeem their promises, and specie payments continued suspended. The obligation of the banks to redeem their notes in specie was an absolute legal obligation, and their failure to comply with it was virtually an act of bankruptcy; but the public, which held in its hands the unredeemed promises of the banks, by tacit consent agreed to wait. In the summer of 1858, first the banks of New York city, and soon after those of Philadelphia, notified the holders of their promises that they were prepared to redeem in specie all their suspended promises to pay specie, and soon after specie payments were resumed throughout the United States. In other words, the banks which had temporarily suspended the redemption in specie of their promises to pay specie now resumed that redemption.

The financial history of England, during the Napoleonic wars, furnishes another and far more memorable example of the suspension of specie payments. The Bank of England had issued a great many promises to pay specie, and had always promptly redeemed them; but the export of coin to subsidize the Continental coalition against France had so much reduced the supply in the country that in 1797 the Bank became unable to redeem its promises any longer, and suspended specie payments. The suspension of the Bank of England was as much an act of bankruptcy as the suspension of the banks of New York; but as it was deemed that great injury would result to the whole country if the Bank were declared bankrupt, the suspension was legalized by an act of Parliament, the Bank was temporarily relieved from the legal obligation to redeem its notes in specie, and thus specie payments in England remained suspended at the pleasure of Parliament, and the bank-notes issued by the Bank of England remained unredeemed in the hands of the people. The Bank was under the obligation to redeem its notes in specie; Parliament had temporarily suspended, not removed, the obligation; and when the danger of great national injury was supposed to have passed, Parliament again enforced the obligation. In 1819, the Bank was notified that in 1823 it must be prepared to comply with its legal obligation to redeem in specie its outstanding promises to pay specie, and in 1823, or in reality some time previous, the Bank of England did, after twenty-five years of suspension, again resume specie payments.

These two notable instances of suspension and resumption appear to be in everybody's mind while discussing our present financial condition. They are daily quoted as examples pro and con., and especially does the mandatory act of Parliament, with its magnificent simplicity, exercise a fascination over many of our financial authorities that entirely prevents them from discerning the difference between the English suspension and our own. We have seen how our banks suspended specie payments in 1857 and resumed in 1858. In 1860 another great financial disturbance took place. The banks again became unable to redeem in specie their promises to pay specie. For some time their unredeemed promises continued in the hands of the holders, the public; specie payments continued suspended. But these unredeemed promises of the banks to pay specie did not continue long in the hands of the public. They were not, it is true, redeemed in specie, but they were redeemed. Everybody remembers how Congress passed the Legal Tender Act, which made greenbacks a legal tender for every form of debt, and which enabled the banks to gradually withdraw and cancel their notes whenever they came into their possession. The banks, like everybody else, took advantage of the Legal Tender Act, and redeemed their promises to pay specie with greenbacks; and so successful were they in getting possession of their notes, that there are now only a very limited amount of them in existence; and, for all practical purposes, it is safe to assert that all promises to pay specie issued in the United States previous to 1861 have been redeemed. Not only have the promises to pay specie been redeemed and destroyed, but the very banks which issued them first and redeemed them afterwards have disappeared, leaving no trace. Not only are there no promises to redeem, and no one to ask their redemption, but there is nobody to redeem them if there were any. The bank-note currency of the United States prior to 1861 was redeemable in specie. It has all been redeemed. There is no currency now in the United States which is redeemable in specie. No bank or other authorized institution has issued any promises to pay specie since 1861. Upon whom, then, is Congress to call to resume the suspended specie payments?

Without a clear understanding of the nature of our financial disease, it is evidently impossible to devise a remedy. If we once divest ourselves of the idea that ours is an ordinary case of suspension, we shall see the uselessness of applying the remedies that in a case of suspension would be suitable. If the country were flooded with bank-notes issued by responsible institutions, and these bank-notes were promises to pay specie, and their redemption were temporarily suspended, we might with perfect propriety follow the example of the English Parliament. Congress need only say to the defaulting or suspended banks: For reasons of urgent public necessity the obligation to redeem your promises in specie was temporarily suspended; the urgency has passed; you may have six or twelve months to put your house in order and prepare yourselves for resumption, but after that time the obligation to redeem your promises in specie will be again enforced. If ours were an ordinary case of suspension, the course would be simple. But our case is a totally different one. We have no unredeemed promises to pay specie in existence. No existing bank or other authorized institution has issued any promises to pay specie; no existing bank or other institution of any kind has failed to redeem its promises to pay specie. There is virtually no suspension of specie payments in the United States to-day.

The financial evil under which the country is now laboring, the legal-tender currency or greenbacks, is a far worse evil than suspension, and far more difficult to deal with. These greenbacks are nothing more nor less than a part of the national debt, precisely the same as the five-twenty and ten-forty bond . They were given out by the Treasury in payment of goods or services bought of the people, just as the seven-thirties and compound-interest notes (which were afterwards converted into bonds) were given out for the same purpose. They represent part of the sum borrowed of the people by the Government. For one part of the sum thus borrowed bonds were given in acknowledgment, stating when they would be paid and what interest they should bear until paid. For another part of the sum thus borrowed greenbacks were given in acknowledgment, not stating when they would be paid, positively declaring (by the law under which they were issued) that no one could demand their redemption in specie, and bearing no interest, but in compensation possessing the capacity of paying debts—in other words, being declared legal-tender currency. Of this form of United States debt, bearing no interest, payable at no time, redeemable in nothing, and receivable for all debts, there are about three hundred and ninety millions in existence, three hundred and sixty millions in notes of one dollar and more, and thirty millions in fractional currency. This irredeemable currency is universally acknowledged to be a curse, and it is the all but unanimous wish of the people of the United States that it should as speedily as possible be made redeemable in specie. The question, therefore, before the country and Congress is, How can that portion of the United States debt which is now an irredeemable legal-tender currency be made redeemable in specie? Many wiseacres believe that a simple declaration of Congress, "that, on or after July 4, 1869, or some other date, the Treasury will redeem all greenbacks in specie," would at once, or gradually, but certainly by the time fixed in advance, make all greenbacks virtually redeemable in specie, and restore to the country a healthy redeemable specie currency. Nobody who is in the habit of "thinking things out" can have fallen into this delusion. If the Treasury redeem greenbacks in specie, it must either cancel the greenbacks so redeemed or reissue them.

The income of the Treasury consists of coin and greenbacks. If its expenditures are just equal to its receipts, it will be obliged to pay out every dollar of coin or greenbacks received, in order to meet its expenditures. If it exchange any part of its coin receipts for greenbacks—in other words, if it use any part of its coin receipts to redeem greenbacks—it will still be obliged to pay out every dollar of coin or greenbacks to meet its expenditures. If it use any part of its coin receipts to redeem greenbacks, it must almost immediately reissue the greenbacks so redeemed, or it must fall short of funds to meet its expenses. It cannot redeem greenbacks without reissuing them, unless its receipts are larger than its expenses. If it redeem greenbacks without reissuing them—in other words, if it cancel them—it is paying off a portion of its debt. It cannot possibly pay off any portion of the debt except out of its surplus revenues. What the surplus revenues of the coming year may be, we do not know. The surplus revenues of the past year, we see from newspaper reports, are estimated by Mr. McCulloch at thirty-five millions. We know, however, that the total debt of the country, according to the official debt statements, was thirty-six millions larger on November 1, 1868, than on the same date of 1867, which shows an incontrovertible deficit of thirty-six millions. The receipts of the Government during the year were thirty-six millions less than its expenditures. It had to borrow that sum to meet its expenses. Let us hope that next year may show a very different result. But for aught we can tell there may be a deficit next year, as large as, or larger than, this year's. Now, with a last year's deficit of thirty-six millions and a next year's probable deficit, what surplus of revenue are we likely to have to be applied to the redemption and cancellation of greenbacks? It is evident that any greenbacks that may be redeemed next year will have to be immediately reissued, unless we have some other means of redemption besides surplus revenue.

Those who advocate the plan of immediate resumption by the mere mandate of Congress, tell us that it is not necessary to wait for surplus revenue in order to redeem greenbacks; we have, they say, a large cash balance on hand which is totally useless, and which could with propriety be used for the purpose. This objection readily suggests the enquiry, Why is not this large cash balance applied wholly, as it was in part, to meeting the last year's deficit? Why did we borrow fresh sums at interest, sell more bonds, if we had a large cash balance on hand to be applied to the purpose? The fact is—and this statement will perhaps surprise some of our over-sanguine financiers—that the much-talked-of large cash balance is a myth. No such thing exists. The debt statement of November 1, 1868, shows a nominal cash balance of one hundred and fourteen millions. On that day the Treasury owed for coin interest actually due about twenty-seven millions, for over-due debt not presented for payment nearly ten millions, for coin certificates nearly twenty millions more, and for three-per-cent. loan certificates, virtually payable on demand, fifty-eight additional millions,—in all no less than one hundred and fifteen millions of actually due debt or debt liable to be called for at a moment's notice. This cash balance, that so many eager legislators wish to see employed in redeeming greenbacks, is actually less in amount than what the Treasury may almost any moment be called upon to pay out in cash. It must be evident to everybody not utterly wanting in prudence that it would be totally impossible to employ any portion of this so-called "cash balance" in redeeming greenbacks, unless with the distinct understanding that they could and would be immediately reissued.

We have seen that it is impossible to redeem and cancel greenbacks except out of surplus revenue. We know that last year we not only had no surplus revenue, but an actual deficit of thirty-six millions. We know that, so far as this fiscal year has progressed, there is nothing to warrant the hope of a different result at its close. We may, therefore, safely abandon the anticipation of being able to redeem many greenbacks and cancel them out of surplus revenue. The advocates of immediate resumption claim that the cash balance in the Treasury can be employed in redemption. We have shown that there is really no such cash balance, and that of the nominal cash balance no portion could be safely employed in redeeming greenbacks for the purpose of cancelling them. If, therefore, the Treasury redeem any greenbacks at all, it can only do so if it does not cancel but immediately reissues them. How many greenbacks can the Treasury redeem, supposing it does not cancel any? On the 1st of November last, the Treasury had on hand one hundred and three millions in coin. Of these nearly eighteen millions belonged to depositors, about twenty-seven millions were that day due for interest on bonds, and about twenty-five millions were set aside for accrued interest on the debt, which must be paid out of the coin then on hand; in all, nearly seventy-two millions which could not be touched for any purpose whatsoever without impairing the Secretary's ability to redeem the most urgent and most sacred of all the Government obligations—the coin interest on the public debt. This would leave about thirty-one millions of coin in the Treasury to be applied to purposes of redemption, and there is no reason for believing that this balance would at any time within the coming year be materially larger. The largest amount with which the redemption experiment could, therefore, be tried would not exceed thirty-one millions. Does any thinking person seriously believe that the mere declaration of Congress, that after a given date the Treasury would commence redeeming greenbacks, would inspire such confidence as to prevent people from presenting their greenbacks for redemption, especially when it is known that of three hundred and ninety millions of greenbacks outstanding not more than thirty millions could possibly be redeemed, and that even these thirty millions would have to be immediately reissued to meet the current expenses of the Government? It is contrary to all experience of human nature to suppose so.

It is plausibly argued that no one has the greenbacks to present for redemption. But what has been the experience of the past? In one week in May, 1866, foreign houses bought of the Treasury twenty-five millions of gold, and paid for them in greenbacks, although the Treasury demanded and received a premium of thirty per cent. on the gold sold; whereas it is now proposed to sell or exchange the gold at par. Would not the same foreign houses be ready to do the same thing over again? It is replied, that then there was a large demand for coin for export consequent upon a decline in bonds abroad during a sudden war, whereas now any attempt to return to specie payments would rapidly advance the value of our bonds abroad, and prevent their importation and the consequent export of coin. The argument is totally fallacious. Experience shows that the market price of our bonds abroad only very slowly follows the decline in gold here, and that gold has never fallen very rapidly here without causing considerable amounts of bonds to be returned. There is no good reason for supposing that any sudden decline in the gold premium now, consequent upon any Congressional attempt to return suddenly to specie payments, would have any other result than to compel the foreign houses to come into the market as buyers, and drain the country of a larger amount of gold than the Treasury could employ for purposes of redemption.

Again, it is said that the national banks, which are supposed to be the largest holders of greenbacks, could be by some legislative proviso restrained from presenting them. But such legislation would be unjust and injurious, as well as useless, for of the three hundred and ninety millions of greenbacks in circulation the banks of the whole country, according to their last reports, held only ninety-two millions, leaving three hundred millions in the hands and pockets of the people. That the people are able and willing to take and hold the gold, if there is any incentive to do so, is well illustrated by the fact that in 1861 nearly seventy millions of gold are proved to have been placed in hoards by the people of this country, in addition to the sums already in circulation at the time of Lincoln's election. When it is known that there are three hundred and ninety millions to be redeemed, and only thirty-one millions to redeem them with, and that after the first redemption there cannot possibly be any further redemptions for a long time to come, then everybody will want a share of the thirty-one millions, one hundred millions at least will be presented for redemption, suspension will ensue before redemption has fairly begun, and permanent resumption will be further off than ever.

The return to specie payments is not to be exhaustively treated in a newspaper article, but enough has, we think, been said to show that, in the present condition of the Treasury, any attempt to return to specie payments in the manner proposed can only result in irremediable confusion and ultimate disaster.

ENGLISH DEMOCRACY AT THE POLLS.

The additional news as to the result of the elections in England brings to light some features in the democratic movement there which have taken both its friends and its enemies by surprise. The new voters have acted in a way that has disappointed everybody. They have shown at the polls no dissatisfaction whatever with the class of men who now do the work of legislation. The new House of Commons will be composed of almost exactly the same kind of men as the last one—that is, of peers and relatives of peers, great landed proprietors, wealthy merchants and lawyers, with a very small sprinkling (so small as hardly to be worth notice) of literary men and professors. The election has, on the whole, been disastrous to the leading out-of-door agitators in the Reform movement. Mr. Beales, its head and front, has been defeated. Mr. Bradlaugh, another of its great lights, has also been defeated, though his misfortunes are doubtless in great part due to his being a ranting, roaring atheist. In fact, not one of the men who have made themselves prominent in it have found their services of the slightest assistance in procuring them elections as legislators. There appears, in fact, little reason to doubt that the strikingly conservative temper of Englishmen of all grades has led the working-men—without, probably, ever having given any thought to the matter—to doubt the capacity for the practical work of government of some whom they listen to with great satisfaction as orators at public meetings. At the same time, a good deal of allowance must be made for the hearty hostility felt towards the Bealeses and Bradlaughs by men of the upper and middle classes.

A still more singular result of the election is, however, the defeat of all "working-men candidates;" that is, of candidates taken from the workshops and put forward because it was supposed they would be better fitted to represent the opinions and feelings of their own class than men of a higher social position. There are already men in the House of Commons, such as Mr. Tom Hughes and Professor Fawcett, who really do consider themselves, in an especial manner, working-class representatives, and do conscientiously endeavor to understand working-class interests and give expression to working-class feelings. But then a great many Liberals have felt that these gentlemen were, after all, very ill-fitted for their position. Both the House of Commons and the country get, it has been said, a very imperfect idea from them of the kind of person the working-man really is, of his wants, aspirations, or prejudices. They are both, as well as the Spectator—the paper which comes nearest to bearing the character of their organ—given to taking sentimental views of things; and the working-man they represent in Parliament is rather a working-man of the mind than the working-man of the foundries and factories and trades unions. For some years back the working-man has, through that process of magnification which is witnessed in all agitations undertaken on behalf of an oppressed class, been made out by his champions to be as much better than he really is as his enemies used to make him out worse, until in the minds of many of the former he seems to offer material for an aristocracy of virtue and wisdom. Something similar was witnessed in Paris in 1848, when the National Assembly was entertained every day with the spectacle of members, who a year or two previously would have blushed to own a working-class origin, laboriously proclaiming that they had themselves been at one time toilers with their hands. The debates were disturbed by contentions between members as to the reality of their pretensions to the character of "working-men;" and one manufacturer, M. Grandin, declared that his reason for claiming the title was, that it seemed to him "to constitute a superiority fully as aristocratic as that constituted in other days by the title of count or marquis." Into these follies, of course, the English Liberals do not run, but then there is not much faith or credit given in or out of Parliament to what Messrs. Fawcett, Hughes, and the like say of working-men's wants—although they, of course, speak with weight and authority as to what working-men ought to want and ought to have.

There has, therefore, been a strong effort made, and principally by those on whom the burden of pleading the working-man's cause in Parliament has hitherto fallen, to secure the election of a few real working-men; and some very good specimens of the class—men whose character and education would have reflected no discredit on it in any assembly; notably Mr. Odger—were selected for the trial of the experiment, and it was believed or hoped that the working-men would subscribe money to pay their expenses while sitting and would support them at the polls. They have, however, been all defeated; no money has been subscribed for their expenses, and no evidence afforded that working-men, as a body, want to be represented in Parliament by members of their own class. The cause of this is doubtless somewhat the same as the cause of the defeat of the Reform agitators—and that is, the belief by which all classes of English society are more or less permeated, that government is an art needing high education and special training. The aristocracy have fought vigorously against this idea, maintaining that government was the hereditary function of a caste, needing high birth, fortune, and leisure, but this is the very point on which they have been beaten. The idea which has triumphed in the Reform movement is that every place in the Government should be open to the competition of every man, but that none but the fittest man should get it. The abolition of test-oaths, of the property qualifications for seats in the House of Commons, the agitation against the purchase system in the army, the institution of competitive examination for appointments in the civil service, are all so many recognitions of it by the popular party. That working-men are influenced by it, there can be little doubt; and all the more strongly because their complete separation hitherto from the work of government, and, in fact, until the foundation of the trades unions, from all work of organization, and from everything included under the term "business," and their familiarity from time immemorial with the monopoly of power by members of the upper classes—that is, of the owners of knowledge and wealth—has impressed them more strongly than the middle classes have ever been impressed with the idea that politics is a "mystery," or at all events a craft requiring close training for its exercise. The sentiment of social equality, as it is found in France, too, has not taken such root in England as to lead them to wish to send a working-man to the House of Commons merely as an assertion of the doctrine that working-men are as good as other people. This may come eventually, but the English are evidently a long way off from it. At present the new voters seem to regard Parliament as a locomotive, with the driving of which they are content not to meddle so long as they can influence in some degree the direction of the train and the rate of speed and the nature of the freight.

One of the most significant features in the struggle has been Mr. Bright's total abstinence from all share in the purely working-man phase of it. He has played a giant's part in getting him the franchise, but he has held aloof from all attempts to get him into the House of Commons or to make him out fit to legislate; and consequently has fallen somewhat under a cloud—a very faint one, it is true—with the present generation of radical leaders, and is forced to hear faint murmurs of doubt and disapproval, in which his position as a member of the employer class is referred to as having something to do with his lukewarmness. But in reality his present position in this matter is the logical result of his career. Neither he nor Cobden was ever a sentimental radical, or ever relied much on the sentimental side of any grievance, or ever gave any countenance to the idea that the work of government was an easy or simple work, for which anybody who chooses can fit himself in a month. The great struggle of their lives was in fact carried on in opposition to it, and their great victory was the result, in the main, of their perfect mastery of a most difficult problem in political economy and their matchless power of statement. It was with these weapons that they vanquished the landholders. Mr. Bright's success is in reality the triumph of thoroughness, of brain, of mental discipline, of eloquence above all things masculine, logical, thoughtful—if indeed there can be eloquence which is not thoughtful.

Mr. Mill's loss of his seat seems to be viewed with mixed feelings by the Liberal press. Just as Beales's defeat represents the disfavor with which the agitator element is viewed by the new constituencies, and Odger's defeat the disfavor with which the working-men candidates are received, Mr. Mill's seems to indicate not perhaps the decline of the "philosophers" in popular estimation, but the popular distrust of them as "practical men." It is generally agreed, even by those who most value Mr. Mill's influence, that he has for one reason or another not been successful as a legislator. He has proved "too fine a machine" for the rough work of the House of Commons; and the Economist speaks with a good deal of feeling of the sadness of the spectacle which was to be witnessed all last session, of one of the most valuable thinkers and writers England has ever produced, sitting bolt upright in his place in the House, hour after hour, as regularly and assiduously as the Speaker, listening to one dull bore and blunderer after another drawling out his fallacies and platitudes; and it asks with great force what compensation does his influence on legislation render for the enforced idleness of that splendid brain during the few years which, in the ordinary course of things, are all that are left for its working. As a debater, he has been singularly subtle and suggestive, but not powerful, and has been on the whole too acute for the House. What has injured him out of doors has been his views on population, which are, in point of fact, those which nine out of ten men hold with regard to every other man's duty, but which, for obvious reasons, nobody likes to have preached to himself, and which, owing to the different shape under which the problem presented itself in ancient times, are apparently hostile to Bible teachings and to the moral traditions of the race; the suspicion about his religious belief, which his resolute refusal to produce it for the inspection of politicians, and his support of persons like Bradlaugh, who make no secret of their atheism, helped to strengthen; and though last, not least, his injudicious attempts to assist constituencies in choosing members, not by speeches, but by letters written from a distance. Where he has been most useful is undoubtedly in the example of moral earnestness which he has offered both to the rising generation of politicians and to the new constituencies. No assembly in which he sat, and no party with which he acted, could help being the purer for his presence. No intriguer or charlatan could sit beside him and not feel uncomfortable. His misfortune has been that he has appeared on the political stage at that transition period in political history in which nations are endeavoring to adapt the system of government by mass-meeting — for Parliament and Congress are nothing else—which has been handed down to us from the Middle Ages, and which managed the business of a scanty population of farmers and soldiers well enough, to the wants of the highly organized, highly complicated, commercial societies of modern times. At such a time the philosopher is wanted almost as much in the forum as in the closet, and yet he can hardly hope to be completely successful in either.

WOMEN AS POLITICIANS.

Whatever may be the result of the enquiry now going on as to the professions for which women are best fitted, there can be little doubt that greater and greater numbers of them will hereafter take part in political discussion, and that once they get the franchise, they will introduce into the political arena a greater or less number of questions as peculiarly "women's questions," and demand for them special legislation or special treatment of some kind at the hands of the State or General Government. We have little doubt, too, they will exercise a much greater influence on male opinion than most of us imagine. No matter how freely the professions may be open to women, a very large proportion of them will not follow any profession, but will live at home at leisure, as they do now; and if they have votes, will give more attention to politics than they have ever done—more, probably, than the great body of their male relatives; and will form opinions which, whether good or bad, they will preach with considerable vigor, and we dare say with considerable effect.

It is, therefore, not a minute too soon for women who want to influence legislation, either through the press or the platform, to begin their political education; that is, to make themselves moderately acquainted with the influences which regulate the conduct of men in society, and with the extent to which they can be suspended or directed by legislation, as far as has been ascertained by human experience; in other words, to make themselves moderately acquainted with history, political economy, and jurisprudence. Unless they do this, we fear, so far from exercising the "elevating and purifying influence" on politics of which we hear so much, they will simply increase the force of the very worst element in politics—that is, the element of blind and ignorant zeal, which we, for our part, consider just now only less dangerous to good government than simple rascality. About the character of corruption or treason there is no room for doubt, and there is no difference of opinion. You have only to reveal them clearly to rouse popular opinion against them. But we make bold to say that if anybody will go through history carefully he will find that what humanity has suffered from wicked and unscrupulous conquerors or tyrants or knaves is a mere trifle compared to what it has suffered from well-meaning ignoramuses and zealots.

If, therefore, female politicians as soon as they appear in the political arena are simply going to reinforce the ranks of those who make a mockery of reason and experience, disdain to argue, and vote and make speeches by the aid of an inner light of their own, of which the rest of the world knows nothing, and to treat the nature of man, as seen and known in the world, as if it did not form the leading element in all the great social problems, female politicians, instead of proving a blessing to the country, will prove a curse. It will not do to tell us in reply to these counsels that the mass of male voters do not study the science of politics any more than women. All men, or nearly all men in this country above the ignorant laborer, have taken an interest in politics and been made familiar with political ideas and political processes from their very boyhood. They are, at least indirectly, trained to politics by the nature of their studies at school and college, and by the nature of their business in active life. There is no man who does not find his calling more or less affected by legislation, and who does not, therefore, give more or less attention to political measures. Clergymen, lawyers, doctors, merchants, farmers, mechanics —all become politicians, in a greater or less degree, from necessity. Moreover, it is one of the familiar facts of domestic life that boys, from the time they begin to read and observe, turn their attention to political affairs, to wars, to laws, to revolutions, to the fortunes of states and of rulers, just as regularly, and with as little direction from without, as girls to dress and dolls and visiting and cooking and other incidents of household economy. Whether this difference be natural or conventional merely, we shall not here discuss. It is enough for the purpose of our argument that it exists, and that nearly all women of the present or next generation will, on entering on a political career, have to acquire by hard work even that amount of fitness for the discussion of political questions which most men acquire without any special effort at all, by merely going on their way, following their natural bent, and attending to their business. Of course there are and will be women who will be able to contribute as much that is valuable to political discussion as any or all but a very few men, but then the mass of female politicians will not, without special preparation, be able to contribute anything at all that will not positively do mischief.

Female politicians, however, thus far, with three or four exceptions—we would willingly make the number larger, if we could—have not given, on the platform or in the press, much, if any, indication of either thought, study, or experience. They show, indeed, an ardent interest in the growth of human happiness and virtue, but about the means of promoting them through legislation they seem to be in a state of simplicity not far removed from that of very small children about their father's capacity for procuring money. We would refer anybody who thinks these remarks too severe to the history of the agitation about Hester Vaughn, the woman recently sentenced to death for infanticide in Philadelphia. The woman found her husband had committed bigamy in marrying her, and refused to prosecute him after he had deserted her. Another scoundrel then committed rape upon her, and she refused to prosecute him or even tell his name, lest it should hurt the feelings of his wife; and she then murdered, or appears to have murdered, her newly-born child, and has been convicted for it. Meetings of women have accordingly been held in New York, in which the laws under which the woman has been condemned have been made the subject of wholesale reprobation by female orators, and the conviction denounced with as much fury as if the woman's story of bigamy, and the rape which the victim refuses to prove, made it in some mysterious way the duty of the Governor to treat the infanticide as really a blameless act and the woman as simply an object of commiseration, and as if, moreover, it was his duty to accept the findings of the meeting in this ebullient state of mind as a guide for his official conduct. No proof of anything, be it remembered, has been offered or proposed. The sole object of the meetings held seems to have been to embody fine moral sentiments in a petition, and to give the petition the force of a political demand. It was laid down, too, amongst other things, that there was something peculiarly monstrous in awarding a woman under such circumstances the treatment that would be accorded to a man, thus surrendering the doctrine of the equality of the sexes on which the woman suffrage movement is based, and accepting the doctrine on which its opponents rely most firmly, that the very peculiarities of woman's moral and physical constitution, which so often in life place her at man's mercy, make it improper to throw open the professions and the ballot-box to her. Moreover, a demand was made by some speakers that Hester Vaughn should be tried by a female jury—that is, by a jury selected from the class of the community least accustomed to weigh evidence, most strongly moved by its passions and prejudices, and in a case appealing with peculiar force to these passions and prejudices. We do not say that cases of this kind should never be tried by female juries, but we do say that we hope the experiment will not be tried till women have acquired experience in the art of drawing inferences and greater control over their emotions than the great body of the sex now display. Moreover, they accused the convict's counsel, without a particle of proof, of having betrayed and deserted her, and, to cap the climax, sent off a deputation to Philadelphia in such complete ignorance of the facts of the case that, when it got there, it found that everything they wanted to have done had been done already on the motion of benevolent people in that city, who had gone to work in a silent, Christian, and efficient manner, without a hall, gaslights, or speeches or "committee on resolutions." The New Yorkers now owe the Philadelphia lawyer a public apology, which we trust they will make, and make handsomely; we hope they will not imitate too many of the reformers by pretending that they never heard of his vindication, or by treating his denial of his guilt as simply a fresh proof of his depravity.

The sum and substance of the whole matter is this, and it is as worthy the attention of male as of female humanitarians, that the experiment they seem disposed to try of the direct application of the moral law—as evolved at public meetings—through legislation to the regulation of society, without regard to the disturbing elements introduced into all political and social problems by human nature, by habit, tradition, prejudices, weaknesses, vices, and ignorance—in other words, without regard to the lessons of history and the facts of human life—is sure to fail. It has been tried in various ages and amongst various races, and has always ended in confusion and disaster. It is but another form of the theocratic government over which everybody now laughs or mourns. What Providence clearly intended the politician for is, to take men and women as they are—their vices along with their virtues, the things in which they differ as well as the things in which they are alike—and having made himself thoroughly acquainted with the history and results of legislative experiments in other ages and places, do what he can, not to re-cast their character, but to place their character under favorable influences while leaving free play for their individual tastes and energies. For instance, when he comes to legislate on the relations of the sexes, he must not fix the position of woman as if she were simply a weak man, and as if he had never heard of such offences as seduction or rape or bigamy; and then when such offences are committed begin to rave against those who commit them as if they were unheard-of monsters, for the possibility of whose existence, like the parricides at Rome, the lawgiver was not to be expected to provide.

THE PRESS AND THE PUBLIC.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your article on the "Provincialism of Southerners," and your paragraph on M. de Cassagnac's billingsgate in your last number, you seem to me to take ground, with regard to the press in this country, which can hardly be sustained. Of course I condemn assassination, but the state of public opinion at the South with regard to the Pollard murder does not, to my mind, warrant the conclusions you draw from it as to the condition of Southern morality or education. Pollard's paper, as he conducted it, was an intolerable nuisance—a real evil to which no civilized community could be expected to submit, and for the removal of which no remedy was provided either by law or society. The man himself, who went constantly armed, was doubtless a practised shot; so that if he blackened the character of your wife or daughter, and made your home wretched, and you attacked him on equal terms, in accordance with what is called "the code," the probability is he would have killed you in addition to libelling you. If, on the other hand, you prosecuted him, what with new trials and appeals and disagreements of juries, the result would have been that your name would have been kept before the public for two or three years besmirched with the Pollard filth, the fellow himself enjoying the notoriety the affair had brought him and his paper, and chuckling over your misery and mortification, and you would at last have retired from the contest worsted and out of pocket. If, therefore, it can ever be allowable to take the life of a fellow-creature, I hold that in such a case as this it is allowable; and if allowable at all, it is ridiculous to ask the injured man to risk his own life in doing it. The crowd in Richmond who cheered Grant felt all this.

I am not so sure either that the Northern press is above the Cassagnac level. There is no doubt that the editorial columns of the Northern newspapers have greatly improved within twenty years. The editors themselves have made great advances, socially and every other way. From being "paragraphists" and collectors of "items," attached to job-printing offices, they have risen into the rank of great merchants and great public instructors. They take their stand in the money market beside the most successful brokers, and they have fairly ousted the clergymen and lawyers as leaders in politics. Therefore, having a social position to uphold, the chiefs, with one or two exceptions, rarely allow dirty gossip and scurrility to appear in their editorial articles. But they manage, nevertheless, to pander to the tastes of those who like such things just as effectually as ever, by their system of "correspondence." They have in their pay a parcel of scamps in various cities, signing themselves "Rhadamanthus," or

"Cerberus," or "Bayard," or "Quintus Curtius," or some such name, who compose letters in which they heap abuse on decent men, throw out odious insinuations against them, tell disgraceful stories of them with the utmost abandon, and these the editor prints in any quantity. If one of these creatures makes you his victim, and you call at the editorial rooms to remonstrate, the editor receives your complaint as if he had never heard of "Rhadamanthus" before, or, if he had heard of him, as if he were a person for whose performances he was no more responsible than for those of Leotard or the Hanlon Brothers. When you point out the libel, he expresses regret and sympathy, but with much the same air as if what had happened you was a wetting from the rain, or a sun-stroke, or some other visitation of Providence which, as a fellow-man, he was bound to deplore, but for which you could hardly be so ridiculous as to hold him accountable, and he probably offers to print "a reply from your pen"—that is, to make the attack on you more public than ever, widen and deepen the raw on your moral hide, and delight "Rhadamanthus" by showing him that he made a decent man wince. You may make it clear as the sun at noon that the correspondent is an unscrupulous scoundrel whose statements cannot be depended on, and that as a man nobody respects him or heeds him, and you may imagine that as soon as the editor hears this he will dismiss him. Bless your innocent heart! he will probably raise the beast's pay the minute your back is turned, on finding how "spicy" he is; and he will meet you that very evening, serene and smiling and respectable, although he has actually been paying "Rhadamanthus" for blackguarding you and lying about you, has borne the expense of printing his slanders, and has made money by selling them.

You have alluded to this matter once or twice in your paper, but it has not been properly ventilated. The increased purity of the editorial columns of the Northern press is a mere cleaning of the outside of the platter as long as the theory prevails that the editor is not responsible morally for what appears in the department of correspondence. That such a theory should prevail may seem monstrous, but it does, nevertheless, and there are only a few of the great daily papers in the country which are not conducted on it.

Let me add that I do not look on the public indifference to these libels, or perhaps I should rather say the enjoyment of them by all who are not affected by them, with the complacency with which you have once or twice professed to regard it. I think that at the bottom of all such callousness and such sport there is a spice of the devilish spirit which once made the combats of men and beasts in the amphitheatre delightful, and I think, too, that morality cannot be in a very sound condition in any community in which few care anything either about their own reputations or other people's.

Yours respectfully, TERTULLIAN.

BALTIMORE, MD., December 3, 1868.

[The practical question is, after all, whether murder is a good and efficient remedy for libel. We hold it is not; and we have no doubt that a public which enjoys seeing a man like Pollard assassinated for scurrilous attacks on private character is just the kind of public which enjoys reading the attacks. It likes the bloody retribution in great part because it heightens the excitement of the whole affair. The murder of Pollard simply increases the number of Pollards, inasmuch as it helps to perpetuate the low civilization of which men like Pollard are the natural product. A community, therefore, which does not like such people can only get rid of them as individuals get rid of vermin, by self-purification. There is, after all, no remedy for such abuses of the press as "Tertullian" complains of but the improvement of the popular taste, and that has to be wrought by a thousand different agencies. Suits for libel are, except in one or two cases, next to useless. Whatever makes readers calmer, wiser, more reasonable, and more refined, will help to make newspapers better, and to lower the value of the "ruffians of the press," as they have been aptly called, in the labor market; but nothing else will. We are bound to add that the means which many of the reformers and philanthropists of the day have employed to carry out their ends have done nearly as much harm in one direction as good in another. For instance, we have little doubt that the foul-mouthedness and unscrupulousness in statement which have marked the talk and writing of large numbers of the friends of freedom have done much to give Brick Pomeroy a circulation of 328,000 for his La Crosse Democrat. This circulation he has, or had very recently, and a large part of it is not in the Southern States; and he got it by using weapons which some Republican agitators have unfortunately helped to teach people to look on as lawful. Those who know what the La Crosse Democrat is will be able to estimate this fact at its proper value.—ED. NATION.]

LITERARY.

MESSRS. WIGGIN & LUNT have in press a very small edition of a rare tract, of much interest to the collectors of early American literature—"New England's Jonas Cast Up at London." "It shows," say the publishers, "the earlier movements of political opposition to the parties in power in the Massachusetts and Plymouth Colonies; the efforts to obtain a greater toleration in matters of religious faith and practice, and the opposition to the laws of those colonies restricting the rights and privileges of freemen to church-members." It is a work frequently cited by historians, and cited with much satisfaction by such historians as are not violently in love with the Pilgrim Fathers. There will be printed but one hundred and seventy copies, twenty of which will be on large paper, and the volumes will be uniform in size and appearance with the volumes of the "Library of New England History," which the same publishers issue.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt, in addition to other works already mentioned, have in hand "King Misery," from the French of Paul Saunier, and Smith, Le Gros, and Hamilton's "International French-English and English-French Dictionary." They announce that they have made a copyright arrangement for the republication of the complete works of Friedrich Spielhagen, to whom critics of some weight assign the first place in contemporary German fiction. The same house will publish immediately a little work by Mr. John Fiske, who rebukes Mr. Parton for unscientific and deluding talk concerning stimulants and narcotics, and announces "It Does Pay to Smoke;" "The Coming Man will Drink Wine."——R. W. De Witt announces a reprint of Miss Braddon's last novel, "Oscar Bertrand;" "The Steel Safe," by H. L. Williams; "Out of the Streets," by Charles Gaylor; and a new edition of Mr. A. J. H. Duganne's "History of Governments."——We are glad to be able to announce the speedy publication by the Catholic Publication Society of Mr. Aubrey De Vere's "Irish Odes, and other Poems," which are certainly sure of a warm welcome from a good-sized circle of the lovers of poetry, and are likely to be welcomed, too, by another, larger, distinctively Roman Catholic circle of readers.——Messrs. Harper & Brothers announce that Mr. R. B. Roosevelt will edit the edition which they will publish of Mr. Charles G. Halpine's "Poetical Works." The book will contain a biographical sketch of the poet and a portrait.—Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son are to be the publishers of Mr. Bayard Taylor's "By-ways of Europe," which have already had one audience in the Atlantic Monthly.——Messrs. Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, announce "The Living Questions of the Times," by an American citizen, who will treat of religious and theological questions—if it is safe to judge by the titles of two works of his already printed. They are: "The Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation," and "God Revealed in Creation and in Christ."——Messrs. Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger will publish "The Van Todleburgs, or the History of a very Distinguished Family," by F. C. Adams, and several other works of fiction for the old and young, as "Typhaine's Abbey," by the Comte de Gobineau; "Springdale Abbey," "Mabel Clifton;" "Marooners' Island," by the author of "The Young Marooners;" "American Fairies," and so on. One of these juveniles, we are given to understand, is the result of an evil-minded attempt to modernize the highly elegant sentiments and moral reflections of the "History of the Robin," by the celebrated and "well-languaged" "Mrs. Trimmer," who wrote for our little grandfathers.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton will publish a prose work by Mr. Alfred B. Street. "The Indian Pass; or, A Tramp Through the Trees," is the title of it. "The work is replete with vivid word-paintings of forest scenery;" and will, perhaps, do something to let people know of the magnificent resting-place which in the summer is within so easy reach of New York. "Helen on Her Travels; What She Saw and What She Did in Europe," is another of Messrs. Hurd & Houghton's announcements, and we believe we have not heretofore mentioned a book of theirs which is just out—"The Life of John Carter," by Mr. F. J. Mills. John Carter is the artist who draws and paints with a pencil held in his mouth, and Mr. Mills, who owns Mr. Carter's "Rat-catcher," which was executed in this manner, and who is his patron, has put together this volume, that the public may hear about the struggles of his friend. It is illustrated by others of Mr. Carter's works.——Mr. Duffield Ashmead announces "Nothing but Leaves," a poem written by an anonymous hand, and illuminated by Jean Lee. ——To our list of the publications of Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. we have to add these: New editions of "Hallow-e'en; A Romaunt," by Bishop Coxe; of "Rasselas;" of "Moore's Poetical Works" (Globe Edition); of "Byron's Poetical Works" (Half-dollar Edition); of "Sandford and Merton," "Robinson Crusoe," "Swiss Family Robinson," "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments," "Pictures of Heroes and Lessons from Their Lives," "Fighting the Flames," "Old Deccan Days," and "Forty-four Years of a Hunter's Life," which eight works last mentioned constitute a very agreeable "Boy's Globe Library." Others of this firm's announcements are: "The Works of Douglas Jerrold," with his son's memoirs of him; "Our Charley, and What to do with Him," by Mrs. Stowe; and William Chambers's "Historical Questions, with Answers."—— Messrs. G. W. Carleton & Co. announce "The Christmas Font," an illustrated child's story, by Mrs. M. J. Holmes; "Montalban," an American novel; and "Regina, and other Poems," by Eliza Cruger.——Messrs. E. J. Hale & Sons have in press a work with this satisfactory title: "Dolores: A Tale of Disappointment and Distress." Mr. Benjamin Robinson is the author of it.——We may say here that Messrs. R. W. Carroll & Co. intend publishing an unsectarian review with the title of the Christian Quarterly. It is to be devoted to "the advocacy of Primitive Christianity, as distinguished from the religion of sects." Its managing editor will be the Rev. W. T. Moore, and the associate editors will be President W. K. Pendleton, of Bethany College, President Errett, of Alliance College, President Graham, of the Kentucky University, and Mr. Thomas Munnell. Persons who know these gentlemen will know, better than the prospectus tells us, what the new magazine is likely to be.

—We have received the first number of Sabin's American Bibliopolist, a monthly literary register and catalogue of old and new books, which will be published, at a dollar a year, by Mr. Joseph Sabin, of Nassau Street, in this city. It is intended more particularly for buyers of books and for libraries, to which latter it will be furnished gratis, and will be found useful by all bibliomaniacs. This present number contains, first, an article on "Recent Auction Sales of Books," in which some very severe remarks—full of knowledge, however; and not unjust—are made on one or two late catalogues and libraries. Secondly, there is a lively account of the Leavitt & Strebeigh sale last spring, when Mr. Sabin and Mr. Gowans contended for the possession of Eliot's "Indian Bible," and the former bought it for $1,130—the largest sum ever paid in America for a book without illustrations. Mr. John A. Rice, of Chicago, is now the owner of the volume. Third, comes a little article on "Bibliomania in America;" and, finally, there is a list of "Books Wanted." Altogether there is a fine old bibliomaniacal and bibliopolical flavor about this little publication which everybody of bookish tastes will find very agreeable, and which we hope long to enjoy. Perhaps it is worth while to mention the advertisement on the last page; it is an advertisement published by H. H. Bancroft & Co. of a list of works relating to the Pacific Coast.

—Mr. Dorsey Gardner having left the Round Table, that journal is now entirely in the hands of Mr. Henry Sedley, who has been for some time its principal conductor. He promises his readers the same sort of a paper—only better—in the future that they have been getting in the past. In addition, he will give them a Chess Department, and will criticise dramatic performances, and devote some of his attention to music. A "Modern Minister" has reached, we see, the fourteenth instalment of a series of articles entitled "My Religion," and in the last number there is a powerful letter from a "Veteran Observer," who shows lucidly that while he does not quite agree with the editor as to the proper definitions of certain words, yet the latter has no reason to fear that he, the "Observer," holds any such opinion in regard to the Constitution as that one recently expressed by a writer in the North American Review. The "Modern Minister," we may say, for the benefit of those persons who are not reading his expositions, maintains in this particular one of them that it is by faith, and in no other way, that we partake of the body and blood in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. "Engaged People," another of the essays in the last number of the paper, is severe upon the hobbledehoy class existing on the doubtful ground between married and single blessedness. Some of the political writing is to the effect that there are communities quite as corrupt, politically, as the City of New York, perhaps more so; and some more of it is to the effect that we, at least, are ashamed of our municipal government, while in Washington, senators, without making their constituents at all ashamed of them, notoriously grow rich on small salaries; but for an obvious reason no names are given.

—The disclosures that have recently been made concerning the poverty of Harvard College have pressed home forcibly on the minds of the alumni what they already certainly, though vaguely, knew, and there is now making a vigorous effort to put into the hands of the trustees an unrestricted fund of at least five hundred thousand dollars. It is proposed that this sum shall be raised by subscription, and that each class shall raise a certain amount. Meetings have been held both of classes separately and in combination with other classes, a committee has been appointed to draw up a general address, subscriptions have been solicited, and all concerned seem to be working in a very hopeful spirit. A contribution of $10,000 is guaranteed by the class of '52, and the same sum by the class of '64. '54 will probably give $10,000; '56 will certainly give $5,000, and so will '57; '59 is expected to raise $10,000; '60—a large class and a rich one, as liberal of money as it used to be of hard knocks and noise—may be set down as reasonably sure to give $20,000; '63 is said to be likely to give $15,000; and '65, '66, '67, and '68, the members of which have not as yet had time to make or inherit their fortunes, will, it is to be hoped, raise $20,000 in due time. Thus, $105,000 will almost certainly be got from the twelve classes which we have named. Besides these there are the classes of '61, 62, '55, '46, and '44, none of which has been away from Cambridge long enough to be much thinned by death, and which ought to be good for an average sum of at least $10,000. Moreover, every year brings a new class, and it is likely that no class will hereafter graduate—in the immediate future, that is to say—without pledging itself to increase the unrestricted fund. However, in order to procure the $500,000 which is desired it will probably be necessary to fall back on some of the celebrated individual benefactors of the college; but there are several of them who have never been forgetful of their obligations to her, and there is little doubt that before very long the fund will be of the proposed dimensions. When that happens it will be time to apply to the Legislature; and it will not only be time, but it will be right, and ought to be done. Massachusetts, as we have already said, knows very well that without Harvard College she would not be the Massachusetts that she is, but less honored and famous, and less deserving of honor. In the new era of educational reform, and amid the activity in educational matters which is developing itself everywhere in the country, it will be possible for our oldest university to be in the front rank of our institutions of learning only by being equipped with the new armor. And as the French say, Money never harms anything; the millennium, when it comes, will no doubt have a sound financial basis, and Harvard must be released from its poverty or be content to see learning and culture decline in New England, while the West, with which the East cannot hope to compete in material and political successes, bears away, too, the only crown which now is left for her to take. The committees wish to get $50,000 as soon as possible, so that some interest may at once begin to come into the hands of the trustees.

—A Frankfort correspondent of the Methodist, the best and most readable of all our religious papers, makes mention, in a recent letter, of a complimentary dinner given by certain scientific and commercial men of Bremen to the famous geographer, August Heinrich Petermann, of whom we have more than once spoken, and of whom, as a geographer, one can hardly speak too respectfully. The occasion of the dinner was the return of the little schooner Germania, which has just come safe home after having made a voyage towards the North Pole and having planted the German flag in the Polar ice beside the Stars and Stripes of Kane and Hayes and the Union Jack of Scoresby and Parry. Doctor Petermann possesses something of that peculiar shrewdness—characteristic also of one of our greatest American savants—which enables him to persuade men of money to spend of their substance for the purpose of furthering the enterprises of the men of science—the men who "cannot afford to be rich," but who must have pecuniary contributions in aid of their objects. He gave so good an account of the trip of the Germania, and so plainly hinted that nothing but the want of means prevented the fitting out of another vessel to whose voyage the Germania expedition was merely preliminary, that several of the rich men in his after-dinner audience resolved themselves into a committee, and next year a new expedition of Polar discovery will undoubtedly be sent out, of which Petermann will be the organizer. He is a natural-born geographer and cartographer. Born in 1822, in the little town of Bleicherode, in the Golden Meadow of Prussian Saxony, he is now in the prime of life. His mother intended him for a theologian, but the boy's own thoughts were decidedly on the earth, and he was remarkable as a cartographist while still in the preparatory schools. Map-drawing is a regular requirement in the lower classes of the Prussian gymnasia; but Petermann, even after he had reached the highest class, still showed an irresistible preference for geographical studies; and in 1839, Professor Heinrich Berghaus established at Potsdam an institution especially designed for the instruction of geographers and cartographers, the pupils of which, under the skilful management of the principal, soon became enthusiastic in the pursuit of orographical, geodetical, hydrographical, and kindred studies. Petermann, perhaps the cleverest student of them all, was a valued co-laborer of Berghaus's in the preparation of the famous "Physical Atlas;" and afterwards, when Keith Johnston resolved to bring out an English edition of that volume, and had to import Germans into Scotland to work at it, Petermann and his friend Lange were two who were so employed. Previously he had drawn for Baron von Humboldt the map for that author's "Central Asia." The atlas being finished, Petermann went to England, and was for a time quite poor in London, but quite hopeful and cheerful. It was at this time that he made his excellent pair of maps of the British Isles, the one hydrographical and climatic, the other statistical. He was not long in making the acquaintance of Baron Bunsen, always the eager friend of men of learning, and of Sir Roderick Murchison, of Thomas Milner, and other eminent men. Becoming better known and more celebrated, he established a geographical institute in London, and about 1848 was appointed geographer to the Queen. He was already a member of the Royal Geographical Society, and besides his more strictly professional labors, was a contributor to the "Encyclopædia Brittanica." It is, however, as a promoter of African travel that he is most widely known. By means of the influence that he was able to bring to bear on Lord Palmerston, and afterwards on Lord John Russell, he succeeded in getting Barth first, and after him Vogel and Overweg, sent out to Africa. Then, too, as now, the Polar regions got much of his attention, and his views in regard to Polar geography have been sustained by Kane's and Hayes's discoveries. Though he is such an organizer of travels, Petermann is not a traveller himself. At present he superintends the publishing establishment of the famous Justus Perthes at Gotha, and is, besides, Professor of Geography in the University there.

—The English papers are calling Mr. Kinglake's attention to an unedited page of the history of the coup d'état. It is taken from a panegyrical memoir of the late Count Walewski, which was not long since printed in the Journal des Débats. The count was minister to England when the December revolution occurred in 1851, and France was entrusted to Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte for ten years. Lansdowne, Russell, and Palmerston were then governing England, and Walewski had no trouble in procuring from them the recognition, in accordance with England's usual policy, of the government actually established in France. Twelve months afterwards, however, when Napoleon had been declared Emperor, Lord Derby was at the head of the English ministry, and Walewski had a different and more difficult task to perform. Napoleon called himself Napoleon III.; to admit his right to that title was to admit the validity of the acts done in the Hundred Days, a thing which was so hard for English Conservatives to do that Derby, Disraeli, Malmesbury, and the rest positively refused to do it. But Walewski was equal to the occasion, and did not at all hesitate to take extreme measures. He made the question of immediate recognition of Napoleon the Third a question of peace or war. He devoted himself to influencing public opinion among the people, who cared a good deal about the safety of British commerce and not much about the abstract principle involved in the objection raised by the ministry; he utilized his excellent social relations to inspire the House of Commons promptly with some of the anxiety that was beginning to reign in commercial circles; and the result was that by his skill and energy he succeeded in getting what he and his master wanted. How true all this is nobody knows, we suppose, except those immediately concerned in it. If it is a true story, we may infer that, as Kinglake maintains, Napoleon was just as willing—and possibly a little more willing—to make war on England, for the purpose of fastening himself firmly in his new seat, as he was to make war in company with her. England's recognition of him, it will be remembered, induced Austria and Prussia to do the same thing, and Nicholas not very long after followed the example of those powers.

—As we risk being too late if we postpone it for a longer notice, we must just mention the catalogue, to be had of Mr. L. W. Schmidt, of the imperial library of Maximilian, bought by him of the collector, D. José Maria Andrade, shipped after Queretaro to Trieste, and to be sold at auction by Messrs. List & Frencke, Leipzig, on the 18th of January next, and for several days succeeding. The collection consists of nearly 4,500 lots (single volumes and series), and in all that relates to Mexico is undoubtedly the most complete in existence. It was the collector's aim to procure all works either relating to Mexico or printed in that country, and this part of the library begins in the catalogue at No. 2,145 with about a hundred manuscripts of considerable value, and ends with the catalogue itself. Nos. 1,738–2,144 inclusive relate to America in general, to the Antilles, to North, South, and Central America. This and the Mexican portion it were greatly to be wished could be secured for some of our public libraries, at least such works as bear upon the history of the continent, which by no means all do. The sixteen introductory divisions of the catalogue consist of a mêlange embracing a great many topics, with not a few cyclopædias and serials which must command a high price. Thus, the Revue des Deux Mondes and its Annuaire make 187 volumes (octavo); the Illustration, forty-eight, etc. What is singular about the collection is that it contains almost no English work in English, and but few (among them Irving's) in translation. Fifty, or certainly a hundred, would comprise the whole. The absence of German is equally striking. Spanish and French overwhelmingly preponderate.

—What is the absolute value of Hindu poetry? has been, and will doubtless long continue to be, a disputed question. When the Sanskrit literature was first thrown open to knowledge there was a general disposition to hail it with enthusiasm and exaggerate its merits. Later, when the novelty of it had worn out, and the halo of illusion became dim, the prevailing tendency was to depreciate it unduly. For a dispassionate and abiding valuation the time has not yet come—if, indeed, the time ever comes when one community can value at their true rate the poetical productions of another; especially of another so unlike it as India, ancient and modern, is unlike Europe. Those who scorn the Oriental muse should at least lay it to heart that the Orientals think no more highly of our own. But there are very few Oriental scholars, even, who have so worked themselves into the conditions of Indian mentality that they are able to feel, as well as see, what an Indian work of fancy is. Its faults are more palpable than its beauties—its faults, among which a tendency to grotesque exaggeration is one of the most marked and most repelling to our soberer minds. To quote but a single example: one of the chief beauties of the female form, to the eye of the Hindu, is breadth of hips below a taper waist; then, not only is this beauty, in Hindu plastic and pictorial art, stretched to the very limit of caricature, but even Kalidasa, in his most admired play, Sakuntāla, makes his hero recognize the nymph's footstep by the deep impression of the heels, driven into the soft ground by the excessive weight of her hips! How could a poet be regardless of the ludicrously ungraceful gait which alone should produce such tracks! But, not to be drawn too far aside from our main point, it seems plain that we have to look chiefly to Europeans resident in the East for those versions which shall put us in more intimate relations with the Eastern mind; and we may rejoice when such are sent back to us from thence. Mr. Griffith, of Benares, has just published a volume of versified extracts from Sanskrit poems, entitled "Scenes from the Ramayana, etc." (London: Trübner; New York: John Wiley & Son.) It is, we understand, the fourth which he has produced; the others have not happened to fall in our way. We can heartily commend it, as one of the best works of its class, to all who desire real enlightenment as to what the poetry of India is; and may safely promise that few who begin it will fail to read it through with genuine interest and admiration. Mr. Griffith's extracts from the Ramayana are nearly all taken from the first part of the poem; he holds out the hope of another volume which shall complete for us a sketch of its contents—a hope of which we desire to see the realization within no long time. Of pieces coming from outside the great epic, the longest and most important by far is the "Messenger Cloud," one of the acknowledged gems of the Sanskrit elegiac literature, from the hand of Kalidasa; it is rendered into Spenserian verse, which seems very well adapted to represent its stanzas. Among the epic pieces we especially relish the trochaic movement of the "Hermit's Son." The volume is from the Benares press, and is very creditably and tastefully executed.

—Among the latest historical productions of German literature we notice the following: "Blätter aus der preussischen Geschichte" (Leaves from the History of Prussia), by Varnhagen von Ense, a posthumous collection destined to complete the famous "Tagebücher" (Diaries) of the same author; "Der österreichische Staatsrath, eine geschichtliche Studie" (The Austrian Council of State, a Historical Study), by Dr. Carl von Hoch, of which the published first number contains the "Staatsrath unter Maria Theresia;" and German editions—the one revised and augmented by Friedrich Nippold, and the other by the author—of the "Memoirs of Bunsen" and L. Bamberger's "M. de Bismarck"—publications with which our readers have been made familiar by late reviews in this paper. The last-named reproduction contains an introductory sketch entitled "Deutschland, Frankreich und die Revolution," which is highly spoken of. A less political but more biographical work on the now so popular Prussian statesman is "Das Buch vom Grafen Bismarck," by G. Hezekiel, an illustrated publication, written by an admirer for admirers, of which the first part has appeared.

—Dr. Friedrich Förster, the poet and historian, author of the drama "Gustav Adolf," of two historical works on Wallenstein, of a "History of Frederic William I., King of Prussia," and various other works, died last month at Berlin, where for a long series of years he officiated as assistant director of the royal museums. He was born on the 24th of November, 1791, one day after Theodor Körner, the German patriot-poet, with whom he entered together the renowned volunteer corps of Lützow, when Germany, in 1813, rose in arms against Napoleon. The author of "Leier und Schwerdt" fell on August 26 of that year in a skirmish with the French, and his friend Förster thus survived him fifty-five years.

BONAPARTE IN ITALY.*

THE Imperial author of the "Vie de César" has published no work on the life of the modern Cæsar, his uncle. But no elaboration of his on that subject could be as meritorious as the grand collection of Napoleon's correspondence—political, military, and administrative—now appearing under the auspices of an Imperial commission, and of which twenty-five volumes have been published, containing about twenty thousand pieces—letters, reports, proclamations, notes, etc. The archives not only of France, but also of Germany, Russia, Sweden, Italy, and other countries, and numberless private collections, have been ransacked for the benefit of that extraordinary publication, from which, however, all private letters of the founder of the French Empire—and probably also a number of other papers—have been excluded. On the other hand, all papers communicated are given entire, without omission or alteration. The value of such a collection for the historian is obvious. The general reader of history, however, must naturally find it too vast, and both on account of its details, especially in military matters, and of its numberless repetitions, not a little tedious. To bring its contents, free of these defects, within the reach of the general reader, Heinrich Kurz has begun the elaboration of an abridgment, based on critical selection, of which the first volume is now before us, embracing, besides some introductory and some supplementary letters, four hundred pages relating to the history of the Italian campaigns of 1796 and 1797, the most brilliant period, perhaps, in the eventful career of the great conqueror.

It is almost needless to state that four hundred selected letters and public writings of Napoleon, illustrative of such a period, form an intensely interesting and highly instructive volume. Most of them are addressed to the Directory; some, confidentially, to Carnot; some to French generals and diplomats; some to the princes of Italy, the Pope, and the Emperor Francis; some to men of science and art; others, in the form of proclamations, to the army. The youthful warrior and diplomat, the future emperor and conqueror of Europe, is almost completely depicted in them. We see him working, organizing, marching, and conquering; we watch him planning, scheming, and brooding; we hear him advising, commanding, menacing, negotiating, and cheating. We admire his military genius, his courage and energy; the keenness of his intellect, the maturity of his ideas, and the wonderful vigor of his words; his consummate diplomatic skill, which seems almost marvellous in a man of twenty-seven; his prudence and patience, of which a long run of good luck and the unrestrained habit of commanding divested him in after-life. We are astounded by his success; we are shocked by his heartlessness. From the foot of the Alps, where he assumes command over a ragged, famished, and demoralized army, we follow him to Montenotte, Millesimo, Dego, Ceva, Mondovi, and Lodi; to Milan, which he liberates; to Lonato, Castiglione, and Bassano; to Arcola and Rivoli; to Mantua, which he forces to surrender; through Modena, Bologna, and the Romagna, to Tolentino, where Pius VI. is compelled to purchase peace; across the Alps, through Görz and Klagenfurt, to Leoben, where the Emperor, trembling for Vienna, finally agrees to preliminaries of peace with the French Republic; back to Milan, where he lords it over Italy; and finally to Campo Formio, where the definitive treaty of peace is concluded which terminates this period, a treaty by which Francis treacherously sacrifices parts of Germany, and Napoleon Venice. And all this belongs to the history of one year and a few days of victory.

Even before starting on his march into Germany Napoleon could thus address his soldiers:

"You have conquered in fourteen pitched battles and in seventy engagements; you have captured more than one hundred thousand prisoners, five hundred field-guns, two thousand heavy cannon, and four pontoon trains.

"The contributions imposed upon the countries conquered by you have fed and paid the army during the whole campaign. Besides this, you have sent the minister of finance thirty millions for the relief of the public treasury.

"You have enriched the Paris Museum by upward of three hundred works of art, masterpieces of ancient and modern Italy, to produce which thirty centuries were needed.

"You have conquered for the Republic the finest regions of Europe; the Lombard and Cispadane Republics owe you their freedom; the French banners for the first time wave over the shores of the Adriatic, in face of old Macedon, to which you can sail in twenty-four hours; the Kings of Sardinia and Naples, the Pope, the Duke of Parma, have abandoned the coalition of our foes and sued for our friendship; you have driven the English from Leghorn, from Genoa, and from Corsica."

These words, which tell what were the res gestæ, also tell us how the nervus rerum gerendarum was obtained. War was made to support war by a system of merciless extortion which differed from the plunderings of ancient and mediæval invaders perhaps only in the manner of its execution. Poor Italy, whom Bonaparte pretended to free, while he was ready to barter away her lands and people; whose past he glorified in his proclamations while, in his reports, he spoke of her living sons in words of intense and boundless contempt—Italy was made to bleed from every pore. Contributions, paid, being paid, or to be paid, are a constant theme of our young conqueror's lucubrations. He eagerly grasps every opportunity of extorting money. He is inventive in creating opportunities. He plans pretexts. But he does it all in a very polite way; he bleeds with polished instruments. He certainly is no Vandal conqueror; he destroys no works of art; he only carries off the best ones. He evinces a taste not only for statues and pictures, but also for manuscripts and anatomical collections, of which he sends off a part. He burns no temples; he only empties some of their treasures. He respects the superstitions of the conquered, and sends the Madonna of Loreto unmutilated, and with all her precious ornaments, to Paris. He sends her privately to the Directory, some of the members of which may have particular regard for piously decorated Madonnas, while the attention of others—or of the same—is directed to the merits of "a hundred carriage horses, the finest that could be discovered in Lombardy." Besides all this, which is done decently and systematically, by order of Napoleon, an immense deal of extortion is done by a swarm of authorized and unauthorized commissioners and agents of the Directory, who infest every corner of Northern Italy, and whose robberies, peculations, and shamelessness the general hardly finds words to stigmatize. The soldiers, too, in spite of most rigorous regulations and frequent shootings, manage to plunder and rob on their own account. At an early stage of the campaign these liberators are designated by their leader himself "an army of brigands."

While contributions feed the army and gorge the Directory and Paris with plunder, a military reign of terror keeps Italy with all its hostile elements—princes, priests, nobles, and a monk-ridden peasantry—in awe and subjection. What that terrorism is, a few quotations may show. An outbreak having taken place in some villages of the Milanese, and an order to lay down arms having been disobeyed, a proclamation announces that "the generals will march the necessary forces to subject them, burn them, and have every man found in arms shot. All priests and all nobles who remain in the rebellious communities will be arrested as hostages and sent to France." The fate of Binasco and Pavia soon after proves that such are not empty threats. Some Frenchmen having been killed at Bosco, General Berthier is directed to throw the council of the place into prison, and to declare that if they refuse to name the guilty, "and do not, on the spot, make out a list of at least twelve persons," they will be immediately shot. The people of the vicinity of Tortono are guilty of a similar crime, and Napoleon reports: "I have had fifteen of the ringleaders arrested, tried by a military commission, and shot"—the names having been obtained in the way indicated to Berthier. On entering the Papal dominion, Napoleon proclaims: "Art. 1. Every village or town in which alarm-bells are sounded at the approach of the French army is immediately to be burnt down, and the council thereof to be shot. Art. 2. Every community in whose territory a Frenchman shall be murdered shall be placed under martial law; a mobile column shall be sent there, hostages taken, and an extraordinary contribution levied. . . ." And yet all this is mild and humane when compared with the orders issued on the eve of a march into the Tyrol, orders, however, which we believe to have received no practical application.

And yet Bonaparte was neither greedy nor cruel. Nor was he by nature hypocritical or false, though his Macchiavellism appears no less great than his heartlessness, when required as a means. "All the fortified places of the Venetian Republic on the Adige," he writes to the Directory as early as July, 1796, "are now in my hands. You may find it suitable to begin, even now, a slight quarrel with the Venetian minister at Paris, so that, after the capture of Mantua and the driving of the Austrians from the Brenta, I may find a greater willingness to listen to the demand for a few millions which you intend me to make." "Is it your desire," he writes on another occasion, "to revolutionize Piedmont and to annex it to the Cispadane Republic? The means to do this without war, without violating either treaty or propriety, is to blend a corps of ten thousand Piedmontese, who must needs be the kernel of the nation, with our army, and to make them partake in our victories. After six months the King of Piedmont shall be dethroned." It is the spectacle of a giant embracing a dwarf and pressing him to his bosom; he suffocates him, but he cannot be accused of a crime. The result is owing to the extraordinary difference in their organizations." He flatters both the Pope and the Emperor, though he heartily hates the one with all his empire, and heartily despises the other, "the old fox," with all his clergy. He speaks "of the religion of our fathers" to Cardinal Mattei, and assures the French minister of foreign affairs that he could easily manage Egypt with armies like his, to whom "all religions, Mohammedans, Copts, Arabs, idolaters, etc., are alike." Hating anarchy and Jacobinism no less, or even more, than émigrés and royalist conspirators, he yet hesitates not to stir up revolutionary passions against clerical influences, to inspire the Italians with "fanaticism against fanaticism." He vaunts the conservatism of the army, and incites Barras to commit a coup d'état. Of course, all this is done in the interest of the French Republic, of "the greatest of nations," and of the Constitution of the year III., and, if we believe his repeated assertions, from the purest of motives and without personal ambition, as he longs to retire into private life, preferring peace to glory, and looking for reward in his "conscience and the opinion of posterity."

But although no glimmer of conscience or moral feeling, in the stricter meaning of the word, is to be found in all these hundreds of letters, a strong sense of the noble, the decorous, and even the virtuous, is almost everywhere perceptible, no less than an intense contempt for everything sordid, and meanly selfish. He admires patriotism no less than heroism. He speaks of the self-sacrifice of a poor washerwoman with the same warmth of feeling with which he claims acknowledgment for the brilliant services of Berthier, Augereau, Joubert, Victor, Lannes, Marmont, or Junot. He writes to every member of the government, separately, to procure relief for the widow of one of his heroes. Terrible to the enemies of France, he is yet free from personal vindictiveness. He neither belittles the deeds of possible rivals—though he betrays his dislike for Moreau—nor speaks boastingly of his own achievements. He honors the devotion of his military antagonists, and never ridicules them when fallen. Though born to command, his tone is unassuming, respectful to superiors, and almost austerely modest. He is dignified even when flattering, and not entirely untruthful when deceiving. Men of science or literary genius he treats with great distinction. Altogether, we find it natural that many who knew him at that time, finding in him the talents without the vices of Cæsar, were inclined to exclaim, "Hic erit Scipio!"

And yet his ambition even then was soaring over all Europe and beyond it. He was planning the conquest of Egypt, of Malta, and of England. He offered his mediation to the Swiss Cantons, received Hellenic deputations, formed Polish legions, and exerted himself to gain the favor of "the brave Hungarian nation." Beyond conquered Corfu, he follows in his thought the shining track of the Macedonian; he will penetrate to the Nile, like Alexander; he will cross the Alps, like Hannibal—he will cross the Rubicon, like Cæsar.

DANA'S MINERALOGY.*

This is a book of which Americans may rightly be proud. It is the most comprehensive, most accurate, and best arranged treatise on descriptive mineralogy in the world. To describe the various stones of which the outer film of the earth is made would seem at first sight no very formidable task. Yet here is a volume containing 875 large, closely-printed pages. Moreover, mineralogy seems to the uninstructed a narrow subject, easily exhaustible and less exalted than astronomy and zoölogy. But Professor Dana is first among scientific men in the United States by virtue of the compass of his mind not less than because of its clearness and penetration. The book before us well illustrates the wonderful range of his abilities. In the first place, mineralogy includes crystallography, a difficult mathematical subject, which Mr. Dana treats amply and clearly. To be sure, the ideal mathematical form is never realized. A perfect crystal is as rare as a perfect man. But every crystal has its precise mathematical law, which it tries to obey and succeeds in obeying with more or less distortion and incompleteness. In crystals, nature seems to try to make straight lines. The effort is seldom successful; nevertheless the straight line is one of the ideals of growing stones. How complex the forms of crystals may become, while conforming to mathematical types, any one may see by glancing at some of the six hundred figures in this treatise. Whoever does this will instantly conceive a high respect for Professor Dana's mathematical powers. But mineralogy is an old subject, which has been studied long and been much written about. Accordingly, we find that Mr. Dana's historical researches have been broad and deep. The list of the abbreviated titles of the works referred to in this treatise covers eleven pages. The books cited were written in Greek, Latin, German, French, Swedish, Spanish, Italian, and English. Aristotle, Theophrastus, Dioscorides, Pliny, Agricola, Linnæus, Wallerius, Bergmann, and Werner are among the older authorities on mineralogy. Years and years of labor are represented in the following simple statement in the preface to this fifth edition: "... the first author and first place of publication of each species, and of each name it has borne, and of the names of all its varieties, are stated in chronological order, with the dates of all publications cited." Professor Dana recognizes 834 distinct mineral species, and there are nearly 4,000 names of minerals in the index. To trace the names and fix the dates it is necessary to read at least eight languages, and to go back through the literature of the subject is to go perhaps to a point of time thirty days distant, and perhaps to a point three thousand years away. Even men who have never made an original investigation themselves can hardly fail to get some idea from these suggestions of the patient labor which must have been undergone before the little words we have italicized in the above quotation could have been truthfully written.

Again, all minerals are compounds, sometimes simple, but often exceedingly complex. Under each mineral species a full account is given of its normal composition, of the common departures from this typical constitution, and of the chemical characters and tests by which the species may be recognized. In the matter of chemical notation and formulæ, Professor Dana's work faithfully reflects the chaos which prevails in strictly chemical writings. The old chemical formulæ predominate; but in the latter part of the book the new formulæ occasionally appear, and a decidedly "progressive" sketch of the new system of notation appears in the introduction. As the classification of mineral species is in this treatise based primarily on chemical considerations, it is evident that a profound knowledge of chemistry is one of the requisites for the preparation of the work before us. The relations of crystals to light, heat, and electricity have been the subject of many curious and valuable investigations during the last twenty years. Professor Dana has been prevented from giving much space to the results of these physical researches by the fear of making his book unreasonably large. He has, however, given the optical properties of those species which needed this addition to their other distinctive qualities.

But information of an entirely different sort from any yet mentioned is liberally provided in this generous book. Minerals have their resorts, their homes or localities, in technical phrase. Students want to know where each mineral is found. Collectors are eager to visit the localities where unique specimens of this or that species have been obtained. The locality of the particular mineral from which the descriptions of a new species were made is not seldom a matter of some importance for those who wish to re-examine the new mineral and compare it with other species. Accordingly, Professor Dana gives under each mineral species information concerning the localities at which it has been found, and this for Europe as well as for America. A list of American localities, arranged by States, fills twenty-six pages at the end of the volume. Hundreds of persons must have contributed to this mass of information about localities, much of which is of the most minute description.

The author of such a compilation as the treatise before us must be versed in many languages and many sciences, and he must have a prodigious power of work in him. But all this is not enough. He must be also a man of singular penetration, good judgment, and fairness of mind. From a great mass of various material he has to choose the best; from a number of original investigators he must select the most trustworthy, and get at the very essence of their thoughts. This is what Professor Dana has admirably done. And, moreover, we venture to say that no student, savant, or collector, however humble, ever rightfully thought himself defrauded of deserved thanks or recognition by this pre-eminently just as well as sagacious compiler.

Of Professor Brush, the worthy collaborator on this treatise, it is enough to say that he deserves to be associated with Professor Dana, and that he has no superior in his specialty in this country except his master.

MRS. JENKIN'S LAST NOVELS.*

In the first of the stories named below, Mrs. Jenkin resigns herself to her ruling passion for depicting jealousy. Hitherto, in those of her books that we have had the pleasure of reading, she has been content with making three or four characters suffer, and that temporarily only, from what Mr. Richard Swiveller would call "the green-eyed." But in "A Psyche of To-day" she shows us the piece for which these previous episodes would seem to have been but studies; she concentrates her attention on her one point, and cuts away everything which does not directly heighten its effect. The result is a story more rapid and dramatic than any she has previously written, though not really more artistic, and certainly less thoughtful.

"A Psyche" is Mademoiselle Regina Nolopœus, the daughter of a musical and constitutionally impecunious Hungarian and a noble French girl with whom he eloped. Regina, orphaned and disowned by her maternal relatives, is introduced to the reader at the age of ten, a shy but dignified young person, who keeps her sorrows to herself, and announces that she can cook, speak Latin, and never tells lies. She is adopted and brought up by a Parisian lady who knew her mother. Madame Saincère is one of those women whom Mrs. Jenkin loves to paint, and she does it so well that we are always glad to see her, whether she be called Madame Saincère, Lady Ponsonby, or Mrs. Lescrimière. An old lady, full of the best kind of worldly wisdom, warm-hearted and sensible, is the type, Madame Saincère differing from her predecessors in being childless, and therefore with less experience of the ways of young hearts. She is a patroness of letters and art. With her resides her nephew, M. Paul Latour de la Mothe, who is a painter and a genius. Latour's aristocratic mother in the provincial town of Juvigny had destined him for a government office, and would have chosen him a proper wife, but he shocked her by refusing both, yielding to her influence only so far as to break his engagement with a young lady whom he loved and of whom she disapproved. This young lady soon becomes Madame Aubry, without, however, losing her affection for Latour.

Madame Saincère sends the little Regina to a boarding-school, whence she emerges in due time pruned of all her promised originality, and very like any other French demoiselle—a "sphinx clothed in white muslin." She possesses, indeed, a wonderful beauty, and is otherwise like her prototype in being a fresh and simple creature, happy, innocent, and loving greatly: for already she loves Paul, who for his part hardly sees her. About this time she goes to visit Paul's mother at Juvigny. There is nothing in the whole book so delightful to our mind as the description of the society in this old town. It consists of a few Legitimist families and the respectable and well-to-do people with whom they condescend to mix; the former poor, despising trade, their manners and thoughts of the past, hopeless, ennuyed, yet indefinably elegant and attractive; the latter, taking Madame de la Mothe for an example, more modern in their ideas, upright, narrow, provincial. Of the first there are the Mlles. De Lusson, darning their dresses in secret, and feebly waiting for some impossible future; Mme. De Noircourt, the devotee, with her enduring alpaca ready for every funeral; M. De Lusson, whose flute and cheerfulness form an added source of misery to his wife and daughters; Lepeaute, the accomplished servant, who manages to give a party to Regina out of pure skill and a fraction of money.

To Paul's mother Regina takes so kindly that she forces the stiff old heart to warm toward her; nevertheless, Mme. Latour does not neglect her duty, but selects for the young girl an eligible if disagreeable young man for a husband. The unsophisticated "Psyche" shrinks from this as from other matches that Paul and Madame Saincère next form for her. While this goes on Madame Aubry meets Paul and rekindles his old flame for her. In time she is dethroned by an eccentric and beautiful genius, a young Irish girl, who insists on being called "Hubert," who has only gentlemen for friends, who is absolutely free from passion, who speaks several languages, reads Hegel, sings wildly and wonderfully, and dresses in the height of fashion. Whether "Hubert" is a copy from life or evolved from Mrs. Jenkin's inner consciousness, she is in either case a failure. Her characteristics are asserted, not depicted. Declared to be a prodigy, she is permitted to utter only commonplaces and perform absurdities. Paul wisely decides that this young person will not make the good wife that he now seriously wants. Somebody suggests that Mlle. Nolopœus is well-born and well-dowered. He proposes for her and they are married, poor "Psyche" as dumb with delight as she had hitherto been with grief. Paul is pleased, on the whole, both with his wife's outlines and the praises she receives. A year passes, and Madame Aubry again turns up. Everything follows now that one may expect, and as it has often done before in novels, only that Mrs. Jenkin manages the gradual separation of the husband and wife with the nicety of a practised hand, touching delicately and omitting effectively; never vulgar, although occasionally trenching on the sensational. The modern Psyche lights her lamp by opening an anonymous letter during her husband's absence, and she finds out that far from being a god, he is only an everyday deceiver. At the sight of him on his return she goes mad, whereupon he immediately discovers that he adores her and hates Madame Aubry. Mrs. Jenkin always rejoices in doing poetic justice. On this occasion she is even more rigorous than usual in the performance of duty. Regina is avenged of every single pang she has suffered; and if we are forced to admit that (to the carnal mind) Providence is not apt to punish the wicked so satisfactorily, we are equally compelled to say that the way in which Mrs. Jenkin does it is ingenious and dreadfully interesting. As, for instance, where the insane wife glides in to stand for the "Iphigenia" begun in happier days, and glares at her husband with the very expression he had once longed for her to assume, being irritated with her persistent loving glances. It would make a good tableau vivant.

When it is conceded that an authoress is skilful and entertaining, knows what is good taste, what good manners, has a graceful wit, a turn for reflection and analysis, vivacity and pathos at command—is, in short, the producer of eminently readable books, is it not captious to take any exception to the works of her hand, so complete in their way? We dare say there is no use in it; Mrs. Jenkin is not a young writer, and criticism or spurring of any kind would hardly cause her to rise from cleverness to greatness. Yet we like her so much it is impossible not to wish to be able to like her more; to wish that she were as good to remember as to read; that she had higher motives for her tales than melodramatic revenges; that she contributed less to form an appetite for morbid emotions, and more to extract some real virtue out of and for the society she is so well fitted to describe. We are not to be understood as insinuating an entreaty for a "moral;" but it is nevertheless true that no work of fiction can be worth much which does not possess that underlying moral which rejects little purposes, and is the only stimulus to true artistic perception.

So far we had already written when "Madame de Beaupré" appeared. It may be described somewhat in the same general terms applied to "A Psyche of To-day;" but it is certainly two or three steps below that story, and bears us out in the suggestion that Mrs. Jenkin is not in an improving way. The little analytical sentences which she is accustomed to sprinkle in here and there have lost all but their worldly wisdom, and are good indications of that lower tone of her mind which is visible in all her novels, and in "Madame de Beaupré" is in the ascendency. "How is it," she asks, "that the inferior nature so constantly governs the superior?" "His egotism prospered with him, as egotism is wont to do." "It is a melancholy fact that as soon as we allow our heart to dictate a course of action to us, we are almost sure to get into a scrape." The society in "Madame de Beaupré" is almost too frivolous and silly to be amusing, well described though it doubtless is. Madame herself is an unattractive person, to our taste, from the time when she becomes a widow till she succeeds in gaining her lover by turning Protestant. A coup de théâtre cuts the Gordian knot of the difficulty, in a scene in which religion and attitudes mingle in a manner positively disagreeable, and awaken suspicion of the means by which Mrs. Jenkin, in her previous compositions, has produced her effects and played on our sympathies.

MR. G. W. MOON'S BAD ENGLISH.*

Since his fight with Dean Alford, a few years ago, Mr. Moon seems to have taken upon himself the office of champion of his native tongue, and to think it necessary that he should sally forth, from time to time, upon offenders against the strictest proprieties of English speech. In this little volume he spits upon his lance three such hapless beings, and retires from the field with all the airs and honors of glorious victory. Perhaps we have missed the proper comparison, and should have said "bodkin," rather than "lance;" but the writer bears himself so stoutly, and so evidently appears in his own eyes a knight "of mighty bone and bold emprise," that he almost imposes upon us, and makes us lose sight of the pettiness of the work in which he is engaged. No literary business, certainly, ranks lower than this verbal criticism, which goes with a microscope over the surface of one and another writer's style, spying out cracks and roughnesses, making a big mark across them, and calling upon the world to stand aghast at their enormity. We would not deny that it has its value; but it should be practised as quietly and unpretentiously as possible, as if the critic fully realized how much more important things there were to be attended to, and that an author who is laboring to get some weighty matter before the minds of his public may fairly be absolved from blame for now and then putting an only in the wrong place, using a for an, being careless of his antitheses, and such like faults. Mr. Moon's whole tone and bearing is "loud;" he elaborates and emphasizes his strictures as if he would fain compel universal attention to them. The very fact of his putting forth a second volume of this character tries our patience severely. We are of the number of those who were never able to see why Dean Alford's unscholarly and awkward lucubrations should have been gathered together out of the magazines in which they first appeared, to be made into a book; nor why Mr. Moon's retorts should have been thought worthy of the same treatment. The task of dealing with an adversary like the Dean was not difficult, nor the credit of vanquishing him great. Still, it must be conceded that the patronage of the public has justified the enterprise of the publisher who puts forth both books together, making each stir up curiosity and attract purchasers for the other. If the warning conveyed in the appearance of the present volume be duly heeded, its reception will be such as to convince its author that he has worked out this particular vein, and had better try to win further reputation, or utilize the notoriety already gained, by contributions to literature of another sort. It would be sad enough to have to look forward to an indefinite succession of volumes of verbal criticism, and there is no reason why the series should ever come to an end for lack of subject.

We must do Mr. Moon the justice to say that, within the limits imposed by his theme, he is a sound and thorough worker, sharp in discovering the vulnerable points in his antagonists' armor, cunning in offering the smallest number of opportunities for counter-thrusts. To such a critic we can probably pay no more gratifying compliment than by acknowledging that his style is very correct. Nor is it wanting in vigor or dash; but to the more delicate graces it can lay no claim. Its humor, for example, is almost uniformly unsuccessful; you cannot well smile heartily at the fun of a man whose grin warns you a sentence or two off of the fun's approach. We have no idea of criticising him in detail—to provoke, perhaps, a retort from a man whom it is so perilous to arouse; we will call attention to but a point or two.

One of the matters respecting which we should most differ with our author in opinion has to do with the use of the article. We are perfectly ready to write "an earnest and faithful man," or "a faithful and earnest man," and to defend against all comers the correctness of both phrases; maintaining that he who requires two articles, "an earnest and a faithful" or "a faithful and an earnest"—because, forsooth, the two adjectives, standing separately, could not take the same article—has an ear which has been made morbidly sensitive by unhealthy training. Very often we should amend Mr. Moon's punctuation (if it be his own)—rejecting, for example, the comma in "Many writers consider the repetition of a word in a sentence, to be an inelegance" (p. 25); or in "The teaching of the foregoing criticisms respecting adverbs, may be summed up thus" (p. 16). And he is not entirely free from that unnecessary and illogical doubling of the auxiliary have—as in "it would have been better still, to have said (p. 32)—which, to be sure, is not so unequivocally an offence against English usage as it ought to be, since authorities innumerable, ancient and modern, can be cited in its support; but which, in our view, is nevertheless an offence, and a grievous one, against real propriety of speech.

We must not leave our young gentleman without calling attention to the tremendous nature of the combat which he and Mr. E. S. Gould recently carried on in the Round Table. It was not unlike one of those manly contests in the prize-ring in which each gentleman, as he "gets in," or tries to get in, on his antagonist, suggests to him that he is a liar, that his mother's failings did not lean to virtue's side, that his father stretched hemp, and so on. Both champions are at present quiet, and as friends of virtue and as persons delicate about manners,—to say nothing of a capacity we have for being bored,—we sincerely hope they may both remain so.

GIFT-BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.*

If the children were better critics, we should have better literature for children than we now have; or rather, more of our juvenile literature would be good. However, the child's critical faults being negative, they produce less unfortunate results than otherwise would be the case. A girl or boy with a good mental appetite will devour almost anything, and, luckily, is usually blessed with so happy a digestion that he easily rejects what is not fit food for him. He is not in the condition in which older readers too often are; he has not yet formed the unhealthy tastes which crave morbid excitement; he is not yet the positively bad reader who necessitates the bad writer; so he suffers no great deal of harm at the hands of the average writer for youth, though it is true, of course, that he misses a vast deal of good which he ought to get, and that therefore the duty devolving upon the older critic, his guardian, is, for practical purposes, not lighter than if authors for the young folks really inflicted all the injury which most of them are so capable of inflicting.

In noticing the children's books of the coming holidays we have already spoken of the best of them; "The Flower and the Star," by Mr. Linton, is, at all events, the best of that class of them which is intended for the smallest people who read—those less than ten or eleven years. To be sure, some of Mr. Linton's work is old enough for readers of patriarchal age; but the best of the imaginative sort of writing for children is pretty safe to be either old enough for the oldest reader at the same time that it is young enough for the youngest, or else to be trivial in meaning, at once wooden and weakly, and distastefully expressive of sham and humbug. Let one of the best of Grimm's or Andersen's little prose poems—full of a morality, high or homely, not less applicable to the grave side than to the side of the cradle, more fully suffused with imagination than most epics, never departing from the truth of things—be compared with the work of any one of the multitude of pretty-story makers or allegorico-moral-story makers who fill the boys' and girls' magazines with the products of what is called their imagination. The latter will be laughed at by men and women who have any right to laugh, or, rather, who have a right to laugh at things—and some such persons there are, Wordsworth to the contrary notwithstanding. Not that all truth and all beauty are within the vision of childhood, but there is none of either which is within the comprehension of the child that is not also delightful and acceptable to the man, and none that the man rejects is fit for the mind of the child, or is anything but spurious. When the father cannot read with satisfaction the holiday book that he buys for his boy or girl, the boy and girl, of course, may read it, and probably will; but, of course, they ought not. We are speaking only of imaginative literature; which, after all, though its operation is often insensible, is apt to be in the end the most powerful in its effect on the morals and the mind. If most of what is good in human life and character has its root in the spiritual power of aspiration after the unknown good, then the literature of aspiration seems to be of most importance; and that it is of most importance, and always has been, an examination of the facts, even in the case of the individual, if it were easily possible, would easily show. Mr. Linton's little book we have already praised, with some hinted reservations. These suggested themselves when we thought of the fact that some parts of it would simply puzzle a childish reader; that he would get from them not only less than an adult reader, but would get nothing from them—which would seem to show a defective sympathetic, if not creative, imagination in the author. Still, we are glad to commend it again as being, on the whole, the best of the more important holiday books for the young.

"Little Rosy's Travels" also—which is a reprint, with good illustrations, of an English book—we can praise heartily. It is an account of a very human little girl's adventures in the South of France, whither her father and mother took her to grow fat. Parents will at once recognize its truth to nature, and children will be the better and happier for making the acquaintance of so good a disobedient, kind-hearted, merry little personage as Miss Rosy. The scenes of the story, too, will be new to the reader, and the book will be a real treasure to whatever girl may be fortunate enough to have it given to her.

Little Californians have recently been told—if any of them listened—that God, foreseeing the influx of Chinamen into the Pacific coast country, has begun to endow American citizens newly born in that region with larger heads than are given to the infants of the other States in the Union. "Wisdom is good to direct," the argument is, and as by divine ordinance the "Johns" are hereafter to dig canals for California, do family washing, work on farms and in gardens, and be in all respects a servile class, it behooves their future masters and mistresses, thus released from drudgery, to devote themselves in earnest to the business of governing and guiding them, and to occupy themselves in intellectual pursuits. Whenever God has formed purposes of this kind the race which He selects for the mastery becomes rather impudent, insulting, domineering, tyrannical, and otherwise in need of good advice. "You-Sing: the Chinaman in California," is therefore a story which we feel in a manner bound to urge on the attention of the people who have accepted for themselves and their offspring their manifest destiny as Californians. It sets forth, in what purports to be a narrative of facts, the courage, the gratitude, and the self-sacrificing spirit of a poor Chinaman who not long ago lived in Sacramento city, and who underwent much partly-deserved and partly-undeserved abuse from the children of a family residing near him, but who, when the floods came, worked hard to save his enemies from destruction, helped to support them after the father was drowned, aided the widow in the recovery of her property from her husband's fraudulent partner, and in every way approved himself an admirable person, although his notions of morality were of a somewhat Oriental character, and he was in religion a consistent pagan. The author gives some decided indications of a willingness to appropriate so much goodness, by summary conversion, to the credit of Christianity, and we are glad for her sake as a story-maker that she had to stick to the facts of the case, and, at the end of the volume, leave You-Sing in an enquiring frame of mind, but not under deep conviction of the entirely worthless character of his josses. The incidents of the book will interest the readers for whom it is intended, and the author is to be thanked for having attacked in a sensible way a cruel prejudice.

"The Little Gypsy" is translated from the French, and, in its English dress, is a pretty story told in a sprightly way. Old Wolf, the tailor, and Marguerite, his quick-tempered wife—who has what Carlyle and Ben Jonson call an aptitude for the profession of sovereign prince, she is so well fitted out with desires for various things—live with their beautiful little daughter in a village in the Tyrol. A band of gypsies come, and of course Marguerite must have her fortune told, and of course she takes Mina with her, and of course all follows on as it should. Mina is stolen and the gypsies beat her and try to teach her to steal, but she will not learn that trade, and, instead, becomes a singer and dancer of marvellous skill. Then the great composer hears her, and the Landgrave sees her, and she is rescued from her hard life, and becomes in time a famous prima donna, and supports her father and mother, whom she fortunately finds again alive and well. There is no need to praise such tales, which will be a part of childhood till the end of time, or till childhood shall be less happy than it is.

Two pleasing writers—Margaret Howitt and Fredrika Bremer, the one as translator and the other as author—combine to make for the children a pleasant book of short tales: "The Butterfly's Gospel, and Other Stories." They are full of the poetical sentimentality which is so common in German literature, and which is perhaps the chief grace and charm of the literature of the Scandinavians, and which, when it does not perilously tremble on the verge—or pass it—of gushing insipidity and weakness, is in some moods so thoroughly delightful. "The Rose of Jericho," with its pretty legend and its warm humanity, is the best of the three stories comprised in this volume, and is good for children just as the "Christmas Carol" is good for them—because, as somebody, not speaking profanely, said of the latter, its love and tender charity make it a continuation of the Sermon on the Mount.

The three books next in order in our lists are so determinedly moral in their tendency—if it can be called tendency when in so many words it is told to little boys and girls that they must not lie, nor even steal, nor be idle, nor disobedient, nor rob birds' nests, nor decline to learn to hem, and so on—they come out so strong in this respect, that we feel a little hesitation in recommending them or speaking of them at all. But they are for the very youngest of readers, or rather spellers, and their didacticism is not so bad; "it is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth," and the moral law may safely be imposed in all its weight and nakedness on the necks of the extremely young sinner.

Mr. Daryl's "Short Stories" are so stuffed with long words and stilted expressions as to offer serious difficulty to children in understanding them, either with or without a dictionary. "Joey's" mother, who lived in a court, "would have been right glad to have left it, could she have found any other locality where the rent was equally moderate." He, poor boy! was not born, but had an "advent into existence." "Nelly" "deposited" her father's supper in the basket, instead of placing it there. Vain of showing her needle-work, "she had only one opportunity in the week of exhibiting her handicraft to the public gaze"—the same day that "the venerable old grey pony was enticed . . . to undergo the labor" of drawing the gig to church. "Enticed"—we must go back again—"with much expenditure of persuasive words by Martin, and knowing dodges by Joe;" a union of diverse not to say opposite styles which is even surpassed in the case of still a third "Joe" (Mr. Daryl not being fertile in names). This last Joseph rose from prayer, "no longer the craven and coward, afraid to meet the ills of life, but ready to grin and bear them." Nor do we find worth or novelty enough in these stories to keep the author from seeming a bore, which we dare say he is considered in his own country. The woodcuts are in the highest style of primitive art.

A somewhat laborious examination of Miss McKeever's collection has enabled us to pronounce at least a tenth of it to have no relation to children, suggestively, subjectively, or objectively, and nearly the whole of it to be eminently unsuited for the compiler's purpose—"to put into the hands of children as a class-book;" i.e., "children between the ages of eight and fourteen." And we can further say that the pretensions to accuracy advanced in the preface are not borne out. We have not made comparisons with the originals, but trust our critical instinct when we denounce page 80 for two gross misprints, and page 81 for fatal mispunctuation, Wordsworth and Longfellow being the sufferers. Miss McKeever's introductory verses are perhaps the worst in the book—which, as she gives seven other pieces of her own, is saying a great deal. No less than seven stanzas (four in succession) are disfigured, though not spoiled, by rhymes like this: teens and seen, gems and them, lays and away, friend and sends, books and Cook, tales and stale, loved and above. One we may applaud for this naive confession:

> "Some very young poets are singing
> In this volume their innocent lays;"

but a little further on we are startled by this paradox:

> "We shall sing the sweet poems of Cowper,
> The poet so pure and so good,
> Who tells us bright animal stories,
> In his own tender, beautiful mood."

"Young ladies between fourteen and twenty" will beware of "School girls with the Poets," which Miss McKeever has in preparation.

We mention "The Orphans' Trials," a Sunday-school story, only to say—and our remarks will perhaps apply to many of the same class—that as it is calculated to reach children chiefly through its influence on their parents, it cannot properly be called a book for children. On this account we forbear to criticise it and others like it, more than to say of this one that it appears to be founded on real occurrences rather than to have been improvised purely from the religious sentiment.

The three square little green books—"Hector," and "Zoe," and "John"—with designs by Frölich, would have been better without the "text by mamma." The pictures are quite charming and have only the drawback of illustrating rather poor stories. The disorderly "John" of the title-page is infinitely preferable to the hypocritical-looking student at the end. We also enter our protest against the plan of making cruel boys better by dwelling, either in words or in pictures, on the deeds of other cruel boys. As well can you make men more virtuous by publishing Police Gazettes and having public hangings. The animals in this series will give great pleasure to children. The figures of several of the boys and girls are drawn with much spirit.

"Ruth Lovell" is more than a story with a moral — it is full of morals; there is a moral to every chapter, a moral to every conversation The two little girls at home for the holidays are inveigled at every turn into discussions on Time and Eternity, and Heaven and Industry, and other kindred themes. The sugar to this medicine is in the jocular flights of one of the children, which may possibly be enjoyed as wit by the youngest and more imbecile readers. The little girls who are to receive this book as a Christmas gift had better be those who have "gone up head" on definitions, for they are required to understand what "capillaceous" means, and "pachydermatous," "incipient," "ignominiously," etc., etc.

Any boy will be glad to get "Appletons' Juvenile Annual." It is handsome without and full of entertaining variety within. It is a selection of all sorts of (short) stories from all sorts of sources, from a legend of King Arthur to "Reuben Pettingill," by Artemus Ward. There is something about gorillas, and the devil-fish, and the Indians, something about hunting and fighting, and the indispensable story about General Washington is not wanting. There are 39 illustrations, and in short, to quote the publishers' advertisement, it may be considered a "sumptuous annual."

"Washed Ashore" is a tolerably good story of a kind which is always sure to interest children. It is full of incident and adventure by sea and land; ghosts, smugglers, one-armed sailors, underground passages, desert islands, shipwrecked vessels; with all suggestive things of this nature its pages are well crowded. It is not, of course, designed for very young readers; but children of twelve years old or so will mightily enjoy it, and after the first page or two there is not much that they will care to skip. There is now and then a long word which may be too much for them, and a little technical moralizing which might, perhaps, have been dispensed with; but, on the whole, the book is very well adapted to the tastes and capacities of children.

It would be pleasant to be able to say as much for "The Cricket's Friends;" but after the first two or three chapters, in which the Spider and the Wasp talk a little about their own habits and those of some of their near connections, the book becomes quite too absurd to inflict upon children of ordinary intelligence. The idea of it, which is that a club composed of such incongruous members as the tea-kettle, the saucepan, the caterpillar, the spider, and the wasp meet in a kitchen every evening for mutual entertainment, is not, to begin with, a very promising one, although something might have been made of it in the way of adapting to their easy comprehension some of those facts in natural history which most children listen so eagerly. But after a very little and very poor work of this kind to make the spider begin a romantic tale in this fashion:—

"Beyond the Frith of Clyde, the Kyles of Bute cleaving their way among grey cliffs, tapestried with mosses and richly clothed with lichens, past Loch Ridan's clear waters, lies the Peninsula of Cantyre, on the bosom of the Atlantic, lies a group of islets, varied in hue and form—the Hebrides;" . . .

and to hear the wasp and caterpillar follow suit in a style equally ambitious, is to count too confidently on the ease with which children may be deluded.

"I Will," is another stupid little book, which a discriminating Santa Claus will doubtless deposit only in the stockings of naughty boys and girls, along with the switches and the lumps of coal which sadly imitate the toys and sugar-plums and fairy tales reserved for better and happier children. We fear, though, that even to the most flagrant violators of nursery decorum its dreary sermonings and its dull narrations would prove less salutary than depressing.

Mrs. Diaz understands her audience better, and gives them a fairy tale which they will be sure to find sufficiently "entertaining" to justify its title. "The Entertaining Story of King Brondé" is simple and pretty, with plenty of the orthodox fairy-tale incident and sentiment, and may be safely commended to holiday-book buyers.

ILLUSTRATED GIFT-BOOKS.*

JULES MICHELET'S tender-hearted and agitated books upon Love, Woman, The Sea, The Bird—treatises in the minor key and with much shuddering of shrill violin notes—are the works by which he is best known in this city. Several of them have been very well translated. It may be that "L'Oiseau" has been translated and published in America. At all events, here comes a London edition of it, under the title of "The Bird," and decorated with woodcut illustrations.

The French edition, in octavo, published by Hachette and imported by F. W. Christern, contains the same illustrations, and, in fact, may be considered as the original of this one. A careful comparison of the French and the English books shows a slight superiority in the French impressions of the engravings, whether expressive of the difference between the wood blocks and electrotypes of them or between earlier and later impressions from the blocks, there is no need of enquiring, nor is the superiority of primary importance. The engraving has been very well done, and, in general, in a simple and satisfactory way.

We had no knowledge of Mr. Giacomelli, as a designer, before the appearance of the French edition of this book, two or three years ago, nor have we since met with any other works illustrated by him. The two hundred and ten pictures in this volume are nearly all interesting; there is not one of those devoted to the birds—that is to say, not one except the rather trifling borders to some of the pages—which it is not a pleasure to examine. The picture on page 147 of the Cairene street spanned by poles reaching from house to house, upon which and upon every frieze, jutty, and coign of vantage the turtle-doves are perched in scores, while others are on the wing, is touching and poetical, in spite of the exceeding simplicity of the design and its inartificial light and shade. Passing by numerous clever small ones, how capital is the freedom and spirit of that on page 163, with the astonished dog and composed raven! And the pictures with less of a story to tell, with only the look of the creatures to record, are the best of all. The flock of birds flying toward us out of the sky on page 81, and the gallant herons on the wing on page 111, are almost as light in the air and as swift in pictured flight as the wonderful birds of the best Japanese designs, from which store-house, indeed, the heron with drooping wing, on page 109, seems to have been immediately drawn. Nearly all the foreign birds of unusual and unfamiliar aspect are well rendered. The puffins, auks, and South American princes of plumage are very successful. It is very probable that some great menagerie like the Jardin des Plantes, and probably the Jardin itself, has furnished the models for these studies.

Within a certain limit, then, these pictures of birds and little animals are good and true. Compared with the greater number of modern illustrations they are good; but it requires only a little study of Japanese work of the best kind to show how far an uncivilized people can go in the same direction; it requires only a few moments over Bewick's partridges and waterbirds to remind the student of an excellence which Mr. Giacomelli has not even aimed at. Beauty of plumage, and of soft and variegated surface, he seems not to have noticed, nor are there any distant landscapes or delicate skies here and there introduced in these pictures; all accessory charm is absent; it is only the form and action of the birds that have been felt and reproduced.

But at all events the illustrations are natural, masculine, simple, compared with the book they illustrate. How a man of feeling could live among the birds and study them and not be a little more cheerful about them, we find it difficult to understand. The author is right; there is a world of horrors and cruelties among the creatures who prey upon each other; and he is still right in his rejoicings over the fitness of the birds to encounter each his trial and his task. But there is the "child's voice" of old, the quavering cry of timid anxiety which seems natural to the voice Michelet. "Gleaming solitudes where danger lurks on every side among the most venomous insects, and upon those mournful plants whose very shade kills. . . . The most terrible and fatal of trees, the spectre whose fatal glance seems to freeze your blood for ever, the deadly manchineel. . . . They swim intrepidly on this vast sea of death—this hissing, croaking, crawling sea—on the terrible miasmatic vapors, inhaling and defying them." Apart from all this "The Bird" is not very instructive. It may serve to remind a few thoughtless and unobserving people that there are things worthy thinking of and observing; but smaller things than this big book have been known to do that service, and perhaps as well as the larger.

Every new edition of Gray's Elegy is welcome. Let there be at least one such every Christmas. What thanks shall we not give to the publishers who bring it to pass that, in the midst of the bustle of crowding modern books, we have to sit down and read again the old—the young, the immortal Elegy? What can we not forgive to the pictures in which the poem is set, and because of which it is again reprinted and again sent to us in its new dress? For the sixteen color-printed pictures in this book are not very valuable aids to our enjoyment of the poem. They are not very accurately adapted to it, and rather obscure than illustrate its beauty. "Yonder ivy-mantled tower," which we have always supposed the church-tower overlooking the famous "Country Churchyard," appears in this book pictorially as a ruined and roofless castle, with flanking turrets. The "long drawn aisle and fretted vault" are represented not as when filled with the "pealing anthem" which "swells the note of praise," but deserted, except for a genuine English verger victimizing a visitor, and one or two unexplained solitaries in the far distance. Why is it always assumed that "the little tyrant of the fields" means a tyrant of tender years—a little boy resisting gallantly and thrashing a big boy? It is more probable that "little tyrant" is only a "petty tyrant," some squireen of the unamiable kind that in the English country districts especially flourishes.

The landscapes are the worst of the illustrations; the figure subjects with large figures, as notably those illustrating "Their homely joys and destiny obscure," and

"On some fond breast the parting soul relies," are much better, and in the original drawings must have been very interesting. The block printing is not well done, and the prints are very rough, and of a chopped-straw texture not pleasant to look upon.

The best part of the book, and a feature which gives it value, is the fac-simile of the original manuscript of the poem. A note says: "The manuscript from which the present fac-simile has been made is the only existing draught of the poem, the autograph at Pembroke House, Cambridge, being manifestly a fair copy made by the poet, probably for circulation among his friends. This draught formed a portion of the papers bequeathed by Gray to his friend and biographer, Mason." The fac-simile tells us some interesting things about the poem. It seems that Gray had written

"The rude forefathers of the village sleep," when a natural second thought made him alter "village" to "hamlet." And the next stanza began, in continuation of the thought,

"For ever sleep; the breezy call of morn," etc.

There are a great many such discrepancies between the manuscript and the printed versions, and among them appear four stanzas always omitted in printed copies, and known to but few readers. The MS. title is

"Stanzas wrote in a Country Church-Yard."

Mr. Darley's preface announces that the substance of his book is the private letters he wrote from abroad, and that "at the suggestion of a friend" he was induced to use them as a thread on which to hang the illustrations. The apology is called for. Nothing could be more commonplace than the sort of record given of the places visited and the things seen. "We saw the apartments of the Duke and Duchess of Savoy, they are quaint but unfurnished," appears to be all he has to say about the apartments in the Castle of Chillon. "A few days ago we finished Switzerland, having visited many places of interest; among them," etc., etc. "The interior seems to me a little overloaded with ornament and small forms, as well as variety of color, the effect of which destroys the idea of space and simplicity." The author writes as if he had no knowledge whatever of the history of the fine arts or of the principles of artistic criticism. For him a cathedral is "a delicious bit of antiquity," and the Pre-Raphaelites are the painters before Raphael. The only striking sentence in the whole book is a remark on the way one suddenly finds one's self wearied out in looking at great works of art. As for the numerous pictures, there are good heads here and there, as the priest on page 63, the painter on page 83, the waiter on page 184, and, on page 98, the gentleman called by Thackeray's Chawls "Sawedwadlitnbulwig." The bits of incident are often amusing in subject, but nearly always spoiled by excessive mannerism. The drawings of architecture, ruins, streets, and the like, are nearly always very slight and valueless.

Some gift-books are valuable not only in themselves, strictly speaking, but because they bring before the people once again and in a new dress the noble poems which people ought to be incited to read. This remark is only to a certain extent applicable to books of selections. "Woodside and Seaside"—as a gathering of English woodcuts by many hands, with the addition of a few by Americans, all illustrating a very miscellaneous collection of poems, and the whole not too accurately named by the title of the book—needs whatever apology can be offered for it. Being a gift-book of the most pronounced character, it must show that it is also something more than a gift-book, or else be thrown over the edge of the table into the waste-basket. The woodcuts cannot save it. They belong, indeed, to that class of modern English work which makes our illustrated books less ridiculous than of old, and fills them with kindly and gentle studies of humanity, and respectful, if not loving, renderings of landscape. But they are not very good of their kind, and it is now so easy to get better ones that these are hardly worth mention. Moreover, they are not generally in good condition, but seem to be either fac-similes made here or worn cuts imported; at least, very few of them are good, and none are excellent as woodcuts. We find the excuse for the book's existence in Shelley's hymn or invocation—

"Swiftly walk over the western waves, Spirit of Night;"

in Wordsworth's "Skylark" and in Cowper's "The Dog and the Water-Lily" in the first place, and, in the second place, in Dickens's "Ivy Green," not often enough seen out of "Pickwick," and Beaumont and Fletcher's "Folding the Flocks," almost never seen out of their works. As for the Tennyson extracts, one is a little too much a piece of stock poetry, and the other is a bit picked out of a longer poem, a dislocation not to be praised. Except for purposes of singing, we cannot enjoy even or the hymn to Sabrina, separated from their context.

The Trotting-Horse of America: How to Train and Drive him; with Reminiscences of the Trotting-Turf. By Hiram Woodruff. (New York: J. B. Ford & Co. 1868.)—He who knows anything of the history of horses in America must have heard of Hiram Woodruff. It was he more than any other man who developed the American horse's surpassing capacity for speed and endurance in harness, and who was not only the trainer and driver of the most distinguished animals, but who is conceded to have held the supremacy in his profession. The record of his experience and suggestions constitutes, therefore, a valuable accession to our knowledge, and will prove to be of standard authority among the most skilful. The graphic style of his descriptions, the vivid pictures he draws of the breeding and education of his favorites, and the reminiscences he recalls of incidents on the turf, form a work of great merit. Nor are the biographies of nearly all the celebrated horses that have appeared in public, "hitched" or under the saddle, for the last thirty years the least attractive feature of this volume.

The author discusses every branch of the horse's education and the reciprocal duties to be performed to him by his master. These branches are numerous, but they cannot be dwelt upon in this place. Some of them inculcate minute directions in regard to feeding, to working, to exposure, to sweating and physic, according to temper, disposition, age, or other circumstances and peculiar character. No definite rules are laid down to govern absolutely in all cases, but maxims are stated which it is well to bear in mind and generally to follow. The most gentle treatment is at all times strenuously recommended; nor is a trainer to be trusted who is not of an amiable disposition. To gain supreme command over the pupil, it is imperative that the teacher have a like command over himself.

Those who are desirous to form an accurate idea of the characteristics of the trotting-horse for their benefit as riders or drivers cannot find any other work in our language so replete with useful information, interesting hints, and readable anecdotes. Hiram Woodruff is now dead, and it will be many a year before we shall look upon his equal in his line of business.

The Week.

ON the 8th of the month the Senate did little more than ask the President for information concerning Minister Washburn's affair with Lopez. On Wednesday the session was a short one. The President sent in his message, and but a little of it had been read when Mr. Conness, who is not the most cold-blooded of men, moved that the further reading be dispensed with. He pronounced Mr. Johnson's language, where he speaks of certain Congressional enactments as being unconstitutional, to be insulting and unendurable. There was a good deal of talk on the one side and the other, and Mr. Edmunds finally moved to adjourn, which the Senate did. On Thursday, Senators had had time to think the matter over, to see that they were aggrandizing Mr. Johnson more than there was any need, and probably to see, too, that Congress is not so exclusively the legislative branch of the Government that the President may not have his say concerning acts, as he has concerning bills. At all events, the message was ordered to be read, and then Senator Frelinghuysen rose and delivered a carefully prepared and not ungraceful eulogium on the Congressional policy of reconstruction, and the party which approves it. On the same day there was a long debate on the House bill to transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department. There is very little doubt that this will be done, and none at all that it ought to be done. Mr. Hendricks, however, opposed it, and so did Mr. Doolittle, each asserting that, though there might be corruption in the present management of Indian affairs, there would be as much if army officers were entrusted with the expenditures. This, although it is notorious that no greater rascals disgrace the public service than Indian agents and commissioners. The whiskey ring steals more in a given length of time: but the Indian agents not only steal: they steal from starving people; and not only that, but their robbery of the ignorant savages helps, every little while, to set them loose on the white settlers, whom the Indians kill with powder and ball that the agencies have very likely furnished them. The bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, some of whom were indignant that there should be any talk of referring it to the Committee on Military Affairs, which latter body is all ready to report upon it favorably. The former will not, however, be able to pigeon-hole the matter this time, as was the case a couple of years ago. On Monday of this week the Senate received the petition of the Union League Club of this city asking for a committee to investigate the late election frauds in New York. Mr. Morton brought forward the financial bill he has been working on.

Senator Morton's bill prohibits all future sales of gold coin, and directs the accumulation of such specie as the Treasury may not need to pay its debts until Jan. 1, 1870, at which date the Secretary is to redeem in coin all United States notes and fractional currency "that may be presented for redemption," and is to issue a new loan. The banks are to resume two years later. The absence from the bill of any directing rule as to the amount of coin the Secretary is to have in his hands when he begins to redeem, renders the measure utterly illusory, if not mischievous. Whether the attempt to return to specie payments in 1870 will prove a failure or a success, depends on the proportion which the amount of coin the Government may have in its possession, derived either from surplus revenue or from the sale of new bonds, bears on the appointed day to the paper that is to be taken up. If it has not by that time succeeded in securing from some source or other at least $130,000,000, or, as many would probably insist, $200,000,000, in gold, not needed for the payment of its debts or the expenses of administration, the proposed redemption will prove, as we pointed out last week, a fiasco on a great scale. In fact, long before that time the real state of the case would be so plain to everybody that if the requisite amount did not seem likely to be forthcoming, the Morton bill would probably be repealed. Any bill providing for resumption, to be effective, and not to impose on the public, must provide, first, for the accumulation of money in the Treasury, either by savings or fresh loans, and then for redemption, not on a fixed day, but when the amount of specie accumulated bears a certain proportion to the amount of greenbacks to be redeemed. There is no good reason for waiting a year to resume, if the means can be had sooner.

---

The House began the week by rejecting with contumely some impudent resolutions of the Oregon Legislature. That assembly requested the Senators of the State to resign, as being persons who had assisted in tyrannizing over the South. Mr. Fernando Wood thought the request was not at all "scandalous, impertinent, and indecorous," but the House took Mr. Washburne's view of it. The House afterwards passed the Indian Bureau bill by a majority of 83; referred to the Judiciary Committee a bill offered by General Butler to repeal the Tenure-of-Office Act; and finally listened to some remarks from Mr. Robinson—known as "Fenian Robinson"—who thought that the United States should at once declare war against the United Kingdom. Mr. Fernando Wood felt compelled to join with his colleague in urging the same request, horrible as war is. The House adjourned without taking action in the matter. On the 9th instant, Mr. Bingham, of the Reconstruction Committee, introduced a bill providing for the holding of an election in Virginia on the 20th of January. A long debate followed, and finally an amendment was adopted, which sets the 20th of May next as the time of election. This was General Butler's proposal. He took the ground that next month the laborers would have to make their annual contracts with their employers, and would be greatly at their master's mercy; whereas in May they would be able to live whether their masters set them adrift or not. The first statement seems just. As for the second, May is a good month for the proposed purpose, because just at that season masters will not feel at all disposed to set their hirelings adrift, though if that should happen there would be a vast deal of what the negroes call "tight livin'" before the corn came in, and probably some little starving.

The debate on this subject was interrupted by the receipt of the President's message, which was read and treated with contempt. The repudiation part of it called forth from Mr. Broomall a denunciatory resolution, and from Mr. Schenck and other members several speeches, which will prevent the President's doctrine from doing any harm at home or abroad. On Thursday, the Military Committee proposed that one or more institutions of learning in each State should be supplied with a detailed officer of the army, who shall give instruction in military matters. After the recess, on Monday last, the House instructed the Reconstruction Committee to investigate the Ku-Klux outrages in Tennessee. On the same day Mr. Broomall's resolution, declaring that all forms of repudiation are odious to the American people, was adopted. The vote on suspending the rules so as to allow of its introduction was a party vote, and stood 135 to 29. The vote on moving the previous question—which passed the resolution—showed a still heavier majority, there being only six voices in the negative. In the Senate, when this matter came up, there appeared to be a greater proportional number of persons who are not yet convinced of the truth of the proposition above laid down. Mr. Fernando Wood offered a resolution, which was adopted, directing the Committee on Public Expenditures to find out the facts about the alleged improper use of two millions of dollars of the Alaska purchase money. Finally, before adjourning, the Secretary of State was asked to inform the House if he has sent a commissioner to Spain, and if so, why.

Mr. Johnson's message appeared just after we had gone to press last week, but though it created a disturbance on a small scale, both in the House and the Senate, and has been the subject of a good deal of comment in the press, there was hardly anything in it worth recalling at this date. He reiterated, almost in the old language, his objections to the Congressional plan of reconstruction, treating the acts passed in furtherance of it as unconstitutional, with as much coolness and gravity as if the question had never come up or been discussed before. He then propounded a scheme for the repudiation of the public debt, which is, in some respects, better than Pendleton's, inasmuch as it involves the payment of gold instead of paper; but it is, on the whole, more impudent than any plan of repudiation yet devised. It consists in an arrangement with the bondholders, by which all payments of interest shall be counted as payments of principal, so that a bondholder, who receives six dollars a year for sixteen years and a fraction, shall be considered as having received full payment of one hundred dollars of principal. Mr. Johnson's chief argument in favor of this scheme is, that if the creditors do not agree to be cheated to this extent, the debtors will, probably, and not unreasonably, cheat them outright. We see, however, that Brick Pomeroy claims the idea as his, and having two newspapers at his disposal, will probably manage to eclipse Mr. Johnson, and hand himself down to posterity as its real author. The message shed no light on the Alabama negotiations, to aid in which Caleb Cushing has been sent over, Mr. Reverdy Johnson having apparently alarmed the State Department.

Senator Wilson has brought in a bill increasing the number of Judges of the Supreme Court to fourteen, besides the Chief-Justice. The New York Tribune says that "the bill finds a motive in the undoubted pressure of work upon the present reduced number of judges; but it is probable that the suddenly developed and unexpected conservatism of several of the judges appointed by Mr. Lincoln will add force to the movement." This will be either the third or fourth attempt to tinker the Supreme Court for party purposes, and we have no doubt there is sense enough in Congress to defeat it. The number of judges was reduced about a year ago to prevent Mr. Johnson filling a vacancy. Then, in order to prevent a decision hostile to the reconstruction acts, an attempt was made to make a two-thirds vote necessary to a decision declaring laws unconstitutional, in order to paralyze the supposed "conservative" majority. None of these attacks on the independence of the Court had any result beyond alarming and disgusting the public, and contributing to Republican defeats at the polls. Nobody who knows anything of the moral condition of political circles at this moment in Washington, of the overwhelming influence of "rings" on legislation, would see without the utmost alarm the manipulation of the Court, with a view to influencing its decisions, by whichever party happened to have the majority. What the Republicans do this year by way of increasing or diminishing the number of judges for their purposes, the Democrats would do next for theirs; and we should soon see the Court converted into the most contemptible engine of corruption and demoralization ever witnessed in a civilized country. A judge reduced to the condition of a "creature," either of a king or a party, is a loathsome sight; but the sight of a whole bench reduced to the condition of creatures of "a whiskey ring," for instance, would be something indescribably sad; and we say deliberately that if the tinkering of the Court for party purposes be persisted in, there is every probability that this sight we shall at last see in the seat of Marshall and Story. One of the unfortunate results of the Republican assaults on the Court last winter is that to make it safe even to enlarge the number of the judges, so as to lighten the labor of the present incumbents, we shall have to wait for calmer times, when no political issues are likely to come up for judicial decision.

Mr. G. W. Curtis has been delivering his lecture on "Political Morality," in Boston, and we learn from the report of the local press that during its delivery about half the audience were "uneasy," owing, doubtless, to his allusions to the outcry against Mr. Fessenden. We have no doubt whatever that when Mr. Curtis receives reinforcements in his attacks on corruption and immorality, as he will before long, from the other lecturers, this phenomenon of "uneasiness" on the part of audiences will be just as common as it was in the anti-slavery agitation down to the outbreak of the war. At first, two-thirds were "uneasy," when slavery was denounced, or even mentioned; then only one-half; then only one-third; and now anybody who chooses to declaim on the equality of men is received with "the wildest enthusiasm;" in other words, nobody is made "uneasy." So will it be with the doctrine that individual conscience is of more value to the nation than party discipline. In forming our judgment about the attacks on Mr. Fessenden, the question of his guilt or innocence is of secondary consequence. The theory preached by his assailants was, that all talk of "conscience" on the part of a politician, no matter who he was, acting against his party, even in a judicial proceeding, was "cant," and impudent cant at that. Now the truth is that this happens to be "a doctrine of devils," and, if generally adopted, would ruin any government ever set up, and a democratic government sooner than any other. It has, therefore, to be denounced, the wriggling of radical "moralists" on their seats to the contrary notwithstanding; and the more they wriggle, the more closely, we trust, the lecturers of the future will stick to the point. The "uneasiness" is simply a sign that the medicine is operating. In this city you cannot denounce judicial corruption without perceiving signs of trouble amongst the audience, but judicial corruption is for all that a bad thing.

Mr. Henry C. Carey replies to M. Benard, in the November number of the Journal des Economistes, with reference to the charge made against him by the latter of having defended slavery at two meetings of the Political Economy Society, in Paris, showing, and, as well as we can judge, conclusively, that what he did do was to defend gradual as opposed to immediate emancipation. His evidence, beyond his own recollection, is somewhat imperfect, but it is strong, and, taken in connection with his utterances elsewhere about slavery, leaves no room for doubt. Moreover, M. Benard does not reply. Mr. Carey then replies to M. Benard's insinuation regarding the connection between slavery and protection, and, amongst other propositions, makes the extraordinary one that the tide of emigration to this country rises and falls with the tariff. Mr. Carey displays on this point the same contempt for elementary logic which he has shown in his discussion of the question of literary property. A good illustration of the way he reasons is to be found in the fact that he passes over in complete silence the state of things in the country which the emigrant leaves, as if that had nothing whatever to do with their emigration; for instance, he ascribes the prodigious exodus from Ireland in 1847, the year following the great famine, to the working of the American tariff of 1842.

The Free Trader, of this city, seems, in the matter of reasoning, to be one of Mr. Carey's disciples. It berates the Nation savagely for pronouncing "absurd" M. Benard's suggestion that a protectionist must necessarily be a friend of slavery, and argues with great vehemence that protection being one form of robbery, and slavery another, there is nothing at all "absurd" in asserting that a friend of high tariffs is presumptively an advocate of forced labor. This reminds us of a story, whether true or invented by a wag we cannot say, of an abolitionist who maintained on the platform, in the old days of the agitation, that anybody who so far countenanced the United States Constitution as even to drop a letter into the mail, only needed the opportunity to become a pirate or a highway robber. If the Free Trader supposes it is going to convert the public to any rational opinion by wild nonsense of this sort, it will find itself greatly mistaken. Even if it be true that the principle of protection and that of slavery are the same, protectionists are no more logical than high Calvinists, or Berkeleyans, or any other holders of troublesome theories. In arguing for free trade as for everything else, if persuasion is the object aimed at, the facts of life must be admitted, else the argument becomes rant and the audience laugh. People know that there are thousands of protectionists in the United States who hate slavery, and, knowing it, when they read such "demonstrations" as the one we are discussing in the Free Trader, they use the periodical to wrap their groceries in and vote for a high tariff.

The Supreme Court of Hamburg has rendered a decision exculpating Herr Sloman, the owner of the vessel, for the dreadful suffering on board the Leibnitz, during its memorable voyage to this port, where it arrived with its passengers decimated by contagion, and reduced, as was alleged, by insufficient and spoiled food, overcrowding, and bad ventilation; as well as on its recent voyage to Quebec under a changed name (the Liebig), when out of 534 passengers 40 died, amid similar complaints of bad treatment. The public here, however, were convinced at the time that a fearful responsibility rested upon those who sent the vessel to sea in such a condition, and will learn of this decision not only with surprise but almost with incredulity. Nevertheless, Herr Sloman, whose wealth, as perhaps the largest shipper in all Germany, may possibly have influenced the court in its decision, sends a triumphant circular to the German press with the evidence of his acquittal, and endeavors to fix upon a certain class of emigrants the charge of exciting discontent where no reasonable ground for it exists. Singularly enough, the case appears to turn on the nature of the disease whose ravages were so tremendous; since, if it was typhus, as asserted by the German physicians here, then the fault must have lain in the vessel; if cholera, as Herr Sloman insists and the Bremen expert decided, then the outbreak of it was due to Providence, even though it took place in mid ocean, after nine months' cessation of the disease in Germany. The vessel seems to have kept just within the limits of the law.

We made a slip last week in calling the Hartford Post "General Hawley's paper," the fact being that the Courant is General Hawley's paper, and that he has no connection with the Post, as we really knew very well. We suppose we owe, for this error, an apology to the editor of the Post, and to anybody else who feels aggrieved. The Courant is an excellent paper, and so is the Post, and General Hawley is an excellent and distinguished man, and this being the case, there cannot be much harm done in any quarter.

The republicans of Cadiz have come very near turning the Spanish revolution into a repulsive and shabby imitation of the French tragedy of 1848–9. They have apparently little patience and little faith in discussion, and would not wait for the meeting of the Constituent Cortes, and, growing tired of arguing with the monarchists, took arms and for a few days held the town against the troops. Luckily they have surrendered without much bloodshed. In so far as the incident has produced any effect on the public mind, it has probably strengthened the hands of the monarchists; and if Prim be really intriguing for the crown, or wishes to force a monarchical form of government on the country, those republicans who advocate an appeal to arms are simply playing into his hands. He has the army well in hand, and the army cares nothing about "your right side or your wrong side," as John Leech's big drayman in Punch says to the driver of the pony wagon. Moreover, when it comes to fighting, the mass of timid people in every country begin to long for a "strong government," and instinctively get behind the big battalions. The outbreak furnishes an additional reason for desiring foreign sympathizers to stop sending burning manifestoes to the Spaniards, telling them what form of government to set up. The sensible portion of the Spanish people won't mind these sage counsels, while the Reds and madcaps may be incited by them into violence. The Republican Committee of Madrid has issued a proclamation acknowledging that since the expulsion of Isabella the party has lost many of its ablest and most distinguished adherents, but denouncing constitutional monarchy in strong though not unjust language, showing the fallacy of the doctrine that it is suited to every people or every state of society. Unfortunately the same arguments might be used against republicanism. The address is composed in the inflated style which now seems to be the one universally adopted by Continental liberals, and, to those who believe in the connection between language and thought, is not pleasant or hopeful reading. The popular loan of $100,000,000, which started so well, is likely to prove a great failure.

The desire for grand changes which for years has been agitating the thin upper layer of Russian society, the layer containing all its more or less civilized and progressive elements, continues to manifest itself in its peculiar crude and eccentric manner. We hear again of socialistic conspiracies emanating from the "nihilistic" centres at Moscow and Kiev. Ladies of high rank are agitating for the establishment of a Woman's University. At the same time the favorite organs of both radical and fashionable circles not only applaud the crusade waged by the Government against everything Polish or Catholic, as well as the gradual restriction of the German-Protestant and Jewish populations, but vehemently condemn the "leniency" with which the work of Russification is managed in the empire; and this at a moment when the Polish priests transported to Siberia are being removed to more remote regions of that wilderness; when the tens of thousands of Lithuanians carried there a few years ago are declared to be Siberian "settlers" for ever; when the Polish students of Wilna are compelled to exchange their prayer-books for others in Russian in which prayers for the Czar are substituted for patriotic invocations; when the Catholic villagers of Grodno and Kovno are being escorted by military force into the churches to listen to a Russianized ritual, and similar measures are daily decreed and executed in every part of the western provinces—measures the like of which have not been attempted since Philip II. extirpated the religion and nationality of the Moriscoes.

Dr. Vámbéry, the celebrated Hungarian traveller, announced, some weeks ago, in a letter to the London Times, that the arrival at St. Petersburg of an envoy from the Khan of Khokand, a region of Eastern Turkestan, was due to the fact, not that this potentate loved Russia, but that he is threatened with dethronement by an unpleasant person named Yakoob Kooshbeghi, who holds sway in Chinese Tartary on his eastern frontier, and who is stirring up against him all the furious fanatics of his own dominions. The envoy of the Khan has, of course, been received right royally, and the acquisition of Khokand as a fief will bring the Russian troops to the feet of the Karakorum Pass in the Eastern Himalayas. More recently has come the news, which is now throwing British India into a ferment, that the Eastern Himalayas, which were supposed to be impassable for an army, have been discovered by Mr. T. D. Forsyth, a civil servant, to be very passable indeed; that the grades by one pass at least—Chanchenmoo—are so easy that a railroad might be made over it, while by that of Karakorum troops can readily pass with artillery, and eastern Turkestan is found to be so rich, that an army moving southward can advance in plenty to the foot of the mountains. It is the ruler of this very region who is now making his submission at St. Petersburg. Moreover, the Chinese, who are, however, we regret, on their account, to say, suspected of lying, assert the Czar has already secured a cantonment at a place called Gurmah, which commands all the passes. Sir John Lawrence, the Viceroy, is accordingly deliberating whether it is time to fight now or to negotiate, the danger being that Russia may use her position in the Himalayas to paralyze British resistance to her designs on Constantinople. The authorities at home are so alarmed that the new ministry have determined —so say the latest telegrams—to subject poor Lord Mayo to the humiliation of a recall almost before he reaches India; to retain Sir John Lawrence in the Governor-Generalship one year longer; and then to replace him by a really able man, the Earl of Salisbury. There is talk, too, of a convention of some kind with Russia, to fix the possible boundaries between the two empires.

THE PRESIDENT'S LAST MESSAGE.

Mr. Johnson's last message has been calling forth, during the past week, a good deal of laughter and indignation; but it is, nevertheless, a valuable contribution to the history of the times, and will probably shed more light for future generations on the story of his quarrels with Congress than any other state paper which the crisis has produced. It is of some importance—indeed, we might say, of a good deal of importance—to the Republican party, both for the sake of its name and memory, and for the sake of its present influence, to justify the estimate of his character on which its hostility to him during the last three years has been based. Now, his "policy," his speeches and messages, and conversations with reporters, bad as many of them were, did not, for various reasons, furnish convincing evidence on this point to the world at large. The notion by which he became possessed when he took office, that it was his business to have a "policy" in the matter of reconstruction and to carry it out, was one which came to him in regular succession from Mr. Lincoln along with the Presidential office. Mr. Lincoln held it and acted on it, with the concurrence of Congress and the approval of the people, having acquired it naturally enough through the exaltation given to the executive branch of the Government by the war. A great many doubtful things had to be covered by the "war power," and of this power the commander-in-chief of the army and navy naturally secured the lion's share. Therefore, Mr. Johnson's undertaking to reconstruct under his own hand and seal really did not shock or alarm Radical leaders till they found out that he was not a Radical. It was then, and then only, that they fell back on the constitutional limitations to executive authority, and then, too, for the first time, the Democrats, who had been for four years thundering against Mr. Lincoln's usurpations, became enamored of executive discretion, and began to fight against Congressional government. Still, Mr. Johnson would probably have been completely beaten in the eyes of all parties after a little discussion, if Congress had merely sought to assert its own exclusive authority over reconstruction. It was the peculiar kind of reconstruction resolved on—that is, reconstruction based on negro suffrage—which secured for the President the continued support of the Democratic party, and brought him out of the contest on this particular point, vanquished indeed, but not confuted—that is to say, he had very nearly half the voting population of the North still on his side; and foolish as his pertinacity in urging his opinion on Congress undoubtedly was, from a practical point of view, it wore, to a vast number of people, the appearance of honest firmness displayed in a good cause.

Circumstances favored him in somewhat the same way as regarded his outrageous speeches on his Western journey. They were, it was admitted on all hands, disgraceful, but the excesses of many of his prominent opponents in Congress in the same direction made their indignation seem partisan merely, and diminished very materially the darkness of his offence in the eyes of the public. There was, everybody felt in his secret heart, something a little absurd in the spectacle of his prosecution or persecution for the use of bad language, at the hands of persons like Thaddeus Stevens, General Butler, or Mr. Bingham. So, also, the impeachment lost all moral weight from the outset, owing to the fact that the particular offence which had brought the prosecution on him was one created for him specially, as a sort of trap, by avowed political enemies; the greater portion of the articles, and the very ones on which the managers afterwards most relied, having actually been pronounced untenable by some of the leading promoters of the process a few short months previously in the House. Moreover, the pains taken by the Republican politicians and newspapers to magnify his guilt, helped him all along. Their language was so extravagant and so often repeated that people at last began to laugh, and the crisis was then over. It was impossible to keep calling a man with whom a very large proportion of the American people sympathized "the greatest criminal of the age" without at last bringing about a reaction, and impossible to put up Messrs. Butler and Bingham to abuse him for the foulness of his tongue without making him seem a victim. He unquestionably gained in popular estimation every day the trial lasted. All that was wanted to give him the rank and honor of a martyr, to absolve him from his past sins and start him afresh in public life, was his conviction and removal. This the vote of the "guilty seven" prevented. The good luck which presided over their "treachery" was dimly seen by some far-seeing people then; it has been growing plainer and plainer ever since. This last message of his has made it as clear as noonday. What the determined pursuit of the Republicans failed to do for their own justification, he has done himself. He was acquitted, and has been left alone ever since. No penalty is hanging over his head. He has no longer anything either to fear from his enemies or hope from his friends, and he has, as his last official utterance, produced a disquisition on public affairs which is marked by stupidity and dishonesty in about equal measure, and really throws a flood of light on his whole course. To discuss his financial theories, or his notions of national honor or political expediency, as displayed in that document, would be a waste of time and paper.

The message, too, is important from still another point of view. Mr. Johnson's great claim—in fact, his only claim—to the nomination which he got at the Baltimore Convention, was his "soundness on the main question," and his having incurred "rebel hate for services rendered during the rebellion." He had no others. His ignorance was notorious; his violence was notorious; his personal character was on one point, and that a very important one, very doubtful. But none of these things was allowed to have any weight. He had been faithful in dark days; he had been bitterly persecuted and was bitterly hated by the rebels and Copperheads; his recent acquisition of the arts of reading and writing (those were the War-Horse days) was dwelt upon as something rather worthy of admiration; and he was put into the second place in the government. After Mr. Lincoln's death the same song was chanted. "Rebel hate" was allowed to cover everything, to cover even the "damned spot" of the 4th of March, 1865; and the extraordinary principle that a man may be safely trusted with great offices of government simply because he has managed to make himself obnoxious to the public enemy, received a kind of solemn sanction. There never was a finer opportunity offered to a human being than was offered to him; no functionary ever received kinder, heartier, or blinder support. We see now what it has all ended in. The "rebel hate" did not keep him true to his principles for six months. He was found fondling the rebels before the summer of 1865 was over. His horror of treason vanished still more rapidly.

Finally, let us bespeak for him, in these his last official hours, still more the attention of those who love "outspoken, whole-souled statesmen," and who distrust Grant because he won't talk politics. Only five years ago Mr. Johnson was their ideal man. His earnestness was of the red-hot variety. He hated "legal minds." He hated precedent and experience. He was "a man of the people." There was no doubt about his "views" on any subject, human or divine. The fountain of his "gab" never ceased to flow. Having passed his youth in blackest ignorance, having learned the alphabet from his wife, having been honored with every office in the gift of the people, and having a deadly hatred of aristocracy in all its forms, there was no problem in political science which he did not consider himself competent to solve. "Theorists" "dilettanti," and "kid-glove politicians" fled howling and discomfited when they saw him coming. And now, after his four years of experience, here he stands, counselling a very ridiculous form of repudiation, which "Brick Pomeroy," we see, claims the honor of having conceived, and pronouncing as firmly against the Congressional plan of reconstruction as the Pope against modern civilization.

THE SPANISH REVOLUTION.

Affairs in Spain have ceased to go well. The long interval which it was thought necessary to allow for the election of the Constitutional Convention is producing its legitimate result in armed collisions between the two great parties and in the shedding of blood, which seem likely to make a return to peaceful controversy very difficult, if not impossible. It is, of course, hard to say whether the delay was a misfortune simply or a fault. The theory of the Republicans seems to be that the Provisional Government, being composed in the main of monarchists, staved off the decision of the nation touching the new form of government partly because they knew the decision would be against a monarchy if taken at once, and partly because they wanted time to provide themselves with a candidate for the throne. The Provisional Government reply, on the other hand, that a nation suddenly released from an absolutist yoke is never prepared to pronounce at once on its own destinies; that it needs time for the deliberation and discussion which under the old régime were impossible; that to have ordered the assembling of the Constituent Cortes immediately after the revolution, would have caused the election of its members before the people had made up their minds either as to the persons they wished to represent them or the instructions they wished to give them, and the decision thus arrived at would be tolerably sure not to stand long, and to be followed by a period of discontent and agitation.

The discussion as to which form of government—a monarchy or a republic—the Spanish people wants or is best fitted for, still rages, and apparently does not approach a satisfactory conclusion. The weight of authority—that is, the opinion of the calmest and ablest men—seems, as we said in a former article, to be on the side of monarchy. The Republicans have, however, the greatest number of agitators, owing to their strength in the great towns and amongst the professors and students. From the peasantry—that is, the bulk of the population—we have as yet no sign, or a very uncertain one. In judging of the form of government they want, we have to rely in a great measure on deductions from their character, habits, and political history, and yet there is probably no people in Europe about whose history, character, and habits foreigners know so little, or can learn so little, by any of the ordinary modes. Very few of the letters in the newspapers from Spain during the present crisis throw much light on the state of the popular mind in any place but Madrid; and of the political and constitutional history of Spain not one writer in fifty seems to have any knowledge whatever. The only articles in the foreign press which really help foreigners to a thorough understanding of the situation, because they are clearly from the pen of a man of the highest political culture, and who, if not a Spaniard himself, knows Spain thoroughly, have appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette under the signature of "Plus Ultra."

His theory is that the expulsion of Isabella is not really much of a revolution after all; that there is not a single reform which is now talked of as one of its consequences, which was not legally accomplished long ago; and that what the nation is now doing is returning to its old path of constitutional progress. He says there has been for half a century no legally established church in Spain and no monasteries; that the monasteries over whose destruction such a fuss is making have grown up in defiance of the law, through the guilty connivance of the Queen; that the absence of freedom of worship has been due not to the tyranny of the Catholic majority, but to the absence of Protestants; that all Spaniards are either Catholics or infidels, and that therefore no demand for formal toleration has ever come from any portion of the Spanish people, while the interference of foreign Bible societies has been resented as an impertinence; that there is no country in Europe in which freedom of opinion on religious as well as other subjects is so general; that, for instance, there is no European country in which a man's religious opinions, no matter how openly he declares them, or how obnoxious they may be to the majority, affect his social position so little; and that, therefore, it is a mistake to suppose that any real ecclesiastical bonds have been burst by the late uprising.

Coming down to the question of the future government, he shows that the administrative machinery of Spain is, in theory, the most perfect in existence; that in so far as it fails to produce good results the failure is due to the low state of the public morals; and that therefore what is wanted is not legislative reforms, but a general raising of the moral tone through freedom and education. He says, moreover, that there is no country in which local self-government or municipal independence is more deeply rooted in the habits of the people, that they have had it for ages, and had free legislative bodies before the English Parliament was known in history, and have, and have always had, the sentiment of social equality to a degree still unknown anywhere else—unknown, we take it, even in the United States. The Spanish noble and Spanish peasant address each other as equals and think of each other as equals, so that there is no attempt at the clumsy self-assertion which is so often seen even here. To give an idea of the real historic Spanish feeling about kings, so far removed from the slavish "loyalty" which was extinguished in France at the Revolution, and is only now slowly expiring in England, he Reproduces the coronation formula of the old Spanish Cortes, under which the king took office, "We, each of us being as good as you, and the whole of us better than you, appoint you our king, that you may maintain our laws and privileges; if not, we do not." This is, in spirit, exactly what the American people say to the newly elected President.

On the showing of this writer, Spain cannot be very far from republicanism, even if she have not yet reached it, inasmuch as she has what is better than republican opinions—the republican habit of mind. In the present crisis time is undoubtedly telling in favor of the republicans. The failure of the monarchists to produce a candidate is, as we pointed out a fortnight ago, either a great misfortune or a great blunder. For monarchy itself nobody in Spain professes the least respect or admiration. Even Prim speaks of it rather as a temporary expedient, pending the coming of something better, than as per se a good form of government. On these conditions, few men of the right class are now willing to accept a crown. Since the disappearance of the feeling of personal loyalty in Europe, and the loss by kings of the old "divinity" which hedged them, the pomps of monarchy have begun to seem very ridiculous, and its cost intolerable, and dynasties have become short-lived. The Russian crown is the only one on the continent now worn by divine right, and the Russian and Austrian thrones are the only ones filled by old royal lines. Every other kingdom may be said to have hired a king on contract and to keep continually threatening him with dismissal. In England the monarch enjoys ease and consideration, solely by almost total abstinence from interference in politics. The recent experience of the Spaniards has satisfied them that whether monarchy be good or bad depends mainly on the character of the monarch. So that the preaching of the monarchical party becomes less and less effective every day that passes without their producing a candidate for the throne. The republicans, on the other hand, are doing their best to relieve them of this difficulty by taking arms and allowing the section of communists, which seems to find a place in every republican party on the Continent, to threaten property. The result is, that the timid people and people who love order—that is, the great bulk of the Spanish, as of every other civilized community—and the capitalists, who, when really frightened, are a most powerful class everywhere, may be sickened of republicanism, and sickened before many weeks, and welcome Prim or anybody else as a dictator—that is, monarchy or no monarchy, accept the rule of the strong hand—and all hope of a free government may thus disappear for another generation. We still trust that the magnificent common sense and self-restraint which have thus far marked the conduct of the people will, however, assert their sway in the end, and save the fruits of the revolution.

In the meantime nothing is so much to be deprecated as the rage which seems to prevail in certain quarters for giving the Spaniards advice. There is hardly a bankrupt politician in Europe who has not forwarded them a letter or a poem, giving them a few hints as to how they ought to manage their affairs, what kind of government is best suited for them, and by what class of considerations they ought to be guided in their political course. As usual, those who have made the most ridiculous failures themselves as practical politicians, such as Louis Blanc, Victor Hugo, Emile Girardin, and Mazzini, are most positive in their conclusions as to what is the right thing for the Spaniards to do in the present crisis. We are sorry to see that there is a disposition to follow their example in this country, and that it is receiving the countenance of Mr. Sumner, who on questions of foreign politics is usually a sound and sensible guide. If anybody will recall the kind of advice which Americans received even from the warm friends of the country abroad during the years 1861-2, and the woful ignorance of the main conditions of the problems to be solved which was displayed in these communications, he will see in an instant the folly as well as impertinence of all attempts from the outside to assist a nation in making up its mind on such points as are now presented to the judgment of the Spanish people. The very fact that national habits and character and passions and prejudices do more than half the work in shaping the national destinies, and ought of right to do more than half of it, is of itself sufficient to make sensible men pause before they attempt to assist Spaniards or any other people in framing a government. Such interference is made all the more improper in the present instance by the division of the Spanish public into two parties, with one of which foreigners must, in offering any advice at all, seem to take part, and we know how Americans relish this sort of thing themselves. We in America, let us add, shall be able to recommend republicanism to foreign nations more effectually when we have extirpated the "whiskey thieves," reformed the civil service, and made permanent arrangements for the payment of the national debt. In the meantime we shall best serve the cause by attending to our own business. There is a touch of the comic given to this propagandist zeal by the fact that the greatest display of it is made by Frenchmen, who as republicans have proved the greatest failures of modern times.

THE DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE BILL.

Some years ago, when it was deemed useful to make a thorough investigation of the English foreign service, a circular despatch was sent by the Foreign Office to all its agents abroad, asking for information, suggestions, and opinions as to the defects of the service and the mode of improving it, and for reports giving a statement or synopsis of the organization of the diplomatic service of the governments to which they were respectively accredited. Among those reports may be found one from Lord Lyons, then at Washington, now at Paris, and one from Lord Napier, then at the Hague, formerly at Washington. There is also contained in the same publication a vast mass of evidence, comprised in the answers to more than three thousand questions. Perhaps if our own Government had pursued such a course we should know more than we now do, and perhaps, again, a pretty good excuse for not having done it is that the English publication is so full that there is little left to be said on the subject. If any one really thinks that our own service does not need reform, he is referred to that publication, the fullest discussion ever yet produced of the organization of a foreign service, and he will find in it food for reflection, if not facts to convince him. With only this reference to the work, we return to the bill reported to the Senate at the last session of Congress.

The division of the different classes of diplomatic representatives into grades of compensation, as "compensation of first grade," of second grade, third grade, and so on, might be omitted with advantage; at least, no advantage is perceived in the arrangement. The scale of grades is no doubt intended to apply exclusively to salaries, and not to the rank of the officers; but it might not always be so understood abroad, or not clearly understood. Certainty and convenience will be consulted by accepting, or following, in its simplest form, the scale of rank recommended by the Congress of Vienna of 1815, and that of Aix-la-Chapelle of 1818, and now universally recognized and acted upon; though the point is not urged as an important one. There is no difficulty in adjusting the pay to the exigencies of the service in different countries, by the form of the expression at present in use for that purpose, without the dubious use of the word "grade" in connection with both rank and compensation.

Whether it is good policy to consolidate several missions, as proposed in the bill, is certainly worthy of serious discussion. It is believed that some of its results can be indicated in advance. As to the treaties which are occasionally required to be negotiated abroad, it is not now seen why the plan might not be made to work well in most cases, if in some it would involve disadvantages which a resident negotiator would either not experience or would find very much diminished. On the other hand, as to the general purpose, duties, and benefits of diplomatic representation, it would be, as to the residence and influence of the minister, a practical abolition of the consolidated missions. Every one who has seen anything of diplomatic service knows the difficulty of obtaining valuable and reliable political information by any other means than a residence, and appropriate social and official intercourse. Occasional and short visits would afford the Government somewhat better information than the newspaper telegrams, by reason of the visitor's official character and access, but would fall far short of the fulness and accuracy of information derived by residence. The event of war between the two countries would immediately increase the difficulty, partly by material obstacles, and partly by the greater reserve and jealousy of a government seeing the same agent accredited to itself and to its enemy. And the same feeling may exist in a large measure in time of peace. Change the bill a little and consolidate Sweden with Russia, and Denmark with Prussia, and how would our minister be received at the smaller courts named? Is it much or any better in the case of Spain and Portugal? The relations between Holland and Belgium were at one time as sensitive, and so have often been those between Denmark and Sweden. It may be asked, how does the jealous or alarmed power receive the minister of its threatening or intriguing neighbor, and why not in the same manner our ministers holding the consolidated missions? The difference is material. One only needs to know the world a little, without being experienced in diplomacy, to know that the minister for foreign affairs, and all the principal official people of a government, might be willing to communicate to one diplomat, having confidence in him, what they could not afford to hint to another. The effect of consolidation, simply as such, and under ordinary circumstances, on the minds and dispositions of the courts thus united, would not be good, as far as it went; but that this would be, of itself, a serious obstacle to agreeable and successful diplomatic intercourse, might not be safely or justly asserted. Not many years ago Prussia tried the system of consolidations, and the plan of reducing some ministers to charges, but soon returned to her former and her present system of full and separate missions.

But if the policy of consolidation is adopted, the form of expression employed in the bill would seem to be about the least appropriate that could easily have been devised. The minister should be accredited directly to the powers named as equals, and even in alphabetic order, instead of saying: "To Spain, [to be accredited also to Portugal]." . . . "To Belgium [to be accredited also to Holland]." . . . "To Sweden [to be accredited also to Denmark]." It is probable that the commissions, made out by the State Department and signed by the President, would run correctly. But this is not sufficient. Foreign governments will be accurately informed of our system, as expressed in the statute, and it would not be very agreeable to any of them to observe themselves thus disposed of in brackets; especially if they had heard the Western criticism on Mr. Brackett's sermon. "Who preached to-day?" enquired one friend of another. "Mr. Brackett, the new minister." "Mr. Brackett? Brackett! bracket! I believe the definition of bracket is 'something that could be left out without hurting the sense.'"

What is the precise official rank, and what is to be the commission, of those officers styled in the bill as first secretaries of legation at one post, and required to act as chargés at another? Will the Government accredit a chargé to the same court to which it has accredited an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary? If so, there is confusion; if not, if he is only secretary, and detailed as chargé, then his rank at the court where he officiates, which in Europe is something to be considered, will be that of secretary, with the duties of chargé imposed upon him under disadvantages. He is thus crippled as chargé, while being of no use and rendering no service at all as first secretary of legation, not being at the same court with his chief, and being further trammelled, as chargé, by being under the official direction of a chief whom, in an emergency, he cannot consult in time.

In matters of economy, whatever may be gained by the whole bill (and of this we have made no estimate), there does not seem to be anything gained by these special arrangements now under discussion. In the case of Belgium and Holland there is an increased expense of $7,000, while in the case of Denmark and Sweden there is a saving of only $500. But in these cases, and in all others of consolidation provided for by the bill, what is its practical operation? Only this: nominally two missions are consolidated into one under an envoy; but practically at one of them an underpaid chargé, with only the official, at least the commissioned, rank of secretary, does the labor of a former minister-resident; while at the other—no more important or difficult—a minister gets increased rank, increased pay, and a secretary of legation (his second secretary) not now allowed, for doing what is now done by himself or some other resident under the present system of rank and pay.

This objection and the one just preceding are not directed against an increase of pay, which at present is sadly deficient, nor against consolidation, as such; for it is not denied that there might exist cases where consolidation could be made to work well. The objections are made to the machinery of the bill. And it will probably be found that if at any time any two or more missions can be welded into one, the doing of it will have to be left to the varying exigencies of the service, judged by the Department of State or by the Foreign Service Board, as the abolition or suspension of some missions is left to the Foreign Office, and practically to the permanent under-secretary, in England; and that it is a matter which cannot be safely and permanently regulated by statute.

If any consolidations are adopted, it ought for the same reason to be left to executive direction, or to the Foreign Service Board, to prescribe at which capital the minister shall reside. Any attempt to regulate this in the bill will involve future inconvenience and disadvantage. This could not be better illustrated than by the patent fact that in one case the residence of the minister, as indicated in the bill, is clearly not the one at present most required, if determined either by the relative importance of our diplomatic business with the two powers, or by the delicate and almost vital relations which the bracketed power holds to the present peace and future "compensations" of the greater powers of Europe.

As regards compensation, any attempt to graduate it according to the supposed political importance of the mission, or to the extent, population, and power of the country in which it is maintained, will result in failure and inequality. The Government pays the senators from Rhode Island and Delaware as much as those from New York and Pennsylvania, because it costs one as much as the other to live at Washington. Having determined that a mission ought to be established or retained, the true question is, What will support it? Considered in this way, none of the salaries are at present too large, if, indeed, any of them are large enough; and the inequality between the highest and the lowest salaries, as at present fixed by law, is out of all just proportion to the real difference in the cost of living. Many things which must be purchased and used much more freely in court society than is necessary in private life cost more at the second and third-rate capitals than at the great centres; while only house-rent, always the first thing seized on in the calculation, and fuel, cost less. A family can live as well on $10,000, or at most on $12,000, a year in Paris or London as upon $7,500 in Constantinople, Lisbon, Brussels, Copenhagen, or Stockholm. Yet there is twice this difference in existing salaries. In all the capitals the expense of suitably furnishing an establishment is very large; the Government gives nothing towards it, and the property is sold at a great sacrifice or brought home at a great expense. On this subject the bill is a great improvement on the existing system, but is itself susceptible of improvement. While there is not so great a difference as is generally supposed in the cost of living at different capitals, yet there is a difference, and it should be regarded in fixing the scale of pay; and in this attempt the bill is not entirely successful. It gives, as reported to the Senate by the committee, less to Vienna, one of the most expensive capitals in Europe, than to Brussels, one of the least expensive; and gives only the same to St. Petersburg, the most expensive capital in the world, as to Berlin, the least expensive of all the great capitals.

The world is changing; and, as we believe, it changes for the better. As private rights and interests become more important and more sacred, the different political communities of the world become more closely knit together in destiny and interest. The time has passed when even the ambassador of the Sublime Porte at the court of the Hapsburgs would peremptorily order to be hanged to a tree in his court-yard a couple of his servants who had given him insolent language in a drunken spree, and seek to give the performance a moral point by ornamenting their necks as they dangled from the limb with the bottles which they had emptied by imbibing too freely. And the time has passed when any people, with a progressive and elastic civilization and political development, can afford to neglect the employment of the best means to secure intelligent, influential, and efficient diplomatic representation. Enlightened and honest diplomacy has become a permanent power in shaping and directing the affairs of the world.

AT THE SPRING.

[FROM THE RUSSIAN OF COUNT ALEXIS TOLSTOI.]

A SPRING in an orchard of cherries,
The prints of a girl's bare foot,
And deeply impressed beside them
The marks of a nail-studded boot.

All is still in the place of their meeting,
Yet my spirit with jealousy burns,
Hears the whispers, the passionate pleading,
The noise as the pail overturns.

OUR TOWN NOMENCLATURE.

IF an American desires to awaken in himself that sense of humility which is so good for us all upon proper occasion, there is no better way—none, that is, of equal triviality in itself—than to compare the Post-office Directory or Railroad Guide of his own country with that of some country of Europe. The very names of the depots on the Muddefontaine Railroad call up the picture of the treeless plain, with dingy, white one-storied houses and unpainted shanties, the inevitable corner groceries and shingle palaces of hotels which, in nine cases out of ten, represent the dreadful transition period when nature has been expelled and art has not yet taken its place. But when you run your eye down the list of the stations in Bradshaw, with what pleasing memories your mind is carried back to that September walk through the rural villages of Cheshire and Derbyshire, or the May morning that you drove over from Warwick to Kenilworth. The names are redolent of antiquity and quiet culture.

After all, it is not altogether a matter of indifference whether the name of the town where you live—which you pronounce a dozen times a day—is well or ill-sounding, calls up agreeable or unpleasant associations. But it may well be questioned whether we deserve as a nation the very bad reputation which we have for prosaic and unmeaning nomenclature; or rather, whether we deserve it any more than older nations, and those of different race. When we trace these much-admired names of English, French, and German towns back to their primitive meaning, we find them to the full as trivial and prosaic as ours. The radical syllable of Rochester means "rock;" of Shrewsbury, "shrub;" of Worcester, "forest;" of Leicester, "field." Only the moss of ages has grown over these old vases and hidden the material of which they are made, while our brand-new ware betrays on its face that it is nothing but stone-china.

It is our misfortune that we have not had time to let names grow up, but have been obliged to invent them and impose them without regard to appropriateness upon the places that have sprung up to our hands. In doing this we were lucky when we found an Indian name ready for us and had the good sense to let it remain. In this way we are provided with a very respectable list of well-sounding names, which have the great advantage of being really proper nouns; for there is but one Nantucket, Chicago, or Oswego. The names mean nothing, to be sure—that is, mean nothing to us; and if their meaning were known, it is not at all likely it would describe the present town. But, for the matter of that, neither do English names mean anything to the present generation.

The truest names, of course, are those which do describe—such as most foreign names were in their origin. Oxford and Cambridge, Interlaken and Lauterbrunnen, Amphipolis and Ostia, we see at a glance what these mean; are they a whit more poetical than Lockport, Brookline, Little Rock, Black Earth, Yellow Springs, and Sunken Hollow? If our impatience in colonization would allow time, names of this class—the most genuine names we have—would count by the hundred instead of the dozen. As it is, names must be devised as best they can, and a new settlement is well off when it has a Mrs. Clavers to draw by lot one so unobjectionable as Montecute. A more probable fate is to be burdened for ever with such meaningless appellations as Palmyra, New Madrid, or Lafayette.

The two classes of names just mentioned—Indian names and descriptive ones—stand at the head in our classification of American nomenclature. Equally excellent, perhaps, are those which do not describe but embody some historical reminiscence, like Providence, Yonkers (the homestead of the "younger" son), Cincinnati, Council Bluffs, Fort Edward.

Towns which immortalize a founder, benefactor, or eminent citizen (not the endless string of Washingtons, Jeffersons, and Jacksons) have done well; but they do best of all if they use his name only as material, and construct some such compound as Ogdensburg, Binghamton, Marblehead, Saybrook, Wilkesbarre. Some surnames, indeed, answer very well alone, as Keene, Cleveland, Castine. And in compounds the Southern affix "ville," and the Northern "town," show the joining too readily, as in Knoxville and Stewartstown; while "burg," "ton," "field," and sometimes "boro'," as in Vicksburg, Lecompton, Pittsfield, and Brattleboro', form a well-sounding and dignified combination. There are also a few excellent names constructed out of names already existing—not the Newton Centre, Newton Corner, West Newton, East Newton, Newton Upper Falls, Newton Lower Falls, and Newtonville, which are so characteristic of New England—but such as Torringford, Stanwich, Lynnfield, Newburyport, and Osawattomie (at the confluence of the Osage and Pottawattomie).

This pretty much exhausts the categories of good names, unless we except European names brought with them by actual settlers and preserved through affection for their old homes—like Boston, Plymouth, New Berne, Vevay. Leaving these aside, we have in our American towns hardly more than dreary repetitions of London, Paris, Rome, Syracuse, Franklin, Madison, and others as meaningless (in this use of them) as these. Not that other nations do any better than we. We do not reiterate Washington and Jefferson any more persistently than our English cousins do Victoria and Albert, whenever they have a chance. Fortunately, they have little chance at home, but their colonies ring with them; and when they have used these as often as they dare, they fall back upon the unfailing storehouse at home, and find nothing better than Birmingham, Liverpool, and Exeter. They show, indeed, even less originality than we do; only they are a little bit more skilful in their borrowing.

Neither did the Greeks and Romans do better. As soon as they had occasion to give names, after the spontaneous growth of these had ceased, they showed the same poverty of ideas and servility of practice. Epaminondas could think of no better name for the Arcadian capital that he founded than "the great city"—Megalopolis. Hamilcar called his colony in Spain New Carthage. Constantine the Great named his new metropolis after himself. Colonia Agrippina still lives in Cologne, Augusta Vindelicorum in Augsburg, Augusta Taurinorum in Turin. And the Alexandrias, Cæsareas, and Heracleas rivalled in number the Washingtons and Wellingtons of the present day.

In short, the poverty of our geographical nomenclature is not caused by our being an unpoetical people, but by our having fallen into the hands of the Philistines. City fathers are "Philistines" of the worst type; and it is they who devise these new barbarities, and, in fact, spoil so many good old names. Once they tried to change the classic "Frog Pond" to "Serpentine Lake;" but the effort failed. They have abolished one of our best and most descriptive names, Roxbury, and substituted "Boston Highlands." They altered the historical "Dorchester Heights" into "South Boston." So "Fall River" once became "Troy," but speedily grew tired of its new title and resumed the old. It was another set of Philistines that attempted to give the stately Tahawa the empty name Mt. Marcy, and that requires you to direct your letters for "Bar Harbor" to "East Eden." To the same class New England owes the "Silver Lakes" and "Crystal Lakes" that adorn every town. Indeed, if the display of a poetical sense in bestowing names is to be the criterion, we venture to say that there is nowhere more of it than here. Silver Lake and Crystal Lake, which have now become so ridiculously common, were at first an effort at something at once descriptive and elegant. It is really a poetical sense, if a mistaken one, that wishes to banish homely names like Frog Pond and Mill Dam. It is the same sense of musical sound that gives us the repetitions of names of the class of Melrose, Belmont, Fairmount, and Waverley.

But there are better examples than these sentimentalisms; names much more genuine than those imposed by city councils or legislative committees, which give good proof of "the imaginative faculty in full health and strength" which Mr. Lowell claims for his countrymen. These are the secondary or popular names, of which so many are found in all parts of the country, and which are in nearly all cases really descriptive and poetical. The Bay State, the Granite State, the Empire State, the Keystone State, the Hoosier State, the Monument City, the Crescent City, the City of Elms—these are all genuine names. Sometimes a touch of racy humor comes in, as in the State of Camden and Amboy, Egypt, the Blue Hen, the Panhandle, the City of Magnificent Distances, Gotham. And here, too, imitation has gone to work and devised similar names in cold blood, not waiting for them to develop themselves. And a coarse and vulgar humor delights in such abominations as Hard Scrabble, Shakerag, Squash End, Purgatory, Burnt Coat, Lick Lizzard, Skunk's Misery, Git-up-and-git. One county in Virginia boasts the names Negro Foot, Hell Town, Buzzard Roost, Bull Ring, Polecat, Negationburg, and Dog Town.

Although our remarks have been for the most part confined to the names of towns, yet the same principles apply, of course, to all geographical names. The States of the Union are, almost without exception, very well named—either Indian names, as Connecticut and Alabama; old home names, as Maine and New Hampshire; or names of historical reminiscence, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Carolina, Florida. Vermont is a descriptive name, so are Montana and Nevada, and, in a quaint way, Rhode Island. The names of counties in the older States were generally transferred from England by the early settlers. In the new States they are very apt to be repetitions of the names of Revolutionary generals and other eminent men; almost every State has its Greene, Knox, Lincoln, Marion, and Wayne. As the territory is cut up and the counties are laid out after the chess-board fashion long before it is settled, nothing better than this could be expected; and if anything peculiar by any chance comes into existence, an enterprising community is pretty sure to become ashamed of it before long—as the other day they changed Bad-Ax County in Wisconsin into Vernon. It is a wonder that Illinois has suffered Jo Daviess to stand so long.

Mountains, rivers, and lakes are almost always tolerably well named. The native titles have held their own in regard to these better than in political divisions, and when these have been set aside it has been very commonly in favor of some old settler who has well deserved such commemoration, or of some bit of actual description. No names are better merited than the Crawford Notch, the Hudson River, and Lake Champlain. Descriptive names for these objects are rather monotonous, to be sure; for when once we have run through the obvious features—Haystack, Saddle Mountain, Sugarloaf, Camel's Hump, Green Lake, Black River, Mad River, Stony Brook, etc.—it is hard to make anything less prominent do service in nomenclature.

There is, however, one useful source of variety in the difference of generic names in different parts of the country. The "brook" of New England is a "kill" along the Hudson, a "run" in Virginia, a "bayou" in Louisiana, and, alas! a "crick" everywhere else. There is a certain variety also in the names of mountains—as Killington Peak in Vermont, Peaks of Otter in Virginia, Blue Ridge in the same State, Blue Mounds in Wisconsin, and Sierra Nevada in California. For lake we have only the New England "pond;" "mere" perhaps exists as an exotic in a few instances, and a sheet of water in Vermont was a few years ago christened "Lama Water," in honor of General Wool! Again, the "notch" of New England is a "clove" at the Catskills, and a "gap" further South.

Finally, justice has hardly been done to the degree in which our proper names have been affected by the different nationalities which discovered and settled different parts of the country. The traveller up the Hudson is gratified by the quaint and picturesque names that he meets, which perpetuate the memory of the Dutch time. The French have left a similar enduring monument of themselves along the Mississippi, not only in Louisiana, but in all the States near its source. Beaufort and Port Royal commemorate the Huguenot settlement in South Carolina; the La Moille River, Calais, and Mt. Desert the Jesuit missionary enterprises which never obtained a lasting foothold in New England. Not only is all California Spanish, but Santa Rosa and Fernandina remind us that Spain once had Florida too.

It is not to be expected that the naming of our towns, counties, and streets will ever be got out of the hands of the Philistines; all that we can look for is to preserve Indian names wherever they can be found, and possibly to persuade the powers that be, when there already exists a good, homely, picturesque name, to let it alone.

THE THEATRE OF OUR DAY.

Herr Wilhelm Marr, writing recently in the Post of Berlin, declares that the theatre is an institution which no longer flourishes. In fact, he announces that its day has wholly passed. Almost everybody has always thought so. Yet we shall undoubtedly transmit the theatre. But, unlike most of the men and women who would unite with him in upholding the conclusion to which he has come, Herr Marr offers to the disbelievers in the theatre a philosophic theory and reasons to fortify their unbelief. Generally, the old theatre-goers, who maintain that the day of the theatre is past, tell us with mingled pity and triumph of the glories of this or that artist, of the matchless grace and feeling of the actor and actress whom they first saw playing Pauline and Claude, or Charles and Lady Teazle; of the archness of the Rosalind and the melancholy of the Jaques whom they knew when they were twenty-one; of the Hamlet or the Iago or the Macbeth of whom time has since relentlessly robbed the stage, and whose place can never again be supplied. Abstracted from all such considerations, Herr Marr contends that so long as the theatre flourished, it was a mirror of high life to the low, and of low life to the high; whenever it was interesting, it was as a picture of a terra incognita. But, says he, with the growth and culture of modern society, the ordinary daily life of the spectator of theatrical performances has come into competition with the life depicted on the stage; nowadays our own experience offers us the reality of all that of which the stage presents us with the mere shows and shadows. So the theatre decays.

This theory has ingenuity and some show of reason, and, so far, is good. But it is the beauty of a theory that it shall fit the facts of the case; and as regards that matter, we incline to think that this one fails.

The Greek stage, both the tragic and the comic, occupied itself not with foreign but with domestic scenes. For the lovers of it there was, to be sure, poetry, which is of no age and no country; but we may be sure that, whatever may be true of its immortal life, its contemporary life the Greek stage got not from its poetry but from something else. The Roman theatre, too, busied itself with the slaves, the soldiers, the legacy-hunters, the women, the gossipers, the heroes, whom the Roman theatre-goers knew; who, indeed, they were. Then, as always, the stage had for its principal and most lucrative business, though not for its sole business, to hold the mirror up to nature. The mediæval theatre, too, with its monkish lessees and managers, its Vices and Virtues, and demons and angels, its contests between the saint and the great adversary, was a faithful reflex of the thought and feeling of the age. The English stage and the Spanish, which were first to escape from religious bonds, both reached their highest success—so far as concerns the pecuniary returns from audiences—when they portrayed the "cloak and sword" life of the towns of the Peninsula, and the wars at home and abroad of the Edwards and Richards and Henries.

It is certainly so to a very great extent now, and whenever it is not so, it is another theory than that of Herr Marr which seems to account for the present condition of the stage. The strong tendency to-day in the theatre of France, of England, and of this country is to the dramatizing of the people and events among whom we live. We should say that, as a means of intellectual pleasure, the theatre constantly grows more and more realistic. Take this city, for example, and most theatre-goers would be more inclined to predict success for a tragedy or comedy which should put before the audience the Battery or the Bowery or the Fifth Avenue, and should show men and women supposed to be and to do and to suffer in New York and Brooklyn, than to predict it for a play the scenes of which should be laid in the Forest of Arden or in Verona, and the characters in which should be kings and not counterfeiters and kidnappers, knights rather than detective policemen, princesses instead of women of the town or distressed American mothers and wives and young ladies.

But whether what we have just said be accepted or rejected, there are other things to be taken into consideration before Herr Marr's conclusion is admitted to be sound. We demand of our managers that they shall put before us scenery painted as that is in "Geneviève de Brabant," for instance, which artists applaud as being in its own way equal to the best work of good landscape-painters. We make our favorite actors and actresses—indeed, one may say all our players—appear before us in dresses of great cost, of the latest fashion, of historical accuracy, and of the richest material. We require expensive orchestras to delight the sense of hearing as the other accessories of the stage delight the eye. A manager's troupe must contain fine-looking men and women, and his repertory of dramas must contain many which have no reason for existing except that they furnish opportunities or the lavish display of personal charms, or are replete with laughable bsurdity, or with fun-making of a character more or less low and very often coarse, or with still more demoralizing, because more sensual, appeals to the vulgar love for mere sensationalism.

But the stage is not now, as it was in the time of Sophocles, and as it was in the time of Shakespeare, the best means for publishing an author's works, almost the only place where author and public could meet. To a certain extent the press has supplanted the stage as it has supplanted the rostrum also, and the pulpit. And to a certain extent the theatre may be said to have decayed, just as the pulpit has and as the platform has, but we doubt if it can be said to have decayed any more. It is on another footing than it was before; it is now relegated to the sphere of mere amusement, and finds in the opera —which to most people, though of course not to all, affords a sensual rather than an intellectual pleasure—a dangerous rival. We now read books and newspapers in order to get our mental pabulum, and we pay little attention to comedians and tragedians, the men who instructed our grandfathers and grandmothers in the days before Hoe was born, and when as yet fast presses were not. We work during the day; we are engaged, even furiously, in mental labors that task the mind to an extent of which our leisurely ancestors had no conception, and in ways of which they knew nothing; and our theatres, which are what their audiences make them, give us "Opéra Bouffé," "Ixion," and three hundred nights of "Humpty Dumpty," simply because we give ourselves ten or twelve hours daily of exhausting toil. Wall Street being what it is to-day, and 1868 being what it is in Wall Street—the age being so exacting as it is in regard to mental labor, and so rich as it is to give us intellectual employment and enjoyment—we naturally enough have disused the theatre, so far as it addresses the intellect, and developed those qualities of it in virtue of which it is a means of mere amusement and of more or less sensual excitation.

This condition of the theatre may, it is true, be called its decline and decay, though our generation will certainly be much less willing to acknowledge it than their fathers would, it being yearly more generally recognized that play is as necessary and is as honorable as labor; that is to say, so long as it is play, so long as it has not reached the point when itself becomes labor; where pleasure is a business. The theatre, we are all beginning to think, as our fathers could not, is serving a purpose no less useful when it simply makes us laugh, or when it legitimately addresses merely physical emotions or mixed physical and spiritual emotions, than it used to serve when it was the chosen abode of high intellectual literature. And there are doubts if even in that time it was not in most respects worse, by a good deal, than it is now. We incline to believe that it was decidedly "once upon a time" that the stage had that heyday which is talked about, and that it would be difficult for its present contemners and abusers to specify with exactness the time when it could have had their approval any more fully than now. In any event, Herr Marr seems to be wrong. There are more theatres and theatre-goers than there ever were before; actors and actresses are, as a class, more esteemed than ever before and more worthy of esteem; the total amount of badness and immorality in the plays of a decade is probably less in this than in other ages. Why, then, should it be said to have declined, unless one can say that to instruct people is a worthier object than to make them gay, that the bent bow is more honorable than the bow relaxed? This any one may, of course, say and believe; and we very likely might not contradict him if he did; but it is not what Herr Marr has been saying.

THE ARGUMENT IN THE LEGAL TENDER CASES.

WASHINGTON, December 11, 1868.

AT the last term of the Supreme Court the cases of Hepburn vs. Griswold and Bronson vs. Rodes were continued for reargument on the first Tuesday of the December term, and the order of March 2, which made this arrangement, also gave leave to the Attorney-General to be heard on the part of the United States, one of the points involved being the validity of the legal tender clause in the Act of Congress of 25th February, 1862, authorizing the issue of Treasury notes on the credit of the United States.

After listening for three entire days to the arguments on this great cause one may justly claim the right to express a certain feeling of disappointment at the close. Mr. Attorney-General Evarts, who can never resist the temptation to make fun of everybody and everything, is said to have expressed it as his opinion that there is really nothing in this matter of legal tender except that people will make too much of it. Setting aside the wit, there may and ought to be some truth in the remark, for otherwise the case should be argued a third time, very little having in this instance been made of the argument against the law. Mr. Curtis and Mr. Evarts have both spoken in its favor, while the only argument on the other side was that of Mr. Potter, of New York; and it is no reflection on Mr. Potter to say that he is not of the force necessary for supporting alone against such advocates the weight of so burdensome a cause. The speech of Mr. Potter contained many clever points, and touched more or less vigorously almost every imaginable argument, but it was discursive, loosely constructed, unequal, and not on a level with the occasion. Mr. Townsend's argument, which has received a good deal of praise, turned on a subordinate issue. There remained only the speeches of Mr. Curtis and Mr. Evarts, both on the same side, both marked by the undisputed ability of their authors, but in styles so different as to produce an effect as though one supplemented and completed the other.

Mr. Curtis's argument, which opened the case, was, as usual with him, one that will be admired by lawyers rather than by the public, but one that lawyers will probably admire as a model. Mr. Curtis argues with such severity, such perfect logical sequence, such clearness, with so much of the judicial spirit, with such caution against assumptions of fact or law, and, above all, with such absence of any appeal to feelings that might disturb and mislead the judgment, that one hesitates to criticise, feeling as one must that the critic must begin by learning to place his criticism on the same level with the argument itself. Any one who is much interested in this legal tender question is justified in thinking it a disaster passing the limit of ordinary griefs that there has been no opportunity to hear an equally calm and severe review of the constitutional issue as seen from the opposite point of view.

Yet Mr. Curtis spoke little longer than an hour, and the essential part of his argument can be stated very concisely. Congress, he said, has the power to borrow money, and as an incident to this power Congress has the choice of means for its exercise, subject, however, to two limitations. The first of these limitations requires that the means should be appropriate and conducive to the end. The second requires that these means should not be prohibited by any express provision of the Constitution, nor by any just deduction or implication from its provisions. That the quality of legal tender was appropriate and conducive to the end of borrowing money was not to be questioned. But it was objected that the power to make paper money a legal tender was a distinct and substantive power not conferred upon Congress, and to this objection Mr. Curtis contented himself by replying that this power was subordinate, appropriate, and necessary to the really substantive power of borrowing. On this proposition Mr. Curtis rested his case.

Mr. Curtis is far too able a lawyer to have stopped at this point if he had thought himself safe in venturing further, for this was precisely the point on which most persons wished to hear argument. Mr. Curtis allowed that any just deduction or implication from the provisions of the Constitution might prohibit any special means of carrying out a power, even though these means were otherwise appropriate and conducive to the end. The very question in dispute was, therefore, whether any such implication or deduction could be drawn. Our Constitution, with its doctrine of limited powers, was supposed to have settled the principle that our Government, unlike most other governments, could legally do only those acts which of right might be done; that there was in it, speaking in general terms, no supreme power, even in the last resort, to make wrong right or false true. And the question now to be settled rested on this very doubt whether a power of declaring by legislation the untruth that a piece of paper is equal in value to a pound of gold, and of compelling the people to accept it at that value, is one of the powers which our Government may of right exercise. Mr. Curtis did not fairly meet this difficulty by showing that our Government was not bound to respect a private contract.

Mr. Evarts saw this gap in the chain of argument clearly enough, and was not restrained from defending it by any such spirit of caution, if it was caution, as restrained Mr. Curtis. Mr. Evarts's audacity in the face of obstacles would make him even greater as a political leader than he is as an advocate. Against this point, which Mr. Curtis seemed to dread and shun, Mr. Evarts struck out with a degree of vehemence that showed the importance he put on it. For two hours he heaped argument on sarcasm and persuasion on ridicule to prove that legal tender was a matter of no consequence at all, an incidental power subordinate to mere purposes of government; or, if not this, then a power essential to national existence, not to be placed among the substantive powers of the Constitution, but above them.

"This power—necessary for emergencies, pernicious as a constant resource—shall not be accorded to the General Government as an independent and substantive power, for this would permit its exercise upon any motive and for its own sake. It shall find its place in the enabling clause of the Constitution which supplies authority for all legislation that is necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers in whose service the use of this expedient is justified, for thus alone can its use be conformed to the exigencies which should furnish at once its warrant and its measure."

And if it be asked what authority is to decide the existence of such an exigency, Mr. Evarts replies by quoting from the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland: "The sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution." The court has only to decide whether the means selected by Congress were such as, in the judgment of the authorities charged with the duty, were appropriate to the end desired.

"Who, then, shall assume to place the integrity of the legal tender above the safety of the state?" The safety of the state is, therefore, the only standard for measuring constitutional powers. Mr. Evarts, of course, did not limit the application of this astonishing principle to the narrow example of legal tender. On the contrary, he was eloquent in his vehement denunciation, and thundered his magnificent contempt for the very idea of a government that should propose to itself the strict observance of law and right in times of national peril. "Let the ship founder," said he, "that is built of material so frail." No private right, no supposed constitutional reservation is sacred enough to stand against national necessity, as estimated by the authorities entrusted with that duty. No mere principle of government, no axiom of political economy, no confidence in fundamental truths, shall interpose themselves between the people and the mistakes of their legislators. In times of national emergency the people have no rights except by the sufferance of Congress.

As a necessary deduction from this principle that the safety of the State is the measure of constitutional powers, it appears to follow, also, that a time of emergency may cause the permanent forfeiture of private rights. "This power [of legal tender]—necessary for emergencies, pernicious as a constant resource—shall find its place in the enabling clause of the Constitution which supplies authority for all legislation," etc. Under that power the husband may be torn from his wife, the son from his dying father, and the property of the country may be seized for the use of the Government in times of emergency. Three years of profound peace have now blessed our country, and yet under this same power the people are still compelled to receive paper at the value of gold. Mr. Evarts did not follow the line of argument out to its logical conclusion, but it appears to be inevitable that as legal tender is now legal and constitutional, so under the same principle all acts committed under the same authority may be made perpetual at the option of Congress, and work a permanent forfeiture of all private rights.

Just as Mr. Curtis's argument, therefore, stopped short of entire demonstration, the argument of Mr. Evarts leaped beyond it; nor does the case seem to be helped by Mr. Evarts's afterthought that the Fourteenth Amendment, declaring that the validity of the debt should never be questioned, covered the legal tender clause as well as the debt. If the debt is questioned, the legal tender clause will be responsible for it. Disregarding this as an evasion of the issue, one may say that as Mr. Curtis proved too little, so Mr. Evarts has proved too much; and that while Mr. Curtis seems to shun the issue, Mr. Evarts dashes at the obstacle of private rights, and, in overthrowing it, overthrows the whole fabric of our Government. No great advocate appeared before the court to fasten upon the point where these two arguments met without connecting, and one can only hope that the court, whose judgment in this case will certainly rank in authority with, and perhaps is to rank above, the Constitution, will supply these defects in the case as it has been argued. No one as yet knows when judgment will be given.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, November 27, 1868.

WE have had a sufficiently interesting time for the last ten days to make up for a good deal of flatness and a considerable dearth of news for a long time before. Our new Parliament is elected—at least the number of elections which still remain to be made is insignificant, and the evidence as to the working of the new Reform Bill may be regarded as being complete as far as it goes. There can, I think, be no doubt at all that it has disappointed many sanguine expectations, and greatly encouraged many persons who had regarded it with unreasonable fear; but I doubt whether we are yet in a position to form anything like a judgment as to the real extent of the change which has been made. There is, as every one must have foreseen that there would be, a large Liberal majority in the new House; but it is remarkable that an unusually large proportion of the leading men of the Liberal party have been defeated in important contests. Mr. Mill was at the bottom of the poll in Westminster, and Mr. W. W. Smith, a Conservative, known principally as the greatest of railway booksellers—you may see slates bearing his name at nearly every station in the country, and I believe that he buys an enormous proportion of our most popular journals—was at the top of the poll by what we regard as a handsome majority, though the whole number of votes given would, I suppose, appear small in American eyes. Mr. Gladstone was defeated for South-west Lancashire, though, as he was elected in his absence and without canvassing or solicitation of any kind on his part at Greenwich, this is of little practical importance. A similar fate befell many others of less importance. All the working-man candidates, of whom there were a few—not more than four or five—were rejected in one way or another; and I think it is no exaggeration to say that the enthusiastic, philosophical subdivision, or wing, as I suppose you would say, of the Radical party has received a considerable check, for I do not think that a single man has been returned who could fairly be said to belong to it. Mr. Bright has shown a decided consciousness of this in some of his latest speeches, which have in them a much more decided Radical tone than most of those which he has delivered for several years past. They sound as if he was meditating a more vigorous policy, a more decided appeal to the sympathies of the masses, than he has been in the habit of making for some time. In one of his speeches, for instance, he pointed out in a very significant way the advantages of having for an election-cry the freedom of the breakfast-table—meaning thereby the institution of direct for indirect taxation, or, what is the same thing, the transfer of the burden of taxation from the poor to the rich. He used other language of like purport about the reform of the laws relating to land. I do not think he sees his way as clearly when he writes or speaks upon this topic as he does in some other cases. It requires a good deal of acquaintance with technical law to discuss it in England without falling into all sorts of mistakes, and this is not one of Mr. Bright's accomplishments; but there was no mistaking the general tone of his address; and I should not be surprised if he and his party were to try to find out whether the enthusiasm of the new electors, who certainly have not been specially enthusiastic, though there can be no mistake as to the general tendency of their opinions, in favor of the very moderate dose of liberalism which has been administered to them, may not be much more decisively raised by an appeal to them upon broader and more popular issues. Upon this point the elections throw very little light indeed.

Whatever may be the end as to these rather recondite and remote questions, there will be very little doubt as to the prospect which lies before us in the immediate future. Parliament is to meet almost immediately, and Mr. Disraeli will be out of office before the session has lasted many days. The majority against him upon such a matter as a vote of want of confidence will in all probability be overwhelming. What will happen next is a very different question, and by no means a very plain one. I think little of various rumors which have been flying about to the effect that the Queen's personal disinclination to consent to the disendowment and disestablishment of the Irish Church is so strong that she will send for Lord Granville or Lord Stanley to make a new ministry, instead of Mr. Gladstone. I feel no doubt that Mr. Gladstone will be the man. Yet the doubtful point is how he will be able to manage to steer through all the obstacles which such a numerous and well led opposition as he will certainly have to encounter will be able to oppose to him. Large majorities often dwindle, and before the Irish Church can be fairly dissected out from the Irish nation and done away with altogether, a variety of difficult and delicate matters will have to be settled, which will act as so many stumbling-blocks to the minister by whom the measure has to be carried out. He would be a bold man who would say whether this session or the next either should see the Irish Church out. English institutions are anvils which wear out a surprising number of hammers.

One of the oddest incidents of the election has been the publication by Mr. Gladstone of a pamphlet called "A Chapter of Autobiography," which appears to me one of the most curious performances of its kind that I ever met with. As you no doubt remember, Mr. Gladstone's first performance in public life was the publication of a book called "The Church in its Relations to the State." This took place just thirty years ago, and provoked one of the best known—though not in my opinion one of the best—of Lord Macaulay's reviews. The book was an elaborate attempt to prove that the real object of the state was the propagation of religious truth—religious truth being, in Mr. Gladstone's opinion, comprised in the creed of the Church of England. Hence he inferred, amongst a variety of other things, that the Irish Church ought to be maintained, and that to disestablish it would be a great national sin. He has, of course, been considerably baited during the present election with taunts about the inconsistency between his youthful speculations and the policy of his mature age; and the pamphlet in question is meant to explain to the world at large how far he has really changed his mind, and upon what principles his change, such as it is, has proceeded. It is a very curious performance, too long to give you an abstract of in such a letter as this; but in a few words it sets forth how, when he was a young man at Oxford, Mr. Gladstone was carried away by High Church enthusiasm, and persuaded himself that the Church of England was about to convert the English nation at least, and to rise spiritually and morally to such a position as would enable it to form a sort of spiritual state correlative with the temporal one. He then sets out how, as time went on, he came to see that this conception of the possible relations of the state to the church would not work, and was in fact repudiated in all sorts of ways by Parliament whenever the occasion for doing so arose. This satisfied him after a certain time that he must look facts in the face, and accept the determination of the state to be essentially a lay body. The consequence of this, he says, was that he could no longer support the Irish Church. To maintain it on the ground of its being the true Church was, he considered, an intelligible and high-minded course of policy; but to maintain it apart from the question of truth and falsehood, and from mere political considerations, would, he thought, be unjust and impolitic. He tells this story at inordinate length, for his pamphlet fills sixty or seventy good large octavo pages, and in a semi-ecclesiastical tone which is singularly characteristic of the man. One of his critics asked—as I thought very pertinently—how long it would be before he found out that the assumption that the Church of England represented religious truth was quite as doubtful as the assumption that the state ought to propagate religious truth, which it had taken him so many years to discover to be false? He is a very singular man, more characteristic than almost any other living politician of the age in which he lives, with its strange mixture of liberalism and ecclesiasticism. The feeling with which he is regarded by the party of which he is the recognized head oddly reflects the great division of opinion which exists upon all these topics. Few people like him all round. They are either afraid of his impulsive liberalism or inclined to despise the superstitious side of his character. Yet on the whole, and with those who do not look into matters very closely, he is decidedly popular.

UNIVERSITY REFORMS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Doctor Hill's resignation of the presidency of Harvard College, and the deep interest with which the selection of his successor is anticipated by the alumni and friends of that institution, suggest the consideration of one phase of college reform which has hardly received the attention it deserves. We refer to the urgent need of change in the system of discipline which is felt by most of those who are acquainted with the internal management of our principal colleges. And this need is particularly manifest at Cambridge, where so many salutary reforms in other directions have been lately instituted.

At the beginning of the academic year 1867-68 the system of study at Harvard was materially changed, how much for the better the experience of a year only has amply shown. I do not purpose to speak of the new system further than to remark that, by greatly increasing the number of "elective" studies, it has opened to the undergraduates much wider opportunities for the gratification of individual preferences and tastes than is furnished at any other of our older colleges. At the same time the standard of admission has been gradually raised, and a rigorous system of written examinations during the course perfected, so that at last the old reproach, "Anybody can get through Harvard College," so familiar to all Cambridge men, is utterly undeserved.

Withal, the average age of graduating classes has become much greater than formerly, being at present about twenty-two years and a half. But with these salutary reforms in the direction of a true university, the disciplinary code remains about the same as in the good old time when the still unrepealed statute forbidding freshmen to wear their hats in the college yard was in full force. It is not, however, of laws which long ago became dead letters that I complain, but of the code still in force—a code which treats the young men of the nineteenth just as boys of the sixteenth century were treated; which, in place of the paper reward-of-merit of the primary school, gives a maximum mark of eight, and works through a perfectly organized system of police, of which the president of the college is chief, and whose spies—the word is a harsh one, but I use it considerately—are to be found in every department of the university.

If it be said, in defence of the present "marking system," that the students' emulation needs to be excited by some more tangible reward than acquaintance with mathematical formulas and Greek dialects, we reply that a system of gradual examinations, by which alone rank should be determined, ought to be amply sufficient for the end in view. The great objection to the present system is, that it turns the discipline which should be the end of study into a means for the attainment of a high place on the sheet of monthly averages, and makes a daily "eight spot" the morning hope and nightly dream of the ambitious student. The immaturity and triviality of student talk and student writing have been often commented on, and it is indisputable that too many of our college graduates, though men in years, are boys in intellect and character. How can this be otherwise so long as they are treated like children throughout the four years of their undergraduate life, and find the discipline of the primary school continued in the college?

But far graver objections than these exist against the disciplinary system proper pursued in American colleges. The conclusion is inevitable that it tends directly to make the conduct of students, in their relations with the faculty, the reverse of manly and honorable. It is a legal presumption that a suspected man is innocent until the contrary is proved; but at Cambridge, at least, the counter presumption generally obtains. It may even be said that a suspected student is supposed to lie until he proves that he speaks the truth. The result is as natural as it is deplorable. Espionage is met by cunning, and accusation by equivocation. Every graduate of the college must own that a thoroughly false system of morality is prevalent among undergraduates in their relations with the faculty; that young men, otherwise honorable, are too often to be found whose practice before a faculty meeting is, to use the mildest adjective, sharp, and who answer all remonstrances by declaring that it is lawful to fight the devil with fire. Students and instructors, in consequence, come to regard each other as natural enemies, and thus the governors and governed become thoroughly antagonistic bodies. And it is not generally until the lapse of time has softened old asperities that graduates begin to feel that affection for, and pride in, their college which ought from the beginning to be the strongest sentiment of college life.

This state of things is the fault of a vicious system, not of those who administer it, although it would be trusting human weakness too far to suppose that a college proctor may not sometimes search the musty armory of ancient statutes for a weapon with which to gratify some petty spite or avenge a boyish insult.

It is, of course, much easier to condemn a faulty system of government than to suggest a better one, and the amelioration of the state of things I have criticised must be the work of time and careful thought. But one step can be taken at once in the right direction. Let the president and senior professors of the oldest university in America be relieved from the duties of common policemen and night patrols. If necessary, make the pay of the proctors something more than nominal, and let its recipients constitute not, as at present, an incongruous body hanging on the outskirts of the government, but a responsible governing power, to whom primarily the discipline of the college shall be committed. Thus, in time, the present antagonism between professors and students might yield to that mutual good-will which, at present, has but a very feeble existence in any of our colleges. We are glad to learn that at the last meeting of the board of overseers at Cambridge a committee was chosen "to confer with the corporation as to the duties which ought to be assigned to the president, and to enquire whether any and what modifications in the charter and laws are necessary to place the office of president upon such footing as the interests of the university may require." It is certainly to be hoped that the next head of the college may not have his time and patience frittered away in the conning of rank-lists and the administering of admonitions.

No more brilliant career could be afforded to an executive and scholarly mind than the presidency of Harvard University might present. With the names of more than a thousand students upon her catalogues, to whom she is constantly opening wider fields of interest and instruction, and with the new life which is being infused into her management by the transference of her government into the hands of the alumni, let us hope that the presidential mantle may fall on shoulders broad enough to bear it, and that a man of dignity and firmness, yet neither a pedant nor a revolutionist, may fill the chair once occupied by Kirkland and Quincy.

But to succeed he must be freed from those petty and thankless duties which have too often, in times past, rendered the office as obnoxious to its holder as he himself has become to those from whom he ought to command a deep respect. H. F. B.

THE DIVORCE QUESTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Your remarks on the "Future of the Family" bring out strongly what seems to be the especial merit of the Nation on all topics—its recognition of existing facts. Most journals, for example, appear to discuss the woman's rights movement in utter obliviousness of the prime truth—which has provoked all the discussion on the subject—that modern civilization, by imparting to woman new culture and giving her new conditions of life to face, has produced, at least in America a new woman—a woman whom no Scott or Dickens or Thackeray has yet arisen to paint, and one who cannot live under the old limitations without constant chafing and wretchedness. Nor has any journal but yours, I believe, touched at all upon the great question which so many thoughtful men are asking themselves, "What is and will be the effect of the movement on the sexual relation?"

The ordinary treatment of the divorce question is equally narrow and unsatisfactory, ignoring wholly or partially these important facts and the conclusions they point to:

1. The general tendency of our older States is to enlarge the grounds for which divorces are granted. In the original thirteen States, for example, the close of every twenty years since the adoption of the Federal Constitutions has found the divorce laws on the whole more liberal than they were at the end of the previous twenty years.

2. In a large number of our newer States it is now practically true that anybody earnestly and persistently seeking a divorce, for any reason whatever, succeeds in obtaining it sooner or later.

3. Connecticut for many years, and Indiana for more than half a century, have had exceedingly easy divorce laws. The Indiana statute authorizes any circuit judge in the State to decree a divorce to the "injured party" for any one of seven causes which are specified, or for "any other cause for which the court shall deem it proper that a divorce should be granted."

Whenever the opponents of easy divorce admit any of these facts, they always assume that their effect is baleful, and so beg the whole question. They frequently record that in Connecticut the divorces for a twelvemonth bear such or such a proportion to the marriages, and then, with a few comments, rest their case, as if that fact alone established an unhealthy or vicious condition of society. Why do they not give us argument instead of assertion? Why not prove by statistics, which the census reports place within everybody's reach, whether or not in the manufacturing State of Connecticut and the farming State of Indiana the ratio of mutes, lunatics, idiots, criminals, assignation houses, brothels, or illegitimate children is larger than in other manufacturing or farming States? Why not attempt to show whether there is more crime, secret and open; whether men and women are really less faithful husbands and wives and less tender fathers and mothers, and whether children grow up to be less pure and manly and womanly? That is the pith of the matter.

The burden of proof rests with the assailants. They allege that certain laws tend to the destruction of morality and the detriment of the general welfare. Two States deny the charge by keeping those laws in force until, in one, two generations have lived and died under them. They adhere steadfastly to those laws despite vehement denunciation and the grave practical disadvantage that the unhappily-wedded not only within their own borders, but also from half the rest of the Union, seek their courts for redress, and thus fasten upon them the additional odium of the multiplied cases of injustice and fraud which inevitably arise under all laws, however carefully administered.

Not only do Connecticut and Indiana do this, but the tendency of the other States is in the same general direction. Where do the advocates of rigid divorce laws fancy it is going to stop? R.

MR. GARDNER AND CREEDS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I perceive that what I said in a letter published in your issue of November 5, conveyed a wrong impression to your mind as well as to that of others. Allow me to correct it.

I am interpreted as expressing a hostility to creeds in toto and per se. I not only disclaim the truth of this interpretation, and regret that I should have been so thoroughly misunderstood, but now reassert what I supposed I had clearly stated before, viz.: That I agree with all orthodox believers in considering some creed necessary to proper church organization, but differ very materially in regard to its relative importance in the same.

As I did not state my reasons for this conviction, I will do so now.

In the first place, then, as I said before, I conceive the whole spirit and teaching of the Scriptures to indicate the brotherhood of the church, and brotherhood implies at least unity of organization. For particular passages teaching the brotherhood of the church, see 1 Peter ii. 17; iii. 8; John xv.

We are all one in Christ, and Christ is our elder brother. We all acknowledge this, too, by addressing each other as brethren. The question then arises, how shall we organize so as to make this a living, palpable fact to the world as well as to ourselves? Manifestly, by making that the prominent idea or basis of our visible organization which is more than all else the index of the supposed fact.

Now, the cardinal doctrine of Christianity is an unconditional and unbiassed seeking after purity of heart, the legitimate result of which, we are taught, will be perfect love toward God and man—a fulfilment, in this way, of all the requirements of the law and the prophets.

What we, as a church or a brotherhood, wish to promote in ourselves, and make manifest to the world, is this seeking after purity of heart; and if we can find one characteristic which, more than any other, indicates to ourselves and others the fact of this new life begun, this should be the basis for our visible organization. What saith the Scriptures? "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren" (1 John iii. 14). Again, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another" (John xiii. 35).

The one characteristic of all others, then, which is best evidence to ourselves, and the world outside, that we have truly begun the better life, is "love," or, as the word is elsewhere translated, "charity." Neither of these terms seems to convey the true idea of the original word, "ἀγάπη," and in my previous communication I preferred to call it sympathy, as more nearly interpreting to our minds now what I understand to be the true signification of the word. We would make, then, "ἀγάπη," or "sympathy," the basis of church organization for the reasons above stated; and I feel called upon to say this, because I think it evident to Christians themselves, as well as the world at large, that "creed," by reason of the relative importance it holds in the church, is now and has from the first been the basis of Protestant Church organization—an error, I conceive, second only to the Catholic error of an organization upon the basis of "works." Faith has come to be synonymous with "creed," or the acceptance of a creed, and "creed" has thus virtually become the door of the church. Whereas Christ says, "I am the door" (John x. 9). To enter this door requires something more than the acceptance of a "creed"—an experimental knowledge of the way through, namely; and, as I said before, this is best expressed in one word, by "trust," not "faith." For this reason I think it does matter, "for the purposes of this discussion, how the word 'πίστις' is translated."

But this experimental knowledge of Christ through trust in him results in "ἀγάπη," or sympathy with him and his teachings, as well as with all who have passed through a like experimental knowledge. We may not have all arrived at the result by exactly the same mental processes. In truth, so long as language is the imperfect medium it is now, and always has been, for the communication of ideas, it is foolish and unreasonable to expect it. It is sufficient to enquire whether the result has been attained. At this point, and not before, arises the necessity for church organization, and the new instinct which demands it should be its basis, for the same reason that another instinct is the basis of the family relation, and another of the state. Since, then, religious experience is the result of thought and feeling fused into one, and one is naught without the other, so far as religion is concerned, it seems illogical to me to maintain that "credo" is the basis of all religious as well as intellectual life.

Finally, let us, as Christians, manifest our love to Christ by loving each other, and not by wrangling as to how we all come to have this same love and can best assert it.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. GARDNER.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO, Dec. 7, 1868.

[We did not maintain "that 'credo' was the basis of all religious life." We said it was the basis of all religious sects or denominations, and behind Mr. Gardner's "sympathy" and "trust" we still see his "credo" as plainly as possible.—ED. NATION.]

A SUBSCRIBER, a professor in the Burlington University (Vermont), writes to us expressing the hope "that the statement made by Miss Dickinson in a lecture delivered in Burlington a few days ago, that the number of your [our] subscribers was rapidly diminishing, is wholly without foundation," and he is pleased to add "that he should consider the failure of the Nation as one of the very bad signs of the times." Miss Dickinson's statement, of which we now hear for the first time, is "wholly without foundation." The number of subscribers to the Nation is and has for a long while been steadily increasing. We are sorry for Miss Dickinson's sake, and for the sake of the causes she advocates, that she should think it desirable to give stories of this kind a place in her lectures. Female politicians must, in order to justify their existence, and exercise that "purifying and elevating influence" on politics which the suffrage conventions promise us, in the first place set the male agitators an example of good taste. Now, it is in the worst possible taste for a lady to reply to an adverse criticism on her speeches and novels in the mode selected by Miss Dickinson in the present instance. In the second place, they must set male agitators an example of scrupulousness and accuracy of statement, especially in speaking of their political enemies. This may seem a hard doctrine but we warrant its soundness. Instead of these things, however, most of the female politicians who have thus far appeared in the field seem to be copying the old male tricks with lamentable fidelity.

LITERARY.

THE proprietors and conductors of the American Journal of Mining and of the Spanish El Correo Hispano-Americano—papers addressing special classes of readers, but, like many such journals, enjoying a considerable circulation—intend to add one more to the number of their periodicals. The new-comer, a monthly, is to be called the Manufacturer and Builder, and its title very well describes its character. It will be always non-political, only occasionally literary, and will have for its usual contents articles, some of them illustrated, on the different branches of manufactures; on the various kinds of manufacturing machinery; on the stone, lumber, and iron interests; on the strength and relative value of building materials; on lime, mortar, cement, sewage, ventilation, and kindred topics. In size the Manufacturer and Builder will be like the London Engineer. There is good reason to think that it will be a useful and well-conducted paper.——Messrs. Roberts Brothers announce an edition edited by Mrs. Hale—Mrs. S. J. Hale, we suppose—of Lady Wortley Montagu's Letters, and of Madame de Sévigné's. Both these works are wanted, and enough has been said of both of them by excellent writers to make it easy for the editor to do her work, and likely that when it is done it will be satisfactory to the reader. "Wandering Recollections of a Somewhat Busy Life" is another of Roberts Brothers' announcements, and still another is a second work by the same author, Mr. John Neal, entitled "Great Plagues and Little Mysteries." Others are Mr. Arthur Helps's "Life of Christopher Columbus;" A. T. Teetgen's "Palingenesia," which is a poem depicting "the rise and progress of heterodoxy in a contemporary soul;" "Under the Lime Trees," which is already issued by the Appletons; "Tales of the Toys," by F. F. Broderip; John Timbs's "Eccentricities of Animal Life;" and "The Adventures of Hans Sterk," which appeared some time ago in Harper & Brothers' announcements.——In Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co.'s list of the Erckmann-Chatrian books the second is "The Conscript."——Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. will publish in book-form certain recently delivered sensational and otherwise not remarkable sermons on "The Failure of Protestantism," by the Reverend Doctor F. C. Ewer. The same house announce as to be published before the end of the current month, "A Half-Century with Juvenile Delinquents," which is a history of American societies for reforming youth, by the Rev. Mr. B. K. Pierce, and a "Globe Edition" of "Cowper's Poetical Works," to match the Scott, Dryden, Spenser, Dante (Cary's), Butler, Campbell, Burns, Milton, and Chaucer already issued.——Mr. M. W. Dodd announces "Watchwords for the Warfare of Life: from Dr. Martin Luther," a new work by the author of "The Schönberg-Cotta Family." The same publisher has ready new editions, in various styles of beauty and at various prices, of all the works of this popular writer.

—Singularly enough, the "History of the Great Rebellion," by J. W. Jones and T. B. Morris, published at Utica by J. Mather Jones, is the first attempt at anything like a history of the United States in the Welsh language. There have been several spasmodic efforts in this direction in various periodicals, but nothing in the shape of a book. Considering the large number of Welsh people in the country, and especially the active part which many of them took in the early settlement of Pennsylvania in the seventeenth century, and more recently of our Western Territories, the lack of a Welsh history of the United States is a fact worth noting, though perhaps not more remarkable than the general absence of original book-writing in their own language among so intelligent a class of our adopted citizens. It certainly does not come from a want of ability to write such books, nor of a reading public to buy them. We account for it from the fact that the Welsh people assimilate native American tastes and habits more thoroughly, perhaps, than any other class of foreigners, save in two things—theology and poetry—and in these two they are thoroughly Welsh wherever found, and for reasons which readily suggest themselves. The authors of this history are veteran journalists, and they have performed their task with painstaking fidelity and conscientious regard for the truth. Of course there is no pretence of access to original information, but a thorough sifting of evidence as found in published works, with a view of giving a connected and intelligible narrative of the exciting events of our late civil war. From an examination of the volume we judge that much the greater portion has been written by Mr. Morris, a facile writer and a thorough master of the Welsh language. It is hard for a stranger to conceive the difficulty of writing a good military work in the language of a people so unwarlike (of late years) as the Cambro-Britons. But the authors have been noticeably successful in this respect. Military movements are narrated and battles described in language at once smooth and intelligible, though many terms had to be coined to express the new agencies used in the art of war. But the work is not a history of the war merely; it aims to give an outline of all the notable events connected with the discovery and settlement of this continent by Europeans, the colonial history of our portion of it, the Revolutionary war, and the various administrations down to the breaking out of the rebellion. The space allotted to the discovery of the continent is small; but, considering the nature of the work, it might have been made smaller with advantage to both authors and readers; the tales of the Norsemen are recited with a circumstantiality altogether out of place in such a work. But when we come to the settlement of Pennsylvania by William Penn and his followers, the most interesting portion of early American history to the ancient Briton, the subject is dismissed with just three lines, a most inexcusable blunder in a work written exclusively for the use of the Welsh people. But the faults to be found with this work are few compared with its many excellences; indeed, with the above exception, we have hardly a fault to find with it. Typographically it is a handsome volume, with good type and good paper.

—A Boston correspondent points out an error into which we fell the other day in speaking of a certain historical compilation as being the work of Mr. C. M. Yonge and Mr. G. M. Sewell. The fact of the matter is, says our correspondent, who is on terms of friendship with one of the compilers, that the book is made by Miss Yonge, the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe"—as she persists in calling herself—who is well and favorably known as a worker in the field of history at second-hand, and by Miss E. M. Sewell. "Mr. G. M. Sewell," then, and "Messrs. Yonge & Sewell" are mistakes of the London Publishers' Circular's compositors and proof-readers, and we are sorry to have been led astray by them. Other recent English books, or such as are to be published soon, are these: Mr. Algernon Swinburne's "Bothwell" is said to be eagerly looked for and shortly expected. Poetry of a precisely opposite sort, so far as concerns the relative proportions of sounding words and sound thought, will be found in a new and needed edition of "Massinger's Plays," which will constitute one volume of the so-called "Mermaid Series." Next come the plays of Marlowe, who, if he was a little too much like Swinburne in some respects, was often sweet and strong and truly poetical. One volume of the now well-known and popular "Bayard Series" will be Hazlitt's "Round Table," and another will be "Rasselas," with Leigh Hunt's essay. A series which is, perhaps, of more importance than either of these we have just mentioned is the "Clarendon Press," which already numbers some thirty volumes of manuals of a high class in various branches of learning, from Anglo-Saxon literature to Greek tragedy, and from science to verbal criticism. The new volumes which are now, as we learn from Mr. Welford in the Bookbuyer, very soon to be issued, are "A History of Germany and of the Empire to the Close of the Middle Ages;" a "Constitutional History of England," by the Rev. Mr. W. Stubbs; a "History of Germany from the Reformation," by Mr. A. W. Ward; a "History of British India," by Mr. S. Owen; and a "History of Greece," by E. A. Freeman. These are all the results of the careful sifting of larger works by trained readers and students of historical literature. "Hints on Household Taste in Furniture, Upholstery," etc., we may very probably take an early occasion to notice more at length. Mr. Moxon—who, by the way, has never, so far as we know, explained the nature of the transaction by which he made his edition of Lamb's works complete at the expense of a Boston publisher and an American collector of ana—puts forth a new edition of Elia's writings. It is prefixed by an essay written by George Augustus Sala. "A Life [whitewashing] of Lucrezia Borgia" is announced, and the author claims to have as a foundation for it some rare and hitherto unpublished documents. The Countess de Boissy has aided Mr. Herbert Jerningham, attaché of the British embassy in Paris, and translator of her book about Byron, by writing for his version of the "Recollections" several new chapters.

—The Lowell Institute, having invited Robert von Schlagintweit to deliver an English course of his admirable lectures in Boston, it may interest many of our readers to hear something of him and his family. A glance at the route lines of the "Uebersichts-Karte," attached to the first volume of the "Reisen in Indien und Hoch-Asien," just published by Hermann von Schlagintweit-Sakünlünski, will show the extraordinary extent and character of the scientific travels executed by the author and his younger brothers, Adolph and Robert, at the expense of the East India Company, in the most interesting parts of the Eastern world. These lines, for the most part separately traversed by the brothers, extend from Galle, at the southern extremity of the Island of Ceylon, to Kashgar, in Chinese Turkestan, and from Kurrachee, west of the Indus Delta, to Sudiyah, near the headwaters of the Brahmaputra—that is, from 6° to 39° N. L., and from 66° to 96° E. L., embracing not only all the regions south of the Ganges and Indus, but also Cashmere, Balti, Ladak, Tibet, Nepaul, Sikkim, Bootan, Assam, and parts of China, and crossing the highest mountain ranges of the globe, the Himalaya, Karakorum, and Kuenlun. In Tibet Adolph and Robert ascended, in 1855, the Ibi-Gamin to the height of upward of twenty-two thousand feet, the highest point ever reached by a known traveller, and in the following year Hermann, accompanied by Robert, penetrated across the Karakorum and Kuenlun into Chinese Turkestan, thus earning the surname bestowed on him on his return to Germany, of Sakünlünski—that is (in Slavic), the Transkuenlunian. The northernmost point, Kashgar, was reached by Adolph alone, who perished there, in August, 1857, by the hands of the barbarous natives. Robert and Hermann had shortly before returned home, via Egypt, and it was long before they learned the tragic end of their heroic brother. Before their departure for the East, the three brothers—born in 1826, 1829, and 1833, respectively—had earned great fame as physical explorers of the Alps, having published the fruits of their explorations, during which Hermann and Adolph ascended the highest summit of Monte Rosa, in the "Untersuchungen über die physikalische Geographie der Alpen" (1850), and "Neue Untersuchungen über die physikalische Geographie und Geologie der Alpen" (1854). The richer fruits of the Eastern journeys are now being deposited in a grand publication in English, entitled "Results of a Scientific Mission to India and High-Asia," issued at Leipzig, and adorned with an atlas containing maps and pictorial views of great merit. The work is to consist of nine volumes, of which four have appeared (1860–1866). The contents of the whole are as follows: Vol. I., Astronomic Measurements and Magnetic Observations; Vol. II., Hypsometry; Vol. III., Topography of Western and Northern High-Asia, and Philological Glossary of Geographic Names; Vols. IV. and V., Meteorology; Vol. VI., Geology; Vol. VII., Botany and Zoölogy; Vol. VIII., Ethnography; Vol. IX., Geographical Sketches of India, the Himalayas, Tibet, and Turkestan. The German "Reisen" now before us may be regarded as a popular abridgment of the scientific "Results," with the admixture of particulars of a more personal character. This book, too, is a work of the highest merit, no less by its form and diction than by its contents. The Schlagintweit brothers, of whom the fifth, Emil (born 1835), is renowned as the author of "Buddhism in Tibet" (1863), and of "Die Könige von Tibet" (1865), and the third, Eduard (born 1831), wrote a history of the "Hispano-Moroccan War" of 1860, in which he partook, were all ennobled by King Maximilian II. of Bavaria, their native country. It was in the service of that country that Eduard fell, in July, 1866, in the battle of Kissingen, fighting bravely against the Prussians. The extraordinary collections of the travellers adorn their mansion at Jägersburg, near Forchheim, in Franconia.

—The Russian Invalid announces that after the 1st of January, 1869, it will cease to appear. This, as well as the other official papers, are to be replaced by a general official newspaper in the style of the French Moniteur, which will contain all the official decrees and announcements, and be called the Government Messenger (Pravitelstvenniy Vyestnik). The cessation of this celebrated paper, the organ of the Russian War Department, and of late edited with great ability, should hardly be allowed to pass without remark. The Invalid was founded in 1813 by Mr. Pezarovius, for the purpose of collecting money for the relief of the wounded. The first number was issued on the 1st of February, 1813, with only twelve subscribers. In three months the subscribers increased to eight hundred in St. Petersburg alone, and there were soon more than four thousand. From the earnings of the newspaper and from private contributions Pezarovius formed an invalid fund, with which in the year 1813 he gave pensions and temporary relief to 450 men, and in 1814 and 1815 to 1,200. In addition to this, at the end of the year 1815 he handed over to the committee for the wounded a fund of 395,000 roubles, and subsequently an annual revenue of 20,000 to 40,000 roubles. During the Crimean war the Invalid brought to the invalid fund more than 100,000 roubles. In 1860 the Invalid was farmed out, but when the conditions of the press changed it was necessary to place it under the immediate direction of the Minister of War. Since 1862 it has paid nothing to the invalid fund, but has even been obliged to have a subsidy, which, in 1867, beside the salaries of the editors, amounted to 23,770 roubles. The other newspapers at present official, such as the North- ern Post, will be deprived of their subsidies and submitted to the general laws which govern the press.

—Trübner's latest Literary Record announces several important new publications on the languages and ethnology of India. Mr. W. W. Hunter, of the Bengal Civil Service, who has lately become so favorably known as author of the "The Annals of Rural Bengal," publishes "A Comparative Dictionary of the Non-Aryan Languages of India and High-Asia," a comprehensive compilation illustrative of Turanian speech, and embracing vocabularies of one hundred and forty-four dialects spoken by the scattered remnants of tribes and peoples who in pre-historic times were the masters of India and adjoining countries, but afterwards succumbed to the overwhelming power of Aryan conquerors. In elaborating his book, which cannot fail to advance the work of research now so vigorously pushed forward by Occidental scholars in the vast and promising field of Turanian philology, Mr. Hunter availed himself of extensive materials belonging to the public, official or scientific, institutions of Hindostan, as well as of valuable private collections placed at his disposal. For the convenience of students of various nationalities the equivalents of the Turanian words are given in English, French, German, Russian, and Latin. A "Sanscrit Prosody," by Charles Philip Brown, author of the Telugu Dictionary, is in the press. From the pen of Major Malleson, of the Bengal Staff Corps, we have "Essays and Lectures on Indian Historical Subjects," containing, among others, sketches of Count Lally, Havelock, and Hyder Ali's last war.

—The following named works, all gleaned from the same number of Trübner's Record, we group together as evidences of the activity of the Jewish mind in the fields of linguistic and antiquarian research: Adolphe Neubauer's "Géographie du Talmud," a work on the geography of Palestine according to the Talmud, which has gained a prize of the French Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres (Paris); "French Views on Zoroastrianism," translated from the texts of M. Adolphe Franck, Member of the Institute, Professor at the Collége de France, and M. Jules Oppert, Professor at the Bibliothèque Impériale (Bombay); "Ursprung und Entwickelung der menschlichen Sprache und Vernunft" (Origin and Development of the Human Language and Reason), by L. Geiger (Vol. I., Stuttgart); and "Das Buch Kusari, von Jehudah ha-Levi," translated after the Hebrew version, and edited, with notes and a general introduction, by Dr. David Cassel (revised edition, Leipzig).

MORE JUVENILE LITERATURE.*

A SPECIMEN of the worst of all sorts of writing for children is "Patience Hathaway: a Story of Ivy Cottage." It depicts the kind of good boy who makes all ordinary vice seem respectable, and the kind of bad boy who never exists in nature, and beyond a doubt it can do nothing for its readers but vulgarize them and make them either hypocritical, self-conscious canters, or else harden them in openly evil courses. Charley Ray is good, so he uses as unexceptionable English as the author has at command; never strikes a blow; gives up all boyish amusements in order that he may spend his evenings in reading books of travel, histories, and other improving works, to a crippled young friend of his; forgives every enemy, rebukes with freedom sinners of all ages, and constantly puts them to the blush by the example of his nobility of character and the worldly success which attends all his steps. The bad boy, Dill, steals melons, will not run on errands, is ungrammatical, proceeds speedily to housebreaking, is obdurate as a flinty burglar of full age; but at the end of the book suddenly he succumbs to the coals of fire which are heaped on his head by the good people, young and old, whom he has causelessly injured. Good is not the word to be used in speaking of the crippled boy of artistic tastes. He is merely an angel of pronounced Christian character and experience, living in quiet pain with a family whose great coarseness of manner jars harshly on his feelings. The incidents of the story are as violently false as the human nature which it presents for inspection, and as vulgar in tone. The good genius of the story, a wealthy, unmarried lady of twenty-six or seven, with a hidden sorrow of the intense though subdued type, has her effects secretly conveyed to a country village, where at once every one hates her and backbites her for no assignable reason except that she looks refined. She takes the lame boy into her house, having previously got for him an easy chair, which she procures with a stealthiness which makes her agent in the purchase almost shed tears of admiration at her modest goodness and benevolence. The lame boy is thirteen or fourteen years of age, and she relates to him one afternoon a very magaziny tale of her love for a young man, and her sudden bereavement, and the grief she thereafterwards bore, and thus reveals to him the secret cause of her pallor and her retired way of life and her occasional quiet tears. She saves from drowning an ill-mannered boy of fourteen or fifteen, who, with his young companions, attempts to break into Ivy Cottage at night. One of the companions is the brother of her dead lover; she reclaims him—"guilty and low as he is," as she remarks to him—and he by-and-by woos and marries an inmate of her house, "a drunkard's daughter"—as she tells the lame boy—whom she had rescued from poverty and degradation. In short, "Patience Hathaway" is a deleterious mixture of the cheap book for boys and the cheapest kind of sensational novel, and it is a matter of regret that any boy or girl should be in danger of reading it. It belongs, too, we may all be sorry to know, to a class of books for boys which are each year turned out in large numbers, whose praise is in a thousand journals, and which, if human nature were not enlisted against them, would do more harm, and of a more disgusting sort, than can at all be calculated. The authors mean well, too, and so are enabled to be all the more injurious. Of the author concerning whom we have just been giving our impressions, a leading religious paper says, after mentioning the fact that "his prolific pen has given to the public thirteen books within the last three or four years," that "he never wrote a line that he had occasion to erase." It seems certainly a duty for us to say that he and the school of which he is one ought never to have written a line at all; if they ought, then we know nothing of boys or of morality.

After going through such a book as Glance Gaylord's, it is more than doubly pleasant to read the charming narrative of "Miss Lily's Voyage Round the World." It was a journey which occupied no less than three or four hours, and in length it was nearly or quite two miles and two furlongs. The papa and mamma of Miss Lily having gone to Paris, and left her and her two cousins—the united ages of the three being nineteen years—in charge of their English governess and the cook, Jeannette, it is speedily resolved that inasmuch as sugar-cane, cocoa-nuts, and the Island of Juan Fernandez are to be found only at the end of the world, no class of people can be so happy as travellers; and further, that if a vessel can be secured and provisioned, the most distant countries shall at once be visited by Toto, Paul, and Miss Lily, and several islands shall be brought back, one for each of the discoverers and one for papa. What follows on this resolution makes up the story, and it is all very entertaining indeed. Little Peter, who is the fisherman's son—rising seven years of age, and a hard literalist for one so young—discovers for the small romancers an unused boat to which he leads them, and a certain quantity of victuals being saved by the children from their meals, it is but a day or two before they set out in search of islands and adventures. The first land they make is England.

"'We have already lost sight of the coast of France,' says Captain Paul, when they have gone down the river some half mile or so.

"They see in the distance clouds of smoke, from the midst of which bright flames escape. They hear far off a noise of hammering iron.

"'I should n't wonder if that was Father Taboureau's forge,' says Little Peter.

"The Admiral shrugs her shoulders. 'That,' she says, 'is foggy England.'

"'It is perfidious Albion, the land of shopkeepers,' says Paul.

"Toto does not want to go to England. There are too many governesses there. It is full of Miss Doras who oblige a little fellow to say 'yes,' and study, and who make them eat their bread and butter with the buttered side down when they do not read well.

"They reassure Toto. They will not land in a country so well known."

In rapid succession La Belle Lili sights Africa, with numbers of naked savages, the Isle of Bourbon, the Isle of France, Australia, Robinson Crusoe's Island, where she runs aground and the discoverers undergo many vicissitudes of fortune, till they are rescued by an artist, who takes them home to their anxious parents. Children may easily be imagined talking exactly like this bold crew, and "making believe" everything set down in the book. Nor is it so very hard a strain on the imagination to suppose them even doing what Paul and his friends are represented as having done. At all events, the young folks will be pleased at reading of the haps and mishaps of the circumnavigation, and will not be hurt at all by listening to the sound lecturing which the artist delivered to the wanderers when he found them in the pickle into which their thoughtless hardihood had brought them, and which could hardly have been in place if spoken to girls and boys on dry land safely playing at navigation. The illustrations, of which there is the very generous number of forty-eight, are by Lorenz Frölich. They are all pleasant and spirited, and are truly illustrations of the text.

"Little Lou's Sayings and Doings" is an American book, and a very pleasant and good one. It seems to be, in fact it must be, a record of a boy's performances till he was six or seven years old, and it relates his speeches, his meritorious actions, and a good many proofs of his depraved nature, in a way which cannot fail to interest parents, and which will command the attention and approval of the younger part of the reading public. It is a good while since we have happened on a book, whether for juvenile or adult readers, that seemed to be closer to absolute truth of portraiture, and the author is to be congratulated on her success, and to be thanked for the pleasure she gives as well as for the excellent example she sets. It is true, perhaps, that one should have had children in order not to find some of the matter rather trivial in its truthful simplicity; but the readers most interested will find nothing trivial; and then for the others—there is the simplicity, a quality of which people conversant with printed matter do not discover so very much in the course of their experience.

The writer of "Tales for Little Convalescents" we should like to praise heartily, her work is so kind throughout, and half of it—the half in the middle of the book—is so clever and amusing. That part of it, however, is clever because—being apparently drawn directly from actual occurrences—it lets the children talk and play while we overhear them; and it is amusing to us grown people, and not, we should suppose, to young readers. The rest of the book children may like, and it may very probably profit them; there is at the least nothing to injure them; but it is not well done; the fairy tale and the poetry are far beneath the "Class in Quizzical Geography" and the "Scenes in a Nursery." On the whole, however, the book is one to be commended, and nobody who buys it for his boys and girls will make a bad mistake.

"The Alphabet in Rhyme" is a "picture-book" with colored pictures, and as such may be of some service in the nursery, just as bright bits of cloth are and gay buttons. But a child is a good way from the innocency of learning his A, B, C when he can assimilate things like this, which ends the page devoted to E, and which refers to the national bird:

"His nest in the cliff
Overlooks the broad sea,
He is the emblem of Freedom,
The pride of the Free."

It is an odd mistake that this writer has made in fancying himself a writer for children, or indeed capable of being such.

"Five Days' Entertainment at Wentworth Grange," a pretty volume, in square octavo, and bound in dark-blue cloth, contains twenty-six tales and seventeen woodcuts, besides a very charming engraved vignette on the title-page. The illustrations ought to be mentioned in the title of the book, for they are all by Arthur Hughes, and into two or three of them he has put his full strength. His designs are always of very unequal merit, not only in this book but throughout the whole of his work as book illustrator and as painter. They are seldom uninteresting, however, and never affected or destitute of feeling; so that there is scarcely any artist whose handiwork it is pleasanter to meet. The poetry that there is in common things he well understands, as any one knows who may recollect the drawings of the boat in the illustrated "Enoch Arden," and the ingenious and fanciful designs of the cloth cover of the same book. And he is a master of expression of face, though that is lost often enough in the woodcuts. His original works are peculiarly valuable in this respect, and in some of the illustrations to the volume before us, especially in the little girl on the title-page, this power of his is delightfully shown.

As for the stories, they are strung together on the thread of a more rational and possible pentameron than we usually have. The stories told during five days by the oldest five of the young people who are spending their holiday at Wentworth Grange, have their supplement in Mrs. Wentworth's own story. We find among the tales some old—in fact, some oldest—friends agreeably retold: "Orpheus and Eurydice," "The Peasant Countess," and the pride of the Decameron, "The Story of the Falcon;" others are new, and some of them very cleverly comic. The stories are arranged so as to illustrate the five senses, one of the senses to each day, with five tales concerning it. For children of ten or twelve years old, this is one of the best books of the time.

"Jack the Conqueror" is a good little story. Jack is a poor English boy who longs to know how to read. He has no one to help him, but one day a travelling artist who sketches him gives him sixpence, and tells him to help himself. The motto of the book is, "Resolve well and persevere," and this Jack carries out, till in the end he attains success. Jack is, to be sure, rather an unnaturally good boy; but as he is a brave, honest little fellow, and neither affected nor hypocritical, he is a very fair ideal for boys of ten years old, who, as a rule, prefer ideals to copies from real life. Besides, occasionally there is a real boy who is a little unnaturally good, and yet far from goody; it takes all kinds of people to make a world. The illustrations are of unusual excellence. The figures are lifelike and forcible. They offer, however, a great variety of Jacks, no one resembling another. It seems to us that the real Jack may have looked like the earnest-faced boy in the popular engraving of "Speed the Plough." At least the spirit of that picture is the spirit of the book.

Judging from the stories, the "Children's Album" was intended for very little children, but the pictures which make exactly half of it would give pleasure to young persons of almost any age. There are 178 woodcuts of various merit, and copied from all sorts of sources. Some of the plates are very much worn. Opposite each is a page of story in large type, made to match the illustration. One of these, by the way, is called "The Anaconda and the Boa Constrictor," "Anaconda" describing an African bull, which is again referred to in the text as "the poor stag." With the exception of this legend, and of three or four frightful pictures, such as the murder of the young princes in the Tower, which we should advise parents to cut out and burn, we do not see why a child might not be considered fortunate in the possession of the volume. The children's verdict will undoubtedly be in its favor.

We perhaps err in putting "Mountain Adventures" in the present category; yet, without professing to have been prepared for the young, it is well calculated to please and instruct the boy or girl engaged in grammar-school studies, not less than their parents. It is an English compilation founded on a Continental one, but varied by substituting for some of the original selections passages from the adventures of English explorers, including Tyndall, whose admirable style needs little adaptation for the comprehension of children. For the most part the scientific portions of these narratives have been purposely subordinated to the incidents, of which, while the range is very large, certain experiences and observations are necessarily repeated and leave a very distinct and accurate impression upon the mind. The extracts not only seem to be literal, even if condensed, but are in each instance carefully credited to the author and work from which they were taken. The pictures, finally, are good, and seem to have been drawn after photographs, which, wherever obtainable, might themselves with advantage have been given.

We cannot readily declare the proper age of readers for "Grandmother's Curiosity Cabinet." The little German Tertianer, or third-form boy, who figures in it, should be about eleven years old, and an American boy of the same age could comprehend most of the stories which the "Cabinet" supplies. The translation, however, is scarcely simple enough to be called successful, and often retains, as if for flavoring, a German word which it was hardly worth while to use, and which has to be explained immediately in a foot-note. Indeed, these foot-notes of translation and pronunciation so abound as to make the book a sort of introduction to the German language—sometimes, also, to German manners. The stories themselves are of a class which is not new, and of which each year we are borrowing less and less from our Teutonic cousins.

The bound volumes of the two rival, yet in many families kindly agreeing, children's magazines known as "Our Young Folks" and the "Riverside," should not be overlooked by those who seek reading for the young that will outlast the holidays. They present an almost exhaustless variety of stories and illustrations, and suit, in one way and another, all ages from the nursery up to the grammar or even high school.

Das Beständige in den Menschenrassen und die Spielweite ihrer Veränderlichkeit (Constancy and Range of Variation of the Human Species). Von Dr. A. Bastian. (Berlin: D. Reimer; New York: L. W. Schmidt.)—In a recent mention of this work, which does not lack learning nor a certain brilliancy of style, we spoke of it as merely the prolegomena to a larger work on civilized peoples; and we shall, therefore, dismiss it somewhat briefly, although of itself it makes a book of nearly three hundred pages octavo.

In general, we may say that the author, with a genuine scientific comprehensiveness, offers ingenious remarks on the natural and the supernatural, on descent, accumulation, craniology, philology, etc., etc., in their manifold relations to ethnology and anthropology. His short but characteristic sentences disclose a truly cyclopædic knowledge, which, on the side of natural philosophy especially, reminds one of Alexander von Humboldt. Dr. Bastian's views, if not always sustained by facts, are always referred to them, and lend whatever weight they have to our latter-day materialism. His more recent authorities, whose theses, however, he does not invariably adopt, but for the most part supplements and broadens from his own painstaking and long-continued studies, are principally Darwin's works, De Candolle's "Géographie botanique," and Nathusius's "Rassen des Schweines"—books which fairly embody the results of modern investigation. In a word, the volume before us may be described as an attempt to harmonize in an application to anthropology the natural laws which produce the various geological formations, physical phenomena, and animal and vegetable species. Since this is here rather suggested than exhibited in detail, we must await the author's more compendious work for a fuller treatment of the subject. The present is illustrated by an ethnographic map, drawn by Prof. Kiepert, the first of several which are promised.

HEARTH AND HOME.

EDITED BY

DONALD G. MITCHELL AND HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

On the 26th of December will be issued the first number of a new Rural and Family Paper with the above title.

It will be published weekly on sixteen large handsome pages, printed from new type on clear, white book paper, abundantly illustrated by the best artists.

IT WILL BE LARGELY DEVOTED TO ## AGRICULTURE.

It will not go to the farmer with any airs of superior knowledge, for its conductors are well aware that every man knows many things in his own special calling better than they; but it will aim to aid the farmer in his peculiar difficulties, and to help him where he needs help. To this end, a large number of scientific men and men of practical experience will tell in its columns from week to week what they know about

SOILS, TILLAGE, DRAINAGE, IRRIGATION, SPECIAL CROPS, MANURES, STOCK-BREEDING, POULTRY-RAISING; THE ARRANGEMENT OF FIELDS AND BUILDINGS, ALL NEW IMPLEMENTS, SEEDS AND, PLANTS OF VALUE.

It will carefully report to him all public discussions at home and abroad of matters pertaining to his calling, and no pains will be spared to induce the best farmers and planters all over the country to state in its pages the methods by which they reached the best results. What its writers have to say will smell of the soil and not of the dictionary, and their object will be to protect the farmer from humbugs, help him out of wrong ways into right ways, and to make the least work produce the most profit.

THE FRUIT-GROWER

will find in this Journal all new fruits of value figured and described, and improved methods of treatment of established sorts, subject to the observations and criticisms of professional and accomplished cultivators. This paper will not be a party in the wars of the pomologists: no outside pressure shall cause it to speak well of an inferior fruit, or badly of a good fruit.

THE FLORIST

will find due space given in this Journal to flower-culture, whether in summer or winter. The conservatory of the rich and the flower-patch of the day-laborer will be both subject of consideration, and of such suggestions as experienced flower-growers or inventive amateurs can supply. This Department of the Journal will be under the supervision of a practical gardener and accomplished botanist.

ORNAMENTAL GARDENING,

whether relating to parterres of flowers, or to the lay-out of an estate, will be subject to special attention, and every number of the Journal will have some one or more illustrations to further and to inform taste in this direction.

RURAL ARCHITECTURE

will be represented by a design each week, and in the course of the year we shall hope to give tasteful examples of every style of Rural Building, from a rustic arbor to a village church.

PLANS OF COUNTRY HOMES

which are noted for their attractiveness will be given from time to time, and also of cemeteries, parks, village-greens, and such directions with respect to details—whether of planting or road-making—as shall make them worthy of study.

TO THE FAMILY CIRCLE

it will bring all that can interest the household: plain rules for healthy living and domestic management, from the folding of a napkin and the cooking of a good dinner to the education of children. It will make record of all that relates to new industries, progress in science, domestic comfort, and fireside art. Here new books and favorite authors will have due notice, with choice items of domestic and foreign news. It will also bring to the hearth the entertainment of adventures by sea and land, the cheer of good stories, and the melody of sweet songs. In these features it will be strong, original, and pure.

Mrs. STOWE, GRACE GREENWOOD, and Mrs. MARY E. DODGE will contribute to every number, and many of the best writers of the country will constantly enrich this department.

A NEW STORY BY MR. J. T. TROWBRIDGE,

"IN THE ICE,"

written expressly for HEARTH AND HOME, will begin with the first number, to be immediately followed by an original novel from the powerful pen of MRS. REBECCA HARDINGE DAVIS, Authoress of "Life in the Iron Mills."

THE BOYS AND GIRLS

will not be forgotten, but will find their own page always lighted with such fun in pictures, and such fun in stories, as shall make them look sharply every week for the coming of HEARTH AND HOME. There will be riddles, and puzzles, and games; and many pleasant women and cheerful men, who love the little people, will have much to say for their entertainment. And all the fun will be so tempered with good teaching, that we shall hope to make them wiser and better, while we make them merrier.

TO ALL WHO LIVE IN THE COUNTRY

we shall hope to bring entertainment, sound teaching, and valuable suggestions.

Finally, we are aware that it is easy, and not unusual, to indulge in large promises in a prospectus: we rely, however, upon the actual merit of our paper to make good all we have said; and to that end we shall confidently ask the attention of every reading person to its ample and beautiful pages.

The Week.

AT the beginning of the week the Senate listened to a set speech by Mr. Ferry, who argued in favor of removing all the political disabilities under which some Southerners are laboring. Mr. Stewart called his attention to the condition of the Republican voters of Louisiana and the colored legislators of Georgia. On the same day the Militia Bill for the Southern States was passed. In effect it repeals the act—framed to prevent Mr. Johnson's provisional governors from arming their adherents—which was passed two years ago, and which it would have been well to have repealed at the last session. In the course of debate Mr. Fessenden proposed that a militia should be given to Texas, and remarked that he could hardly believe the civil authorities there could countenance a state of society which makes their own and all men's lives and property unsafe. But it is in Texas as it is in West Tennessee; even if the organized robbers and murderers are robbers and murderers merely, they know very well what class in the community public opinion will permit them to pillage and kill with impunity, and if the government happens to belong to the other class the disorders go on. Mr. Fessenden made a good remark when he said that a great deal of the difficulty is owing to "the extreme haste of Congress to economize"—before election—"by reducing the army below the force necessary to keep the peace in the South." "Necessary" is the precise word, and it is to be feared that in some of the States we shall find in the end that the State militia will cost us all more than a few thousand additional regular troops. On Wednesday, Mr. Morton spoke an hour and a half in favor of his financial bill, a measure of which we spoke last week. When the resolution repudiating Mr. Johnson's repudiating scheme came up for passage, Mr. Hendricks offered a substitute to the effect that contracts not specifically demanding gold might be discharged with "lawful money." For this proposal he got 7 votes; in the negative there were 44. On Thursday, little was done. On Friday, a resolution in regard to Spanish affairs was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, which seems to have been in a less advisory mood than its chairman; the resolution expresses sympathy with the Spanish "Liberals"—of all shades, of course—and puts the Spaniards in mind of the slave-trade which, under the monarchical government of Spain, was carried on between Africa and Cuba.

On the same day Mr. Edmunds introduced an important bill, which will in all probability become law. It proposes to repeal so much of the act admitting several Southern States to representation in Congress as concerns the State of Georgia; it pronounces the present Legislature an irregular body and reconstruction in Georgia a failure; it restores therefore the military government in that State, but restores it subject to this limitation—the present civil government under the new constitution shall, provisionally and subject to the will of Congress, continue to be the civil government, the expelled legislators being first restored to their places, their so-called successors being removed. Finally, the President is directed to support these requirements with the necessary number of troops—a duty which will fall on President Grant. On Friday, too, Messrs. Sumner, Buckalew, Morrill, and Cameron pronounced eulogies on the late Mr. Stevens. Mr. Buckalew remarked that Mr. Stevens's character was one that called for analysis and reflection rather than for eulogium—which is true, perhaps, of most of us; but he proceeded to say some things which were neither analytic nor eulogistic, nor particularly reflective, and which certainly it was very discreditable to him to say. On Monday the Senate adjourned for a fortnight of holidays.

It would, we are sure, do much for the reputation of both branches of Congress, and be a great saving of pain to the friends of departed members, and to people of taste and sensibility of all classes and creeds, if, when it becomes necessary to take notice of the decease of a distinguished member, the work of "analysis," "reflection," and "eulogy" were committed to two or three or, at most, four members. One from each party would be, we think, ample; but the friends of the defunct might, perhaps, be allowed to furnish two, and these two should be selected either with reference to their relations with the deceased or their special ability in the delivery of funeral orations. The indiscriminate volleys of eloquence which are now fired over the newly-made graves are objectionable for all sorts of reasons, a prominent one being that they make the memory of even the best men seem ridiculous to the young and light-minded. No reputation, character, or services can be exposed to them with impunity. We make this suggestion in the interest of real feeling, real solemnity, and real reverence for departed worth, and in real hostility to the tom-tom, foot-light, and brass-band sentiment.

---

The House on Wednesday week passed the Southern Militia Bill, and there is no doubt of its passage over the veto which no doubt will come, and no doubt that before very long the Southern governors will find themselves in a position to make some resistance to any attempt at the violent overthrow of their governments—possibly in a position to enforce order, though this is far less certain. On the same day Mr. Julian tried to introduce a resolution ordering a committee to investigate a charge that hundreds of persons are still held in slavery in Kentucky; he was refused leave to introduce it. A better fate befell a resolution providing that women employed by Government shall receive the same rate of compensation as men who perform similar service; but we fear the service, in nine cases out of ten, is sure not to be similar. Thursday was taken up by eulogies on Mr. Stevens, the speakers being Judge Kelley, Mr. Broomall, Mr. Whittemore, Mr. Covode, Judge Woodward, and Mr. Fernando Wood. The last named speaker made, by much, the best address that the occasion called out in either house. On Friday the Louisiana election case was got fairly under examination. The credentials of the colored member from that State, Mr. Menard, having been presented by his colleague, Mr. Sypher, the House referred them to the Committee on Elections, and how that committee will report there is not much doubt. The House has as yet done nothing in regard to Georgia, but the Committee on Reconstruction are busily getting together evidence, and Mr. Edmunds's Senate bill will be none too thorough-going to suit the temper of the House and the Committee. The session previous to the recess has not been very long, but it has been very busy. Very little speech-making has been done and a great deal of work is cut out for the winter.

The other Congressional business, as will be seen by our summary, is unimportant, with the exception of an attempt to put an end to the nest of iniquity known as the Indian Bureau. The abuses in this concern have been long known to be atrocious, and the military men, who have to pay in their persons for its crimes and follies, have been long anxious to have it handed over to the War Department, hitherto without success; and, as might be expected, there has now grown up about it a "ring," known as the "Indian Ring," composed of a band of jobbers who live on its abuses, and encourage them and cover them up. In spite of their efforts, however, a bill has passed the House transferring the Indian affairs to the War Department. In the Senate the opposition made a determined stand, and a new bill was introduced by way of compromise, creating an "Indian Department," which, however, would certainly be little, if any, better than the Indian bureau. The "ring" would probably as soon have one as the other. The object of putting the Indians into the hands of the army is to give them a new kind of men to deal with.

Senator Morton followed up his bill for the resumption of specie payments—to which, by-the-by, we inadvertently ascribed last week the intention of resuming in a year instead of in two—by a speech in which, in reply to the demand for contraction, he denied that the currency was redundant; maintained that gold cannot be kept from going abroad except by creating a demand for it at home; denied that there was any necessary connection between the price of bonds and the discount on greenbacks; attributed the discount to the failure of the Government to pay its notes on demand, as it promised to do; pointed out that the greenbacks are a debt now past due; the bonds a debt having twenty years to run; ridiculed the idea that we could ever return to specie payments by "willing it," or with $70,000,000 in specie—a point on which Horace Greeley meets him valiantly in a long letter of infantile simplicity in the Tribune, maintaining that $70,000,000 would be plenty, and in fact somewhat more than is needed for the purpose. Mr. Morton also denounced the contraction policy of the Secretary of the Treasury, his strongest argument being that the country would not submit to it; commended the legalization of contracts in coin; and apologized for voting against it last session. As regards the amount of coin with which it would be safe for the Government to resume, he avoided committing himself by the mention of any definite sum, but expressed the opinion that, inasmuch as banks can undertake to redeem in specie on a third in gold of the amount of notes in circulation, the Government could do it with less. Here, however, Mr. Morton became very vague and misty, wandering off into calculations about the amount of gold now in the country, the product of the mines, and the sums brought over by emigrants—evidently laboring under some of the delusions so prevalent during the war, that it is the amount of money in the country, and not the amount which can be got into the Treasury, which is available for the discharge of the public engagements. If the mines produced ten billions of gold a year, and the emigrants brought over two billions, it would not help the Government to resume specie payments, unless a share of it could be got into the Treasury through taxation. So that the question which lies at the bottom of the whole matter is, How much taxation will the country bear, and what surplus shall we have, or how much can we borrow and pay interest on? As matters stand, there is, even if Mr. Morton's bill should pass, no knowing when specie payments will be resumed.

Mr. Wilson has introduced a bill intended as an inducement to Supreme Court judges to retire from the bench when they have become too old to be useful, providing them with full pay if they choose to resign at the age of 70. Something of this kind has long been wanted. It is a scandal to have a judge sitting on the bench after his faculties have begun to decay, and just as great a one to have him retiring into penury after his best years have been spent in the public service. But the bill should be made to cover the judges of the District Courts just as well, and its failure to do so, taken together with Mr. Wilson's other Supreme Court bill, gives some color to the story that its main object is to get Judge Grier to quit the bench, and to get a "sound" man in his place. We trust that this party tinkering of the Supreme Court will soon come to an end. If the court is a nuisance, pray let us have it abolished. If it needs mending, let it be on the recommendation of a commission composed of both Democrats and Republicans, and not by bill, dragged in every month or two, in the middle of red-hot crises, for party purposes.

Mr. Strong, a clergyman in Cleveland, Ohio, preached a sermon on Thanksgiving Day, in which he denounced Mr. B. F. Butler for proposing in Congress "to tax the bonds." What Mr. Butler really did was to propose and carry a resolution peremptorily directing the Committee of Ways and Means to introduce a bill imposing a special tax of 10 per cent. on the interest on the bonds—that is, reducing the interest which the government had solemnly promised its creditors from 6 per cent. to 5.40 per cent. The motion was simply an attempt at swindling on a great scale, and it was carried against the best men of the Republican party by the aid of the Democrats, and was indignantly denounced, and in plain English, by the Committee of Ways and Means. So that Mr. Strong was correct enough for all ordinary purposes in terming it "taxing the bonds." Mr. Butler, however, writes him a letter, accusing him of having used his pulpit "in the interest of capital and money-changers, whom our Divine Master drove out of God's holy temple with a whip of small cords," and of having "given the benefit of the sanctuary to gold-gamblers and speculators." "There was," adds the Lowell moralist, "no proposition to tax the bonds, only the income derived from them, as the Government has always done." The object of this last phrase is to produce the impression that the Butler tax was of the same nature as the tax now levied on the interest of the bonds—that is, an income tax falling equally on income derived from all sources whatever; the fact being that it was a special tax, levied on the public creditors solely, such as the Government has never levied or proposed to levy, and in borrowing the money agreed not to levy—the object of it being to depreciate the value of the public obligations in the interest of repudiators. The author's reappearance at this date to lecture a clergyman for denouncing it, and even to quote Scripture against him, proves what the declarations of his disciples, that he has repented him of his financial heresies, are worth. It throws some light, too, on the kind of morality he teaches them at the class-meetings of the new sect of which he is the founder and the ornament. Most of his followers are very indignant with Mr. Fessenden for not "following after the truth." What kind of "truth," we should like to know, do the brethren mean? It is enough to make either clergyman or journalist hate his trade to have to comment on the Butlerite doctrines. It is only the number of the Butlerites that makes the work supportable to any honest man.

The Cabinet appointments continue still to furnish food for speculation, but speculation which, as compared with the speculation on this subject in bygone days, is very mild, watery stuff indeed, owing to deficiency of materials. The facts appear to be still in possession of General Grant, "the feelings, fancies, and intuitions" being all that the reporters and rumor-mongers have to go upon. The person whose friends are most vociferous in his favor is undoubtedly Mr. Greeley, for whom the English mission is still claimed with great pertinacity by some fond but ironical admirers. A rival has, however, appeared in the field in the person of Senator Wilson, whose claims are urged much on the same grounds—viz., that we have been sending envoys to the gentlemen of England long enough, and that it is now time to send a man of the people to the working-men of England. We are greatly afraid, however, that missions organized on this theory would not be a success. The working-men of England do not as yet take charge of its diplomacy, and, judging from the late elections, do not want to do so; so that the conferences between our plenipotentiary and them would amount to nothing. Mr. Sumner is still talked of, and with sense, for the State Department. We sincerely hope he may get it. He and some of the brethren in Massachusetts may think he is more useful in the Senate, but then this is not the first time that both of them have been mistaken. There is no position in the Government more important just now, except the Treasury, than the State Department, and there is nobody who unites a greater number of qualifications for it than he; and his presence in the Cabinet would help to disarm Radical suspicions about Grant, and render it unnecessary to recall the Honorable Ben Wade into public life. The probable Secretary of the Treasury is not much talked of; the subject is too serious for joking

There is this that is singular about the place—that there is none for which so many men think themselves well fitted, and for which so few think other men fitted. Of those who have furnished proofs of fitness in black and white, nobody can thus far compare with Mr. David A. Wells.

The new English Ministry has been organized, Mr. Gladstone, of course, at the head, and the only remarkable feature in the new Cabinet being Mr. Bright's appearance as president of the Board of Trade—a position in which the work is light, and may be made lighter without anybody's noticing it, the duties of the board being simply the giving of advice and collection of statistics. In fact, it is well known to be the opinion of Mr. Lowe, another member of the Cabinet, that the less work it does the better. But the place is for this reason all the more suited to Mr. Bright. His health is not vigorous—indeed, he was seriously threatened eight years ago with a permanent break-down—and he has now a seat in the Cabinet, which is the important thing. He declined the Indian Secretaryship on the ground that the duties were too onerous, and he did not think public opinion in England sufficiently "advanced" on Indian affairs. Mr. Bright's accession to office is the only result of the late elections in which one sees any sign of change in the character of the Government through the Reform Bill, but this of itself indicates an immense change, in spite of the defeat of the working-men candidates and "intellectual liberals." The complete overthrow of the latter, not one of them securing a seat, was perhaps the most disheartening incident of the struggle, and shows how deeply the English mind in all grades and conditions is permeated by Philistinism. The "compound householders" distrust men with "ideas" just as much as the ten-pound freeholders.

---

If there is a body of men in the kingdom whose minds one would expect to be open to new influences, it is the graduates of the London University. As the University is merely an examining body, the graduates are not bound together by corporate feeling, or under the dominion of the Idols of the Market-Place. Moreover, the degrees, unlike those of Oxford and Cambridge, mean something; a man cannot get them without knowing a good deal, and the men who try for them are men who are not afraid of work. One of their most distinguished graduates is Mr. Bagehot, the editor of the Economist, and one of the acutest—we were going to say the acutest—and deepest thinkers on political and social questions to be found in England to-day, as his paper and his work on the English Constitution show. Well, he offered himself as a candidate for the representation of the University in Parliament, but was forced to give way for Mr. Lowe, a graduate of Oxford and a man of great ability, but whose mind belongs to, perhaps, the most objectionable type of cultivated mind to be found in England; the type which, for want of a better term, we may perhaps call mulish, and whose influence is invariably used to increase the imperviousness to new ideas of the average English understanding. But he had the reputation of being a "practical man," broken to harness. So he was elected, the University setting aside its own graduates, who are both numerous, able, and brilliant.

Mr. Mill, we have reason to believe, does not personally regret his defeat. His appearance in public life at his advanced age, and with his habits of mind, was, of course, in more ways than one, a great sacrifice, which he made partly with the hope of helping on the reform movement—then, though so short a time ago, still feeble—and partly with the view of removing some of the reproach which rests on scholars, of unfitness for or indifference to public affairs. But it is very doubtful whether, in modern times, with the press at their disposal, it is not a waste of power to employ political philosophers in the actual work of legislation. Most of the real work of government in this age consists in diffusing certain ideas amongst the people, and this philosophers can do with most effect in their own rooms. It would doubtless be well to employ them in legislation if they had nothing to do in legislative bodies but talk and think; but in legislative bodies they have to devote nine-tenths of their time to listening to unconscionable bores and dunces, and every minute thinkers of Mill's calibre devote to this is time wasted.

The news from Spain is better. The insurgent republicans have laid down their arms, having shed some blood and shaken popular confidence in their good sense and self-restraint, and thus far strengthened the monarchists. The elections for the Constituent Cortes have at last begun, and the result thus far, though we know nothing of the feeling of the country districts—returns having only been received from the corporate towns—shows, it is reported, heavy monarchical majorities. We are not able to say, of course, what influences have most affected the vote, or whether there has been any recent change of opinion; but, reasoning à priori, we may conclude that republican violence has helped to swell the monarchical ranks. It always has done so, and probably always will do so, in countries in which the people is still divided on the comparative merits of monarchy and republicanism. Nobody can have confidence in the common sense of republicans who take arms within a fortnight of a popular election. The restriction of the suffrage to men over twenty-five years of age is exciting a good deal of remonstrance; but we suspect, the propriety or the right of fixing any limit of age whatever being once conceded, it will be found that no great interest is damaged by shutting out Spaniards who have not reached twenty-five, and probably some dangers are avoided by it. If the limit has no other value, it has that of an expression of opinion on the part of the Government that brain, experience, and maturity of judgment and character are of some use in deciding on the form of government a great nation ought to adopt.

Turkey and Greece have, after long threatening, almost come to blows, and the great powers are now occupied busily in trying to get the Greeks to keep the peace. At the bottom of it all is the Cretan question. The insurgents in Crete have maintained their resistance not with sufficient vigor to drive the Turks out, but with sufficient to keep a certain portion of the island to themselves, and keep up a semblance of war and the hope of success, and constant sympathetic agitation at Athens. What with sending volunteers to Crete, running the Turkish blockade, and relieving Cretan refugees, the Greeks of the kingdom have been worked up into a good deal of Panhellenic excitement, followed, as in 1854, by hostile demonstrations by Greek irregulars on the Turkish frontier on the mainland. Then come Turkish remonstrances, Turkish indignation and threats, and finally a recourse to force. The Greek ambassador has left Constantinople; the ministers of the other Christian powers refuse to protect the Greek subjects he has left behind, and the Porte announces that in a fortnight it will treat all Greeks whom it finds in Turkey as Turkish subjects.

---

This refusal of the other ministers to protect Greek subjects is, we believe, an unprecedented act of discourtesy, but is made excusable by the peculiar circumstances of the case. Turkish Greeks and Greek Greeks are exactly similar, and swarm in European Turkey; and every Turkish Greek wants, if he can, to range himself under some other nationality, and is constantly trying to do so under one pretext or another. If he succeeds, he gets rid not only of allegiance to the Sultan, but of amenability to Turkish courts and police, a very valuable privilege, which foreign ministers are naturally anxious to confine to as few persons as possible. Before the Ionian Isles were ceded by Great Britain, Ionian subjects of the Queen used nearly to drive the British embassy crazy, owing to their numbers, their importunity, and incessant contentions with the Turkish authorities. There is very little probability that there will now be war. The Great Powers won't let the Greeks fight, or, if they do, will see that they are worsted, because they are not yet ready for a break-up of Turkey, and a Greek war would probably result in this. Russia is not ready, or anything like ready, for a renewal of the Eastern question, and neither is France, England, nor Austria. The Eastern question means, who shall dominate in the Black Sea and the Mediterranean? what shall be the fate of the Danubian Provinces? who shall control the Isthmus of Suez and get Egypt? Nobody is ready to answer these questions, and we may be sure Greece will not be allowed to force them on the world just now. Some day it doubtless will be encouraged to do so, but that is some distance off still.

OUR FOREIGN DEBT.

Mr. McCulloch has been an able, faithful, honest, and industrious Secretary of the Treasury, who, with extraordinary patience, self-reliance, and an unbounded faith in our national honesty and national prosperity, has administered the finances of the country in times of severe trial and through periods of transition and change extremely harassing and vexatious. Few public men have done the nation more honest service. Few public servants are entitled to so large a share of national gratitude. Yet Mr. McCulloch is to-day essentially unpopular; unpopular in the true and best sense of the word. He is not in thorough sympathy with the people. Nor is it difficult to find the cause. With all his unquestionable ability, he is undeniably one-sided. At the early outset of his career he pledged himself to restore the country to specie payments—a noble and worthy task. He has labored at it faithfully and persistently ever since. But he has not shown sufficient faith in the people's desire to return to specie payments of their own free will. All the measures proposed by him have been coercive. We take it, there is not a public question upon which a more perfect unanimity prevails than on that of the advisability of an early return to specie payments. But the people will not be forced into it. They justly insist that the time and the means of returning to a sound currency shall be indicated by the natural course of events. It is on this account that Mr. McCulloch's report, pregnant as it is with subjects of the utmost importance, has fallen with so little effect upon the public mind. It is only as a fresh plea in favor of contraction that the whole lament about excessive importations is introduced, and it is mainly on this account that his lugubrious predictions and assertions require to be combated.

We shall show hereafter that there is nothing essentially injurious in the importation of foreign luxuries; that, even if injurious, it could not be prevented; and that a very large and important part of our public revenues is now, and must for some years to come, be derived from them. The Secretary himself admits that "no exception could be taken to such importations, if they were paid for in our own productions." He adds, "This, unfortunately, is not the fact;" on the contrary, these importations have, he asserts, been mainly paid for in our bonds, and are the main cause why so large a part of our debt is owned abroad. He then goes on to assert that it is injurious for the country to have its debt owned by foreigners, that the foreign importations are the cause of this injury, and that nothing will stop this importation but a contraction of the debased and redundant currency.

The statement that a large part of our debt is owned abroad is only another way of saying that foreigners have lent us money. It may be said that borrowing is at all times the worst way of obtaining money, and this is true of nations as of individuals. But it is sometimes the only way to obtain it. Large parts of this country are entirely unsettled or only very partially settled, its production has scarcely begun, and consequently an accumulation of savings or a growth of capital has been totally impossible. In all the new or comparatively new districts and territories production would be slow or practically stagnant without credit, without the opportunity to borrow money for employment in opening up production. If in these new countries production is very profitable, it is evident that the producer can afford to pay a liberal interest on his borrowed capital, and if after paying a liberal interest he has a handsome profit left, he, the producer, will have benefited by borrowing. If a borrower pays seven dollars yearly interest on the loan of one hundred dollars, and with the hundred dollars earns twenty that he could not have earned otherwise, then both the individual and the whole nation are thirteen dollars better off on account of that loan. If a borrower can increase production by borrowing when he could not have increased it without borrowing, he does well to borrow. It is a simple question of profit. It is well known that production in this country is eminently profitable, and hence borrowing—credit—is more general here than elsewhere, and producers here can afford to pay a higher rate of interest than producers in most other countries. Now, if nations or individuals find it profitable to borrow at all, it is evidently the interest of the one as of the other to borrow wherever money can be obtained cheapest. In the older countries of Europe production is comparatively unprofitable; ages of active production have accumulated there large amounts of capital, interest is consequently lower than with us; Europeans can obtain from us higher rates of interest than they can obtain at home, we can borrow from Europeans more cheaply than we can from our own capitalists. From our earliest times we have, consequently, been borrowers from Europe, have been constantly in debt to Europe, have constantly employed European capital in profitable production here, and have prospered by it beyond precedent or parallel. But in spite of this unexampled prosperity, largely due to the profitable employment of European capital, we have for fifty years past had to listen to periodical outbreaks of the most pathetic lamentations over our foreign indebtedness and the annual drain of our country's resources to pay the interest on foreign capital, to the most doleful prophecies of our consequent approaching ruin, and to the most convincing arguments to prove that every misfortune we have had to endure has flowed from that one source. Yet we have prospered. Now Mr. McCulloch again threatens us with general bankruptcy as sure to result from that same foreign debt.

It is true that our present debt to Europe is probably larger than it has ever been before. But it is not, as many persons seem to think, larger than before the war to the whole extent of the amount of Government securities owned abroad. Since 1857, and notably since the outbreak of the war, there had been a steady reduction of our foreign debt. Many State, railroad, and other securities had been returned here for sale. Much capital invested here in mercantile and financial houses had been gradually withdrawn or voluntarily paid off. Amounts by no means inconsiderable even of American capital had been remitted to Europe for investment by timid or unfriendly owners. Individual credits had, as Mr. McCulloch himself points out, been largely reduced, and altogether it is probably safe to assert that in the second year of our war our foreign debt had been reduced to a lower point than it had been at in twenty years before. It is absolutely impossible to form any estimate of what this amount may have been, or what was the amount when it reached its highest point. But it is certain beyond peradventure that the individual or mercantile debt has never resumed its former proportions, and it may be doubted whether the present debt represented by United States bonds, even at Mr. McCulloch's liberal estimate, much exceeds the individual indebtedness of twelve years ago, or exceeds it at all in proportion to the increased wealth of the country. The form, indeed, is changed. But it is very questionable whether the present form of the debt is not a more favorable one for this country.

The great fear of those who warn us against a foreign debt is, that we may be called upon to pay it when we are least prepared for it. Even Mr. McCulloch, much as he desires to see all our bonds owned at home, proposes elaborate and costly measures in order that they may not be returned at unpropitious times. Of course, what is feared is not so much the return of the securities for sale here, as the necessity of remitting the amount abroad after sale, and the possible inability to provide the means without general financial disturbance. But in reality this danger is far greater from individual indebtedness than from the holding of national securities abroad. The amount owed by an individual is a fixed and certain amount, which he is obliged to remit when called upon. The amount which the whole nation can be called upon to remit against the bonds owned abroad is precisely the amount that those bonds will bring when sold in this market. The owner of our bonds in Europe will not send them here for sale unless he can get more for them here than he can in Europe; in other words, unless the price here is higher than in Europe. Either the price in Europe must materially decline or the price here materially advance before there need be any serious fear of bonds being returned. What would produce a decline in the price in Europe would almost instantly produce a decline here, and any natural rise here has heretofore been, and is hereafter likely to be, followed by a corresponding advance abroad. In fact, so closely do the markets respond, one to the other, that only a serious loss of confidence abroad, due to a threatened breach of the public faith or a renewal of domestic disturbances on the one hand, or an artificial interference with the natural course of the markets here on the other, could cause any important amount of our bonds to be returned. So long as the rate of interest abroad is materially higher than with us, so long as we maintain the public faith inviolate and remain at peace, we are less likely to be called upon to pay our foreign debt now that it is in the shape of bonds than we were when it consisted principally of individual indebtedness. If, then, the amount of our foreign debt is not proportionately much larger, and really in a better shape than before the war, when we were prosperous beyond measure, why should we be less prosperous now?

It makes little or no difference what we import in exchange for the bonds that we export. Wealthy people will have foreign luxuries. If we have no surplus products to export in payment for them, we must export coin. If foreign capitalists prefer to lend us the coin which we would otherwise have had to send to them, and leave it to us as a loan which we can employ in profitable production, so much the better for us. The refusal of the foreign capitalist to lend to us would not have diminished perceptibly the importation of luxuries to gratify the tastes of our wealthy citizens. They would have been imported under all circumstances. But the purchase of our bonds by the foreign investor prevents the necessity of exporting our coin. While, therefore, the importation of foreign luxuries cannot possibly be prevented, and is not in any financial sense injurious, the export of our bonds, or the borrowing of money in Europe, is not a new practice, but, on the whole, an advantageous one, under which this country has attained great prosperity.

If it be true that it is injurious to the nation to import foreign luxuries, it certainly cannot fall within the province of the Secretary of the Treasury to propose a renewal of the oft-tried and ever-abandoned sumptuary laws. It is entirely supererogatory at this day to argue the injustice and the futility of such laws. Luxuries, like necessaries, are bought by individuals, who do not generally buy more than they can afford to pay for. If individuals can afford to pay for luxuries that our own country does not produce, the luxuries will be imported from countries that do produce them, even if you build a wall around our coast as high as the Chinese wall. The more difficult the importation becomes, the more highly will the luxuries be prized, the more will they be sought by those who can afford to pay for them. The whole question turns on the ability of individuals to pay for them. The ability of individuals to pay for luxuries is only measured by their wealth. The desire of individuals to possess and consume luxuries is only measured by their taste and refinement. Large importations of foreign luxuries only prove the existence of a large number of wealthy people of taste and refinement—a circumstance surely in itself not much to be regretted. Many persons think that it would be better if our luxuries and everything else were produced at home; but it is evident that if we produced more luxuries, we should produce less breadstuffs and timber and other articles that we export, and should have less surplus productions to send abroad. Mr. McCulloch himself is desirous to have laws framed so as to encourage exports and enlarge our commerce with foreign nations. But if we produce our luxuries at home, we certainly shall have less to export, so that we cannot increase our exports if we attempt to produce our luxuries at home. Luxuries the people will have, as long as they can pay for them. Many of our luxuries must, therefore, continue to be imported.

The term luxury is in itself vague and relative. What many a man in moderate circumstances considers absolute necessaries of life would be extravagant luxuries for one who barely earns his daily bread. In one class of society a costly silk dress may be justly considered a necessary; in another class, a poplin gown may be fairly deemed a luxury. Who will presume to decide where the line should be drawn between necessaries and luxuries, between economy and extravagance? There is only one relation in which the scope of the word luxuries may be considered fairly established, and that is its relation to the public revenues, the relation in which it peculiarly concerns a Secretary of the Treasury. But it is not in this relation that Mr. McCulloch considers it. Nearly all men are agreed that, so long as indirect taxation shall exist, it is wise and sound policy to levy it on luxuries. In this sense "luxuries" mean all articles that do not directly contribute to the sustenance, comfort, and well-being of large masses of the community. In this sense our tariff is evidently admirably adjusted, for, according to Mr. McCulloch, two-thirds of our customs revenue is derived from "articles which, in economical times, would be pronounced luxuries." Considering that the interest on our debt is payable in coin, that the only coin revenues of the Government are derived from customs, and that the customs revenues of last year (calculating gold at 135) produced nearly fifteen per cent. more than the whole of our harassing, vexatious, immoral, and unreliable internal revenues, and that "for many years to come large revenues must be derived from customs," it seems strange that the Secretary should be so desirous of passing measures to stop the importation of those foreign luxuries from which so large a portion of our revenues is derived. But from this point of view the question of luxuries is not considered at all in the report. The objection to their importation does not arise from their relation to the revenue, nor indeed from the "unexampled extravagance" of which they are the evidence and the fruit. Indeed, the Secretary pointedly says, "no exception could be taken to such importations" but for one reason—the exportation of the bonds to pay for them.

RESPONSIBILITY TO THE PEOPLE.

The three prisoners who were arrested in Canada a few weeks ago, on charge of having formed part of a band of express robbers in Indiana, and who were surrendered by the Canadian authorities on receiving a pledge from the United States officials that they should be safely delivered to the State of Indiana—that is, that they would not be lynched on the way—have been lynched since their delivery. The United States Government kept its express promise faithfully; but the State of Indiana broke the promise implied in its receiving the men back, by failing to provide for their safe custody and fair trial, and letting them be taken out of their cells by a mob and hanged on the staircase. It appears that the sheriff received formal notice from the lynchers that they were coming, and the governor knew that a lynching organization was in existence and had already done execution on other members of the same gang of robbers; but neither of them took any precautions against an attack, and the jail was accordingly stormed, and the prisoners taken out with very little more difficulty than if they had been in an ordinary framed dwelling-house. Moreover, it appears that these last hangings make up the number of those committed by the "regulators" to thirty, or thereabouts—and two or three, at least, of the victims have been innocent.

This on the surface seems a strange story, but behind it lies a stranger story still. The robbers whom the lynchers have been putting out of the world are the leading members of a gang who have been operating on a grand scale all over the State of Indiana during the last year or two, committing a good many murders in the course of their business, and at last undertaking, and in one or two instances successfully, to board railroad trains in the night, and remove and plunder the safes of the express companies. The last attempt failed, owing to the provision of a guard by the express company, but a conductor was mortally wounded in the affray. The robbers were not only numerous and well organized, but appear to have been persons of means and position. One family, the Renos, whose male members occupied a leading position in the band, and have been nearly all killed by the "regulators," lived in "genteel" style on a farm of their own; the "ladies" being very well bred people, taking the popular periodicals and playing on a piano of the best modern construction. It was found, too, practically impossible to bring them to justice, numerous and audacious as their crimes were. What the difficulties were, we may guess from our experience both in this city and in Western New York, where, not long ago, a family of robbers and their confederates for several years set the law at defiance, and, if we remember rightly, had at last to be surprised in the night and burnt out by a vigilance committee; but these difficulties are more readily imagined than defined. They consist in great languor or want of interest in the subject on the part of the sheriff or district-attorney, an exceeding fastidiousness about evidence and a tender regard for the liberty of the citizen on the part of justices of the peace, great timidity on the part of witnesses and juries, and strong humanitarianism, or disposition to "give the poor devil another chance," on the part of judges. The general result has been that criminals possessed of plenty of money, and forming part of large organizations, have enjoyed almost complete impunity, as far as the law was concerned, in Indiana. Nay, even after several of the gang had been lynched, the survivors were bold and powerful enough to threaten or attempt retaliation, and the lynchers assert—though this is doubtless an exaggeration—that it has its ramifications in Ohio and Michigan and Canada.

Of course this was a state of things to which no civilized community could be expected to submit very long. A vigilance committee consisting of 700 members, it was said, was soon formed in Indiana, and they made short work of the principal robbers. That is to say, thirty men suspected of crimes of various sorts have been seized by a mob, generally in the night, and dragged to a tree and strung up, without enquiry or shrift, and left hanging there. The same number of executions within the same period, in any one State, by judicial sentence, after a solemn trial, and after the use of all the methods prescribed by reason and experience for the discovery of truth and the protection of innocence, would have filled the country with horror and thrown the opponents of capital punishment into convulsions. The leading humanitarian papers would have had sensational reports of each execution, with short biographies of the victims, accompanied by genealogical tables containing the principal cases of mental and moral weakness amongst their ancestors, both in the male and female line. We should have had meetings to discuss the right of society to take away life, and the governor would have "been handled without gloves" for not exercising the pardoning power, and the sheriff himself would probably have had some unpleasant light thrown on his personal history. As it is, the affair has hardly elicited more than a few narrative paragraphs; of comment there has been little outside the State. The State in which these lynchings have occurred is not a border community, in which the machinery of justice has to be aided in its work by volunteers. It is one of the wealthiest, most highly civilized, and patriotic and intelligent in the Union. There is none in which the love of order and law is stronger; in fact, the lynching is a proof of this. It showed the determination of the people to have security somehow, and to make the place terrible to evil-doers; yet the more civilized and the more moral a community is in which such departures from legality take place, the more barbarizing and demoralizing they are, and the more earnestly do they call for criticism and enquiry.

Similar occurrences have taken place in Ohio within the past year, the cause being the same—the often and long-continued failure of the courts to do their duty in criminal cases. We think it may be fairly said that there is no State at the North in which the democratic movement of the last twenty years has had full swing, in which this same tendency to inefficiency on the part of the courts and sheriffs and district-attorneys is not to be observed. The theory on which the democratic movement triumphed in the constitutions of Northern States was that by making all or nearly all officers elective, and making their terms of office short, their sense of responsibility to the people would be deepened, and the guarantees for their good behavior would be strengthened. In point of fact, the very reverse has proved to be true. The sense of responsibility of all officers has been almost destroyed, and nearly all the pre-existing guarantees for good behavior have been removed. Responsibility to "the people," when "the people" is numerous and busy, and when the number of officers is great, and elections frequent, is a synonym for responsibility to nobody. "The people" in a community like ours will not occupy itself watching the conduct of sheriffs and judges and constables and district-attorneys, and other officers, from day to day. Its means of information are limited; the criticisms of the party press untrustworthy; the officer's means of defending himself are ample; the trouble and expense of calling him to account before the expiration of his term of office are more than any individual can encounter, and more than associations of individuals are ready to undertake as long as terms of office are so short. Long before he could be got out of office by extraordinary means, he goes out in the ordinary course of things. The punishment of his bad behavior is therefore left, in practice as well as in theory, to the whole body of the electors, to be executed at the polls. But here again the system of short terms and general election secures him complete impunity.

There is no community in the world in which the whole body of the people think and talk more about politics, and are able to form, on the whole, sounder judgments on political questions, than this; but the number of competent and honest men who will give their time to the working of the political machinery is very small. If you make the machinery very complicated, calling for constant and minute attention, competent and honest men will not give any attention to it at all. Now, this is exactly what most Northern States have done. By making every office elective and every term of office short, the mere working of the machinery and selection of the candidates have become things too formidable for the body of the community to attend to; and it does not attend to them. The work has fallen entirely into the hands of a small body of professional politicians, with a code of morals of their own which the community abhors, and interests of their own which are hostile to those of society; and it is to this class, and not to the people, that the office-holders are really responsible, and the office-holders, judges included, know it. The caucus system and the doctrine of party allegiance have both grown up into buttresses of the power of this class. The one gives them the power of selecting the candidate and the other the power of forcing "the people" to vote for him. It is with the caucus, therefore—or, rather, with the class who convene and compose it—that the officer has to curry favor and make his peace; nor is this a very difficult matter. In nine cases out of ten he belongs to the class himself; in many cases he is such a powerful politician—like General Butler, for instance—that he selects the caucus himself, or, in other words, organizes the tribunal to which he is to render his account, and which is to renominate him. "The people" have less to say in the matter than in the negotiation of treaties with foreign powers.

Moreover, as regards the judges and district-attorneys elected for short terms, it has to be borne in mind that not only are the salaries kept too low to render the places tempting to the best men—a piece of that penny wisdom and pound folly of which we trust farmers will before long perceive the real nature—but the criminals with whom they have to deal, from the great stock-jobber or express robber down to the humble "cracksman," are almost always active politicians, or can readily become so. We venture to say that there is hardly a violator of the law, on a great or small scale, in this or any other State, or a knave of any sort, who does not take a keen interest in "the questions of the day," in so far as they affect candidates for office. There are very few districts indeed in which they do not have it in their power to put a judge off the bench or prevent the re-election of a district-attorney, either by working through the nominating conventions or at the polls. Therefore, a judge or district-attorney does not need to be a bad man, in the ordinary sense of the term, to be afraid of them or to be languid in his pursuit of them. He needs simply to be human, with a man's hopes, fears, and responsibilities. They make him, when they stand at the bar, think of his family, of his old age, of his creditors, of his broken-up practice, whether he will or no, and the majority of our State constitutions place him at their mercy, and yet mock him with a form of words, in which he is asked to believe that the eye of "the people" is upon him, watching his zeal, his devotion, his integrity, and that when, after five or six years of faithful service, the time comes for him to be turned adrift, "the people" will meet him at the door of the court and send him back again to his work with applause. The horrible reality is, that "the people" know little about him; vote "the straight ticket," through zeal for "the main question;" and when they find thieves multiplying beyond endurance, and brigandage covering the community like a net-work, rise in mobs and hang right and left without judge or jury, as in Indiana, or else shrug their shoulders and go on making money, as in New York.

The remedy is happily simple. It consists in paying better; in making the tenure of judicial officers permanent; and in so diminishing the number of elected offices that the public attention can be concentrated on a few officers, and these few be thus made really responsible for the working of the machinery of government. Public opinion will undoubtedly run in this direction for the next twenty years, whether the desired change come within that period of time or not. We notice in the letter of a correspondent of the New York Times that the new Democratic candidate for the office of warden at Sing Sing is the "Honorable Homer Nelson," and that "his prospective appointment is hailed with favor by the convicts generally." The logical extension of the system of appointment now in use with regard to most State offices would require the election of this functionary by the convicts. His appointment by the governor robs them of an "inalienable right."

THE UNPOPULARITY OF PRODUCTION.

Mr. Wells, the Revenue Commissioner, has, we believe, been more struck in the course of his investigations into the condition of American industry by the rapid decline in the quality of the skilled labor of the United States, than by almost any other fact; the cause being partly the eagerness of the better sort of young men to get into commerce, or some kind of employment in which the labor is clerical, or at all events is not in the strict sense of the term productive; and possibly to the growing disinclination of young men to submit to any course of training. An apprentice who has served out his full time in any handicraft, and has learned it thoroughly, is getting to be a rare bird. In some trades, ship-building for one, printing for another, he is almost unknown. Plenty of boys are apprentices in all trades, but hardly any remain apprenticed long enough to learn their business. Either they tire of the restraint and drudgery which meet the novice at the entrance to every calling, and go a-roving, the authority of the parents being now too weak to prevent them, or they find that they can readily get employment as journeymen long before they have attained real proficiency. The result is that the workshops swarm with inefficient workmen who only half know their business, and only one-third do it, to the great detriment of their own character, the great diminution of the national production, and to the despair of employers. The shipbuilders ascribe a large proportion of the present depression in their business to the scarcity of good workmen, and they do not look very hopefully into the future, owing to the increasing scarcity of apprentices who show either the desire or intention to learn the trade thoroughly.

The eagerness of young men to escape from the workshops and farms and become clerks or speculators in the great towns—in other words, to become distributors rather than producers—does not, perhaps, do so much damage to industry as the want of thoroughness on the part of those engaged in it; but it does a good deal, and every year more. It is the fashion just now with some observers to ascribe the rush into the cities to the paper currency, and the prevalent spirit of speculation begot by it; but more of the responsibility is thrown on this cause than it will fairly bear. The spirit of speculation is no new thing. The fluctuations in the value of the currency have no doubt done something to stimulate it, but comparatively very little. In a new country with vast resources, with a thousand new schemes for their development; every day starting new railroads, new mines, new steamboats; with population doubling every twenty-five years, values must rise at an enormous and unprecedented rate, no matter how good or steady the standard may be; and when values are constantly rising, and the volume of shares offered on the stock exchange constantly increasing, it is useless to expect that there will not be constant and fierce speculation, and that the army of speculators will not continually grow in numbers and audacity. There are other agencies at work which have more to do with the drifting of the young men into the towns than speculations. One is the degrading influence, from a social point of view, which foreign immigration has exerted, and is now exerting, in all kinds of manual employment. Bacon has a striking suggestion regarding the frequency with which certain axioms are found to be common to several of the sciences, moral as well as physical—those of mechanics and mathematics, for instance, to ethics and politics; and a curious illustration of its truthfulness is to be found in the fact that just as you cannot keep two kinds of currency in circulation, one of higher value than the other, so also you cannot keep two kinds of laborers, one possessing higher social culture than the other, at work in the same fields and workshops. As the cheaper currency drives the dearer out of circulation, the more ignorant and less exacting laborer drives the better educated and more fastidious one out of the market. The popular theory that the better educated and more decent a workman is, the more wages he gets, and the more advantages he enjoys, is not true of workmen en masse. What actually happens when a degraded class of laborers come into competition with a better one is that, unless the difference between their work is enormous, the former underbids the latter, or makes the workshop and its associations so repulsive that the latter quit the field if they can find any place else to go to; and this is exactly what is happening in the United States. The flood of unpleasant foreign emigrants who are filling the factories and mines, with their low standard of living, their personal habits, their lower type of religious and moral feeling, have made most of the "haunts of industry" so disagreeable that the American mechanic, as he used to be known forty years ago, and as essayists and "magazinists" still write about him, is gradually disappearing, at least in the East. He has gone in battalions from New England, and is getting to be rarer and rarer everywhere, except in the character of a "boss." In spite of all, he hears about the equality of men, the dignity of labor, he feels that he loses caste by working side by side with the common run of Irish and Germans, hearing them swear, seeing their "mills" and their sprees, and sharing their seclusion from the moral and intellectual life of the community in which he has been born and bred. So he is seeking new seats in the small rising towns of the far West, where he can preserve his individuality and his self-respect and his social position, and bring his children up away from the immoral influence of the great workshops.

Much the same causes are producing the same effects on farm labor. Into this field of industry Europe has poured an immense host of its poorer classes, and the native American is consequently eager, and every year more eager, to escape from it, and the readiest way of escape is by taking to some kind of trade or clerk work. Moreover, the city population has become of late years such a very prominent element in American society, and has departed so far from the country standard of living; so many successful adventurers revisit every year "the old homestead," transformed in habit, in appearance, and in power of enjoyment, in a way unknown in the last generation, that the country imagination is naturally dazzled to an insupportable degree. It is not in human nature for a farm boy to live contentedly, and be satisfied with the dignity of husbandry, when he knows a lad who left the next farm a few short years before is living on the fat of the land in Fifth Avenue, or that another whom he remembers as a pedlar in a small way has become a first-class speculator, and is filling the newspapers with the glory of his "operations."

Horace Greeley is incessantly advising farm boys who are on the farm to stay there and those who have come to the city to go back; but there is little use in his preaching as long as he spreads abroad the story of his own life, and the press keeps continually singing the praises of "self-made men." Every farm boy thinks he can "make himself," and flatters himself that he is a possible Horace Greeley. He knows the prizes of city life are numerous, and, this being the case, the fact that the failures are a hundred times more numerous does not deter him from trying his luck. If it did, it would show that one of the greatest springs of human activity had been broken. It is true the life of a young clerk in New York is dismal and comfortless, but every young man takes the possibilities of every position along with its actualities. Three in a bed is supportable enough to a man who hopes ten years later to sell five hundred thousand dollars' worth of dry goods in a year or make "a corner" in Erie.

Education, too, has got somewhat ahead of the material civilization of the country. This is particularly true as regards the girls. The common schools now supply a degree of culture and a kind of taste to the minds of the youth of both sexes, for the gratification of which neither the steam-engine, nor the telegraph, nor the lightning-press has as yet made adequate provision. Girls are now taught in a way, even in the common schools, which would go far to fit them for "receiving" wits and beauties in New York or Boston, but which does a good deal to disqualify them for the only positions which in the present state of our civilization they are likely to hold, those of farmers' or mechanics' wives; hence the bad bread, the poor health, the small families, and the tremendous consumption of popular magazines and thrilling serial tales, and cheap pianos, and the enormous competition amongst female teachers. The young men are in a somewhat similar position, but, having more physical vigor, resist better. They do not become invalids, but they go clerking, trading, brokering, preaching, practising law, or doctoring, anything, in short, but producing by the labor of their hands. There are probably few kinds of labor on which the spread of education has told more unfavorably, strange to say, than farm labor. The life of the farmer is solitary in the extreme, and the spread of books and periodicals, instead of reconciling him to the solitude, is making it intolerable to him. The growth of intellectual tastes and interests, and the knowledge of the outside world and its ways, which come with reading, and with the facility of locomotion, develop the social instinct, and with it a love of change and of movement, which makes the "homely toil and destiny obscure" of the tiller of the soil more and more repulsive, and suggests the question whether the work of farming will ever be permanently carried on by any class much above the European peasant in habits and aspirations.

A writer of some very suggestive papers in the Atlantic Monthly, on "Co-operative Housekeeping," proposes to meet the difficulty by grouping farmers in villages; but village life would hardly sweeten toil, however well organized the community might be as regards household aids and conveniences. What is wanted is something that will make a thoughtful and moderately well-taught man hoe or plough for ten hours a day as uncomplainingly as a clerk casts up figures, or an agent goes about soliciting orders, and that thing, we fear, is not for the present likely to be forthcoming, though machinery is doing much to hasten it. Muscular toil does unfit a man for intellectual pursuits, and to a great extent for social enjoyments of the higher kind, and as long as farm work is what it now is, farmers must make up their minds to be cut off from most of the pleasures which now make town life attractive; and for the restoration of the equilibrium, now so much disturbed, between the town and the country, or, in other words, for the reflux of labor from manufactures and its distribution to agriculture, we must look rather to stern necessity, we fear, than to any new contrivance for making farm life lively or attractive.

Just as the burning of corn for fuel in the West, of which we hear dismal stories once in seven years, is an indication that too many people then are engaged in farming and too few in manufacturing, so present prices of flour and beef, and of houses here in the cities, are indications that too many people are engaged in manufacturing, speculating, and bartering, and that some of them will have to go back to the spade. This is the way Providence regulates the matter, and we suspect committees of Congress will find some difficulty in substituting a better one. We have little doubt that the prev alent disinclination of young men to learn handicrafts, or, in fact, to learn any business thoroughly, and the general disposition to roving and change, will be remedied somewhat after the same fashion. There is a glut of lawyers and clergymen, stump-speakers and brokers, clerks, shopmen, and small dealers, and there is a scarcity of all kinds of natural producers of commodities; and those who are engaged in the work of production are less skilful and less diligent and less steady than they ought to be. But we believe we are safe in saying that there is no country in the world, and there has never been a time in the history of this country, in which such a career was opened to young men who choose to begin at the bottom of the ladder, and learn any industrial pursuit, or any work of production thoroughly, and stick to it faithfully, as is open to young men in the United States at this moment. Any boy of good education who chooses to go into a mill or workshop, and make himself master of any branch of industry, and determine to live by it, and stick to it and make a profession of thoroughness and fidelity, may feel as sure of fortune and influence as it is ever permitted to mortals to feel. The very multitude of those who will not submit to drudgery, who love "gentility" and change, prefer jobbing and speculating to producing, make his triumph all the easier, because they make him the more remarkable by contrast, and the prizes which all the great fields of industry offer to such men are not only numerous but of enormous value. Parents and boys are beginning to find this out, and we have little doubt we shall see before long a tolerably general reaction in favor of steady industry.

"THE PROVINCIALISM OF SOUTHERNERS."

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: You have been fully assured of my friendship for your journal, based upon what I deem its dignity, its freedom from undue prejudice, and its endeavors to set forth truth. You will not, therefore, misunderstand my motive in taking some exceptions to the article with the above title in your issue of December 3.

Born and reared in the South, but having lived for many years in the North, and hating the bad while loving the good in each, I trust that I am able to judge both dispassionately.

Unhappily arrayed against each other as opposing sections, having hostile views and interests, nothing is more deplorable to every one who has at heart the good of our whole country than that spirit of asperity and unkind criticism on the part of the press of both sides which tends to engender and cherish mutual alienation.

Disclaiming the invidious thought that the writer of the article alluded to had such intention, he is certain, I think, to produce this effect in such utterances. Though having much of truth as to the baneful influence of slavery upon the social habits and customs of the South, yet his statements are quite too sweeping, and in some respects unjust.

If the cowardly murder of Pollard found some excusers, and even applauders, in Richmond, surely the fact that a jury could be had to acquit Cole of a crime but little less cold-blooded upon the principle of a man-slayer being justifiably crazy between two sane moments, and the verdict should be received with plaudits in open court, and followed by a banquet at a public house in Albany—surely this is no more creditable than that. If your writer will carefully consider the number and circumstances of such crimes, and of others of a heinous sort occurring in the various States, will he not find they are not to be traced to a spirit pre-eminently Southern, but to that evil heart common to man, whence "proceed adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, and all evil things?"

Then, "Southern essayists" and "college professors," whom he cites, are by no means alone in illustrating by puerile remarks the truth of that pithy saying of the Bible, "Great men are not always wise," as your "Literary Notes," almost any week, will well prove.

As to his statement that, "tried by the average Northern standard," the condition of the South may be rated as "usually half or one-fourth," is this sustained in the public men produced by the South—Calhoun, Clay, Benton, and others? Comparing the mass of our physicians in the rural districts of the North with those of the South, as mainly an agricultural region, my observation does not discover the great disparity claimed. The same is true of the bench and bar. And taking the standard of the ordinary common-school and academic learning of the youth of the two sections, I find that of the South in nowise inferior. This judgment is based upon a comparison of the northern part of Alabama with some of the oldest and most intelligent portions of Pennsylvania. I do not know the proportion of the white population of the South unable to read and write. Perhaps it is larger than that of the North; but is it not a startling fact, stated not very long since by one of her governors, that the number of the people of Pennsylvania thus illiterate was sixty thousand?

Touching the question, "When has the South had a distinguished divine?" that is easily answered by mentioning the name of the late Dr. Thornwell, of the Presbyterian Church, admitted by all who knew him to be among the very first reasoners and preachers in the land. Bishop Johns, of the Episcopal Church, and many others might be named, who must be reckoned, in all fairness, "eloquent preachers of the Word, and learned in the Scriptures," and to whom a large portion of the Church has "great reason to be thankful." For the inconsistency of the South in boasting of a "non-political pulpit" no apology can be offered. That inconsistency has been a glaring one, and it should seal the lips of her ministers and church courts concerning the utterances of their Northern brethren; but this can scarcely be deemed a "provincialism."

Upon other points, so sharply compared or contrasted in your article, I will not touch. The foregoing are referred to with pain, and with the sole view in utmost kindness to remove wrong impressions and prevent unkind feelings. I long, labor, and pray for the day when the term section in our country will be merely geographical; when the interests of each part and each man shall be dear to all; when the shadows of the evil of slavery past, and of all evils present, shall be driven out by light from above; when with such generous feeling and in such blessed light we shall attain our true national elevation of liberty, intelligence, and love.

A Country Pastor.

[We think no dispassionate person will say that the Nation has at any time appeared to do with malice aforethought anything whatever to increase what is called sectional animosity. Of course, we should hardly expect an average Southerner to hold so favorable an opinion of us; but sensible outsiders being judges, we have little doubt that we should be acquitted of all design to array one section of the country against any other. We ourselves being judges, we should say that, leaving animus apart, we have hardly ever essentially erred in statements of the facts on which true views of Southern society may be founded; and the article on which "A Country Pastor" comments we do not regard as being exceptional in this respect.

General Cole was acquitted, not rightfully, in our opinion, but still in obedience to perhaps the very strongest feeling that ever governs the action of men in general. It is altogether probable, whatever may have been the truth concerning the murdered man's relations with General Cole's family, that the jurors believed them to have been such as Cole himself described them, and believed that he committed the homicide for the reason which he has always given. Now, while wives are regarded as they are at present, no jury composed of ordinary men in any civilized country will ever hang a man for killing his wife's seducer. That is the fact of the matter; and to prove the provincialism, if one likes to call it so, of Northerners by citation of the recent Albany verdict and the public approval of it, is to prove that all Christendom is provincial, which is to prove too much. The murder of Pollard was done on very much slighter provocation—on provocation which, according to the rules in force in what are considered enlightened and comparatively unprovincial communities, would have justified the extorting of a public apology from the libeller, and possibly a duel. But there is no other country making the pretensions of the South where such an offence as the late editor's would have caused so cowardly and so theatrical an assassination as the one by which young Grant has done equal credit to his taste, his courage, his morals, and the civilization of the community in which he lives.

As for the Southern essayists and college professors, the examples we gave of their works—and they might be multiplied indefinitely—seem to us quite capable of bearing us out fully. We must—little as the Louisville Courier and the Southern Observer will believe it—repeat that we have no men of letters who, as a class, are so insufficient and worthless as those of the Southern States.

We hardly know what to say to any one who believes in Calhoun and Benton and Clay as great statesmen. The best opinion about them seems to be that none of them was more than a third or fourth-rate man of slight cultivation and little learning; that all of them were eminent in the worst days of our politics—worst morally, and not at all the best intellectually considered; and that there is none of them whose name now, a dozen years after his death, is not rapidly becoming a mere name. The one of them whose name is most likely to last has, for his best title to remembrance, this: that his fellow-citizens, being desirous of holding negroes as slaves, went into a disgraceful, bloody, and utterly unsuccessful war for the purpose of perpetuating a condemned social system, and allowed him to furnish some of them with a flimsy pretext for doing so. Calhoun, without slavery, would have been a political pedant; Clay was a plausible and able but not a great man; and Benton was less than either of the others.

"A Country Pastor" has only to turn to any of the collections of American educational statistics to see two things on which we have not now time to dwell, namely, that he chose a not very favorable Northern State with which to compare a rather better than ordinary Southern one; and, secondly, that the South generally, as compared with the North generally—even though the North suffers so much from the stream of ignorant immigrants—was very much worse off as regards the illiterate among her population. This examination will, to be sure, give him but a rough gauge by which to measure the comparative culture of the two sections.

In conclusion, let us repeat that we have not one particle of "animosity against the South." But we sincerely believe that in very many respects the South is, unfortunately for all of us, in a very backward and unhappy condition, and to get her out of it the very best way is not to talk about magnanimity or sectionalism, but to tell the exact truth, without fear or favor; which we try to do.—Ed. Nation.]

DOCTORS AND DOCTRESSES.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: I would not ask for space in your columns for the correction of errors for which I am responsible, but in your comments upon a letter which I addressed to you with reference to women in the University of Michigan I believe that you were unjust to me in the following particulars: First, in implying that I did not understand the differences which the fact of sex makes between the association of men and women in the study of medicine and their association in other studies. Second, although in my method of statement there was an appearance of my assuming what it was my business to prove, I did not do so, unless my objections to the statement that women were "peculiarly fitted" for the practice of medicine were proved invalid, and this brings me to my third cause of complaint. I said that women were admirably adapted for the practice of one of the medical arts (which was atrociously misprinted "acts") viz., the obstetrical; but that they were ill-adapted for the arduous and indiscriminate (in your comments you omitted the word indiscriminate) labors of the general practitioner. You then proceeded to enquire "what the general practitioner had to endure in the way of hardship which the obstetrician had not." To which I reply, a very great deal. Labor is a perfectly natural process occurring at an ascertained period, and requires interference of any sort in less than four cases out of the hundred, and when such interference is required, or where the obstetrician is otherwise engaged than in the conduct of an accouchement, he or she is generally, for all practical purposes, a surgeon. I further asserted that woman was not "peculiarly fitted" for the "herculean" tasks of the surgeon. If the term "herculean" must be restricted in its application to muscular strength, I was wrong; and perhaps I did use the word "herculean" unadvisedly; but if I possess average intelligence I know that "dexterity, tact, coolness, judgment, knowledge," and courage and bravery, with power of endurance, are the requisites of the surgeon, and I cannot believe that women are so likely to possess all of these as are men. Again, if "human reason and human experience" do not show that women in the great majority of their ailments would, under all circumstances, look to the other sex for "aid, counsel, and support," I will cheerfully disallow that argument. Furthermore, I do not think it is by any means a rule that physicians have to marry in order to gain even a large obstetrical practice

Very respectfully yours, Richard S. Dewey.

LITERARY.

Mr. Joel Munsell announces for speedy publication "An Historical Sketch of Tomo-chi-chi, Mico, of the Yamacraws," a chief of a Southern tribe of Indians friendly to Oglethorpe and his Georgia Colony.——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. add to their "Globe Edition" of British authors the complete poetical works of Moore, and the miscellaneous works of Goldsmith. The same house has in press a work on "Seats and Saddles," by Francis Dwyer, and an edition of Swift's complete works, of which we think there is now no American edition that is not out of print. So far as we know, a thoroughly good edition of Swift, with nothing admitted not known to be his, with a good memoir and an essay on his times, and his genius and character, is a desideratum on both sides of the water. Of what English edition this announced one is a reprint we are not informed.——Messrs. W. A. Townsend & Adams have for some time been publishing a reprint of the London Chemical News, which, by arrangement with the English publishers, they are enabled to put in our market about as soon as it can be received from England, and at about half the price that would have to be paid for an imported copy. They now announce that with and after the number for December they will make this valuable journal still more valuable to the American reader by adding to it a supplement, which will be under the editorial direction of Professor Charles A. Seely. This supplement will contain original and selected matter relating to the progress of chemical and physical science among us, the movements of trade and so forth, together with notices of such new scientific works as naturally fall within the province of such a journal as the News is.——On the 1st of January, Messrs. S. M. Pettengill & Co. begin publishing a literary, horticultural, and agricultural weekly, to be called the Hearth and Home. The "Home and Fireside Departments" will be in Mrs. Stowe's charge, while the general editor will be Mr. D. G. Mitchell. Many good writers have promised their assistance, and there is little doubt of the immediate success of the new enterprise.

—Among American books republished in England we see these: A new edition of Mr. Dana's "Two Years Before the Mast," on which we hope he has an English copyright, or that he will get one, if that is possible, under the last construction of the law. "Darley's Sketches Abroad with Pen and Pencil" appears in a more sumptuous dress in England, we judge, than here. A two-and-sixpenny edition of "Emily Chester" is another of our American claimants for English favor; and the others are Mr. C. C. Perkins's "Italian Sculptors," in imperial octavo; Hawthorne's Note-Books; and Mr. Parton's "Smoking and Drinking." We are not sure whether these last two are published in England or are merely in the booksellers' hands. "A formidable attack on our little pleasures," the Pall Mall Gazette calls Mr. Parton's work. "His arguments are not all good," it goes on, "and it does not settle the question; but let any one who thinks that the discussion is worn out read this essay, and acknowledge the power of a first-rate literary cook. It is difficult to define Mr. Parton's style otherwise than by saying that it is eminently readable. It does not show great power of mind or subtlety or deep feeling, only the perfection of a not very exalted art," and so on—which is all just, and "a little more so," the literary cook being responsible not merely for his way of working with his materials, but also for the materials themselves. Still, to be sure, when the materials are very good, we do not call the caterer a cook of any class. The Saturday Review, however, is of opinion that Mr. Parton's book is a "long, quaint, illogical diatribe," and thinks that it hardly deserves to be called quasi-scientific. The same journal speaks very well of "If, Yet, and Perhaps," by the Rev. Mr. Hale, saying of it that "it is considerably above the usual level of American"—or any other—"magazine literature," and that "altogether the book is a very good specimen of a kind of light literature in which America is certainly not inferior to England." "Absaraka, the Home of the Crows," being under review, the Saturday takes occasion to administer a little rap to the Northern army in the late war. Thus: "Her book is calculated to give a very clear, and we fancy a very just, idea of the life of the Federal soldiers at those stations which now form the advanced posts of General Sherman's command, and to enforce a higher estimate of the officers and men of the regular army than Englishmen were led to form of the volunteer soldiery of the North by the incidents of the civil war"—a passage which shows in the writer a queer confusion of thought, and seems to prove in him a willingness to keep confused. The regular and the volunteer armies of the United States are two very different tools, designed for different purposes, and to talk about both in the same breath is to mislead one's hearers. The same book gives the reviewer occasion to wonder slightly that our "American women, luxurious and selfish as they often seem in the East," should get aboard wagon-trains and go out to stockade forts to "endure all the hardships of the West with quite as much courage and cheerfulness as could be shown by their English sisters." The reviewer's East must be down in the maritime Provinces. Nobody this side of the boundary line knows anything about women of doubtful unselfishness and courage.

—We learn from the Michigan University Magazine that the Museum of the University has been enriched by a bronze copy of Michael Angelo's "Moses," made at the Maison industrielle in Paris, and secured by President White, of Cornell University. There is, we believe, but one other copy of this magnificent statue in the country, and that in plaster, at the rooms of the Historical Society, Worcester, Mass. We presume, though it is not clearly stated, that the bronze is exactly the size of the original, in which case it ought to be made the basis of fresh reproductions, and offered in exchange to other institutions for veritable works of art. Such a practice, once inaugurated, would be an admirable preparation for that international exchange of which we spoke some weeks ago, and would furnish other grounds than mere courtesy for admitting the United States to the European agreement. The materials for this domestic interchange are not wanting, especially if it should include, as it ought to do, statuary having rather an historical than an artistic value. The New York Historical Society, the Boston Athenæum—with, among other things, Michael Angelo's "Dawn" and "Night"—the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts, the various State capitols North and South, the Capitol at Washington, the several universities, together with not a few private collections, that would undoubtedly contribute their treasures—all these offer a wide and busy field for so useful an enterprise. By means of photographs, even paintings could be included, and an exchange of this sort, at small expense, would seem to have no limit. Could not Michigan University, for example, send something to Germany which would bring in return photographs of the remarkable silver-ware recently discovered at Hildesheim, supposed by some to be part of the spoils of Varus, and at all events the most valuable relics of the kind yet recovered of antiquity?

—If it is worth while to say more on the subject of the adjective presidential, which, with its fellows tangential and exponential, is once again, in the January Galaxy, condemned by Mr. R. G. White, let us in behalf of the first word—which is all that the public care to preserve and will infallibly cling to—ask what proof Mr. White has that it is derived from president, and not from presidency? Since Mr. White insists on analogy, we would point him to the examples confidential, providential, differential, reverential, etc., from confidence, providence, etc., and not from the participial or adjective form, which happens, in the case of president, to have become a substantive. Analogy here must be followed up in the Latin, and although the example of Occidens, used as a real substantive, may be cited as forming occidentalis, or occidental—like our modern mental, dental, (instrumental, incidental, etc., etc.)—the reason is clear The meaning of the root-word, as distorted by metaphor till it meant merely "the west," did not admit of an abstract idea. Instances of the formation of verbal adjectives in alis, or ialis, from the present participle are exceedingly rare in classical Latin; but adjectives and adverbs so formed occur in the writings of the Latin Fathers, and point to the rule which we have suggested, viz.: that any participial substantive in ia, that is, tia—(Eng. ce, cy)—may properly form an adjective or abverb in ialis. Thus: substantialis, essentialiter, potentialiter, etc., late Latin from substantia, etc. Now, in presidency we have precisely the abstract form to justify presidential; for tangential we have, likewise, tangency, formed also on strict analogy; and if the mathematicians wish to invent exponency, as we believe they have not yet done, to set themselves right with Mr. White in regard to exponential, we do not know what objections could be made to them on the score of analogy. A science which deals so much in abstractions might find exponency a useful expression for a certainly intelligible idea. The close relation of presidential to presidency was well illustrated by Mr. Motley in his oration, last week, before the New York Historical Society. He said:

"It is impossible, however, not to make a passing allusion to the Presidential election which has just occurred in Great Britain, almost simultaneously with our own. I say Presidential election, because on the vote just taken it has been decided that Mr. Gladstone, and not Mr. Disraeli, is to preside over affairs in England for the next political term, be it long or short, as conclusively as if their names had been voted for on a general ticket."

We conclude, therefore, that Mr. White begs the question in regard to presidential; but more than that, we believe he is mistaken in supposing that if we were to substitute presidental for presidential, the former could at all do the duties of the latter. Adjectives in alis (Lat.) and al (Eng.) mean "belonging to" or "pertaining to" the idea expressed by the root. Words in point are regal, dorsal, cerebral, and so on. In these words, and such as these, one may remark their subjectiveness, so to speak. In words ending with ial, on the other hand, there is an objectiveness equally noticeable. We say "providential," thinking of things outside us; we say "provident," thinking of the foreseeing quality inherent in the subject who, or which, is provident. We say "confidential," but when the trust is of the man himself in himself, we say "confident." So, then, in the phrase "a presidential campaign," or "a presidential candidate," the idea expressed by the obnoxious word is unmistakably objective. A presidental candidate would be a president acting as candidate; a presidential candidate might be any candidate seeking a presidency. In 1860 Mr. Lincoln was a presidential, in 1864 a presidental (and presidential) candidate, and if there had been much need for the proposed adjective it might possibly, and certainly properly, have been then made for him. To have made it for Grant, as Mr. White would have had us do, would have been to make a mistake—unless, indeed, to get it ready for him in 1872.

—As for presidential campaign as a metaphorical term for one of our political canvasses, we still look on it as a pretty good one; it is better than the common run of metaphors, with almost any one of which Mr. White might make sad work if he chose to haul it over the coals for not being exact in all particulars. To be sure "metaphors are identities," as the philosophic Frenchman said; but only in a certain sense—a sense with which we are not here going to bother Mr. White; generally to point out the differences between objects metaphorically brought together is a work done with indefinitely more ease than it is to show their likenesses. The kingdom of Heaven, for example, and the grain of mustard seed, offer to a superficial observer many more points of dissimilarity than of similarity; yet how much they resemble each other in one respect Mr. White is, no doubt, aware. Our fierce presidential contest, with its October battles and the great fight in November, the result of which depends so much on how the preliminary measurings of strength have turned out, with the passions it excites, with its army-like gatherings and military marchings, with its influence on the fate of nations—which is the chief political use of all battle, and almost the sole use of political battles—all this Mr. White must, we think, permit us to call a "campaign;" and on reflection he will justify us, very likely, for disagreeing with him where he says that "presidential campaign" is a "blatant Americanism." His moral hostility to the use of inflamed, mock-eloquent, tom-tom language we also profoundly feel. But it should not be said, because some of our American words are inflated, that we are not in possession of some that are naturally, properly, and admirably large.

—We spoke last week of one of the books recently contributed to the literature of our Cambro-British fellow-citizens. "The History of the Great Rebellion" is almost alone among such books in being of a non-religious character; as might be expected of a people so pious as the Welsh, theological and devotional works find among them a better market than any other sort of reading. We mention this week two or three more works published by Mr. J. M. Jones, of Utica, in this State: "The Expositor of Revelation; or, Practical and Explanatory Notes on the Book of Revelations," by the Rev. Rhys Gwesyn Jones, attempts one of the hardest tasks that Biblical criticism presents; and coming after the elaborate works, in the same language, of Lloyd and Morgan, its author would naturally expect to be subjected to severe tests. So many theories have been advanced, and vagaries maintained, on the strength of this apparently inexplicable portion of the Hebrew Scriptures, that we have grown to be a little suspicious of almost all endeavors at its explanation. And we confess that the perusal of this work leaves us about as much in the dark as to St. John's real meaning as we were before. There is such an inextricable confusion of numbers and figures as to be perfectly bewildering. Our author's cardinal idea of the book is that it is a panoramic view of the "Church" in all ages; but the attempt to give this "view" reality presents the Church in a rather sorry aspect. In one respect, however, the author has rendered signal service to his countrymen. He has shown them an outline of the opinions of German expositors, thus giving them the benefit of researches that would otherwise have been inaccessible to most of them. As a "practical" commentary, the work is thus far good, that it unfailingly educes Christian precepts and principles from every scene depicted in this wonderful production; as for the "explanations," they show much ingenuity and great diligence; but we fear the work must take its place with the thousand-and-one of its predecessors, leaving the prophetic meaning of the Apocalypse, if it has any, as yet beyond human ken. The compiler of "A Collection of Sermons" by the most eminent Congregational ministers in Wales, conceived the idea of publishing his volume while on a visit to the land of his fathers. Mr. Edward Davies is one of the very few clergymen born in this country who continue to preach to the Welsh people in their native language. Being a gentleman of good taste and good judgment, his book contains excellent discourses on a great variety of subjects, and must be very welcome to that large class of Welshmen who still look back with longing on their early associations. "The Sabbath the Heritage of Man" is a reprint of a book by the Rev. John Hughes, of Liverpool, to which two American Welsh clergymen, the Rev. Rhys Gwesyn Jones and the Rev. Howel Powell, have made additions. It is an argument on the Sabbatarian controversy, and is what experience teaches one to look for in works on that subject, having been prepared for a strict Sabbath-keeping audience. All that can be said concerning the good effects of having one day out of seven as a day of rest is well said. But it is not gratifying to learn that a large and estimable class in the community are still reading books that set forth the "sinfulness" of doing any but religious duties on the day of rest. The authors are like others that have gone before them, in failing to find in the New Testament any command to keep either the first day or the seventh day holy, or indeed to keep it at all; but for this failure they are not to be blamed. We may add that, on the whole, the work shows candor, learning, and ability.

—A work of probable value for the history of the rebellion is Scheibert's "Sieben Monaten in den Rebellen-Staaten während des nordamerikanischen Krieges." These seven months fell in the year 1863, and the author, a Prussian officer of engineers, joined Lee's army at Fredericksburg, witnessed the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, and subsequently at Charleston watched the progress of the siege, having tested the efficiency of the blockade at the same port by running in there on his arrival with a drunken and divided captain and crew. Though his last experience of it was in disaster, he saw the Confederate army in probably its best estate and spirits, and on this account it may have seemed to him that injustice had been done it and the cause of the South, to defend which, he declares, is the purpose of his writing. This bias does not appear to enter into his observations on purely military matters, such as the clothing and arming of the Confederates, their artillery, tactics—in which he remarks the absence of the square—their marching (80 to 90 steps a minute ordinarily), camp arrangements and discipline, cavalry (of which he treats at some length), fortifications, etc., etc. Of discipline he says that, on the march and in battle, it was of the strictest; in camp it could hardly be said to exist. And he instances the Texans, who, when snow fell in April, pelted indiscriminately with snow-balls every stranger who passed through their camp, whether officer or private.

—The official work on the "Seven Weeks' War," which the Austrian staff have been busy preparing ever since 1866, has now reached its third volume, the first part of which is just published. It contains some interesting particulars of the events immediately preceding Sadowa. Poor Marshal Benedek, old, out-fought, out-generalled, beaten at all points—a "captain famousèd for fight," and all at once bewilderingly foiled—was "thoroughly discouraged;" he had lost all confidence in "himself, his entourage, his army," and the cause for which he had been fighting. On the 1st of July he wrote to the Emperor: "I beg your Majesty most strongly to make peace at any price; a catastrophe for the army is inevitable." The Emperor had nothing to reply to this but to recommend a retreat in the best possible order, and to say that to make peace was then impossible On the 2d of July Benedek felt more hopeful. It would seem that on the previous day, in retreating, he found his army-trains blocking up his roads, and fully perceived that the attack which he feared and expected that the Prussians would make would be his entire ruin. It is little wonder that the feelings of the old man, who knew that on his shoulders rested the fate of an historic monarchy, proved too much for his coolness and power of self-control. At noon of the 2d he called a meeting of general officers in his tent, but told them nothing at all of his plans, and his subordinates left him with no notion as to when or where the battle would take place. It is probable that he did not know himself. It was three o'clock on the morning of the 3d before the plan of battle was given to the commanders. This official report—as is no more than natural, and perhaps is true—pronounces it to have been very defective, and the main cause of the defeat of the Austrians.

MAGAZINES FOR JANUARY.

If anything were wanting to show that we have hardly any magazines which exclusively devote themselves to addressing the best class of readers, the efforts which the publishers make to get out an exceptionally good number at the beginning of the year would alone be enough to show it. Even the best of our monthly periodicals is not content to hold the even tenor of its course, careful only to be unostentatiously good, and unwilling to descend to even such an amount of clap-trap as consists in crowding as many as possible distinguished or widely-known names into the January number.

The Atlantic for this month counts among its contributors Lowell, Whittier, Bryant, Holmes, Howells, Parton, Bayard Taylor, Whipple, Edward Everett Hale, and Higginson. There would be something to be said against this, as having in it a touch of sensationalism, even if all the contributions of the celebrated writers were excellent; but sometimes they seem to have been printed in the magazine in order that the excellent names might be printed in the advertisements. Mr. Hale's article, for example, "The Good-Natured Pendulum," pleasant reading as it is, seems better suited for Our Young Folks than for the Atlantic, and one wishes he had had something else ready in his writing-desk when the call was made on him; and Mr. Whittier's "After Election" would have appeared more seasonably if it had been printed a month ago, when, probably, it was written. It is in its author's old vein. Not in his earliest one, the one which he worked when he was putting New England into Byronic metres—as in "Mogg Megone"—but in his second, which he worked so well when his wrath was kindled against slavery and he was doing his country such yeoman's service—if, indeed, when one thinks of his charming "Snow Bound," and remembers the benignity and sweetness of his religious singing, it is right to seem to attribute greater serviceableness to his anti-slavery lyrics, powerful and salutary as their immediate effect undoubtedly was, than to that portion of his writing which is poetry, and that portion of it which nearly approaches poetry. Mr. Taylor's "Sunshine of the Gods" is graceful, or rather well finished, but would be read with more pleasure if it were shorter. Mr. Taylor's prose, probably from excessive journalism, shows diffuseness, but his poetry, which is always carefully done and gives every indication of being intended for permanence, is open to the same objection. Mr. Bryant's "Dante" is in the nature of occasional verse, and as such is pleasing. The other poetry of this number is "The Flying Dutchman," a fanciful bit of satirical fun-making, by Mr. Lowell, who apparently suffers more from bores and wooden people than they in their simplicity suspect, and, for a reason not difficult to discover, his pen does not help such to find themselves out.

The prose of the January Atlantic begins with "Malbone," Mr. Higginson's romance, of which it will not be fair to speak till more of it has been given to us. "A Literary Gourmand" is the ambiguous title of an unusually subdued article by Mr. Eugene Benson, who talks of Brillat-Savarin, unduly exalting him as Mr. Benson is apt to exalt people who have more manner than matter, and whose matter, such as they have, is very material. "Co-operative Housekeeping," of which we have already spoken in commendatory language, continues in this third part to set forth the details of its author's plan; "Woman" being just now in a state of high activity, the scheme is pretty sure to get attention; we fear, though, that none of the sticklers for the ancient ways will be sufficiently in fear of its fulfilment to attack it, and it is to be feared too that its friends will not soon venture to attempt putting it in practice. Doctor Bowditch, who has a right to speak authoritatively, begins a series of articles on "Consumption in America," which will be eagerly read, especially in Massachusetts, where the lungs may almost be defined as "a disease prevalent in New England." Mr. Parton is in some respects better than usual in his account of "The Mean Yankees at Home;" but we wish that, wisely considering his powers as a philosopher, he would make more than one essay on this subject, and would confine himself in one or two of the series to descriptions of the "odd sticks" that abound in New England towns. There is no village there so small that it has not its "original cuss"—to use the local vernacular—in religion, in invention, in science, in humor, in mode of life. When Mr. Emerson talked of the whimsicality of Englishmen, we imagine he thought, too, of the very chosen abode of "kinkiness"—they have had to make a word for it—which lies all about his Concord home, in Bedford and Lexington and Billerica and Burlington, and Massachusetts generally. The race which now for seven or eight generations has lived cramped in religious, moral New England, keeping its blood unmixed, its brain hard at work within limits which it must perforce break through in some direction, or, failing that, be turned back upon itself, has necessarily produced many a strange and many a morbid development of human nature. It has generated countless isms, good and bad, tried all sorts of wise and foolish social experiments, and never ceased to be the most acute and original portion of the American people. Nowhere else are so many patentees to be found as among the descendants of the Puritans, and probably nowhere else in proportion to the population so many madmen and so many men of all degrees of "queerness" as regards all sorts of things. In his present article Mr. Parton devotes himself mainly to depicting the capacity of the people for self-government, the high stage of intelligence which they have reached, their forwardness in good works of all kinds, and their progress in social refinement. We think he perhaps a little overstates their admirableness; the picture has another side which we have briefly and partially indicated.

The old-time essayistic flavor in the title of Mr. Lowell's essay—title, "On a certain Condescension in Foreigners"—is not in precise accordance—so we feel—with the matter of it, much of which deals with very recent events, and all of which is so fresh and sparkling that, in reading it, one is far enough from thinking of any time but now. Having said this, let us now contradict ourselves; let us ask if, perhaps, all the extant willingness to rebuke foreigners for their condescension towards us does not partake a little of times that have all but gone wholly away; if it may not almost be pronounced traditional? We have our doubts if the young men now coming up have a great deal of it. America has moved West of late, and grown in the grace of indifference. Senator Zachariah Chandler or Senator Nye have less care, we imagine, as to what the Times or the Edinburgh Review thinks about American affairs than Senator Everett had some fifteen or twenty years ago. They see too much land and too many miles "put into corn," and shoot too many buffaloes from the windows of the cars that are going to connect New York with China. We observe that our Californian travellers nowadays go to Europe to chaff that continent and neighboring parts of Asia, and do not at all write such books of travel as Doctor Peabody's and our other Eastern visitors to the old shrines. Nothing is sacred to these sapeurs of old institutions and makers of new. They draw revolvers in Paris, and speak with a tone of levity of the Jordan. Gentlemen like these will not in the least share, will hardly understand, Mr. Paulding's acrimonious, or his friend Mr. Irving's grateful, feelings concerning British and other airs of condescension; will not admit inferiority either directly by anger when it is asserted, or indirectly by protesting that they are not troubled by the reproach, or by proving that they don't deserve it. Most of Mr. Lowell's essay, however, is before all else humorous, witty, easy yet biting satire on the cheaper sort of foreign tourists. Besides, it is not to be forgotten that our Chandlers and Nyes owe a good deal of their ability to smile superior to British opinion to a certain inability to see when the laugh is really against us. Still, the fact remains that the new men are far more careless of foreign opinion than the old ones, and the new men are to be, are now almost, the country. And it is true that Mr. Lowell holds in all its intensity—and he does not leave it unexpressed in the essay before us—the faith in America which some of the faithful blindly hold, and hold alloyed with worse things than a desire that we should be not merely big and rich, not merely great even, but also fine and beautiful.

Mr. Howells's "Gnadenhütten" is concerning the Moravians in America, and more especially concerning the Indian converts of that communion. It has many of his characteristic touches, and is, we may safely suppose, of value as a correct historical sketch of little known events. Dr. Holmes's "Cinders from the Ashes" will be read with much pleasure, both as being pleasant in itself, and as containing some of the autobiography of an author to whom there is no one of the present reading public of America who is not indebted for some instruction and some pleasure.

Hours at Home has a noticeable article by Professor E. P. Evans on "Babism"—a subject which has, we think, never but once before been treated of in any American periodical; we may refer our readers to an article on the same subject in No. 59 of this journal, from which may be got a rather clearer idea of the religious tenets of the sect than Professor Evans here furnishes. "Progress" is the title of an ingenious essay by Dr. Bushnell, who seems to do better when attacking Mr. Herbert Spencer than when undertaking to deal with certain modern scientists who observe phenomena, but who have declined to frame any theory of the universe, moral or physical. "My Tenants" is a pretty piece of poetry, suggested by Emerson and written by "H. H." The Rev. Mr. G. B. Bacon, a skilful magazine writer, makes an entertaining article on what he saw in China; and a translation from the German, which describes a visit to the late M. Berryer, is also agreeable reading. We can hardly say as much for Mrs. Austin's "Sackcloth under Velvet," with its sentimental and highly improbable, yet perfectly transparent, plot. The author of "Mary Powell" goes on with her new story, and so does the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe;" and anybody who cares for scientific information concerning the human eye, and who has been having doubts as to the necessity of wearing spectacles, will do well to turn to an article by Professor Roosa, who attacks a previous writer, and seems to us to make a clear case against him. This is a good number of Hours at Home, a magazine which has been rather slowly, and not quite steadily, but still, on the whole, surely improving from the start, and is now, we suppose, the most readable of all the mixed literary and religious American monthly magazines that we receive.

Lippincott's new story, "Beyond the Breakers," begins in Philadelphia with a trial scene—with which, by the way, the Philadelphians find some fault for inaccuracy in its details—and then proceeds to the West, a field as yet for the most part untrodden by any story-tellers except such as went there for Indians and animals. Mr. Boker, Mr. Stoddard, Mr. Bayard Taylor, Mr. Edgar Fawcett, and Mr. F. W. Clarke furnish the poetry for the January Lippincott's; Mr. Fawcett's "Cross and Crown" being, perhaps, the best of it. The best poem, however, is the prose article by Mr. Albert Fabre, a new writer, who narrates a moral and poetical fable suitable for Christmas time. It is oriental, and is borrowed, perhaps, from some Eastern story-teller's repertory, and retouched by Mr. Fabre. It is, at all events, very pretty. A late article in the Atlantic by Doctor Mitchell seems to have suggested to Mrs. Austin a not good story of woorara poisoning. It is sensational and melodramatic in a high degree, and is all the more disagreeable as coming from a writer who once in a while gives indications of a capacity for liking, and even for doing, better things. Karl Blind does not know whether Spain will be a republic, but thinks she ought to be. His is not an opinion which it is very well worth while to have, but his article contains some information worth having and not very easily accessible, and he makes a point when he says that since it was agreed that both monarchists and republicans among the Spanish leaders should keep quiet till the Constitutional Convention had spoken, it was entirely wrong for Prim to pronounce publicly in favor of a monarchical government. The "Monthly Gossip" and "Literature of the Day," in this number of Lippincott's, are, as usual, both prepared with care, and both good; but, as also is usual, too many of the papers in the body of the magazine read as if the editor was solicitous rather to encourage young writers than new readers. "The Blue Cabinet," for example, is exceedingly trite; nobody need care to go through "Christmas Pantomimes;" nobody need care to begin going through a "Parisian New Year's;" "Justice for Bluebeard," too, is very thin. We must not forget to mention an anonymous writer, who begins a series of articles, which we hope may not be a short one, on "A Secret Agent of Napoleon the Third." The author writes like a person perfectly conversant with his facts, and produces what may be called a typical magazine article of the lighter sort.

Putnam's has for its most prominent contribution a new poem by Mr. Bryant. The blank verse is good throughout, and in places is managed as only a master manages it. For the rest, it is characteristically grave, grave almost to solemnity in tone and thought. In these days it is easy to resign one's self to the sentimental way of looking at nature; in fact, it would be impossible for the men of our time not to do so; till our blood is made over, it will and must be done. And, of course, it is vain and it is undesirable to plead with the poet that nature be not clothed upon with his sad and even his despairing moods, for these moods are ours, and materials for the poet's use. But in much of Mr. Bryant's poetry nature is endued, not with a sadness of the poet's own—a human sadness which we also can feel and like to feel—but rather the poet seems to bring out a shadowy sombreness inherent in nature's self; there comes over her aspect a gloom which tells us that she is not only alien from man but hostile to him, and which oppresses the heart with a chilly lonesomeness and half-defined fear. This melancholy feeling the poem we have just been reading brings into the reader's sub-consciousness, and never, perhaps, fully to his perception; of course it is an affair of tone, of general impression; but we imagine it to be at the bottom of the distaste which many readers feel for all Mr. Bryant's poetry.

"To-day" is a romance by Mr. R. B. Kimball. New York, both up-town and down-town New York, is in it, and we hope that as the story proceeds there may be developed something more than a mere surface realism. "Tent Life with the Wandering Koraks" is a lively and readable account of a visit to a winter encampment of those Siberian natives, and Mr. George Kennan is a traveller whom all boys and many men will willingly meet again. Mr. James Fenimore Cooper left behind him, it appears, a paper which he prepared for the purpose of reading it before the New York Historical Society, on the Battle of Plattsburgh Bay, an action which, resulting favorably for the Americans under the brave, able, and modest MacDonough, compelled the defeat of the British land expedition under the unfortunate Prevost. The editor of Putnam's has published this essay, but, unfortunately, has cut out the description of the fight itself, which is what was most valuable. This is all the more unsatisfactory as he has retained a long and worthless disquisition on English misunderstanding of our American polity, the strategic plans of the British commander, and so on. "Treasure," by Mr. W. I. Paulding, is an interesting, instructive, we may say very touching, story of a poor, illiterate fellow in Putnam County years ago, who addled his brain with the notion of finding a silver mine. The author gives a very graphic description of the preaching of an itinerant orator who, by the power of his appeals, turned 'Bias from his error of greed. There is also a very good description of a wood-chopping match, and a pathetic account of the old man's perishing in the snow. The story is full of local color, spirited and truthful, and is, we believe, the best piece of Mr. Paulding's work that we have ever seen. Everybody who is interested in the various plans—there are twelve of them, at least—for giving New York an aerial or a subterranean or a surface steam railway from the business part of the city to the region two and three and four miles distant where business men live in the evenings, will do well to read an excellent article by Mr. A. W. Colgate, entitled "Steam Travel in Cities." The London city railways and the city termini of the extra-urban railways Mr. Colgate has examined and studied, and he makes it plain that something better than our vile horse-cars and our detestable stages not only can be but has been invented and put in use. But we have a far worse than worthless city government, and usually a Legislature that a horse-railroad lobby can easily buy. Mr. Colgate writes clearly on a subject upon which writing clearly could not have been very easy. Of the lighter articles in Putnam's, a brief biography of Hans Andersen may be recommended, and so may an article on "Popular Lectures in England," by Professor Moses Coit Tyler, who justly congratulates his fellow-countrymen that the non-political platform is more respectable and more profitable here among us than it is in England, where lectures are either given by condescending persons or are paid for at the rate of from one guinea or so up to six, and are listened to by only a small and rather illiterate class of hearers.

Harper's opens with an original poem not without strength and beauty—and it is not very often that so much can be said in praise of Harper's poetry, whether borrowed or unborrowed. "The Silent City" is the title of it, and it deals with the silent city at Greenwood whence one can see the city of New York. The idea is not new, and the thoughts are common thoughts; but one may say that of the "Elegy in a Country Churchyard." It is true that one would have to say more of the elegy and that not much more could be said of this poem; but it is so often that a good deal less has to be said. Two stanzas of it are as follows:

> "There are traders without traffic, merchants without books or gains;
> Tender brides in new-made chambers where the trickling water stains;
> Where the guests forget to come and strange listening silence reigns:
> Listening silence ever reigns.
>
> "Ships sail past this silent city, but their owners quiet lie,
> And no signals fly from tree-tops, 'gainst the glowing crimson sky,
> Telling the neglectful owner that his well-built argosy
> For the Fleece is sailing by."

The rest of Harper's is nearly all very good. Mr. Curtis, talking of Hawthorne and Brook Farm, makes one wish that he would set about doing what he could do better than any man now living—write a history of the Brook Farm life. The work seems to cry aloud for him. A great many readers will know what a good thing is to be expected when we say that Major De Forest writes an article on "Chivalrous and Semi-Chivalrous Southerners." The non-chivalrous he has described in more articles than one. Mr. Conway is learned, and, though a little flighty, decidedly interesting in the second of his "South Coast Saunterings in England," and Mr. Theodore Davis makes one of the best of Harper's illustrated papers on "The Buffalo Range on the Plains." Then we have Du Chaillu with pictures, the beginning of a good love-story by Mr. Justin McCarthy, who will no doubt be obliged to us for supplying the omission of his name. The editor of Harper's might have seen it, too, for it is printed with the story in Belgravia. The rest of the magazine contains an instalment of "The New Timothy," historical articles on "The Bishops of Rome" and "Antonio Perez," some not very good book notices, "The Editor's Drawer," and many pages more.

The Overland Monthly for November is the last that we have received, and there is nothing in it that is bad and little that is not good. "A Cruise of a Slaver" is better than most chapters in nautical novels; and "Sahara and the Saharans" than most books of travels. For local articles we are offered "Restaurant Life in San Francisco," "The Dead Rivers of California," "Wheat in California," "Concerning the Late Earthquake," and "Our Heathen Temples." So far the Overland has kept itself astonishingly free from padding, and thus negatively, as well as in many ways positively, sets the older, Eastern magazines an example as unexpected as it is honorable to the conductors of the new periodical.

There is little or nothing, we think, that we need say about this number of the Catholic World, except that it is as well adapted as any of the others to edify Roman Catholics; rather less adapted than usual to the tastes of Protestant readers; and about as well adapted as usual to fill the indifferent reader with a sort of wonder. Clergymen who have been displeased with Dr. Ewer, understanding him to be unduly severe on Protestantism, will be pleased to see him, whether he will or no, lumped with the general mass of persons outside the pale. "The Episcopal Church," says another writer, in an article which Dissenting polemics will not unwillingly look into, "must work either for us or for Protestantism." For the general reader there is a translation, by Doctor Parsons, we presume, of a sonnet from the "Vita Nuova," and the conclusion of the learned and clever essay on "Galileo-Galilei"—which we advise a Montreal correspondent of ours to peruse with care. He will see how little, when weighed with all the evidence, avails the authority of Milton, who, being then a youth, visited the astronomer after he had been released from confinement, and who probably got most of his impressions of the affair from Galileo himself—who must have been glad of a Protestant listener. In the whole quarrel, the hypocrisy of the leading churchmen, who in private upheld the man whom in public they condemned, is not more conspicuous than the wrong-headed perversity of Galileo, who persisted in dragging the Scriptures into the quarrel instead of going on with his work and teaching in peace all that he had of the new learning.

"Cipher," Mrs. Jane G. Austin's novel, is the opening article in the Galaxy, and in this instalment ceases entirely to be interesting. It is a way that the magazine stories of a certain class are apt to have. The authors are naturally clever enough to dislike the commonplace, very probably they are naturally clever enough to do better than commonplace work. But they will neither wait and grow, nor work and grow. So it is usual with them, in each of their more elaborate attempts, to spend pains in the invention of a striking beginning for the story; and here their abilities are seen at their best. But afterwards comes the unnaturalness of defective art and defective knowledge; characters hastily studied are imperfectly put on the stage; sensationalism in the incidents, appeals to the reader's passions, word-painting, take the place of simple truth, careful invention, just thinking, and force of feeling. Still Mrs. Austin is, perhaps, above rather than below the school in which it is necessary to place her; shows a brighter intelligence, at any rate, though, perhaps, she hardly keeps herself better in hand.

Mr. Eugene Benson is at his worst—which is also his best—in this number of the Galaxy. His theme is "New York Journalists: W. H. Hurlbut." "With what vim and raillery," says Mr. Benson, "does he"—the Corinthian Hurlbut, namely—"demonstrate Sumner's legs and Tilton's limbs. In one word, Mr. Hurlbut is the prince of persifleurs. Only a polished and adroit mind can persifle. . . . . Mr. Hurlbut has a polished and adroit mind. . . . . I say he is the Heine of our press. . . . . He can suggest without becoming prurient. . . . . A great boy nature, full of the frolic and juggle of talent. . . . . He whinnies over the field of politics, and caracoles and prances and runs in full sight of our political gladiators. . . . . How he frolics with our democratic deities." . . . "The literary execution of William Ellery Channing, fils" (Poe made a clumsily brutal attack on Channing in one of the most puerile and disgusting of his criticisms)—"the Literary Execution of William Ellery Channing, fils" (French phrase, as Mr. Ward used to say), "was by a hand that might have played with Grant's name as 'W. H. H.' played with it during the last Presidential campaign. . . . . He covers the gravest and heaviest subject with the very foam of human speech, and freshens the driest mind with the cool full shock of his style." We protest that we would not knowingly be unjust to the least or the poorest; in quoting these sentences we have given fair samples of the critic's performance.

"A Belt of Asteroids" is the title of an essay by Mr. E. C. Stedman on the "poets of one poem." He could hardly be exhaustive on such a theme, and every reader of poetry would probably suggest some one or two poems that might have been mentioned. But the essay is pleasantly written and readable, and contains some sound criticism and some little that seems unsound. The author shows a familiar acquaintance with the whole field of minor English and American poetry, and a taste that is seldom at fault. "Edwin Booth" is the work of Mrs. Lucia Gilbert Calhoun, who is, as most women are, a trifle too enthusiastic in her admiration for our handsome, sentimental, and most effective actor; his Hamlet male critics who have studied that character are not, as a general thing, particularly fond of, their demand being for a little more intellectuality. "The Liberal Triumvirate of England"—Bright, Gladstone, and Mill, namely—are treated of in an interesting way by Mr. Justin McCarthy; Mr. A. Oakey Hall has rather a weak semi-allegorical article called "Our Crime Land Excursion;" Mr. R. G. White has another of his discourses on English grammar; "The Lanman Scandal" is a not bad story by Mrs. W. H. Palmer; Mr. N. S. Dodge's "Charleston Vendue in 1842" is interesting; Mrs. Sarah E. Henshaw proves her individual inferiority to most male writers on the woman question; Mrs. Edwards begins a new novel, and so the magazine is filled up with what must be called good light reading. By-and-by, probably in the March number, we are to have Mr. Charles Reade.

For poetry, the January Galaxy has a little piece by Dr. Parsons, very pleasing in the second stanza, which is in the manner of the Elizabethans, or rather of the men of the first Charles's day; next a translation by Mr. Bryant of the flight of Diomed, from the eighth of the "Iliad;" and finally something from Miss Crane ("Emily Chester"), something from Miss E. D. Proctor, and something from Mr. R. H. Stoddard.

MORE OF THE HOLIDAY BOOKS FOR YOUNG CHILDREN.*

WHETHER or not to recommend "The Doctor's Ward" as "a tale for girls" we hardly know. It is a tale for girls of seventeen or eighteen years of age and ends with bridesmaids and two happy marriages. Still, there is no danger we suppose, in a love story which represents the heroine as a wilful young lady who is gradually brought to respect and love a stern physician, not very handsome and not very young, with a strong sense of duty, who is severe in rebuking the early wilfulness of his ward, who is very reticent about his affection, who does not declare it till Miss Phillis has had a fair opportunity to reject the addresses of a wealthy young man, and of whom at the end of our exemplary story his bride speaks as "Doctor Raymond." Really the tale, if a little sentimental, is quite sensible, pure, and pleasantly told. To withhold entire commendation is not easy when one remembers that the authorities of our largest city library find that the works of "the mysterious Ouida" are greater favorites with the New York and Brooklyn young ladies of seventeen and eighteen than even the novels of Miss Mühlbach. "The Doctor's Ward," apart from its love-making, teaches not too ostentatiously good lessons of self-control and of consideration for others.

For boys of a pretty good age the second book on our list is a desirable one. It consists of the most adventurous and exciting incidents of the most interesting of Cooper's prairie stories, separated from their context. They are all the better, perhaps, for the excision, whether we think of young readers or old. The wearisome reflections of the novelist, which, in the novels as their author published them, are so much dead wood, the reader of these razeed stories before us wholly escapes. And for the rest, the rapid movement of these tales, the stirring character of the incidents, the courage and ready resource of the actors, cannot fail to interest boys and be of service to them; Cooper, whatever else may be said of him, was certainly a straightforward, manly man, without a really unsound streak in him.

M. Du Chaillu is another favorite of the boys, though perhaps hardly so profitable a companion. It would be a good thing, M. Paul thinks, if some of our widowers and bachelors in this country could have of the brain of the gorilla with which to make charms that should lead all the pretty girls to seek them in marriage. Such was the use to which, as he was informed by his friends Makinda, Yeava, and Miengai, a certain preparation of the brain of the gorilla is put in Africa. And at home the beautiful girls are so difficult to please! But whatever the American parental mind may think of these and other such French touches, what American boy could resist following the lively Gaul up rivers where countless water-snakes of all colors swim around the boat; to islands where millions of parrots fill the trees; into the courts of African monarchs clothed in the state garment of a stiff black stock with a steel buckle at the back of the neck; into encampments where the traveller eats elephant or makes a meal of monkey meat; into swamps where the snake-charmer subjugates the most venomous serpents, and at last, being bitten, becomes delirious and commits suicide by splitting his head open with an axe; across forests where march armies of ants with sentinels and captains of companies and colonels of regiments, before whose advance lions and elephants flee in fear, which devour in a twinkling every beast on which they fasten, and which cross streams by means of a living bridge or chain of ants swung from trees upon the banks; through forests abounding in terrors natural and supernatural? Nothing could better please adventurous youths than our explorer's narrations; and they will not be troubled, and perhaps they should not be, by incredulity concerning the habits of the gorilla—an animal which, in this volume, walks on two legs, gnashes his teeth at the approach of man, and beats with his hands upon his breast, which emits a hollow roar while it resounds with the monster's blows. All males not yet arrived at the critical or criticising age will find "Wild Life under the Equator" a work of fascination.

The "Foster Brothers" is a healthy, agreeable little book, dealing realistically with such events as occur in the home, school, and vacation life of average New England boys. The moral lesson inculcated is not too forcibly presented, the best of good nature reigns throughout, the children are natural, whether at Lawrence, or Swampscott, or North Conway, or plaguing each other at home; and altogether we can praise "Cousin Sue" as an excellent writer for young children, whom she evidently loves and believes in.

Perhaps "Uncle Rod's Pet" is a little too definitively religious, or preachy, rather. We, for our part, have not often fallen in with a romping little girl who makes herself, or is made, all in the course of a twelvemonth, an instrument in the sudden conversion of an old farmer who has long disused religious observances; in inducing a good maiden lady to clear her house of Indian and Chinese curiosities and fit it up as a home for seven orphans; and of causing a wilful cousin of fifteen years old to give up a determination to stay in Lima, though his father grievingly longs for him to go back to Canton. It must be bad to offer children things like these as constituting the warp and woof of any child's life. In their secret hearts, they must disbelieve in so much juvenile goodness; for, however little else they know, they do know their brothers and sisters and themselves and their school companions, and when do any of them find young folks of their own circle of acquaintance doing such things? Older people—some older people—may think boys and girls of ten or eleven ought to do them; but the boys and girls know the facts very well, and to offer them too much virtue incarnate in flesh of about their own age generally, we should imagine, leads them to more or less unconscious resentment and recalcitrancy, and they become, to a certain extent, sceptics and practical atheists. The unnatural goodness of the copperplate copy too often fills the young scribe with despair and a disgust akin to hatred, and induces vicious scrawling on the rest of the page. Many Sunday-school scholars of the bad old times, whom "Tom Brown at Rugby," for instance, would have filled with admiration and seduced into the paths of tolerable virtue, have been hardened in evil courses by the excess of early piety so noteworthy in the case, say, of a certain "Samuel S." whose "Memoir" many of us remember having read with feelings unbecoming baptized children. Indeed, to look for too early piety is a mistake, and we more than half believe that to inculcate it is a crime.

But our discourse is getting to be rather more severe than is entirely warranted by our text. "Uncle Rod's Pet" has a good deal in it that is life-like and agreeable, and its direct teachings are not to be found fault with. Only we are afraid of its indirect effects. It would take but little, it would require only a revision of her theories as to how children should be approached, to make our author a good writer in the line she has chosen.

"The Boy Foresters" attempts to reproduce, and does it with some surface fidelity, the life of the men whom the harsh forest laws of Norman England and the oppression of the lords-of-the-manor drove into exile in the greenwood. The story is interesting, and the sentiments of the outlaws will be found to be in the main highly creditable to their religious, moral, and political training. It is not a book that we should be very willing or very desirous to put into the hands of children. That they would get amusement from it, is as certain as that their fathers get amusement from "Ivanhoe," and the amusement would not be of a much different kind, nor, making due allowance for the discrepancy of age, would it be at all different, we suppose, in degree.

What to say about "The Laughter Book" we do not know, except that surely it is very laughable. It is profusely illustrated with such pictures as little boys make on scraps of paper and which they then color in the most flaming manner with their toy paint-brushes. The subjects of these designs are of the simplest possible ridiculousness, and the letter-press that accompanies them, highly moral as it always is, is worthy of the designer's best efforts. But it is so far beneath as to be far above criticism. As we have said, we found it justify its name. Looking through it, one thinks of Burton of the "Anatomy" going out in his deepest fits of spleen to listen to the billingsgate of the low fishwomen, in order that he might be made to go home holding his sides; why the reader of this work laughs is a thing that even more successfully defies analysis than Burton's singular merriment. We can only recommend the purchase of the work.

"The Governor's Pardon" is a story of a degraded boy, reclaimed from the streets, who goes into the country from a Mission School, and is adopted by a gentleman of wealth; he is well schooled, marries, becomes tolerably rich, is cheated by a person to whom he has sold some property, persuades himself that he has a right to forge his fraudulent debtor's name and so get some of the money due him, is convicted and sent to the State prison, behaves well, is pardoned at the end of two years, and goes home a thoroughly reformed man to live with his loving wife and family. It will be seen that this is not in any special sense a book for young folks, and why it should be presented as such there is no telling. To condense a very poor novel, and make it bald and uninteresting to adult novel readers, is not to make an interesting or useful book for children. Just about that is what Mrs. Leslie has done in this case. Still, there is nothing particularly bad in the book; unless, indeed, it is bad to set before children crimes to the commission of which their fathers are liable. Probably children find out their parents' sins and weaknesses quite soon enough without assistance from books.

Ann Taylor's verses, which, at some time or other, every child knows by heart, they being among the holy things of the nursery, renew their well deserved life in the pretty volume, "My Mother." Every stanza has a border of its own, of agreeable design, occupying the whole page, and (except the last, which is not exactly adapted for the purpose) has a full-page illustration, colored. The designs are to be praised for their simplicity, directness, good feeling, and good drawing. The title-page has a vignette and a pattern "in diaper," of rather better color than the subsequent plates, and the book is sure to be a favorite as well for its pictures as for its poem.

Outwardly of the same handsome dress as the foregoing, "Clever Dogs" depends even more on its pictures than on its text for its value to the young. The former, many of them of full size, being after Harrison Weir, Landseer, and other artists equally at home with the brute creation, of course are excellent. So are the anecdotes themselves, but being made to illustrate the illustrations, they have to be connected by a rambling talk, unexceptionable in spirit, to be sure, yet such as may be guessed from the sudden check with which the writer pulls himself up every now and then: "But you do n't want a dry book;" "I will give an anecdote to light up this little essay," etc. The occasional verses are of a mild crudity.

The disappointment which we have experienced in Mary Howitt's "Pictures from Nature" was due rather more to our traditional faith in her than to our forgetting a similar disappointment which she caused us last year. To begin with the prints in the present instance, we find them very poor art indeed, both in drawing and in color. To match these we have twelve essays, one for each month, but for what class of readers we are puzzled to say. Compositions on the seasons are not apt to be looked upon by children in the light of a luxurious relaxation; and as these are purely writings of sentiment, they could not have been designed for instruction. Moreover, this language is not for children: "December and January, we say, are settled, legitimate winter; they are months in which we resign ourselves to our fate, let it be what it may, for we know that frost and snow and storm are the appropriate condition of the time." Even the old might think this somewhat trite, and yet Mrs. Howitt has written, it seems to us, with rather more fitness for them than for youth.

We can do more than repeat the hearty praise which we accorded to "Every Boy's Book" last Christmas-time. We spoke then of certain deficiencies in it, from an American point of view, such as the absence of base-ball from the list of "athletic sports and manly exercises." The editor no longer permits us to make this exception. He has enlarged his work fifty pages in order to give full and authoritative rules not only for base-ball, but also for billiards and the Canadian game of "la crosse," thus leaving nothing for the American boy to desire in a manual otherwise so complete. Still another effort to amend the edition of last year, which has caught our attention, though not wholly successful, exhibits the right spirit; so the editor will, doubtless, pardon us for saying that he has not wholly removed the confusion between Stonewall and Andrew Jackson on p. 767 of the chapter on stamp-collecting.

ILLUSTRATED BOOKS—GIFT-BOOKS AND OTHERS.*

BEFORE the publication last winter of the first of the treatises named below, people who read only English had no account which they could trust of French painting and painters. In England, and even more remarkably in America, the influence of the highly trained French painters has been growing very rapidly for several years, and the number of buyers of French pictures and the number of French pictures bought in those two countries has been mounting season by season. It has been, therefore, with great curiosity and interest that the people who look at pictures and chat about painters have caught up every floating bit of gossip or more reliable information in regard to French artists. But unless one reads French, and, reading French, dabbles in a great sea of floating literature, periodicals, pamphlets, Bulletins, and the like, one has little chance to get anything better than gossip, except now with the assistance of Mr. Hamerton. It is highly desirable that everybody who admires Gérôme or Hamon or Blaise Desgoffe—or thinks he does—should buy at once and speedily read the two volumes before us.

They are square books, of a page large enough to allow a good margin around each photograph; in fact books of a form which the English publishers have much affected these few years past for their Christmas gift-books. Everybody has seen either "English Children as painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds," or "The Great Works of Raphael," or a similar volume of Mulready's works, or one containing Rembrandt's etchings. These two books by Mr. Hamerton range with those we have named; and, while all are of a certain value, and books for the library as well as for Christmas-day trafficking, Mr. Hamerton's volumes are as good as the best of them.

The painters from whose works the photographs in the first volume are taken are, Bouguereau, Hamon, Ingres, Protais, Horace Vernet, Delaroche, Ary Scheffer, Troyon, Rosa Bonheur, Robert, Charles Jacque, Decamps, Gérôme, Meissonier, Edouard Frère, and Toulmouche; one picture for each In the second volume are illustrations after Aubert, Courbet, De Jonghe, Lobrichon, Charles Brun, Henriette Browne, Jalabert, Comte Calix, Otto Weber, Le Poittevin, Tissot, Londelle, Janet Lange, and Corot. But this imperfect list of the living and the recently dead artists of the French school includes by no means all who are criticised in Mr. Hamerton's text. Thus, the accounts of Géricault and Delacroix are as important as any in the book which contains them; and the few words about Froment are of importance to the great public which has never seen a line drawn by his hand. In connection with these books the student should read the same author's valuable paper on Hypolite Flandrin, which was published in the now defunct Fine Arts Quarterly.

These books have nearly the same value to English and American readers about art that a teacher of French or of German would have who should speak English absolutely well, and hold the two languages alike. Everybody who has been fortunate enough to have such a master will remember how easily all difficulties are smoothed away, and how clearly the pupil learns not to translate English thoughts and expressions into French, but how at once to think and express himself in French. Mr. Hamerton, like our seldom found teacher, is English and French in one. He stands half across the border; from infancy he has held the two languages, the two societies, the two nations as his own, and although he is an English subject, and only for a time a sojourner in France, that does not interfere with his permanent residence in the two intellectual kingdoms at the same time. He is a peculiarly safe guide, therefore, to lead us all to a better knowledge of the good and the not so good in French art; while his long training as a practical painter among Highland mountains and Burgundian hill-sides qualifies him in an especial manner to pronounce upon an art so highly developed and mechanically perfect as that of the ateliers of modern Paris.

It is possible that close examination would establish the fact that something is lacking to Mr. Hamerton's method of criticism. The plough does not go quite deep enough; the soil is not turned over from the bottom. Let the student read together the notices of painters of extremely opposite character, of Gérôme and of Flandrin, or of Doré and of Delaroche, and there will be plain to him a want of perception of the fundamental difference—the eternal gulf between these men and between their works. True criticism is careful, no doubt, and hedges around with reservations and cautious statements all the praise or the blame that it awards. But it ought to be possible to extract from true criticism a knowledge of the most important qualities and characters of the work criticised. And it is demonstrable that, as regards Doré, for instance, no knowledge could be obtained by a student from Mr. Hamerton's pages that would help him to define Doré's art for himself, while certainly it is not defined for him. It is probable that, both in the two papers in the Fine Arts Quarterly on Doré and in this book, he has ranked this artist far too high; but even this would be a small evil in comparison, if his estimate of him were clearly set forth and the comparative rank he assigns to him accurately explained. And what is very clear about Doré is equally true about the others, though possibly less clear. It may be admitted, of course, that the books claim rather to be a popular introduction to the study of French art than an exhaustive and critical treatise upon it. We have expressed our admiration for them as such, and insist only on this their distinctive character, which marks them as temporary shifts to keep us a little informed upon the subject until solid and permanent criticism can be written.

We find in the first of these volumes a sentence which goes far toward explaining our meaning. "It has been severely criticised, but not very fairly, because critics, in this instance, as in many others, speak of the merely positive merits of the work, without taking into consideration"—no matter what; and no matter what was the work, or who the workman. If critics "speak of the merely positive merits of the work"—using "merits" in the large sense—they do just what they ought. Criticism has nothing to do with taking into consideration any difficulties beyond the visible ones and inherent ones of subject. Criticism has to do with positive existing qualities of the work under consideration, its individual character, and its relation to other works of art and to the world at large; what the painter has done is the question, and not whether he had some good reason for doing it, or some excuse for partial failure. Kindly natured writers of criticism will always state their knowledge of facts which partly explain shortcomings, or increase the merit of excellence; but when they do so they are not discharging a critical, but rather a philanthropic and social duty. There are, however, pieces of very sound criticism in these volumes; we have found particularly good the long reviews of the works of Courbet.

The artists whose works are copied as "Gems of British Art" are the best known to the American public; and the particular "gems" selected are generally as familiar to the untravelled as any pictures in Europe can be. The old familiar names and subjects meet us again. Landseer's "Jack in Office," Maclise's "Malvolio," Mulready's "Choosing the Wedding Gown," Herring's "Frugal Meal," and West's "Death of General Wolf" are familiar to all persons in this country who think of pictures at all, and very few of the twenty-four illustrations in the book before us are unknown to general and popular fame. The pictures have been reproduced by oil-color printing from wood blocks, and from copies —as Mr. Palgrave's preface says—carefully prepared for the purpose. The author seems to think that the prints are pretty successful; at least the preface goes on to say that they "preserve (so far as the process can) that element in a picture which, although beyond the reach of simple engraving, is the most characteristic of its elements—the coloring of the original." Mr. Palgrave is no inconsiderable critic of works of art, and if we had here his deliberately expressed opinion as to the relative value of these as compared with other modern color-prints, it would be only justice to allow it to stand beside our own not very favorable judgment. It is, however, not necessary to say that these pictures are used only as illustrative helps to the historical criticism Mr. Palgrave has undertaken. For this purpose they are good. The exquisite and admirably finished picture "Choosing the Wedding Gown" is perfectly well described by the colored print of it in this book, taken with the accompanying text; while to say that its artistic character is not in any sense reproduced here is to utter a mere truism. Mr. Palgrave has gone deep for a Christmas book. Matters that lie at the very foundation of criticism, and questions which modern research painfully strives to answer, are his theme. His plan does not allow of any grappling with such subjects, and we heartily wish that the text of this costly volume could be printed by itself in a half-dollar book, which students might find it more easy to possess.

"Enid" completes the "Idyls of the King," illustrated by Doré. The splendid pages of the text, the exquisitely clear and comely printing on so large a scale, are wholly delightful. It is much to say of the fourfold poem—the "Idyls of the King"—that it seems not misfitted by the ample page and clear type that would befit Chaucer. In respect to Doré's peculiar gifts as a designer, and the relative value of these designs for Tennyson as compared with his other work, our views have been given often enough. It is but fair to say that we find in Mr. Hamerton's book—the second of the two criticised above—a higher value set upon the works of Gustave Doré than we had supposed any trained judge of art would give to it at this time. The profane "Contes Drolatiques" and some purely comic woodcuts of twenty years ago are probably Doré's best works; but the steel engravings of the other three Idyls have been very popular, and it is curious to find Mr. Ruskin in his last volume assuring his correspondent that he is mistaken—that, after all, the engravings are no better than the woodcuts which they had agreed in disliking. Worse, Mr. Ruskin thinks; and if it is with the "Contes Drolatiques" that he compares them, we agree with him very heartily.

There are not many of our readers who will not know very well what sort of a book is "The Holidays," as soon as they read the title-page which we copy below. Curious information in regard to holiday observances, both the grave and the merry, enlivened, though it needs little enlivenment, by illustrative scraps of queer old poetry—these usually make up such books. Generally there is a tone of affected quaintness about them and a fearful triteness; but from these faults this work of Mr. Warren's is free. He is a graceful writer, he has evidently been a wide reader in his chosen field, and he has a genuine hearty love for his subject; he is saved, therefore, from namby-pambyism and from the dull retailing of old articles in church magazines. Our Episcopalian readers will find it a very suitable book for gift-giving purposes; and so, too, will that large class of the general public whose interest in the great Christian festivals has of late years been much increased. The designs are of the well known character of Mr. Darley's work.

"The Women of the Old Testament" is a gift-book made upon a plan somewhat new—a gift-book so absolutely devotional in character and so grave in tone that its destination is easily fixed. It consists of extracts in prose and verse which have been selected—it must have been at some pains—from many writers, and of photographs from engravings of familiar pictures. Sermons by Bishop Hall have contributed sketches of Deborah, Miriam, and Vashti; one of the cantos of Keble's "Christian Year" supplies the text about Lot and his wife; Jonathan Edwards has been called upon for meditations upon Ruth and Naomi. Every extract is a homily, either in prose or in verse, and many of them are very good homilies indeed.

The illustrations are nearly all taken from well-known engravings. Among them is one of the most academic and unreal of Raphael's compositions, the "Judgment of Solomon," in which the youthful Solomon is made a grey-bearded patriarch, and the action is that of models posed in graceful attitudes. One or two good points are to be found in Schrader's "Queen Esther," and so with others; but as a general thing these large engravings are a little hard to enjoy in the first place, and seen through the medium of photography, are immeasurably inferior.

LAST WINTER IN THE UNITED STATES.*

This book is written by a gentleman, a man of the world, and a practised observer—a combination of characteristics rarely found among the English travellers who have written on America. It is quite as unfortunate for England as for America that for two generations at least the mass of English writers on America have been incompetent alike to observe correctly and to report candidly upon what they had observed. Even now it is from Mr. Trollope, Mr. Hepworth Dixon, Mr. Latham, and Mr. Rose that many of the strongest late English impressions of America are derived. Mr. Zincke's little book is, so far as it goes, an excellent set-off against the volumes of these and other such writers; but it is slight in construction, and his stay in America was too short to give to his impressions and conclusions that authority with the English reader which they really deserve to exert.

The power of observation and of narrative which Mr. Zincke displays, his liberal and open spirit, his good sense, and his genial feeling, give occasion for regret that he did not remain longer in the country, that he might have made a more thorough study of it and written a more complete book.

His feeling toward Americans may be judged of from the concluding sentence of his volume:

"If any from that side (the American) shall have accompanied me through these pages, my wish is that they may have come to look upon me somewhat in the light in which one of my Boston acquaintances told me a week's intercourse had brought him to regard me, that is, 'as one of themselves.'"

Mr. Zincke may be assured that his wish is a claim that will be readily allowed. It is but rarely that he shows himself not an American in sympathy, and he very seldom falls into any error of intelligence in regard to the conditions of the country, or makes a blunder in his statement of facts. And this is the more creditable because, as he says, "the aspects of human society, as well as of outward nature, are here so unlike anything with which the English traveller is familiar at home, that he is ever feeling conscious that new pictures are being added to the furniture of his mind." But an Englishman who, "wherever in America he sees a piece of land being cleared or settled, or a church or school being built, looks on as if something were being done by and for his own countrymen," becomes capable, through the penetrating insight of sympathy, of estimating at their worth external differences and of appreciating internal qualities.

In this feeling of the essential unity of the people of the two countries, and of their common interest in each other's progress and prosperity, Mr. Zincke belongs to the large and increasing number of Englishmen to whose sentiments Mr. Bright gave expression in his recent speech at the banquet given to Mr. Reverdy Johnson in Birmingham, when he said:

"I resist altogether and reject the notion that we are two nations in that old barbarous sense which should make us rivals and should make us think it possible—possible, mind—that war should arise between us. They share in the glories of our past history, and I am greedy enough to share in the glories of their present, and in the still greater glories of their future. . . . Why should we not regard them as of our own race, as in all respects which bear upon the amities of the two peoples the same people as ourselves? What we have to do is this—to get rid of a certain foolish jealousy which we islanders have been taught to entertain with regard to almost every other people. We have continual rivalry in goods, but I should like to have something like a community of glory and of kinship."

Such books as Mr. Zincke's will help to bring about this most desirable state of feeling, so far as England is concerned; but it must be difficult for him and for Mr. Bright, and for the large class of Englishmen whom they represent, to understand how widely separated we are from them, and how completely an Englishman now is a foreigner to us. Mr. Zincke says that his nationality was never mistaken in the United States. But it is not in mere outside appearance that the two nations differ. The events of the last few years have given us a far more distinct sense than we ever before possessed of the radical difference between our political and social principles, and of the system of government and society which has grown out of them, from those of the Old World, including England. And this sense will be constantly deepened, and Englishmen will become more and more foreigners to us, until a revolution shall take place in their principles of political and social life, bringing them more into accordance and harmony with the doctrine and faith of America. Two nations, one founded on the rock of human equality, the other on the sands of human inequality, cannot be as one people in sympathy and heart. Happily for the future of the world, England seems to have entered on a course which ultimately will bring her to a common faith with America, a faith which shall bind the two nations together with cords stronger than those of trade or literature or common blood. Meanwhile, we may be friends.

The chief part of Mr. Zincke's book is occupied with the narrative of his tour. It is both entertaining and instructive. There is no better picture of scenery and life at the present time between St. Louis and the Rocky Mountains than that which he gives in the lively chapters devoted to his experiences in that region.

Altogether, without possessing any great literary merits, the book is an excellent one and quite worth reprinting. Its praise of America is stimulating. Think of an Englishman, a clergyman moreover, saying (with the remembrance, no doubt, of Steele's delightful phrase about the lovely Lady Elizabeth Hastings): "Why, to have seen Chicago is in itself an education."

The "Percheron" Horse. Translated from the French of Charles du Hüys. (New York: Orange Judd & Co.)—Most of us have observed the fine horses used by certain safe-makers and express companies of this city. We have certainly admired the splendid proportions and strength of those animals. Although they are not by any means of the pure type of the "Percheron," yet the one-fourth or one-eighth blood is impressed upon them in a very marked degree.

Although but few pure-blooded Percherons are to be found in this country, yet many, and indeed a larger proportion of the real draught horses in use with us, have, to a greater or less degree, a taint of the Percheron sire. Indeed, so powerful is the nature of the blood of this breed that for many generations—notwithstanding every variety of cross—certain characteristics of the original sire are still preserved. The Roman nose, large body, and stout, heavy legs, as seen in our most common dray-horses, are a proof of this fact.

A pure Percheron is almost invariably of a dappled iron-grey, but of course in the numerous crossings to which the race is subjected the color is frequently lost. Not alone as a draught-horse is the Percheron most valuable. The "light" variety is the diligence horse of France, and the omnibus horse of Paris. He is even a trotter of considerable speed and of more than ordinary endurance. We doubt not that this breed of the Percheron might be crossed with advantage with our more delicate-framed trotters. M. du Hüys gives tables of the speed of some of these horses. One mile and a quarter has been made by them in 3 min. 50 sec., and this on a track broken by several abrupt hills. Nine miles an hour is their ordinary gait, but when pushed they are equal to twelve, or even more. We speak now of what is called the "light Percheron." The draught-horse is equal to a loaded wagon of 5,000 pounds weight, while the English draught-horse is never taxed with more than 2,000 pounds. The Percheron is a fast walker under the heaviest loads, and maintains his gait with such regularity that he may be counted upon to make his time with the precision of a clock. We see in what is called the Canadian horse the lasting qualities of Percheron; for there is little doubt but that the Norman is the progenitor of this hardy, shaggy Canadian pony.

But few importations of the pure Percheron have been made into this country; but we trust the wonderful qualities of this admirable animal will in the future be more appreciated, and the get of the few stallions owned here more sought after. From this horse—the "light" and heavy—the entire stock of the country may receive benefit, both as roadsters or as draught-horses. We trust that this translation from M. du Hüys will be extensively circulated and read among the farmers and breeders of the country. It certainly merits it. The illustrations which accompany the book are admirably engraved and, what is more rare, carefully printed.

Christ in Song. Hymns of Immanuel. Selected from all Ages, with Notes. By Philip Schaff, D.D." (New York: Anson D. F. Randolph & Co. 1869.)—Perhaps hymns have, or ought to have, a standard of their own; nobody who has given much attention to the subject would care to say just how far they ought, and how far they ought not, to be tried simply by the same tests which are sufficient for the trying of other poetry. And if one reads the ordinary collections of them—whether made for church or for private use—with any eye to literary enjoyment, he will escape disappointment in proportion as his expectations are modest. Understanding this, one may find more pleasure in Dr. Schaff's book than he would perhaps anticipate. It is a handsome quarto of over 700 pages. So large a mass, gathered from within definite limits—it deals with the mere Christology of song—is of necessity restricted in its claim to pure poetic merit; that goes without saying. But one is not afflicted here by that one-sidedness which is apt to disfigure such compilations; we escape the Calvinistic prejudice in favor of Watts, the Methodist leaning to overmuch Wesley, the Anglican devotion to revived mediævalism, exclusive or nearly so, the ultra-Protestant ignorance of ancient and foreign material. The book represents fairly enough the average condition of hymnody to-day. It draws very largely, as it ought, from Latin, Greek, and German sources; and about half its contents come from that modern school of translators and revivers in which Dr. Neale and Miss Winkworth are the leading names; the least narrow school, and one of the most vigorous, that has yet arisen in English hymn-making. This praise of catholicity, which we are free to bestow here, is one of the best commendations that can be given to a hymn-book.

Dr. Schaff is better versed in German and ancient sacred poetry than in the native English; though, to be sure, the native English (at least, the strictly lyrical portion of it) is not very much to be versed in. He draws too largely from that nearly worthless book, Rogers's Lyra Britannica; and he makes one or two evident blunders. "Jesus, Thy Blood and Righteousness" (page 191) is by John Wesley; Charles probably knew no German. "Angels, roll the rock away!" (page 292) is not by Gibbons, but Thomas Scott, and utterly mangled. Any reliable hymn-book (of which sort, indeed, there are few) could have told these facts. So, too, half the "anonymous" pieces need not have been anonymous. But these cases are not numerous; in the names of authors, dates (when given), and text so far as we have examined, there is a general and quite uncommon correctness. The notes, too, give some interesting items, especially about the foreign hymns. There are some thirty originals, of tolerable merit; the best, most readers will say, is Professor Porter's rendering of Rückert's "Bethlehem and Golgotha," on page 93. And doubtless the best feature of the book is the introduction of some of Neale's exquisite translations from the Greek.

The Life of Prince Henry of Portugal, surnamed the Navigator, and its Results. By R. H. Major, F.S.A., F.R.S.L. (London: A. Ascher & Co.; New York: John Wiley & Son.)—The biographer's task is difficult when the life of his subject is marked by few interesting incidents, and is important much less for what it was in itself than for what it produced in and through others; and when, after all, the particulars of that life have to be verified by minute and laborious research. A writer of more imagination might perhaps have performed this service for Prince Henry in a manner more popular than Mr. Major's, yet not unlikely at the expense, if not of accuracy, at least of the completeness which is the merit of the present work. And indeed it is so much intended for the student and the learned in history that it can scarcely be recommended to the general reader, to whom it will certainly appear a mass of exhaustingly dry details, interspersed with no brilliant or even engrossing narrative, with absolutely no order of arrangement, and altogether heavy and uninviting.

The career of Prince Henry belongs to the first half of the fifteenth century, which was rendered illustrious before its close by the voyages of Cabral, Cadamosto, Columbus, Vasco da Gama, and Bartholomew Diaz, including the discovery of America and the circumnavigation of Africa. In these enterprises Portugal decidedly took the lead of Spain, and her acquisitions in this and the succeeding century, also one of great voyages, were largely due to the spirit and example of Prince Henry. Not that he was entitled to be called "the Navigator" for any remarkable voyage of his own; he attempted none. But by lending all his encouragement and resources to the fitting out of successive expeditions he greatly stimulated the passion for adventure, and conferred substantial benefits on the maritime industry of his country. His aims were very much greater than the accomplishment of his agents. He had an almost prophetic conviction that India could be reached by the southern extremity of Africa, and during his whole life he struggled to prove this with a method and confidence truly wonderful at that period. His first success was the discovery, or equally meritorious rediscovery, of Porto Santo and Madeira. In 1435 his cup-bearer passed some fifty leagues beyond Cape Bojador, as Mr. Major successfully maintains against the claims of the French to prior discoveries on the Guinea coast. His emissary Nuño Tristan passed Cape Blanco in 1441, and shortly afterwards Portugal reaped the advantages—such as that age regarded them—of a negro slave-trade. Mr. Major devotes an entire chapter to an effort to exculpate his hero from his connection with the origin and continuance of a traffic which has not yet received the moral condemnation of all Christendom, against which the first effective legal enactments were pronounced only in the present century, and which is still conducted by the Portuguese with the most disastrous consequences on the east coast of Africa. In view of these notorious facts, Mr. Major might perhaps have done better to say less in a doubtful matter, and to trust to the discriminating charity of his readers. It is, by the way, curious to notice in the Portuguese faces of the present day traces of the effect of the mingling of negro blood. Cadamosto reached and passed Cape Roxo in 1454, 1460, and falsely pretended to have discovered the Cape Verde Islands. That honor, as Mr. Major shows, is to be attributed to Diego Gomez, a Portuguese in the Prince's service, who made the last voyage under his auspices. Sierra Leone was the southern limit of the explorations which the Prince had achieved at his death in 1460.

Mr. Major has little to say by way of personal detail concerning Prince Henry, whose portrait forms the frontispiece of the work. He is described as "large of frame and brawny, and his naturally fair complexion had become dark by constant toil and exposure. Stout of heart and keen of intellect, he was extraordinarily ambitious of achieving great deeds. He was generous and constant, humble in prosperity, and obedient and reverent to his sovereign. He never failed to show due respect to every person, however humble, without lowering his own dignity. A foul or indelicate word was never known to issue from his lips." Such was the character of him whom Mr. Major styles "the originator of modern discovery"—words that might well serve to-day for the epitaph of the Navigator. But Mr. Major is a trifle too laudatory. No character of Henry is complete which fails to speak of the rashness and over-adventurousness into which his boldness not seldom degenerated, and omits to note that his keen and active intellect was frequently too active and not sufficiently under control. There was somewhat too much of the knight errant in his composition. However, he was more of a hero than most heroes of biographers.

A Hand-book of Natural Philosophy. By W. J. Rolfe and J. A. Gillet, Teachers in the Cambridge High School. (Boston: Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co. New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1868.)—We have before us a work intended as a text-book in natural philosophy, for the use of schools where this subject is taught in an elementary manner. The first part of the volume, which is one of a series prepared for the Cambridge (Mass.) High School, treats of the mechanics of solids, liquids, and gases. From the brief space allotted to this portion of the subject many things were necessarily omitted; but we were surprised to find no mention of "work" in its relation to mechanical forces, although its relation to heat is well shown in the concluding chapter of the book. A chapter is devoted to the six mechanical powers, each one being treated simply and clearly. This is followed by a description of the different motive powers; but the advantage of comparing one power with another is more than counterbalanced by the objection that the student is taught the construction of the steam-engine before he has learned the first laws of heat.

The second part of the book treats of sound, light, and heat. Sound and heat, as is stated in the preface, are taken mainly from the works of Tyndall. This gentleman's experiments are, therefore, given rather too fully, to the exclusion of more important matter. Thus, in the appendix several pages are devoted to his sensitive gas flames, while no mention is made of the more important experiment of Lissajous with tuning-forks. The experiments of Melde with vibrating cords are also omitted, although easily performed and attractive to students. We would call attention to the portions on the transmission of sound, the vibration of plates, and the Helmhotz theory of harmony, although the latter seems scarcely suited to an elementary work. In optics, the methods described for measuring the velocity and intensity of light are not those which give the best results in practice. Spectrum analysis is illustrated by a colored plate, which appears to be well executed considering the difficulty of the subject. The chapter on the eye is ably written, giving recent experiments on its accommodation to objects at different distances. The experiments of Regnault are treated fully, and illustrated by numerous woodcuts; and the same may be said of radiant heat, which, in fact, receives rather more than its share of space.

In conclusion, it is perhaps somewhat questionable whether this work will meet any real want of the community, as it is too difficult to put in the hands of young students, while from its almost entire omission of all mathematical formulæ it is equally unsuitable for a college course. To occupy some intermediate position, however, it is much superior to the common text-books, and, notwithstanding the omissions mentioned above, shows signs of careful preparation. Numerous problems are introduced, and each chapter is followed by a summary which will be very useful to the pupil in reviewing his studies.

Outlines of Indian Philology; with a Map showing the Distribution of Indian Languages. By John Beames, Bengal Civil Service, etc. Second edition, considerably enlarged and revised. (London: Trübner & Co.;

New York: J. Wiley & Son. 1868.)—Mr. Beames has prepared this little work with the laudable design of furnishing a practical guide to the linguistic explorer in India, and of inciting his fellow-officials to increased diligence in the task of collecting materials for the dialectic geography of the British Empire in Asia. It sketches the classification of the Indian languages, enumerates the known members of each class, and briefly explains their distribution. Then, in two or three chapters of a more theoretic character, it aims to give an idea of the general structural features of language, on which the current classification is based. A practically useful chapter of hints to explorers how to set about the task of observing and recording a new dialect, concludes the main body of the work; but in an appendix are added, by way of specimens of the resemblances and differences of languages, lists of numerals in most of the known tongues of India, nearly seventy in number. The book is well adapted to its purpose, and may be expected to exert a happy influence in furthering that scholarly activity of England's servants in India, civil and military, of which the fruits are already so abundant and valuable. Would that anything like the same diligence were shown by our own officials in the collection and working up of our aboriginal dialects; that men of ability and devotion, like Gibbs and Hayden, were less rare among us! Possibly a little manual of (American) Indian philology, somewhat after the model of this one, might be worth preparing by some competent scholar. The Smithsonian Institution would doubtless be glad to print in its octavo series such an auxiliary to so good a cause.

To criticise a work like this in detail, as if it were a scientific treatise, would not be fair. Its value to the general public is that of a succinct but careful conspectus of Indian languages, made doubly clear by a good dialect map. It lays no claim to novelty and originality in its theoretic chapters, which, as was to be expected, are its least satisfactory portion. Thus, a good part of the chapter "On Dialects" is taken up with a vain endeavor to define the difference between languages and dialects—a difference which, in strictness, does not exist, since every language is a dialect when considered in its relations to other languages, as joint heir with them from a common ancestor; and if it be thought practically useful to distinguish by these two names a nearer and remoter degree of relationship, we think it would puzzle Mr. Beames to set up a better criterion than that of mutual intelligibility, which he so pointedly rejects. There is nothing fundamentally wrong, perhaps, in his discussion of the subject, but it is full of half-truths and indistinct views.

The most notable error of the book is its adoption of the name "Turanian," and of the Bunsen-Müller classification represented by that unfortunate word. We are the more surprised at this, inasmuch as the author shows himself in general tolerably independent of Müller. To class Tibetan, Siamese, Burmese, and Tamil together as branches of one family by descent, is a proceeding altogether to be condemned and rejected. It is strange, too, that the Hindustani receives only a passing reference or two, being set down formally in no list of languages or dialects. If tongues of mongrel origin are to be ignored, what shall become of our own English?

Laugel's Problems of the Soul.—"Les Problèmes de l'Ame. Par Auguste Laugel." (Paris: Germer Baillière. 1868.)—"Before reasoning about the soul," says Linnæus, "we must give a definition of life." M. Laugel has followed this maxim in the order and method of his psychological investigations. In his work, "Les Problèmes de la Vie," published in 1867, he passed in review and attempted to solve some of the chief problems of biology which are now agitating the scientific world, such as the principle of life, the genesis of individuals, of species, and of man, the relation of physico-chemical elements to vital forces, spontaneous generation, and the doctrines of transmutation and progressive development originally suggested by Lamarck and subsequently verified and illustrated by Darwin. In the present volume he discusses various psychical phenomena and the manner of their manifestation through physical organs, the animal soul (l'âme de la bête), the brain and its "approaches," sleep, madness, science and psychology, the unity of man, instinct, the ideal, passion, freedom, and human destiny. All these topics are subjected to a thoroughly scientific treatment from a physiological rather than from a metaphysical point of view. In the very interesting chapter on "Les Approches du Cerveau" M. Laugel describes the functions performed by the neural centre of the medulla oblongata in regulating the movements of deglutition, in rendering locomotion and speech mechanically possible, in metamorphosing impressions into sensations, and in controlling the muscles of expression in the face and the tones of emotion in the voice. The ablation of the brain does not prevent the utterance of plaintive cries as the result of painful impressions, but if the annular protuberance in which the spinal marrow terminates be removed, the cry loses at once its pathetic quality and becomes merely an artificial, automatic noise. It is the mysterious office of this little living machine to elaborate and transform brute sounds into intelligent utterances. The slightest disturbance of structure in this "vital knot" produces as great a change in the functions of brain and mind as the minutest displacement in the bearings of the balance-wheel produces in the time-keeping function of a watch. A few molecules of alcohol may seriously derange the equilibrium of the cerebral organism without effecting any visible alteration of tissue, and yet how great the functional result! But although M. Laugel bases his psychology upon physiological facts rather than upon metaphysical definitions and so-called intuitional truths, he is not a materialist in the technical signification of the word. He recognizes in man an "ideal life parallel to his organic life." Ganglionic nerves, knobs at the base of the brain, vertebral bulbs, and tubercules quadrijumeaux form important parts of the mechanism through which the mind works; but, says Laugel, they neither exhaust nor explain it. The scalpel of the surgeon cannot lay bare the mysteries of the soul. Anatomy and physiology can throw no light upon that inner world where sensibility, thought, and will celebrate their mystic marriage. Between a knowledge of the cerebral organism and an analysis of intelligence and volition there is a great gulf fixed which positive science can never bridge. The ideal in the individual and in humanity has seldom had a more earnest advocate than is M. Laugel in the concluding chapters of his little book.

The Week.

THE nearest approach to a sensation at home, during the week, has been occasioned by the report of a conversation between Grant and some Congressmen, in which the reporter—the New York Tribune's—made the General brawl a little about his hostility to subsidies and extravagance, and the picture was still further heightened in color by representing the Congressmen on whom this denunciation was expended as having been stricken with astonishment and consternation. The truth was, we believe, that Grant did indicate, in his way, his hostility to subsidies and extravagance; but then his way is not the "reportorial" way, and it is doing him injustice to say or suppose that he has departed from his usual course—that is, saying little and thinking much. He has declined expressing himself for or against the repeal of the Tenure-of-Office Act, leaving the matter to the wisdom of Congress. To Jenckes's bill there is no doubt he is favorable. The Cabinet still continues a mystery. One late and reliable rumor is that Mr. Washburne will have a foreign mission, and another and less reliable one is that Mr. Hamilton Fish will have another mission; but it is doubtful whether any rumor on these subjects is worth repeating.

General Butler has written another letter on financial matters, in which he defends his attempt to tax the bondholders on a new ground, viz., that he wished to equalize taxation by extracting from the bondholders some equivalent for their exemption from State and municipal taxes. That is to say, the exemption from State and municipal taxes having been part of the bargain on which the money was borrowed, he wishes to enable the Government to evade the stipulation by getting a certain amount out of the creditors in another way, pretty much as if, having agreed not to tax pantaloons, it were to clap a heavy duty on buttons, needles, and thread. We call attention to this last effusion of the general's solely because his constituents, having increased his force and importance by re-electing him, these utterances of his continue and aggravate the difficulties in the way of contracting a loan at a new rate of interest. Nobody will lend money to the Government at any lower rate than at present as long as this kind of talk on the part of politicians is permitted; but for whatever amount of damage General Butler is doing, his constituents rather than he are now responsible.

Our readers may remember that we commented last February on the horrible love of war and devastation manifested by the Honorable Robert J. Walker, apropos of the Alaska purchase and the purchase of St. Thomas. The hesitation of the public about the annexation of fresh territory, and its slowness in seeing what we were to gain by paying in gold, which we had to borrow, as it turns out, for land which we were sure to have, in the ordinary course of events, whenever we could make a good use of it, threw him into a paroxysm of patriotic indignation. He wanted to have Mr. David A. Wells removed for opposing the Alaska folly, and then got into a kind of fit, like the ecstasy of a Welsh bard, over the possible advantages of St. Thomas to the Union. By holding it, America was to be able to "flank" the British fleet in the West Indies, and then, going on from conquest to conquest, to seize India and most of the foreign possessions of Great Britain, and was finally to arm "the whole population" of Ireland, overthrow the monarchy, and set up a republic in London. Many people asked at the time, more in sorrow than in anger, "What had got into the man?" The answer to this irreverent question has, alas! been rendered. It appears he was retained as "counsel"—"lobby agent" he scorned to be—by Baron Stoeckl to "put the Alaska business through," and got $26,000 for his services. The services consisted in writing letters and articles, like that from which we have quoted above, threatening to fill the world with slaughter, and pouring similar views into the ears of Congressmen. Part of the money he generously offered to Colonel Forney, in consideration of the fact that much of the thunder had rolled in the columns of that calm and judicial-minded paper, the Washington Chronicle. But here he found he had mistaken his man, for the colonel proudly refused the foreign gold, whereupon the generous and indefatigable Walker took it to the publisher of the paper, Colonel Forney's brother, who, to prevent waste, and to save further trouble, pocketed it. If anybody now is opposed to further extension of the "area of freedom," we advise him to keep out of Mr. Walker's way, for when angry he must be terrible.

There appears to be little question that all probability of an immediate settlement of the Alabama question is at an end. What are the exact terms of the "settlement" on which Mr. Johnson and Lord Stanley have agreed we are unable to say, but it is now generally understood that its nature is such that there is not the least chance that the Senate would confirm it, even if Mr. Seward were disposed to adopt it. A successful renewal of the negotiations by Mr. Johnson with the new Ministry is impossible, if for no other reason, for want of time. Mr. Johnson is well known to have only two months of office left, and Lord Clarendon will therefore hardly feel inclined to renew with him a very troublesome discussion. So the matter will now probably go off till his successor has made his appearance on the scene. Mr. Johnson's public glorifications of the work he was doing have probably done more to disgust people with "open diplomacy" than all the arguments the friends of secrecy have ever brought forward. The way in which he has allowed himself to be used as an electioneering tool in England is for Americans a tolerably humiliating spectacle. He was undoubtedly taken to Sheffield by the Tories to help them with the artisans at the then approaching election, and it is now said that Laird used him to help in procuring his re-election at Birkenhead by showing that he had not, after all, done so much mischief as people said he had, for there was the American minister hand-in-glove with him. The working-men have been prevented from giving him a banquet by the private representations made to the leaders by Americans in London, and by the publication in the Daily News, by the London correspondent of the New York Tribune, of extracts from various papers in this country showing the state of popular feeling here about his performances.

Mr. Johnson is another melancholy illustration of the defects of our system of diplomatic appointments. Some wise people ascribe his follies to his being born in Maryland, but they might just as well ascribe them to his height or weight. Had he been trained to his work, he never could have made such an exhibition of himself, no matter where he was born or what his sympathies. Men possess tact, judgment, and discretion in very unequal degrees and no school of politicians or moralists has a monopoly of them. Radical donkeys are fully as numerous as Conservative ones, and, on the whole, less docile; and what we want, therefore, is not the selection of public servants with reference to the place of their birth, or their political opinions, or social antecedents, but the training of public servants for their work, and the supply of an artificial judgment where a natural judgment does not exist, or is very feeble, or has failed to supply one, or has only supplied a very poor one. No man who had been long in diplomatic life, as any man who represents the United States at the court of a first-class power ought to be, could possibly do the things Mr. Johnson has done, even if he had traded in negroes, or edited De Bow's Review, or preached a pro-slavery Gospel. At present the selection of foreign ministers is a mere lottery, owing to the novelty of diplomatic work to those who undertake it, and the different ways in which the peculiar social influences of foreign capitals affect different men. For instance, it is hardly possible, even for his most intimate friends, to say beforehand how an American who had never lived abroad, or a man of any country who had never occupied such a position as to be worth captivating, would be affected by the blandishments of London women of rank, long trained in the art of cajoling men of distinction, and ever ready to use their social charms and their drawing-rooms to help their husband or their party. To such snares the best lawyer or most practical philanthropist might fall a victim. Whether he would or not nobody can tell till he has been tried; and one of the great objects of diplomatic training is to subject diplomatists to the necessary tests, and familiarize them with inevitable dangers before they reach the highest positions in the profession.

"The work of family dismemberment" is the suggestive name which a Chicago paper applies to the divorce business of the Chicago courts during the year 1868. This word, it adds, will probably suggest forebodings to "those eminently well-meaning persons, of a dyspeptic turn, who are predestinated to morbid views of things," and have not long been residents of Illinois; but the Chicago press seems not disposed to take too gloomy a view of the matter, and gives statistics with much cheerfulness of manner. 460, it appears, is the whole number of persons who have applied within twelve months for a dissolution of the marriage contract. This is 122 more than applied in 1867. Of these, 284 were women and 176 were men, and of the successful suitors also the women were in a majority of 113. The greatest number of actions was brought in the month of June, for what reason is not stated, and we cannot conjecture. October was another month of emancipation, and that for the reason, as the Chicago Times thinks, that so many persons were then making their domestic arrangements for the winter—which seems quite plausible. As regards the causes of these suits, the most fruitful seem to have been cruelty, inebriety, desertion, and adultery. In adultery the wives lead the husbands—the cases alleged and proved against the latter being 39, while those charged against the former were 41. In drunkenness and cruelty the men have the superiority. Perhaps these statistics mean little more than that women are scarce in the Western country. Their general drift seems to be in that direction. But they show, too, or we are mistaken, that here in America we are framing a theory of marriage which is in many respects decidedly new. It is almost to be wished that it could be completely framed and thoroughly put together before many more people come together and produce homeless children. On the old theory of marriage, 460 divorced persons in one year, in one town, afford, with their sons and daughters, a spectacle that may well set society thinking.

The "Erie War entered" on a new phase on Wednesday last, by the arrest of Mr. Bowles of the Springfield Republican, at the suit of Mr. James Fiske, Jr., one of the Erie barons, for an alleged libellous account of his origin and career, which had appeared in the Republican. Mr. Bowles was seized at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and hurried with a good deal of unnecessary violence to Ludlow Street Jail, where he was forced to pass the night, all efforts to procure his release on bail having proved fruitless, owing to Judge McCunn's refusal to wake up, and the Sheriff, who was found feasting with the plaintiff and others, having been got out of the way. All concerned were evidently determined to wreak on Mr. Bowles whatever vengeance might be contained in one night's confinement. In fact, Mr. Fiske in his reply to the criticisms that the affair has called forth from the press, while alleging that the time chosen for the arrest was the result of accident, does not deny that the taking of bail was purposely and maliciously evaded. The result of the matter has been to call forth for Mr. Bowles a prodigious amount of sympathy, and to throw some very unpleasant light on Mr. Fiske's relations with the officers of justice, as well as on his notions of decency and fair play. The article in the Republican was one parts of which at least it would have done well not to print, and which had really nothing to recommend it but its "spiciness;" but then few papers, if any, have done better service in waging war on the corruption and rascality by which both politics and commerce are being overwhelmed, and no honest man therefore is disposed to examine its faults with a microscope, or see Mr. Fiske assail it or its editor without indignation. If public opinion has any terrors for the barons, and it seems it has, they made a most absurd blunder when they clapped Mr. Bowles in jail, and locked Judge McCunn in unwakable slumbers, and spirited away that upright officer, Sheriff O'Brien, from the social board. Curiously enough, General Butler's nephew figures in the affair as an attorney, and has produced a scathing "card" in the van of the Fiske battle, and leaves little doubt as to the master who taught him his rhetoric. The combat deepens in every direction, and one good effect of the Bowles arrest is the increasing disposition of the press to make common cause against the "rings."

A banquet was given in this city on Tuesday evening to Professor Morse as a recognition of the sense entertained by his fellow-citizens of the great services he has rendered to telegraphy, and through telegraphy to civilization. The occasion was an interesting one, in that few greater inventors or discoverers have ever had their claims on the gratitude of the race as fully acknowledged in their lifetime as Professor Morse has had his, or have seen as earnest efforts made by those who have profited by their inventions to discharge the debt. He has been singularly fortunate, too, in finding his honors grow with his years, and in receiving this last expression of contemporary respect at a ripe but hale old age. His own contribution to the oratory of the dinner was very happy, and he rendered Congressmen a great service by reproducing a portion of the report of the debate in the House, in 1843, on the bill to appropriate $30,000 to test the merits of the Morse telegraph. It was cruel to recall it, and yet there is no present member of Congress who may not be the better for reading it. The bill was treated as a joke, and Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, proposed that one half the amount should be given for experiments in mesmerism or animal magnetism, a field in which he evidently thought exploration would be just as profitable as in Professor Morse's. But then, he was not half as severe as Mr. Houston, who bitingly suggested that "Millerism should also have some of the benefit of the appropriation." And then there was an exchange of pleasantries between the wag from Tennessee, Mr. Johnson, and another wag from North Carolina, Mr. Stanley, the latter offering to support the vote if Mr. Johnson were to be the subject of the mesmeric experiments, and Mr. Johnson pleasantly offering to submit if Mr. Stanley were to be the operator. Mr. Mason, of Ohio, objected to the mesmeric amendment as "not bonâ fide," or, in other words, as a bad joke; but the Speaker gravely ruled against the point of order, on the ground that there was no saying, without actual scientific experiment, whether the magnetism of mesmerism was not analogous to that which Professor Morse proposed to employ in his telegraph.

The New York Times has been making some very sensible remarks on the violence with which the Sun has been denouncing Reverdy Johnson's opinion, given at a dinner got up by the French Cable Company, as to the rights of States to grant the exclusive privilege of landing cables on their coast. The Sun is entitled to the credit of first calling attention to this new illustration of Mr. Johnson's folly, but no good can possibly come of accusing him of "being in the pay of the enemies of the country." No suspicion of corruption of this kind has, we believe, ever rested on Mr. Johnson; and it is a well-established rule of reasoning, that in trying to account for a phenomenon it is not allowable to resort to unnecessary hypotheses. An invitation to a public dinner has already proved sufficient to seduce Mr. Johnson into the most lamentable indiscretions, and we, therefore, may be satisfied with attributing this last one to the same cause. The French Cable Company have wanted from the outset a good legal opinion as to the right of a State to grant them the desired monopoly to enable them to raise their capital, and their original idea was, we believe, to get the Chief Justice's, but this was found to be impossible; so they have fallen back on Reverdy Johnson as a leading lawyer, an ex-senator, and United States Ambassador, and knowing his weakness, have asked him to dinner as the best mode of loosening his tongue, and have been only too successful. Of course it is a great scandal and humiliation to have the United States Minister publicly giving certificates to commercial adventurers, as in this case and the case of the "Texas Emigration and Steamship Company," to be used by them as a trade advertisement, but what is the use or the sense of saying he is bribed in money to do it? Why should they bribe him, and what is there in his legal views on the subject of State sovereignty to prove his rascality? Good or bad, they are held by about half the lawyers in the country. What the war has done for the doctrine of State sovereignty, as held by the Johnsons and Stephenses, is to render it harmless; its extinction could not be wrought by arms. Opinions are destroyed by refutation or by time only. It has to be remembered, too, that, inasmuch as Mr. Reverdy Johnson is the United States Minister unanimously nominated by the Senate, after forty years of political or forensic life, his character can hardly be blackened now without the rest of us catching a good deal of the soot. For his turning out silly, we are not responsible; but for his proving knavish, we certainly should be.

The settlement of the Greco-Turkish difficulty was confidently announced in most of the European capitals, either officially or semi-officially, during the past week, but the Cable telegrams show that the preparations for war continue on both sides, with many of the characteristics of a farce. Both of the belligerents know they will not be allowed to fight, and are consequently absolutely deaf to all proposals for accommodation. Turkey won't hear of a conference for the settlement of the difficulty, and Greece won't hear of concessions to Turkey. But the Greeks meanwhile have the best of the row, as their operations cost them nothing—there is not a cent in the treasury, not even enough to pay the King's travelling expenses to Germany—and if the fighting began to-morrow, it would be carried on, as the present agitation is, by volunteers—that is, Klephts by land and privateers by sea. Hobart Pasha would find himself in the midst of a swarm of mosquito-like craft which he could neither catch nor destroy. Commerce on the Mediterranean would be exposed to somewhat the same perils as in the days of the Algerine corsairs, for we may be sure plenty of cruisers would quit Greek ports with large and comprehensive views as to the nature of belligerent rights. There is an amusing story, illustrative of the confusion which prevails on this subject in the Greek mind, told of the dragoman of a foreign embassy at Athens,—an old and faithful servant—who, on learning that his son had been engaged in the highway robbery of two military officers of the same nationality as the ambassador, was plunged in grief, and exclaimed that "he had always told his son what would happen to him if he kept meddling in politics."

The present disturbance is bringing an old house about Lord Stanley's ears in England, inasmuch as it is ascribed, in part at least, to false hopes created by a speech of his delivered a few weeks ago at Lynn, in which he said, or seemed to say, that the desirableness of maintaining Turkey no longer occupied its old place in English policy. The fact seems to be, the painful, unvarnishable fact, that there is little or nothing to be perceived in Greek government or society, except the spread of education in the towns, to give it strong claims on foreign sympathy, in trying to extend the area of the kingdom. The finance and administration of justice and agriculture are in a worse condition than ever. Although Turkey is certainly going, it is by no means clear that Greece is coming. The rising race in Turkey just now are the Bulgarians—that is to say, they are the race which is growing in foreign estimation, whichever may get the upper hand ultimately.

The only help afforded by the Romans to the crusade which ended in Mentana was to blow up the barracks of the Zouaves and as many of the Zouaves themselves as happened to be inside. This exploit was not calculated to relieve the reproach of apathy already incurred by the citizens, suggesting as it did a prudence not far removed from cowardice. Two men, paid to do the business, were caught and brought to trial, and were executed last month, more than a year after the event, on the day when the Italian Parliament reassembled, and while Prince Humbert and his wife were passing through the Papal dominions. All attempts to persuade the Pope to commute the death-sentence to imprisonment for life were ineffectual; and the announcement that Monti and Tognetti were actually executed, with the aggravating circumstances just mentioned, produced an extraordinary sensation in Italy, and has revived the Roman question with increased bitterness. Public subscriptions have been opened in behalf of the families of the deceased, and it has been proposed in Parliament to vote them pensions from the national treasury. The aroused feeling has also been taken advantage of to carry in the Lower House a measure intended chiefly for Roman exiles, but which really makes citizens of any Italians who may register themselves for the purpose in any commune of their choosing. The obligations thus imposed upon the state are such as to render it liable to frequent collisions with neighboring powers—the Pope, of course, included—or else to a humiliating abstinence from interference or retaliation when the rights conferred by the new law are disregarded, as, in the case of revolutionary and other disorderly persons, they are sure to be.

The Spanish Provisional Government has made the terrible mistake of still further postponing the elections for the Constituent Cortes, although they have been partially held, the great towns having voted. The expression of the national will on the form of the future government being thus delayed, disorders naturally multiply. The distress amongst the working classes grows, the taxes fall off, riots and insurrections multiply, and the popular suspicion of Prim, Serrano, and Olozaga gains strength. The Government committed, in the earlier days of the revolution, two other blunders of equal magnitude; one was distributing arms amongst the populace of Madrid, the other was imitating Ledru Rollin's and Louis Blanc's craze of setting up "national workshops" in the capital. The workshops are still going, but the money to pay for the work is not forthcoming, and the workmen have arms in their hands, and the Government is afraid to discharge them; in other words, it has the wolf by the ears. It must be confessed that the signs just now lead one to fear that Spain is going to furnish us with a shabby imitation of the French farce of 1848.

From France there is no news of importance. Berryer's funeral has been the last sensation. He wrote a letter on his deathbed to Count Chambord (Henri V.), professing true allegiance to him as his lawful king, and praying fervently for his restoration to the throne. Oddly enough, he gave as one of his reasons for taking the last sacraments—in fact, the only reason—his desire to make this prayer more efficacious. The Moniteur took no notice of the funeral, and only one of the Paris judges, contrary to all precedent, attended it—M. Berryer having denounced them in the Corps Législatif as corrupt in the trial of political cases. A deputation from the English bar attended by invitation, and one member spoke at the grave. M. Paul de Cassagnac, writing a few days before Berryer's death of his subscription to Baudin's monument, abused him soundly as a vile and degraded old man, and expressed his regret that it was not permissible to kill off such old fellows when they had outlived their usefulness. The position occupied by this bravo is one of the saddest illustrations of the character of the Imperial régime. The approaching elections are still filling the Government with apprehensions, but the janissaries all say there is to be no change in policy, no matter what the result may be.

THE TENURE-OF-OFFICE ACT.

General Butler's friends are announcing with much zeal that he is about to press his bill for the repeal of the Tenure-of-Office Act through the House as soon as Congress meets again, with the view, the Springfield Republican suggests, of establishing a thoroughly cordial understanding with General Grant before the distribution of offices begins under the new administration. Those who paid attention to the canvass in the Fifth Massachusetts District will remember that the only charge or threat or prediction from his opponents which seemed to throw him off his guard, was a hint—we forget from what quarter—that, even if elected, Grant would pay no attention to his wishes in the appointments to office. This seemed to exasperate him a good deal, and caused him to forget for a moment the rôle of admirer of Grant in which he was then figuring, and to exclaim that if Grant attempted anything o the kind, he (Butler) would give him plenty to do, or words to that effect—meaning that Grant would find in him what is popularly called "a troublesome customer." The inference the Republican therefore draws is, that the new bill is due to General Butler's fear that Grant may possibly cherish sinister designs with regard to the Butler share of the spoils, and the latter therefore wishes to avoid an open row by establishing, before the division begins, a claim on the new President's gratitude.

As a piece of speculative enquiry, there is much in this examination of General Butler's motives to command our respect, but we doubt the utility of examining his motives for acts in themselves good. He does so many things in themselves bad, that the analysis of his mental and moral constitution may safely be reserved for occasions on which these come under discussion. For ourselves, we are quite willing to take any active support he gives to useful legislation—and until now he can hardly be said to have given any whatever—at its full value, and to be only too thankful that he is not in mischief. If his zeal about the repeal of the Tenure-of-Office Act were only sufficient to prevent his damaging the public credit by writing letters about taxing the bonds—a kind of work in which he has been vigorously engaged during the last week or two—it would delight us, even if the measure were not in itself as useful as we believe it to be.

It is not difficult to defend the Tenure-of-Office Act, even if its results have not proved as valuable as was expected, or even if it be now proved worthless or mischievous as a permanent arrangement. In the earlier days of Mr. Johnson's quarrel with Congress, in 1866, the most prominent of his hallucinations undoubtedly was his belief that he was going to be the founder of a new party, which was to back him up in excluding Congress from all share in the work of reconstruction, and he and his friends made no secret of his intention to use, or rather abuse, the appointing power in aid of this scheme. With the enormous amount of patronage which has been at the disposal of the President since the outbreak of the war, it was easy to see that even if he could not make it available for the defeat of Congress at the elections, he could use it so as to create a false impression everywhere, and especially at the South, of his real strength, and the success or failure of reconstruction depended largely on the Southern comprehension of the real state of feeling at the North, and of the exact extent of the President's power. Even, therefore, if Congress was not shocked by the spectacle of the conversion of the civil servants of the Government into electioneering tools,—which it certainly was not, for no spectacle was more familiar,—and even if it had been fully aware, as most members, we feel sure, were, that no such restriction of the President's powers and responsibilities could be justified as a permanent enactment—its depriving Mr. Johnson of the authority to dismiss, with a view simply to the existing emergency, was as natural and proper as any other step in the reconstruction process. He and his friends would doubtless have held strong ground, if he had been able, in defending his authority against Congressional encroachment, to appear as the champion of reform, or as the advocate of the withdrawal of the civil service from the arena of party politics altogether. But he was not able to do anything of the kind. He could not pretend that the appointments or dismissals made by him without Congressional interference would be or were any better than those in which Congress meddled, or that the nation would lose anything as regarded the purity and efficiency of the administration by having his responsibility lessened.

The act undoubtedly had the effect of disabusing the President and his supporters of the idea that he was either a formidable political enemy or a valuable political friend, and of putting an end to all hope in any quarter of his being able to impede seriously the work of reconstruction. But here its usefulness ended. In so far as it helped to precipitate impeachment, it was a calamity. It has done nothing to improve the public service. The President, if he had had full swing, could not have made it worse than it is at this moment. The Senate, if it had had none of the power of interference the act has given it, could not have done less for reform than it has done since the act was passed. In fact, whatever change has occurred in the administrative system since the act was passed has been for the worse and not for the better, and the difficulty of reform has been increased because it is more difficult than ever to fix the responsibility of abuses. To whom we owe the swarm of rascals who figure in the dissolving views offered to the public by the various "rings," nobody can tell. Mr. Johnson says it is the Senate, and the Senate says it is Mr. Johnson. All the public can tell is that both are concerned in it. But one thing is certain, and that is, that the repeal, "pure and simple," of the Tenure-of-Office Act will, as a measure of reform, prove illusory unless accompanied by the passage of the Civil Service bill; and if General Butler wants to associate his name with something useful, let him rally to the support of this also. It would be difficult for us, without seeming extravagant, to express all the confidence we feel in General Grant's character and ability, but he would have to be more than mortal if he could make head against the corruption which now prevails in Washington without the aid of a radical change in the system. The mere restoration of the authority the President enjoyed before the passage of the Tenure-of-Office Act, though a step in the right direction, would enable him to accomplish little or nothing. The various "rings" have during the last three or four years gained such enormous strength that unless the President's legal authority—that is, legal power of exercising his discretion—is surrounded by stronger barriers than his personal character, however good or wise or able he may be, can supply, he must, sooner or later, succumb or be outwitted. The matter is all the more important because, with Grant in the Presidential chair untrammelled by pledges, and with a great reputation and unquestioned claims on the national gratitude at his back, a chance of choosing between the upward and the downward road in the conduct of the Government is offered us which may not come again in the lifetime of any of those who elected him, or come at all till reform would have to be purchased by great structural changes in the Government.

THE INDIAN DIFFICULTY.

The effort which we are now witnessing in Congress to transfer the management of Indian affairs to the War Department, combined with the long continuance of the Indian hostilities on the Plains, and the news of Custer's recent bloody encounter with the unfortunate "Black Kettle" and his tribe, is fixing a larger amount of public attention on Indian affairs than they have succeeded in securing for several years. The "Indian Ring," i.e., the jobbers who make money by the distribution of Indian supplies and annuities, are naturally offering all the opposition in their power to a measure which would take the Indians out of the political arena and rob political life of the prizes known as Indian agencies. Moreover, a very large number of humane people, who are as firm foes of corruption as are to be found, join in this opposition, from the feeling that military dealings with the Indians would, as the natural result of the military temper and military way of viewing the work of government, be characterized by cruelty and brutality; and they are strengthened in their opposition by such incidents as the Chivington massacre, about the atrocity of which there is no doubt, and by the more recent Hancock operations at Pawnee Fork in 1867, and Custer's attack on "Black Kettle" a fortnight ago, both of which the partisans of the Indian Bureau are eagerly representing as unprovoked onslaughts on unoffending and even meritorious savages. The Bureau party has been still further reinforced by the appearance in the field, during the past week, of Colonel Wynkoop, who has for some time acted as agent of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, and whose character for probity and humanity stands very high, but who has been so disgusted by the manner in which the operations of the troops against the Indians are conducted, that he has resigned his position in despair, and is now making speeches on Indian reform, which are not likely to help the transfer of Indian management to the War Department. One reason he gives for quitting his post is, that on more than one occasion, when he had brought Indians together to treat of peace, or to receive some peaceful communication from him, the troops have seized the opportunity to attack them, thus not only defeating his object, but destroying his credit in the eyes of the Indians, by inspiring them with the belief that he had acted as a decoy to bring them within reach of their enemy. But that his testimony is probably in some respects inaccurate, owing to his strong feeling of sympathy with the Indians, may be inferred from the fact that one of his charges against General Hancock, of having wantonly burnt an Indian village, has been successfully disposed of by that officer. General Hancock found the village deserted, and found that some of the tribe that owned it were committing murders and outrages, and yet kept strict guard over it for five days, while in vain sending invitations to the owners to come back, and did not burn it down till his efforts had failed, and he had unquestionable testimony as to the nature of the work in which they were engaged.

It will be very difficult to convince the public, by any amount of denunciation of the army, that the Indians would not gain by the abolition of the Bureau and the transfer of its duties to the War Department; first, because the public is satisfied that the Bureau is a sink of corruption; and, secondly, because it is convinced that, on the whole, the military service is honest. If, as Colonel Wynkoop and everybody else seem to think, the first requisite in dealing with the Indians be honesty and fairness, there is not the least probability that these can be secured through the Bureau, in the present state of the civil service; and if we were to acknowledge that nothing would be gained by handing over its business to the army, we should surrender one of the strongest arguments for Mr. Jenckes's Civil Service Bill, inasmuch as we should admit that trained officials, holding office during good behavior, and promoted for merit or long service, were no more likely to be faithful and efficient than the tag-rag-and-bobtail who are gathered up at the beginning of every Presidential term and thrust into office, in reward for stump-speaking or bill-sticking. We should admit, too, what would be still more unreasonable, that the record of the army counted for nothing in deciding a question of this kind, and that the extraordinary purity and integrity in the transaction of public business, and the handling of public money, displayed by several generations of military officers, gave no ground for believing that they might be more safely trusted to take care of the pecuniary interests of wards of the nation than the class of adventurers who now fill the great majority of the offices in the civil service. Of course it would be absurd, as well as unjust, to say that there are no honest Indian agents; but what knaves some of them are, and what a terrible thing it is to have knaves entrusted with the expenditure of large sums of money, and the exercise of a sort of sovereignty over a class like the Indians—too ignorant to know when they are cheated, or to avail themselves of any system of checks, however well contrived—those who are familiar with Indian affairs know only too well. Of course the army, too, will have its faults in managing Indian affairs. It will probably be too fond of coercion, and over-ready to fight rather than to persuade; but these are faults comparatively easy to detect and cure. Massacres cannot be committed in secret, and it must be remembered that soldiers are under a kind of restraint in dealing with Indians of which civilians know nothing, inasmuch as the former "pay with their persons" for any defects in policy toward the tribes, while the Indian agents are "reporting" in Washington. Such expeditions as Custer's after "Black Kettle" are not those which the most enthusiastic soldier undertakes for pleasure.

In discussing Indian affairs, too, as in discussing all other human affairs, the facts of life must be taken into consideration; in other words, all plans of reform must be based on things as they are, and not on things as they ought to be. It is useless to tell us that all would go well if the whites would not provoke the Indians, and that nearly all Indian wars are due to acts of violence or perfidy on the part of the former. The fact is—and it is a fact which cannot be evaded or removed or modified—that the white population comes in contact with the Indians along a frontier line running through nearly twenty degrees of latitude, and that the white men along that line are, and in the present or any probable state of American society must continue to be, as long as there is any wilderness between this and the Pacific Ocean, more or less lawless in their habits, quick with their weapons, unscrupulous in their dealings, bitterly prejudiced against the Indians, and but very slenderly influenced by moral or religious ideas. This is the experience of everybody who lives amongst them; and is it not almost childish to go on year after year whining over their treatment of the Indians, as if better things were to be expected of them, or as if the brutality and recklessness of frontiersmen were something new and unlooked for, that could be abolished by declamation? In the Indian problem with which we have to deal, the white population of the Plains as it is, and not as we could wish it to be, is one of the leading elements; the Indians as they are, is another; and it is useless as well as silly for men calling themselves politicians to keep grumbling over their materials, and wishing they were something else, or would mix in different proportions. What should we think of a chemist who came to us every now and then to tell us of the splendid things he could accomplish if hydrogen were only not needed to produce water, or if alkalies did not neutralize acids?

In talking of the Indians, it will be well, in their interest, for their friends not to draw too largely on the credulity of the public. We are not prepared to deny the Indian the possession of many good qualities; but it cannot be denied, also, that he is a savage, and possesses all the characteristics covered by that terrible word, and has shown himself, ever since history dawned on him, cruel and treacherous, filthy and dishonest; and the common run of men of any European race will not, no matter what you may say, respect a person or breed notorious for these qualities. Moreover, no number of testimonials as to kindness, simplicity, or inoffensiveness will induce people to believe that a man who, if you quarrel with him, will certainly collect some of his friends, ravish your wife, tomahawk your children, burn your house, disembowel you, or hang you by the heels over a brisk fire, is really a good fellow; and yet there is no Indian who does not do these things if you go to "war" with him. A good deal of a man's character is shown in his mode of avenging his injuries, and the Indian's mode is fiendish, according to the popular idea of fiends; therefore we are satisfied that all attempts at whitewashing him, in the teeth of the popular knowledge of his character and habits, simply make it more difficult to improve his condition.

His reformation and salvation are plainly—the experience of two hundred years shows it—impossible, except through civilization; and civilization means the dissolution of the tribal organization, which is simply a clumsy machine for the perpetuation of barbarism; the substitution of settled abodes for camps, of agriculture for hunting, of decent clothes for paint and skins of beasts, the supply of schools and teachers, the protection of the common law for each individual, and the responsibility of each individual to the courts. The present mode of making the Indians respect life and property by means of "treaties of peace" between one of the great powers of the world and a few hundred naked savages, is one of the greatest farces of the age. The fostering of habits of idleness, improvidence, and mendicancy, by the annual distribution of presents and annuities, is something worse than a farce, and so is our general failure to do anything whatever to start the Indians on the path of progress. Keeping savages plentifully supplied with "hunting-grounds," or, in other words, land enough for the continuance of the most wretched and precarious form of human existence, is an odd sort of kindness for a civilized people possessed of boundless resources to plume itself on. The reform of the Indian Bureau should therer fore go further than the transfer of its powers and duties to othehands. What is wanted is a Bureau of Civilization, with force enough at its disposal to gather in the remnants of the tribes on the Plains and settle them somewhere on farms, and teach them to live by labor.

Perhaps even under this treatment the Indians could not be saved; but if they cannot bear civilization, it will at least kill them decently, and be a humane substitute for the revolver, the small-pox, and the whiskey-bottle.

PUBLIC MEETINGS IN FRANCE.

Amongst the recent concessions of the Imperialists to the French Liberals is the right of holding meetings for discussion of political or other topics. Under the law as it previously existed, all assemblages of more than twenty persons, without a special authorization of the police, were forbidden; and the prohibition was enforced with such rigor that the English workmen who visited the Exposition in 1862 were arrested, to their great astonishment, for assembling at a rendezvous in the street on coming from their various lodgings, in the morning, preparatory to the day's sight-seeing. Moreover, the co-operative associations have, ever since the coup d'état, been seriously embarrassed by the necessity of obtaining a permit for meetings of the members for the mere transaction of corporate business.

It must not be supposed, however, that this régime was a serious shock to French sensibilities or a serious inroad on French political habits. Agitation by public meeting, as known here and in England, has really never been known in France. Such formal expressions of public opinion as were witnessed before the Revolution—and they were both few and far between—came from official bodies, like the States-General, or the Parliaments as the judiciary was called. Since the Revolution, large public dinners have been the nearest approach made to public meetings. About public meetings as they are now known in America and England—that is, assemblages composed of all sorts of people, choosing their own chairmen, selecting their own subjects of discussion, and discussing them in their own way—or about the mode of conducting such meetings, or, in fact, about the forms of procedure in deliberative bodies, Frenchmen of the old régime knew nothing whatever. Dumont tells of an amusing incident, illustrative of the strangeness of the whole machinery of free government to the French people, which occurred on his journey to Paris in 1789, with M. Duroverai. While breakfasting on the road at Montreuil-sur-Mer, they found that the people of the place had been for three days making vain attempts to elect deputies; but never having heard of such things as presidents, or chairmen, or secretaries, or voting tickets, made no progress, and passed the time in wrangling and tumult. Dumont and his friend called for pen, ink, and paper, and, greatly to their own amusement, drafted a code of rules for the conduct of an election, based on English practice, and presented it to the landlord of the inn, who, highly delighted, had it voted on by his fellow-citizens, and the election was completed forthwith with great order, and proved to be the first in the kingdom, and the fame of it so spread that the town was for some weeks covered with glory. In the early and best days of the National Assembly, there was similar helplessness and confusion. Romilly, then a young man, wrote a short and admirable treatise on the rules of parliamentary procedure, as in use in the English Parliament, and indicated in it the manner of putting the question, regulating debate, taking the vote, and so on, and Dumont translated it. Mirabeau presented it to the Assembly, and earnestly urged the framing of a code of regulations based on it, but the proposal was rejected with scorn and indignation—cries of "Nothing English—we want nothing English!" coming from all parts of the room. So the disorder continued, increasing every week, until at last the most boisterous, brazen-lunged, unscrupulous, and ignorant fairly got the upper hand, and, after having silenced their opponents, cut off their heads. The nearest approach to an orderly debate was obtained by choosing the orators on each side beforehand, as in a debating club, and giving each of them time to prepare an essay, which, when the day came, he read aloud, and which was usually preposterously long, and, as might have been expected, "exhaustive;" but no orator replied, or thought of replying, to any other. One need hardly fear to say that the adoption and observance from the outset of a good set of rules of procedure might have given the French Revolution a different turn, and made it a peaceful triumph of liberal ideas in legislation, instead of the triumph of anarchy, ending in military despotism.

In England, even, the use of public meetings as a means of "agitation"—that is, of expressing discontent, and seeking changes in legislation—was not known till the middle of the last century; but ages of parliamentary experience and a large degree of local self-government had made the people perfectly familiar with the forms to be observed in debate. The House of Commons was, in fact, a standing and conspicuous "meeting," which, by great care and long experience, had hit the best mode of transacting business and eliciting expressions of opinion in large promiscuous assemblies. It served, too, as a model to the colonies in the organization and conduct of their own political business; and the consequence is that the huge and heterogeneous body known as the "Anglo-Saxon race" now possesses an amount of skill in the parliamentary art which seems wonderful to any continental Europeans except Hungarians, who are also, and for the same reason, very able tacticians.

The original idea of the meeting, however, was based on the supposition that there were amongst those who attended it two sets of opinions; that the object of the meeting was to debate them, and find out by a vote which of them had the greater number of supporters. Parliamentary rules are all framed with reference to this hypothesis, and have, in fact, for their main object the securing of a fair hearing for both sides, and the close of the discussion by an orderly decision. But as the newspapers grew in power and circulation, meetings lost this character of debating clubs, and came to be simply a means of expressing the opinions of one side and exciting enthusiasm amongst persons of one way of thinking. He has to be a bold man who now moves a contradictory amendment to a resolution in an American or English political meeting in our day. In fact, so completely has the fundamental idea been forgotten, that in nine cases out of ten he would run some risk of being handed over to a policeman as a disturber.

In France, the recent change in the law can hardly be said to concede the right of meeting in the broad sense of the term. It concedes, however, the right of meeting on the invitation of some one person, addressed to each individual, and this invitation must be shown to a policeman at the door, the object being to give the affair as far as possible the air of a private gathering. Several meetings of considerable size have, however, been held under these restrictions in Paris, at which the most important social and political problems have been discussed with the utmost freedom, and the reports of them—or rather summaries of reports—which we have seen, throw some curious light on the condition of the French mind with regard to the working of political machinery. They show, in the first place—what, however, we knew already from the practice of the French legislative bodies ever since 1815—that Frenchmen have never adopted, or even got hold of, the American or English theory of the character of the presiding officer of a deliberative assembly; that is, instead of looking on him as a servant of the meeting, or, at most, as an arbitrator bound by strict rules, they look on him as a kind of censor, sitting not to decide questions of procedure simply, but to decide who is getting the best of the argument, and whose arguments are sound or judicious, and whose opinions are respectable or the reverse—very much like a law professor presiding over a students' moot court. The presiding officer of a French legislature does not wait for somebody "to rise to order" before he interrupts a speaker. He listens closely himself, admonishes the orator whenever he thinks it necessary, calls his attention to his faults, whether of matter or manner, to the dangerous tendency of his opinions, and the fallaciousness of his arguments, and, in fact, plays the part of an officer of the government, whose duty it is to protect society against the license of the tongue—and this sort of criticism hardly any orator, however eminent, escapes. It is said that the late M. Berryer was the only member of the opposition in the Corps Législatif whom the president never ventured to interrupt; because it was well known that, should anything of the kind have been attempted, he would have returned to his seat with an expression of face, a shrug of the shoulders and a twirling of his eye-glass against which no president felt able to bear up.

In the second place, they show what a strong hold on the French mind is still retained by the idea with which many of our "come-outers" in this country have made us familiar, that the object of public speaking is not so much to win others over to the orator's way of thinking as to unburden his own soul; in other words, that when a man appears on the platform, it is rather as a prophet, with a message for an adulterous generation which they will listen to if they are wise, but their reception of which is no concern of his, than as a debater whose highest object is to convince his fellow-men. The effect of this way of looking at the matter is to turn French meetings into what some of our Radical brethren would call "a free platform"—that is, a place to which all sorts of people go, not to debate any particular question, but to say their say on all subjects which, in their opinion, are connected with the welfare of humanity. The general result, as might be expected, is that wisdom does not abound in these gatherings, and in its place there is much of what Carlyle calls "temporary menacings and deliriums." In some of the recent meetings in Paris—in spite of the presence of the Commissary of Police, who attended to look after the interests of society and frequently called the orators to order, and in spite of the efforts of sensible men, who got them up in order to assist in the reawakening of political life—the discussions took the widest possible range; and the very foundations of society—property and the family—were amongst the earliest objects of question. At one at which M. Horn, the distinguished political economist, presided, the institution of marriage was assailed with great fierceness, and the superior advantages of concubinage preached with vigor; but after a good deal of talk, in which the friends of concubinage had everything their own way, when the vote was taken it was found that their arguments had produced no effect, or else an effect the reverse of what was intended, as the majority against their views was overwhelming. In fact, if one were to judge of the state of the political education of the French people from what has passed at the meetings—which, we are satisfied, would be unfair—one could hardly help feeling that France has still a long, thorny road to travel before reaching the pleasant fields of orderly self-government.

THE PRESIDENCY OF HARVARD COLLEGE.

The interregnum at Harvard College occasioned by Dr. Hill's resignation of the presidency, affords an opportunity for some suggestions upon a topic of national importance. We speak deliberately in saying this. The welfare of an institution like Harvard College is, when properly regarded, a matter not merely of local but of national interest. It concerns not only the hundreds of students who yearly seek to obtain, in one or another of its departments, the best portion of their preparatory education; not only Cambridge, which, quâ Cambridge, exists only in and through its time-honored university; not only Boston, and indeed all Massachusetts, where it exerts a civilizing influence upon society that is noticeable by all, though duly estimated but by few; but also the whole United States as a nation, which needs nothing so much as one or two marked centres of culture; in brief, it nearly concerns every one that Harvard College should be as prosperous and well-governed and should pursue a policy as progressive and enlightened as possible.

We are aware that Harvard is not the only valuable college in the country, and that our boys might still get well educated if Cambridge were to become a deserted village or a hiding-place for antiquaries and bibliomaniacs. Nor when we insist upon the little-understood importance of Harvard as a centre of culture for the whole country, do we insist upon it in an exclusive spirit. We can hardly have too many bright points from which knowledge may be diffused, provided they shine with a genuine and not a meretricious light—provided they really impart to society something of a thoroughgoing, scholarlike spirit, and do not merely cater to crude popular fancies as to what is worth knowing and what is "useful." We shall therefore hail the time—if we live to see it—when Cambridge, New Haven, Ithaca, Ann Arbor, and Columbia, here in New York, shall be to this country what Tübingen, Jena, and the rest are, or have been, to Germany, and what Oxford and Cambridge, in spite of their shortcomings, are to England. At present it must be acknowledged that none of our universities adequately fulfil these high social functions. To give them by degrees, and as rapidly as possible, the means of thus legitimately extending their influence, should be one of the objects distinctly kept in view in each important act of university legislation. And if, meanwhile, we confine our remarks to Harvard, it is both because that is the only college of which the present writer has direct personal knowledge, and because the present crisis there renders its case, for the time being, of paramount importance.

The aberrations which it is the office of every university, as far as possible, to correct, and of which Harvard should strive to keep clear, are, among others, Philistinism, Toryism, Radicalism, and Sectarianism. By Philistinism, we mean the group of opinions and resulting policy founded upon the genuine American idea of dollar-hunting. We are far from looking without pleasure and satisfaction upon this great industrial civilization which our country is developing, and which will no doubt form the basis of culture in the future, even if it takes another renaissance to bring about the result. But at present the hurry and turmoil of a transition stage of development affect, and are liable to affect injuriously, all our theories of education and of living. There is a disposition to throw overboard whatever is not available from a practical (and by this is always meant a money-getting) point of view. Colleges are founded in conformity to this idea; and into all projects of university reform, as commonly agitated, this idea largely enters. Young men, it is thought, should be required to learn only those things which will be "of use" (for getting money) in after-life. And a university, it is supposed, should become, as nearly as possible, an aggregation of professional schools and "preparatory" courses. This view of the functions of a university opens questions altogether too large to be argued here. We may content ourselves with registering our own opinion, that money-making is not, even in these ages of Philistinism, the worthiest end of life, any more than war-making, in the mediæval ages of barbarism, was the worthiest end. The culture of the whole individual is what a university should aim at. And while new colleges are from time to time being founded in more or less strict accordance with the present American theory, it is desirable that Harvard should keep itself from getting drawn along too rapidly with the general current. Instead of making a Polytechnic Institute of itself, or attempting to compete with other colleges which are perhaps little more, it should strive to make itself yet more distinctly what it has been in times past—a nucleus about which all desirous of obtaining a complete and rounded culture might aggregate. In such a course, we are convinced, lies its only hope of maintaining its traditional prestige. A Boston merchant, therefore, or business man of any sort, no matter how much he may have the interests of the college at heart, is hardly the kind of person needed just now for president. We want a man who can appreciate and do justice to the "great American idea," without having been himself too long or too exclusively under its influence. We want a man of solid scholarship and extensive culture, who is at the same time possessed of that sterling good sense, that happiest kind of practical ability which consists in habitually seeking, as by an instinctive wisdom, the most effective attainable means of compassing any given end. It is by no means essential that such a person should have been "a man of business." If he be sought among those who are now, or have lately been, concerned in the government of the college or the instruction of the students, he will doubtless be found to be one who—chief among many worthy compeers—has by the very strength of his character most uniformly succeeded in winning the esteem and confidence of his classes, while awakening in them some perception of what true culture is, and some desire to submit to its influences.

Such a candidate for the headship of the university, if such can be found, will not be likely to err seriously either in the direction of Toryism or in that of Radicalism. Pulling up by the roots is not always the best way of removing ancient obstacles from the path of progress. Old abuses and anomalies are much like worm-eaten woodbines: in trying to dig them up, you must excavate a long distance, and will be pretty likely to loosen the foothold of some sound and valuable plant. Better to abstain from artificial manuring, or from any palliative scratching about the roots, and let the old vine die of natural inanition. The world is not governed on radical principles. Nature is no radical; she does not rest, but neither does she haste; and, as it has been well said, she is content to let a hundred generations live and die while picture-writing grows into printing. Let us bear this in mind when we reflect upon the sort of policy to which we are willing to see the university committed. Let it be borne in mind that the mere mania for improvement, even in this anti-conservative time and country, is apt to excite a justifiable distrust; and let us be slow in counselling a too reckless overthrow of a long-tried system at Harvard, in conformity with what a superficial view may regard as the "demands of the age."

But as nearly as we can make out, the college appears at present to be in more imminent peril from toryism than from any too eager iconoclastic spirit. By toryism we do not mean intelligent conservatism. We mean by it the disposition to tamper with nature—to manure and prop up the old tree, after its heart has rotted away and its sap dried up. If Nature is no radical, she is certainly no tory; when the organism is once dead, she does not galvanize it into a semblance of new life. Only when toryism has too long coddled a sickly state of things, she sometimes has to let loose her barbarians and sans-culottes to shorten its miseries. Now, a tory president of Harvard—a man, perhaps, who was graduated fifty years ago, and who must have inevitably outlived the receptive and appreciative period of life long before any of the emergencies which now beset a college administration could have taken their rise, who, therefore, can have no lively sympathy with the needs of the present time, and will be likely to oppose every reformatory measure, not because it is too sweeping or too radical, but simply because it expresses the opinions of an age that has outlived him—such a Tory president, we say, would be the greatest evil with which Harvard could now be afflicted. Consider the enormous power for evil which such a president would have. For perhaps a dozen years to come, either all appointments of subordinate officers will be virtually controlled by him, or in such appointments he will at least have a share by no means insignificant. And especially will this apply to the appointment of tutors, proctors, and assistant professors—those officers, in short, who come into most direct contact with the students, and by whom they are most immediately influenced for good or evil. As often as a vacancy occurs, depend upon it a Tory president will fill the place with some promising young Tory, some unexceptionable, wooden young person who never "cuts prayers," and will in good time develop into a sapless King-Log of a professor. Such a prospect, considered merely as a possibility, is, for a true and devoted lover of the University, unutterably dreary.

Finally, the college should—perhaps above all things—avoid sectarianism. At the present day, when clergymen are no longer the recognized teachers of the community—and when, in fact, their very vocation is apt to exclude them from the knowledge of the best part of that science which the community needs—there is really no reason whatever why a college should represent any religious sect in particular. The end for which a college exists is to stimulate culture, to train the faculties of youth—not to encourage or propagate a set of religious dogmas. Colleges which attempt this latter work are, by their very nature and inclinations, provincial. Metropolitan colleges—true universities which aim to make themselves centres of culture for a country which prescribes no special form of belief for its citizens—cannot afford to circumscribe their sphere of usefulness in any such way. We are glad to be able to say that Harvard is not, and for a good while has not been, in reality sectarian. We congratulate her upon possessing two theological schools, teaching doctrines diametrically opposed to each other. And we congratulate her still more heartily upon the fact that, for any influence which either of these schools may exercise upon her general policy, they might as well be Thibetan monasteries, or might cease to exist altogether, and the difference would hardly be noticed. The general tone of thinking at Harvard is, it must be admitted, very catholic and very tolerant. Nevertheless, Harvard has the reputation, among all those who know her only by hearsay, of being a "Unitarian college." Unitarians like to think so, for they like to believe that the biggest college is on their side. Trinitarians like to proclaim that it is so, in order that they may frighten the lay orthodox into entrusting their sons to some provincial fold where sound doctrine constitutes a formidable proportion of the pabulum administered. There is nothing that would please the so-called "orthodox," as well as Unitarians, so much as to see a Unitarian clergyman elected president of Harvard. And we know of no "appearance of evil" which Harvard ought more carefully to avoid. Cæsar's wife should be above suspicion.

But we doubt if, after all, the appearance of evil would be commensurate with the deplorable reality. An old-school Unitarian would, of course, be an impracticable tory; a new-school Unitarian would be an equally impracticable radical. The former would regard each new question of policy from what is perhaps the least satisfactory of ecclesiastical points of view; the latter would be continually guilty of the error of taking a premature action upon complicated questions which "ask only to be let alone" in order that they may gradually desist from troubling us. And what our limited space obliges us here to express with such vague generality would, in the concrete, amount to a thousand little acts, expressions of opinion, and declarations of policy, all tending with cumulative force to weaken the faith of the general public in the university. Unitarianism, or any other thing, good or bad, which is an ism, is not what the university wishes to adopt. Under the present circumstances, a clergyman should be regarded from the outset as a rather ineligible candidate; a clergyman who was graduated more than twenty-five years ago should be ipso facto disqualified; a clergyman who has ever been, directly or remotely, identified with opposition to any desirable measures of university reform, should not even be thought of. Against clergymen, as such, we entertain no sort of prejudice; but a clergyman is one thing, the head of a college is another—and if a man is fit to be the first, he is, in all probability, in our day at all events, unfit to be the second.

To sum up, then: What we do not want is a mere business man, a fossil man, an ultra-radical man, or a clergyman. What we do want is a man of thorough scholarship—not a specialist, not a mere mathematician or physicist or grammarian, but a man of general culture, able to estimate at their proper importance the requirements of culture, and at the same time endowed with sound judgment, shrewd mother-wit, practical good sense. If such a man is to be found among those who have already taken a part in the management of the college, so that he will come to his new office with some adequate knowledge of the work before him, so much the better; he will be the better able to understand what the college needs. If he should also happen to be found among those who have been graduated within the past twenty years, he will be the better able to understand what the present time requires.

These remarks have been made upon the assumption that the presidential office will be maintained upon its present footing. It has, indeed, been lately proposed that, owing to the accumulation of duties now devolving upon the president, the office should be divided; that there should be a chancellor, to exercise a general supervision over the numerous departments of the university, and a master of the college, to preside over the faculty, and take charge of the undergraduate department. We doubt if this proposal is likely to meet with favor. And we strongly suspect that the "chancellor," in such a scheme, would be simply a magnificent incumbrance. If he were to be selected for his distinction as a statesman, historian, or general scholar, in order to serve as an ornament, we doubt if his "general supervision" would be much more than a euphemism for an overlooking altogether. If a difficulty were to arise, implicating the master, confusion would probably be only worse confounded by summoning the chancellor, ab extra, to evolve a judgment upon the affair from the depths of his moral consciousness. A far preferable method of lightening the task of the president would be to provide him with an assistant—a sort of vice-president or secretary. Such an officer, acting under the president's direction, might answer letters, etc., besides relieving the regent of the business of receiving petitions and computing the "rank" of the students This, as it seems to us, would be the most efficient as well as the least expensive way of disposing of that mass of mere routine work which is now put upon the president, but might just as well be performed by a special subordinate.

JOSEPH RIGDON, ESQ.

He and his family and his chosen intimates are usually birds of a feather.

They are all that is proper, providing they may see the 'Black Crook." They are all that is select in their English reading, providing they may warm their imaginations with "Camors." They are all that is honest, providing they may issue bogus stock in Ontario. They are all that is puritanic, providing they may nominate for Congress fellows whom the Puritans would have whipped publicly as swindlers and slanderers.

What is the use of a closet, thinks our hero, if a teetotaller may not keep his bottle in it? Where is the good of having the back of one's vest made of the same costly and respectable stuff as the front? What profit is there in "soundness on the main question," unless it will hide a multitude of sins? If he does not distinctly say such things to himself, he at least lives as if they contained his confession of faith.

Let us imagine him before the altar which is truly his, praying to the Demiurge who really guides his life: "O morality! O conveniently double-headed deity! smile upon us with both your smiles as we offer incense to both your faces. We have this day exorcised a magazine for alluding to seduction, and we have read with avidity the last horrid divorce case in the Daily Scavenger. We have given money to save souls in Guinea, and we have issued bogus stock to ruin widows in Mamaroneck. If we could have cheated the savages while converting them, or if we could have converted the widows while bankrupting them, we would have done it. Grant us both your seraphic smile and your impish leer, O duplex-visaged! for we have made you what you are, and still we are your followers."

It will be observed that our friend does not worship the true God, or that he worships him with little understanding or with much hypocrisy. Now who is this heathen whom we have discovered in "our moral midst," under the shadows of our churches? A native American, a fiercely loyal citizen, an eminent philanthropist, but, above all, a capitalist. In one word, Joseph Rigdon, Esq.

Any one of a thousand villages in any section of our land might have given him birth. Wherever he may have sprung up, he had no ancestors, no education of family pride, no teachings which could lead him to suppose himself a patrician, no surroundings which could prevent him from understanding that he must make his own position. He knew that he must work, either with his hands or head, for such money and respectability as he might want. All around him worked, and called on him to do likewise. Not seeing what else to do, not supposing that anything else could be done, he flung himself into the collar of labor. This one virtue of industry he has never forsaken. It is his chief and perhaps his only unmixed glory. Whatever people may allege against him on other scores, they all declare eulogistically that "Rigdon is a worker."

While a clerk, and subsequently a "storekeeper," in the country, he was more broadly moral than he has been since he came to Wall Street. Obedient to the opinions of the rustic population, he never robbed his master's till, he never sanded his customers' sugar. Even now, as he coolly swindles a hundred thousand in Ontario, he delights to talk of his upright boyhood, not aware that it is a ghost which reproaches him. His ethics, you perceive, are made for him, made by the majority, made by the majority nearest at hand. What was wrong in his native village, because the villagers said it was wrong, is right in Wall Street because the Wall Streeters say it is right. Public opinion, at least the opinion of his public, Mr. Rigdon considers as legal tender, and accepts it without discount.

We will not follow him through his triumphant course of privateering. We will simply state the secret of his success: In the first place, he has been, as we have said, indefatigable; in the second, he has sailed under two flags—two consciences. As a man he has held himself bound to be temperate, chaste, decorous, charitable, churchgoing. As a merchant, he has held himself bound to make money. All is fair in business, except forging another man's note, or failing to meet his own. If these two crimes were not generally considered such, he would not so consider them, and he would practise them.

If you found fault with his professional conscience, he showed you his private one. You were forced to admit that it was sound on all "main questions" and "moral issues;" that it was not disfigured by unmentionable vices, nor even by offences against the minor proprieties. On the credit of that conscience he asked you to entrust his business one with your money. Then he sailed away with it to the islands where he buries his treasure. Such a cunning rover; a rover, too, not awkwardly conscious of his own cunning. How should he not prosper? To use the terse exaggeration of a somewhat unjust critic, "Mr. Rigdon has made a character by talking through his nose, and a fortune out of his character."

What is at first sight odd, this half-finished moralist is very severe in his judgments, considering those the chief of sinners who break his favorites among the commandments. He has fleeced a corner full of victims in the grain market! Yes, but he doesn't play cards; he never entered a gambling saloon. He has seen the "Black Crook!" Yes, but he has not been to hear the "Grande Duchesse;" woe to those whose concupiscence leads them to that siren! Rising from overmuch sherry, he must perforce condemn smokers. Having outwitted his own cousin on 'Change, he must denounce geologists as atheistical. Good Heavens! a man must have his share of morality; if he takes it in small doses, he must take them strong.

If you attempt to show him that his special ethics are not of such preeminent importance, he flies at you with a feeling that you are robbing him. "My rules of life not essential? You are trying to depreciate my spiritual investments; you are making out that I have not salt enough to save me; you are sending me to perdition. Get out of my house, sir; I won't take your periodical; I won't read your book."

A hypocrite? We think you err in trying to make that word cover his whole ground. The main trouble with him is that his education, both ethical and intellectual, is incomplete. He is but a complex representative or prolongation of many a moral curiosity of ancient and barbarous ages. The growth of the idea of right and wrong in the mind of the human race has been gradual and very slow. It is interesting to look back along the ages and study the differing moralities of each. Probably there never was a more pious, prayerful, conscientious army than that little one of seventy Connecticut Puritans which burnt seven hundred Pequots alive. Earnest Christians of the Middle Ages plundered and murdered Jews. David, the holy man of his time, sawed Gentile prisoners asunder, and cut off the hoofs of Gentile horses.

It would be edifying to enquire into the conscience-condition of those cave-dwelling ancestors of ours, who, as Charles Lamb describes them, "sat and grumbled at one another in the dark." Did their sense of what was right allow them to snatch half-picked bones from a rheumatic brother or a blind father? Did it permit them, or perhaps stimulate them, to drive a stone hatchet through the occiput of an old friend, who was returning cavern-ward by night with a tempting string of fish? Did it oblige them to stand manfully by the same comrade when he was charged by the British hyena or the prehistoric elephant? One of these suppositions is as likely as another. We may be sure that the morality of the Troglodytes was at least as mixed and contradictory as our own, although it covered a narrower range of beliefs and influenced a smaller number of actions.

By the way, how few sins had been invented at that period! The most ascetic lake-dweller of Switzerland had not a word to say against Sabbath-breaking or card-playing or the drinking of lager. And with a scarcity of sins, there was also a dearth of virtues. No Sabbath-keeping, no moral reforming, no Maine liquor-lawing, no writing of articles against tobacco. Imagine Mr. Parton in that era asking whether "the coming man will drink wine." The Albionic Troglodyte squatting among the bones of his cavern, and the Helvetian lake-dweller staring out of his fish-scented hovel, would have been even less able to attach a moral sequence to the enquiry than the Briton or Swiss of the present day. With them the "main question" may have been, Whether the coming man would eat his grandfather?

The fortunate truth is, that our stock of ethics has grown in proportion to our wardrobe, household furniture, and other results of material civilization. As society furnishes the body with new comforts and diseases, so it provides the soul with new virtues and new sins. Our present hero, Joseph Rigdon, Esq., of New York City, is dowered with all these things in abundance. The point with the Troglodyte seems to have been, whether he had sins enough to take him to hell. The point with our contemporary is, whether he has virtues enough to take him to heaven. To our mind, the future of both is equally dubious.

On the whole, Mr. Joseph Rigdon is a relic of a barbarous antiquity. Despite his shaven face, his modern sharpness of feature, his nineteenth-century alertness of intellect, he is a specimen of the moral architecture of a time which morticed persecution and piety, massacring of prisoners and founding of charities, plundering of Jews and reverence for Jesus, into the same edifice. The Englishman of King John's time could not draw an inference from the fact that Christ had prayed that his executioners might be forgiven. Mr. Rigdon is equally incapable of reasoning with regard to his Hebrews. His prejudices date from beyond Stonehenge; they are at least as old as the Troglodytes. Who but a cavern-dweller would consider his own double-faced morality adorable, and at the same time denounce his neighbor's double-faced morality as hellish? The Rigdons precisely answer Charles Lamb's description; they "grumble at one another in the dark;" only the darkness is intellectual.

We are almost prepared to declare that the Rigdons are older than the Troglodytes. A late essayist has attempted to show that the elephant has notions which approach the nature of superstition. It appears that that sagacious beast is unreasonably afraid of long white wands and absurdly conscientious about breaking into enclosures. He would charge a platoon of bayonets, when he would run away from a peeled branch. He would respect a bamboo fence around a tempting rice-field, when he would trample its coolie proprietor to a lifeless jelly. Our friend Rigdon is an elephant in a complex state of moral development. He, too, has his terrible wands; they are the opinions of society. He, too, has his respected enclosures; they are established laws and institutions. Beyond the thrust of these weapons and the shadow of these barriers, he feels free to frolic and plunder at his pleasure. Yes; in a certain sense, he is older than the Troglodytes.

Will this modern dweller in caves of darkness never come forth into the full light? The miserable difficulty is that we have as yet no full light into which to conduct him. There are fireflies of "main questions" and "moral issues," but scarcely have we gathered about one ere its glow is out and we must rush after another. A few months, a few lustres, a few centuries, prove that our greatest discoveries are not the "pure truth," but only fractions of it. We cannot too constantly remember that morality is not finished, that it is only in a state of growth, and that it grows through incessant change, like the physical phenomena of nature. Under these circumstances, the path of progress being thus blind, we must not hope to get a high speed out of Mr. Rigdon.

If we urge him, he will not understand us; he imagines that he is pretty near the end of his route already: he has so completely distanced his grandfather! Let us glance at a somewhat similar case; let us turn aside into the ethical prairies of the Blackfeet; we will tell a moralist of that community that it is wrong to roast prisoners. "But it is so much more decorous and humane," he will allege, "than the old custom of eating them! You must remember, my pale-faced friend, that this is an age of philanthropy and progress." He does not imagine that you require any further advance of him; his first thought is that you wish him to take a step backward.

Surrounded by mere will-o'-the-wisps of truth, Mr. Joseph Rigdon is measurably pardonable for making huge blunders among them, setting overmuch value on some and unjustly disregarding others. There is little chance of large improvement in him; but we have high hopes of his descendants—say in the thirtieth generation. We trust that the Rigdon of that day will see that he must not at the same time invoke the blessing of his Creator and speculate on the ruin of his fellow-creatures. Perhaps, however, we are too sanguine; the thirtieth generation seems alarmingly near; we had better rest our faith on the sixtieth.

There are millions of Joseph Rigdons. In an enlarged sense, in reference to our possible ignorance of the greater moral laws of the universe, we are, perhaps, all Rigdons. A profounder knowledge than we now have of the institutions and ethics of the Milky Way might show us that the moralities of earth are even more mixed, contradictory, and absurd than the most suspicious of us imagine. What if it should turn out that the greatest of all offences is a hardened indifference to the law of evolution? What if it should appear that the calamities of this world are sent to teach its conceited inhabitants that they do not constitute the moral centre of the universe? What if we should learn that intelligent and complete goodness cannot be attained without a perfect conception of the stellar equilibrium?

Speaking seriously, it is probable that we have as yet only begun to comprehend the nature and the laws of the Creator. It is in our ignorance that we are wicked; that we are double-faced moralists, or, rather, partial moralists; that we are, more or less, Joseph Rigdons. If we should learn from this reflection to be cautious in our condemnation of the sinners that are, and patient in our expectation of the saints that are to be, perhaps that alone would be a step in grace.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, December 11, 1868.

MR. DISRAELI'S judicious resignation of office has deprived the British public of its expected amusement of a Parliamentary battle before Christmas. The fortress has been evacuated at the moment that all preparations for assault had been completed. Mr. Disraeli and his followers have marched out, carrying with them bag and baggage to no inconsiderable amount. Although we have not the American system of changing the great mass of officials at every change of government, there is still a good deal of plunder to stimulate the energies of patriots. Mr. Disraeli, as the Times reminds us this morning, has himself appointed an archbishop, three bishops, seven peers, "and a swarm of Irish functionaries that baffles English computation." The Conservative administration has, in two years or a little over, made twenty-seven great legal appointments. And, in short, it is calculated that the amount of patronage of which they have disposed, and which, for the most part, is held by the fortunate receivers for life, amounts to £250,000 annually. If the prizes won would not seem very numerous, measured by an American standard, they are certainly very valuable, taken by themselves. Consoled by these solid profits, Mr. Disraeli's followers may well go cheerfully into retirement; and may hope—not without probability—that some slip on the part of the present holders of office may before long reproduce a Conservative administration. To abolish the Irish Church sounds an easy problem; but it is no easy matter to provide a scheme for the new distribution of its revenues which will not endanger the unanimity of the Liberal party. We shall not know till the beginning of next February what is Mr. Gladstone's scheme; and I am only too glad to defer till that time the discussion of a subject which will be painfully obtrusive during the coming year; but it may be worth while to say a few words on the composition of the ministry to which this difficult task is committed.

Of Mr. Gladstone himself it would be superfluous to say much; but I may remark that he has the singular faculty of attracting in equal degrees the admiration of large masses of his countrymen and the hatred of certain schools of politicians. No man is more bitterly abused, not merely by the Conservative press, but by many soi-disant Liberals; and yet it has been a marked peculiarity in the past elections that the constituents have rigorously exacted from candidates the one pledge that they will follow Mr. Gladstone's lead, with the utmost loyalty, whilst all "Adullamites" and party deserters have been sternly punished for their treason to the popular leader. I will not attempt to account for this state of feeling, further than to say, that it seems to me to prove that, whilst Mr. Gladstone has undoubtedly some very weak sides to his character as a politician, he has a force behind him which it will be very difficult for his opponents to encounter. He will make blunders; he will, it may be, be outmanœuvred in details by Mr. Disraeli's acuteness; but he represents a great power, and I venture to add that no candid or generous mind will deny that, whatever his faults, he is not only a man of genius, but one whose influence tends on the whole to raise the tone of English politics.

In the House of Commons he will have able supporters. Mr. Bright has taken an office whose great recommendation is that it will give him little to do, his health being unequal to any severe administrative labors. It was of course anticipated that Mr. Bright would take office; but it certainly brings him into some singular relations. The one Adullamite who has escaped from the ruin of his party is Mr. Lowe; and Mr. Lowe has, by a singular felicity, received the most important post in the government from the Liberal party, after having deserted the Liberals and bitterly opposed all extension of the suffrage. Moreover, I should think that the majority of the party, on the whole, approve of an appointment at first sight so singular. The fact is, that Mr. Lowe not only possesses one of the clearest intellects, and the greatest talents in debate, of all our present statesmen, but he is a most thoroughgoing reformer of a certain type. He spoke admirably as a vigorous opponent of the Irish Church establishment, and in all Church matters is a thoroughgoing Liberal. Mr. Matthew Arnold holds him to be a Philistine, and he is certainly a stubborn believer in the laissez-faire theories of political economists, and has, I am sorry to say, just published some remarks on our educational system, condemning very strongly the measures which most reformers feel to be necessary. He is an obstinate believer in the doctrinaire theory that government should improve things by letting them alone. However, he is the author of the valuable sentiment that we must educate our masters—the householders. He is, at any rate, a man of marked ability, and likely to make an effective Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Turning to other members of the government, there is little appearance of any introduction of fresh vigor. The respectable Lord Clarendon is Foreign Secretary. The colonies are committed to the charge of that most respectable and amiable nobleman, Lord Granville, and India to the equally respectable and able, if rather pedantic nobleman, the Duke of Argyll. The respectable Mr. Cardwell will be Secretary of War, and certainly is an improvement upon Sir J. Pakington, and Mr. Bruce is a respectable Home Secretary, and Mr. Goschen a respectable President of the Poor-law Board. So are they all, all most respectable men; but not likely perhaps to win any higher credit than that of good men of business.

Two of the ablest men of the radical wing, Mr. Foster and Mr. Stansfeld, take office, though, I am sorry to add, without the honor of being in the cabinet. Mr. Foster will be at the head of the educational department, and is excellently qualified for the post. Mr. Stansfeld, a man of much cultivation and an excellent speaker, will be concerned with the finances. The legal appointments are rather weak. Sir W. Page Wood, under the new name of Lord Hatherley, will be Lord Chancellor; and is likely to be an excellent judge, but a very poor debater. Sir R. Collier is not a very strong Attorney-General, whilst Mr. Coleridge, the new Solicitor-General, has lately won great reputation as a Parliamentary speaker, but has certain weaknesses, and especially in Church matters, which fit him to follow Mr. Gladstone better than to give him a strong hold over his party.

The general result is perhaps to this effect: In the House of Commons, the government has not only a large majority but will have a great superiority in debating power. Such men as Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, Mr. Lowe, and, I might add, Mr. Coleridge, are altogether an overmatch for Mr. Disraeli and Lord Stanley, supported only by men of inferior calibre, such as Mr. Gathorne Hardy. In the House of Lords matters are reversed. Lord Cairns, the outgoing Lord Chancellor, is incomparably superior to his successor, and he will have such supporters as Lord Derby and Lord Salisbury to oppose to the inferior eloquence of Lord Russell, the Duke of Argyll, and Lord Granville. The difference of power will be specially felt in the difficult legal questions which must arise in the course of the Irish Church debate, and the government has been much criticised for not taking as Chancellor one of the ablest of Parliamentary orators, the present Chief-Justice, Sir A. Cockburn. It may therefore be anticipated that the great fight of the ensuing session will be won with comparative ease in the House of Commons; and I hope that the majority there may be sufficiently decisive to ensure the passage of the measure through the House of Lords in spite of the opposing weight of numbers and talents.

Indeed, it can scarcely be anticipated that any manœuvres of skilful partisans or any reliance upon the lurking bigotry of the country will embolden the House of Lords to face the decided expression of opinion of the new constituencies. But it is impossible to look upon the prospect with unqualified satisfaction. We urgently require a ministry that can take the initiative in many wider schemes of reform. That the Irish Church should be abolished is obviously desirable. It is a subject which has long passed beyond the reach of controversy in the minds of all sensible men; and that fact makes me regret the strong probability that another year will be suffered to elapse in endless discussions and floods of Parliamentary eloquence upon a threadbare topic. The opposition will be strong enough and zealous enough in their prejudices to throw every possible hindrance in the way of the desired measure. Months of valuable time may be easily consumed; and meanwhile other topics of far more immediate importance, such as educational reform, army reform, poor-law reform, and many more, will be postponed or crammed into spare half-hours of languid talk. The composition of the ministry justifies a hope that they may carry the particular measure which will excite most public attention; but they have too much of the old Whig leaven to give very sanguine hopes of any more far-seeing measures. As the first Parliament elected by household suffrage is singularly like the old Parliament elected by ten pound householders, so the first ministry, in which its confidence is placed, is remarkably like the old ministries of the Palmerstonian era, with the faintest possible additional flavor of radicalism. We must still hope for an improvement rather in the general advance of public opinion than in any very distinct change in the components of Parliament or the ministry.

UNIVERSITY REFORM—THE FACULTY VIEW.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: The article of your Annapolis correspondent upon "University Reform," published in the Nation of the 17th inst., contains some suggestions which are worthy of careful consideration. All that is said of daily "marks" will probably meet the approbation of many thoughtful men. For one, I can give it my hearty concurrence. No one can think more meanly of "the marking system" than I do. The assertions of the article, however, in regard to the kind of government which is stated to prevail at present in American colleges are so injurious that they ought not to be accepted without examination; and if, after examination, it should be found that there is the slightest ground to question their universal, or at least general, truth, their utterance cannot possibly be justified. The writer asserts that the college code now in force "treats the young men of the nineteenth just as the boys of the sixteenth century were treated;" and further, that it "works through a perfectly organized system of police, of which the president of the college is the chief, and whose spies" (at this point the writer pauses to assure us that he means what he says, by adding—"the word is a harsh one, but I use it considerately") "are to be found in every department of the university."

Speaking of the disciplinary system, he goes on to say: "The conclusion is inevitable that it [the system] tends directly to make students in their relations with the faculty the reverse of manly and honorable. It is a legal presumption that a suspected man is innocent until the contrary is proved; but at Cambridge, at least, the counter presumption generally obtains. It may even be said that a suspected student is supposed to lie until he proves that he speaks the truth. The result is as natural as it is deplorable. Espionage is met by cunning, and accusation by equivocation." The writer here narrows down the scope of his charge so as to direct it against a single institution—Harvard University; but the public will not suppose that this venerable seat of learning is laboring under a system of government which is exceptionally odious. The charge, therefore, implicates equally all the colleges and all the college officers in the country, and denounces them as all alike culpable of maintaining a system which is wanting in fairness, in wisdom, and even in simple common sense.

I know very little of Harvard University, but with many other colleges I have had large opportunities to be acquainted. In one capacity or another, as a student, as a tutor, as a professor, as a trustee, or as an executive officer, I have been connected with colleges for more than thirty years. My acquaintance with the college officers of the country, generally, is also very wide. With many of them I have often counselled in past times upon the embarrassing problems which college government frequently presents. If the statements of your correspondent quoted above are generally true of our collegiate institutions, I think I should have been likely to discover their truth. I have never discovered anything of the kind.

And first, as to what your correspondent says of spies. By a spy I suppose we are to understand a secret agent employed to watch the conduct of others without their knowledge, and to report his observations to his employer. A college proctor on his regular beat, or a college tutor or professor in the regular discharge of his daily duty, is not a spy any more than are the guardians of the public peace who constantly patrol the streets of our city. Now, whatever they may do at Harvard University, I have never known or heard of an instance in which a college officer of any grade has employed a spy to watch over the movements of any student. While I was myself a student I occasionally heard other students, in moments of excitement, throw such imputations upon their officers. I never saw the slightest evidence that the imputations were true.

Again, the assertion that a suspected student is "generally supposed to lie until he proves that he speaks the truth," is so complete, and at the same time so grave, a misrepresentation, as to admit of no possible justification. I know no college in which the simple, unsupported statement of a student whom circumstances have seemed to implicate in an offence is not accepted as entirely conclusive, and made the ground, in case it is a denial of the imputation, of his complete exoneration from the charge. I am not in the least disposed to deny the unfortunate fact, that the relations between students and faculty in many of our colleges might be happier than they are; but they are not likely to improve if we persist in imputing their present state to causes which are not the true ones; and such is the imaginary cause here dwelt on by your correspondent.

Now as to the broad assertion that we "treat the young men of the nineteenth just as the boys of the sixteenth century were treated." Nothing could be more strikingly illustrative than this sentence of the loose manner in which men will sometimes allow themselves to speak in regard to matters of history which they have not taken the pains to study. The college student of the sixteenth century was kept under constant supervision, by night as well as by day, at his meals and his amusements as well as during his hours of study and recitation. The aim of college government was to prevent wrong-doing by simply depriving the student of the opportunity of doing wrong. The student of the nineteenth century, on the contrary, is left entirely and absolutely the master of his own actions. College government endeavors to influence him to act worthily and well by appeals to his heart, to his conscience, to his better tastes, to his common sense. If such appeals are not effectual, and if in spite of them he will still disturb the good order of the college, or commit acts unworthy of a student, then, in case the fact is brought home to him, he falls under some kind of censure. In the majority of cases, however, beyond a doubt, he even yet escapes; for the machinery which your correspondent denounces with so lofty disdain—the espionage which he supposes to follow the student in his unguarded moments—has no existence except in your correspondent's own fertile brain.

If you will permit me here to quote one or two paragraphs relating to this subject, written and published by me many years ago but now passed out of memory, I think they will throw some light upon the causes of the peculiar relations which are found so often to exist between college students and college officers; and will show at the same time how far it is true that the student of the nineteenth century is treated like the student of the sixteenth:

"Candidates for admission to college often apply at the early age of fourteen years, and many enter below sixteen. On the other hand, not a few attain, or have nearly attained, their majority before becoming members of a college; and the consequence is that we have a community very heterogeneous in character, very unequal in power of self-command, very widely different in degree of manliness, very unfit to be all subjected to the same uniform regimen. In the younger classes we find a majority who have come directly from the schools, where their conduct has been subjected to the restraint of immediate and constant supervision. Such, even if they possess the power, have not yet acquired the habit of self-control; and the almost irresistible propensity of juvenile nature to avail itself without consideration of every accidental opportunity to give way to frolicsome mirthfulness on the slightest relaxation of the severe vigilance of school supervision, is carried into the college, and is not laid aside until familiarity with freedom neutralizes the temptation to extravagance. . .

"It is a very great disadvantage of college government that it can provide but one system of discipline for all varieties of subjects; and that consequently the stringent system which the more volatile—those in whom the boy spirit still predominates—require is felt to be unreasonably oppressive and galling by the graver class, who disdain even the suspicion of puerility. The popular idea of the college student is drawn much more from the latter class than from the former; and hence the strictures on college government which we so frequently hear carry with them among the people an appearance of weight and reason which they would hardly possess were it remembered that this system does not exist for the supervision and restraint of those who need no restraint, but on account of those others who do need it, yet cannot possibly be separately reached. . . . .

"It is a curious fact that, while the popular idea of the college student at the present day invests him very much with the character of a man—though many individual students are in fact but boys—in the early history of colleges, both in this country and abroad, the case was completely the reverse, and the college or university student was looked upon and treated as a mere school-boy. It was this fact indeed which, if it did not determine the erection of colleges and halls in the universities, at least suggested the form of their organization. The universities of England taught only, and assumed no responsibility for the deportment or morals of the students. The lecturers—ultimately styled professors—did nothing, and do nothing to this day, but lecture; they heard no recapitulations of the subjects by the students—that is, no recitations. But boy learners require both moral control and mental drilling. The colleges and halls were erected to subserve these purposes. In these establishments the students were boarded, lodged, and kept under close supervision. They were governed each by a master, assisted by one or more tutors as necessity might require. It was the business of the tutor to see that the youths duly attended the lectures, and to interrogate them upon what they heard—that is, to hear them recite. It was also his business to give them religious instruction, and to 'do all that in him lay to render them conformable to the Church of England.' In addition to this, he had the further rather troublesome charge of 'containing his pupils within statutory regulations in matters of external appearance, such as their clothes, boots, and hair;' with the unpleasant liability, in case the unmanageable urchins evaded his vigilance, expressed in this clause, 'which if the pupils are found to transgress, the tutor, for the first, second, and third offence, shall forfeit six and eight pence, and for the fourth shall be interdicted of his tutorial functions.'" [It may be observed just here that we have not, even in our own day, wholly discontinued the practice of punishing the officer for the offences of the student; only that instead of fining him six and eight pence, we simply speak disrespectfully of him in the newspapers.] "Corporal punishment was inflicted in the English universities so late as the time of Milton, who himself is said to have been subjected to this indignity. The same appears to have been true in the early years of Harvard and Yale in this country. Down to the commencement of the present century the fagging system survived in both these colleges—a system which rendered the student during his freshman year the drudge of his fellow-students above him; and to quite as late a period the whole body of the students were compelled to observances toward the college officers which would now be held to be degrading, and could then only consist with the idea that the student is a mere school-boy. In those primitive days nice questions of casuistry as to how far a student may or may not, by his testimony, rightfully or honorably criminate his fellow, were unknown; but the youth who refused to testify—if that phenomenon ever occurred—was neither remonstrated with nor dismissed, but simply, I suppose, 'licked.' However, we have changed all that, and very properly; but so far has the change gone that nearly all attempts on the part of college faculties to use coercion of any kind, if not resisted in limine, are at least met with remonstrance and complaint.

"From the foregoing statements it is apparent that the American colleges have assumed to themselves the double duty which, some centuries ago in England, was divided between college and university—the duty of instruction and that of government. . . . But, in undertaking this twofold responsibility, our colleges have failed to copy from their models the devices by which they secured the ability to discharge it. Our college officers neither live in the same building nor eat at the same table with the students, nor are the college premises shut in by walls or secured by locks and bolts. In the absence of these material safeguards, we have spun around our colleges a cobweb of words; instead of immediate and constant supervision, we have substituted law; instead of bolts and bars, we have invoked penalties; instead of substantial brick and mortar, we have built our reliance on a barricade of paper. What wonder that the merest breath sometimes bears down the barrier before it!"

It thus appears that between the condition of the student of the sixteenth, or even of the eighteenth century, and that of the student of the present day, as it respects the form of government to which he is subjected, there is scarcely a single point of resemblance. And the reason of the existence of that peculiar relation between the governors and the governed of the academic body, of which mention has been made, is to be found partly in the heterogeneousness above explained of the student body, which makes it inevitable that there will always be some individuals who will be deficient in manliness, and who will delight to create confusion; and partly in that traditional principle of solidarity universally recognized in colleges, which permits the vicious or the turbulent few to use the exemplary and well-disposed many as their invulnerable shield and inexpugnable defence.

Whoever, in discussing the difficult questions connected with college government, overlooks these two capital facts, will arrive at no conclusions worthy of attention. The expedient proposed by your correspondent of separating the governing from the teaching body, while it would involve a largely increased expenditure, would afford no adequate solution of the problem—a truth too obvious to require argument.

In conclusion, I would observe that, while there is doubtless room in our colleges and universities for many improvements, no true friend of higher education in our country will speak of those institutions in terms calculated to shake the public confidence in the wisdom of their management, or to bring their governors into contempt, until at least he has sufficiently investigated the subject to be quite sure of his facts. ## LITERARY.

Mr. William James McClure sends us the prospectus of a volume of poems, comprising amatory, patriotic, moral, and miscellaneous pieces, which will be published in one month's time by Mr. P. O'Shea, of 27 Barclay Street, to whom all communications should be addressed. ——Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son have in press a work by Mr. C. L. Brace, which is entitled the "New West; or, California in 1867 and 1868." "Its main object," say the publishers, "is to describe in California what is generally omitted in travellers' journals." In pursuance of this plan, Mr. Brace writes of the minute features of vegetation and scenery in respect of which California is very different from the older States; of the branches of industry and production almost peculiar to the Pacific Slope—as vine-growing and the rearing of silkworms; of the Digger Indians, ethnologically considered; of the antediluvian or post-pliocene skull of Calaveras County; of the Yo Semite Valley, which, perhaps, is not exactly a virgin theme; of the Chinese in California; the climate, as compared with European and Asiatic climates; social life among the Californians, and many topics more.——Mr. Howard Challen announces that his Trade List Directory for 1869 will contain a complete list of the books published by nearly every publisher in this country, and of the publications of many foreign publishers. To say this—and it can be truthfully said—is to say enough to show that the book is a valuable work for reference. ——With its sixth volume, the "Theological Eclectic," which is mainly a repertory of foreign theological literature, will become a monthly periodical, and its volumes will begin and end with the calendar year. What is its special character, and with what ability it is sustained, will be understood by our clerical readers when we say that its editors are Dr. George E. Day, Dr. Philip Schaff, Dr. H. B. Hackett, Dr. John McClintock, Dr. W. H. Green, Dr. C. M. Butler, and Mr. L. P. Evans.

—Our Philadelphia correspondent, "Subscriber," may get the Pall Mall Budget of Messrs. Willmer & Rogers, of 47 Nassau Street, of this city, who will take his subscription or will themselves send the paper to him at his order. Mr. August Brentano, of 708 Broadway, will also send it to order, and has for sale single copies. In speaking of the Budget, by anticipation, some time since, we gave its outward appearance rather more praise than belonged to it. The printing is like that of the daily issue, but—for the sake of cheapening the postal charges—the paper is thin. As for the matter, the editors succeed wonderfully well in getting into the weekly issue everything of consequence contained in the Pall Mall Gazette.

—The "American Newspaper Directory" is the title of a volume to be published almost immediately by Messrs. George P. Rowell & Co., a firm of advertising agents doing business in this city. Such a book can never be finished, for each year witnesses the death of some journals and the birth of many more; the publishers therefore intend to make their work an annual, and thus keep it as nearly full and accurate in its information as its character will admit of. It will contain various lists giving the names of all newspapers and other periodicals issued in the United States and Territories, and in the British Provinces, giving brief descriptions of the towns and cities in which they are published, and giving, too, the circulation of each paper, the class of readers whom it addresses, the character of the community in which it is printed, and much similar information, which, as advertisers will see, cannot but be of value to them. As its publishers point out, it is not so very long since such an index as they promise was not to be had at all, and such incomplete lists as the advertising agencies had in their possession were guarded with the utmost jealousy. Two or three years ago, a man who had made a list of the journals of the Southern States sold copies of it for a hundred and fifty dollars. Why advertisers should care to conceal such information it is easy to see; but the advertising agencies perhaps gained very little by a course of concealment; they probably lost as much as they gained. The publicity in which the whole matter will henceforth be set will be the best prevention of false opinions in regard to the circulation and influence of the different journals; the means of making a just estimate will be within everybody's reach, and the advertising agencies will be able to devote themselves to their proper business—that of agents between the newspaper owner and the man who wants to advertise. The latter will know just what it is he is buying, and will pay the middleman not for occult information nor for assistance in carrying on his business, but a fair compensation for his work. Of this projected "Directory" we have seen only a few of the specimen pages; these, as regards paper and printing, look very well indeed, and the matter which they contain seems to have been prepared with honesty as well as with industry and intelligence. To give a sample of their contents we copy from the list of Alabama papers:

"MONTGOMERY Advertiser; every morning and evening except Sundays, and Weekly, Tuesdays; Democratic; four pages; size—daily 24x36, weekly 27x40; subscription—daily $10, weekly $4; established 1830; W. W. Screws, editor and publisher; Robert Tyler, associate editor; claims 800 daily circulation."

"MONTGOMERY, Alabama State Journal; every evening except Sundays; Republican; four pages; size 22x32; subscription $10; established 1867; John G. Stokes, editor; State Journal Association, publishers; 1,160 positive circulation."

In the little Advertisers' Gazette which Messrs. Rowell & Co. have previously published we have noticed some decided mistakes in the characterization of different journals. For example, we have no objection to having the Nation set down as "Radical," because in a sense, and that, as we think, not the worst sense of the word, the Nation is radical. But what the compiler of the Gazette means by the word he indicates clearly when he applies it to the Independent and the Anti-Slavery Standard, and we may say, without any disrespect to those journals, that "radical," as applicable to them, cannot with any propriety be applied to this paper.

—We spoke the other day of a general circular which would soon be laid before the alumni of Harvard College, by a committee acting in behalf of various classes from that of 1817 down to that of 1868, exclusive of the classes of 1818, '19, '20, '22, '24, '41, '42, '43, '45, '47, '48, '49, '54. As we said before, it is proposed to raise during the next ten years at least $500,000, which is in the first instance to be put into the hands of trustees, there to remain until $50,000 has accumulated, when that sum is at once to be turned over to the corporation. The circular, which we are requested to reprint, is as follows:

TO THE GRADUATES OF HARVARD COLLEGE.

The undersigned desire to lay before you a brief statement of a plan which has been lately set on foot for the benefit of the college. The plan is as follows: Each class is asked to agree to give a fixed sum every year for ten years, to be invested and kept as a fund to be called "The Class Subscription Fund," and the income devoted without restrictions to the purposes for which the general fund of the college is used by the corporation. Those classes which object to prospective subscriptions are requested to make outright payments. We do not think that much argument is needed to show—first, the necessity of raising money for the college now, and, secondly, the propriety of giving all that is raised by this subscription to the general fund.

There are two objects eminently deserving all the pecuniary aid that can be given them, viz.: the salaries of the professors and the college library. An article in the North American Review for last October by Mr. Cutter, assistant-librarian, draws a melancholy picture of the condition of the library. There are certain funds restricted to the purchase of books in particular branches, but for the increase of the library in the wide field of general literature and science the whole sums available in the hands of the library council is less than $400 a year. The professors' salaries are in urgent need of an increase. The highest salary given is $2,400 a year, independent of any temporary aid the corporation may be able to grant; and when it is considered that the expenditure of the college during the present financial year exceeds the income by nearly $8,000, it must be apparent that the corporation will not be justified in making any considerable increase at present. The property given at various times to the college has been generally restricted to special objects, such as the foundation of a particular professorship, the enlargement of a particular collection; and since the special gifts are frequently inadequate for the purpose to which they are devoted, the result is, in such cases, that the deficiency is supplied from the general fund, and thus each act of liberality becomes in one sense a drain upon the resources of the college.

During the past year it was considered necessary to make some alterations in University Hall. No money was to be had except some of the general fund that would otherwise have been used to eke out the salaries of the professors. Considering the necessity of the alterations a pressing one, they consented to the use of the money for that purpose, and professors' salaries were accordingly clipped that the college carpenter might receive his dues. These facts justify our statement that any money that can be raised should be given to the general fund, and if any further argument is needed we would suggest that the corporation have abandoned their former practice of setting aside for the general fund all the income above five per cent. from each endowment, so that the fund has actually been reduced.

Meanwhile, private munificence has given to New York, in Cornell University, a college with abundant resources for present needs and future growth. For a library the corporation sends its president to purchase the treasures of Europe, and at the first examination three hundred candidates present themselves at her doors. Can a college of yesterday, without association, without a history, be dearer to its founders than our ancient university is to us, her children?

—The committee of the Free Grace Protestant Union, feeling that every lawful effort ought to "be used to stir up and keep alive a strong Protestant feeling among the people of this land, are anxious to purchase a first-rate magic-lantern." Cradley, near Birmingham, the residence of the Rev. Thomas Husband Gregg, seems to be one of the committee's scenes of operations, and the land meant is England and the North of Ireland, probably. To enable them to purchase the lantern, the committee make a special appeal to those whom Providence has blessed with funds, and who love the civil and religious liberties which have so long been enjoyed by the people of England. As one of their own poets hath said, "He is the freeman whom the truth makes free." However, such considerations entirely apart, and to return to the curate and his optical instrument, he wants it in order that he may have the slides painted with scenes from the "Book of Martyrs." These are to be exhibited in the course of the delivery of certain lectures setting forth the most striking massacres and other atrocities recorded in Fox's work, and are expected to promote sound views of the Scarlet Woman, and teach in an unprejudiced way "what she would do now if she only had the power." "The Catholic Church, let us always deny;" of course, "it is built on a sandy foundation," as Romanists in the South of Ireland falsely say of the Establishment; but sometimes, in moments of depression, when we examine the weapons with which Babylon is assailed, the millennium seems not near at hand.

—About this time will have been issued the thousandth volume of the memorable series, the Tauchnitz edition of standard works and authors, in which so many English novelists figure, and which has been so often confiscated on its arrival at British ports. The enterprise has been very skilfully conducted, and has supplied one of the great needs of the present day—books of fair and open typography, and of portable size; easy for the hand, and adapted to the pocket. The first volume appeared September 1, 1841, and most of the series has been stereotyped; no less than 250,000 plates would be needed to reproduce it entire. The thousandth issue is worthy of the post of honor, being Tischendorf's "New Testament," derived by comparison from the following manuscripts: The Codex Sinaiticus, discovered by the professor himself; the Codex Vaticanus; and the Codex Alexandrinus. The editor accompanies the text with notes. It is pleasant to think that when the Baron Von Tauchnitz—his services to literature procured him ennoblement some time ago—shall have been gathered to his fathers, his good work will probably continue. He has a son who will no doubt carry on the enterprise. It is very likely, by the way, that as the publication of his five-hundredth volume made Tauchnitz a baron, that of the thousandth may make him a count.

—"The Geographical Knowledge of the Chinese" is the title of an interesting paper, originally read by K. A. Skatschkof before the Imperial Geographical Society of Russia, and recently translated into German by Professor Voelkel, and published in Petermann's "Mittheilungen." The catalogue of the Imperial Library of Pekin, issued in 1767, contained the titles of 729 geographical works, comprising in all 10,283 volumes. During the century that has elapsed since that time, it is estimated that this number has increased to nearly 15,000 volumes. Some of these books are very ancient, and date back to at least three centuries before the Christian era. So far as the geography of China proper is concerned, they are very full and accurate, containing treatises on political economy, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, as well as indicating the configuration of the land, mountains, seas, rivers, canals, lakes, cities, villages, roads, bridges, dams, temples, cemeteries, and forts; describing, also, the peculiar products, customs, costumes, and manners of the different provinces, and interspersing the whole with biographies and anecdotes of local celebrities, and accounts of the antiquities of these several places. The information about foreign countries (all of which are represented as tributary to the Celestial Empire) is such as might be expected from a conceited and exclusive people. The Europeans are described as extremely ignorant; and, although it is admitted that they publish almanacs and a few other books, it is nevertheless affirmed that only a very small part of the population know how to read and write. In Europe, according to these writers, wheat is black and rice is wholly unknown. The fields are poorly cultivated, and the mechanical arts sadly neglected. Each class of society is distinguished by a peculiar costume. The women are remarkable chiefly for their frivolity, impudence, large feet, and indecency of attire. The inhabitants live in towers several stories high, are fond of table luxuries, and eat out of gold and silver dishes. They seldom walk, but ride in lofty, unwieldy coaches. Although very wealthy, they dislike to pay their debts, and are in general exceedingly avaricious. There is no truth in their courts of justice, no ingenuousness or confidence even between friends or brothers. Their statesmanship and public policy rest entirely on falsehood and hypocrisy. Such are the salient features of European civilization, as seen through the almond-shaped eyes of the Chinese. The most remarkable of their geo graphical works is the one entitled "Elaborate Representation of Lands," originally published in 1566, at the expense of the government. It is the principal source of Marco Polo's information concerning China. A new and enlarged edition of this work was issued in 1754, in five hundred stout octavo volumes. The revision was entrusted to a committee of one hundred and eighty-one scholars, appointed by the Emperor. It is replete with statistical information, carefully collated and condensed from the official reports of provincial governors and magistrates throughout the empire, and is also enlivened by poems, panegyrics of illustrious men, historical essays, antiquarian treatises, etc. The Chinese are quite minute and painstaking in cartography, although their maps are less accurate than those of the Western nations, because they are not based upon any nice system of triangulations, by which alone can be determined with scientific precision the different points of latitude and longitude, the courses of rivers, the ranges of mountains, the boundaries of provinces, and the irregular lines of sea-coast.

UNDER THE WILLOWS.*

THE dedicatory verses with which Mr. Lowell begins this volume are not only an expression of his love and esteem for Mr. Norton, but also they strike the note which is most frequently heard in the poems that follow:

"My Elmwood chimneys seem crooning to me,
As of old, in their moody, minor key,
And out of the past the hoarse wind blows,
As I sit in my arm-chair and toast my toes.

"'Ho! ho! nine-and-forty,' they seem to sing,
'We saw you a little toddling thing,
We knew you child and youth and man,
A wonderful fellow to dream and plan,
With a great thing always to come, who knows?'
Well, well! 't is some comfort to toast one 's toes."

And so they go on, ending thus:

"Instead of a fleet of broad-browed ships,
To send a child's armada of chips!
Instead of the great guns, tier on tier,
A freight of pebbles and grass-blades sere!
'Well, maybe more love with the less gift goes,'
I growl, as, half moody, I toast my toes."

Regrets for unfulfilled youthful visions, a pensive, though hardly a sad, recurrence to the thoughts and dreams of childhood, an inclination to self-blame for opportunities unused and time slipped away without fruits, have moved the poet to not a little of his serious singing. Sometimes, but not often, this tone is deeper; in one of his almost remorseful moods he asks of the melancholy pine-tree—the "sea-foreboding pine," as he finely calls it—

"Do I, in this vague emotion,
This sadness that will not pass
Though the air throbs with wings,
And the field laughs and sings,
Do I forebode, alas!
The ship-building longer and wearier,
The voyage's struggle and strife,
And then the darker and drearier
Wreck of a broken life?"

It would be ungracious and ungrateful to find fault with a mood to which we have owed very much good poetry, and we are hardly prepared to say that we could find it in our heart to wish that it less often colored Mr. Lowell's thoughts and found voice in his writing. Indeed, for the matter of that, it is a mood under whose dominion the poetical nature must of necessity often fall; from which, whatever we say of poetry at this or that point of its history, no poet, we may be sure, has ever been free since Lamech sang to Adah and Zillah. The poet's occasional glimpses of things not to be uttered in human speech, his despair of ever doing more than to hint afar off the pleasure and the pain, "at once baffling and luring," of which he is exquisitely sensible, though by the most part of mankind they are not regarded or perceived, now and again make all that he may have done seem worthless; make it all seem worse than that; he discerns falsehood and a profaning indelicacy in his best attempts at making us acquainted with his muse; even the praises which men give him and which are a better measure of his work's value than any other that can justly be applied, if sometimes they give him pleasure and almost give him content, yet not seldom, seeming to him flatteries or mistakes, only increase his disgust with himself. Yet, as it is easy to yield to this feeling more frequently than is good for him who experiences it, so, too, it is easy for the reader to have it presented to him—especially if it is presented in its nakedness—more frequently than is pleasing. It is, after all, in the nature of a confession of weakness; and necessary and inevitable as it is to make that confession, it is what none of us like to do, and what we do not overmuch enjoy when done by others. And if this is true of such confessions when they are called forth by the vague, general sense of incapacity of which we have been speaking, all the more is it true of incapacity due to special causes within one's self, and possibly within one's own control. But of these we are not speaking.

It may, however, here be said—and all the more fitly as it has a connection with what has been said before—that the power of sympathy with nature and the love of communion with her which Mr. Lowell possesses in so eminent a degree that it very often fills all his verse till the words and the music seem tremulously and delicately responsive to her direct influences, is a power the exercise of which is not unapt to breed a discontent of soul and a sort of despair. Doubtless the most immediately painful part of the riddle of the world would disappear with the disappearance of men, would not exist if it were not for the mental and spiritual trouble it gives to consider or enquire into the fates of one's fellows and one's own fate as a human being. But there is, too, the profounder if less poignant painfulness which the mere existence of this frame of things gives to the mind, especially to the modern mind, which has outgrown so many solutions of the problem, but finds the problem itself still to be outgrown. The contemplation of nature, then, no matter with what love and enjoyment the study is carried on, is not always, perhaps not generally, tonic and bracing, but often it directly nourishes a deep dissatisfaction. This is not a feeling which gets explicit expression in any of the poems before us; but we imagine that it has had its share in giving a melancholy tinge to several of them, and that its influence should have due consideration.

Again, the habitual experience of

"This pleasure more sharp than pain, That baffles and lures us so;"

the continual presence of

"A something so shy, it would shame it
To make it a show
A something too vague, could we name it, the inability to express in its charm and beauty what is most keenly felt and seems most worthy to be expressed and shared, naturally tends to induce a humor of turning on one's self, and, unless one's nature is very kindly, of turning on others also, in a half mocking way—which, by the way, does not fail to shock numerous downright, good people as being wholly mocking and bitter. Many of the best writers of vers de société, perhaps all whose vers de société are to be called poetry, have, as might be supposed, afforded illustrations of this fact, as we take it to be. It is not surprising to find illustrations of it in Mr. Lowell's poems. Such is the finely finished little poem called "Without and Within," which we copy not less for its excellence in its own way than for its serviceableness in making our meaning clear. Lovers of Mr. Lowell's poetry will recognize in it an old favorite:
For others to know;"

WITHOUT AND WITHIN.

"My coachman, in the moonlight there,
Looks through the sidelight of the door;
I hear him with his brethren swear,
As I could do,—but only more.

Flattening his nose against the pane,
He envies me my brilliant lot,
Breathes on his aching fists in vain,
And dooms me to a place more hot.

He sees me into supper go,
A silken wonder by my side,
Bare arms, bare shoulders, and a row
Of flounces, for the door too wide.

He thinks how happy is my arm
'Neath its white-gloved and jewelled load;
And wishes me some dreadful harm,
Hearing the merry corks explode.

Meanwhile, I inly curse the bore
Of hunting still the same old coon,
And envy him outside the door,
In golden quiets of the moon.

The winter wind is not so cold
As the bright smile he sees me win,
Nor the host's oldest wine so old
As our poor gabble sour and thin.

I envy him the ungyved prance
By which his freezing feet he warms,
And drag my lady's-chains and dance
The galley-slave of dreary forms.

O, could he have my share of din,
And I his quiet!—past a doubt
'T would still be one man bored within,
And just another bored without."

We were going to say that we were not sure that this is not almost the completest and best of all those poems which spring directly from Mr. Lowell's personal feelings. There is, however, no question that the preference must be given to the delicately beautiful "Auf Wiedersehen"—without its autumn palinode—and that, too, we shall allow ourselves the pleasure of quoting:

* "Under the Willows, and Other Poems. By James Russell Lowell." Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1868.

AUF WIEDERSEHEN.

" The little gate was reached at last,
Half hid in lilacs down the lane;
She pushed it wide, and, as she past,
A wistful look she backward cast,
And said,—'Auf wiedersehen.'

With hand on latch, a vision white,
Lingered reluctant, and again
Half doubting if she did aright,
Soft as the dews that fell that night,
She said,—'Auf wiedersehen.'

The lamp's clear gleam flits up the stair;
I linger in delicious pain;
Ah, in that chamber, whose rich air
To breathe in thought I scarcely dare,
Thinks she,—'Auf wiedersehen?'

'T is thirteen years; once more I press
The turf that silences the lane;
I hear the rustle of her dress,
I smell the lilacs, and—ah, yes,
I hear 'Auf wiedersehen.'

Sweet piece of bashful maiden art!
The English words had seemed too fain,
But these—they drew us heart to heart,
Yet held us tenderly apart;
She said, 'Auf wiedersehen!' "

Of course, Mr. Lowell is not seen at his best in this poem. There are many detached passages in many of his serious pieces which are far superior to this in strength and lofty earnestness of thought and feeling. Indeed, we may speak thus of the whole poem of the "Commemoration Ode," which for sustained eloquence, for force of diction—despite what seems an occasional affectation of antiqueness—for manly nobleness of sentiment, for real fervor, for genuineness—despite occasional reminders of other poets—seems to us not equalled by any other American poetry. There are also passages in the volume before us which may boast greater positive felicities of phrase, or rather of statement, than the little gem we have just been looking at, though how this, in its kind, could be improved in that respect we do not know—and we believe there is nobody to tell us. Our poet's great power of entering, with the insight of love and sympathy as well as by the keenness of his intellectual vision, into the characters of other men, is also more clearly revealed in more than one other portion of his writings than in "Auf Wiedersehen;" though there is a nice little faint touch of it in the last of the stanzas given above. And—however it may be as regards the revelation of himself, which is, perhaps, his best gift to us—no doubt his enduring fame is founded most firmly on the works in which he went furthest out of himself, was most objective, and displayed, together with his wisdom and wit, that power of character-painting — at once of types and of individuals—which makes the fortunately-planned and executed "Biglow Papers" a permanent part of the literature of the century, and the only very good portraiture of real "characters" yet achieved by any American. But "Auf Wiedersehen" appears to be, as we have said, free from faults—a gem without flaw and a gem of pure ray. This is what cannot be said of very many of Mr. Lowell's poems, which too often bear evident marks of haste, in which, as we have hinted, one is apt to find marks, too, of wide reading as well as more manifest and frequent signs of desultory writing. Witness the Emersonianism of several of the poems in this volume; the imitativeness of the decidedly literary, fanciful "Winter Evening Hymn to my Fire;" the troubling sense of anachroniem —though that is not just the word either—which is felt in the reading of "Sir Launfal;" the incongruity of the Carlylism of the Rev. Homer Wilbur—who, no doubt, detested Carlylism; of the nineteenth-century-ism, so to speak, of the "Voyage to Vinland"—which took place some thousand years before the nineteenth century affected any Scandinavian brains; and of the unsuccessful balladizing of "The Singing Leaves." But, for that matter, who does make a good ballad? There is a time for all things, and for ballads it is time past.

Yet after making whatever abatements it has occurred to us to make in the course of a long acquaintance with Mr. Lowell's poetry, it remains, as a duty, not to take leave of it on any occasion when it has been spoken of at any length without saying, as a last word, that, taken altogether, we have nothing so good; unless, possibly, we except a little of Emerson—and to make that exception we are not wholly willing. To Emerson, the poet, the reader who likes him much is likely to pay something of the regard which it is probable a stricter analysis would show to be due to him not in his character of poet, but as a thinker, or rather a seer primarily addressing himself to the perception of truth. It is, to be sure, truth in that ultimate form in which it is felt to be one with beauty; but even so, it is hardly one with the beauty which is assigned the poet as his object. It is hardly as a poet that one thinks of the writer of "Uriel," for example. And coming down a little to the "Threnody" and the "Humble Bee" and "Terminus" and the "Sea-shore"—if that is the title of it—do we remain above or do we come down below "In the Twilight" and "Under the Willows" and "Auf Wiedersehen" and the "Commemoration Ode" and "Memoriæ Positum" and "Fitz Adams' Story"? This, however, is criticism by comparison. Or it would be if it were not for the names we have given, which well enough exclude the thought of this man or that. Much more hard work from both is a wish that no lover of poetry will fail to form as he renders his thanks for the work already done; and the wish is, perhaps, the best thanks and the highest praise we could give them.

The Gates Ajar. By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. (Boston: Fields, Osgood & Co. 1869.)—For the last year or two Miss Phelps has contributed various short stories to Harper's and the Atlantic, which we have usually read with some pleasure. They never, that we remember, gave promise of anything like high excellence; but magazine readers are not apt to be hypercritical, and magazine writers might, we dare say, with some justice complain of being tried by other than very ordinary standards. Miss Phelps wrote with apparent ease, and her stories—notably "Kentucky's Ghost"—had a sort of unlabored naturalness which sometimes made them contrast favorably with their immediate surroundings. We took up her book, therefore, with the expectation of being confirmed in our notion that she is a more than tolerable specimen of the average magazine story-teller and, although we confess to finding the "Gates Ajar" as unsatisfactory in most respects as it is certainly amusing in others, we are not yet inclined to recast our opinion of its author. She merely gives, in a small way, another illustration of the truth that one may observe and report accurately what goes on before his eyes, while his speculations on abstract and doubtful matters are worse than worthless. One may paint admirable portraits of every-day people and talk sad nonsense about the future life; one may be a sorry theologian and tell unexceptionable love stories. The temptation of a whole book to herself has apparently proved too much for Miss Phelps's practical mind. Shall one be moral and not moralize?—inherit the traditions of Andover and not import them into familiar speech? But, though her youth and inexperience have given her courage to rush boldly into precincts which a little more wisdom would doubtless have made her fear to enter, there is no reason for supposing that she may not yet do some very respectable literary work. Just now her sentiments are often absurd enough, but she has not, we should say, any inbred absurdity of nature which will always be bound to come out in what she does; she is not flippant, though much that she says is sufficiently shallow, and, as she is, besides, neither affected nor untruthful, there is still time enough for her to learn the distinction between sentimentalizing and thinking, and to recognize that to lose sight of the essential difference between the desire for truth and goodness for their own sakes and the desire for the most innocent personal gratification, is to begin breaking down the barriers between vice and virtue. Some time or other she may come to invent a heroine capable of smiling good-naturedly at the small vanities and the unpleasant self-consciousness of this one of to-day, who, veiled in sombrest crêpe as to her outer woman and plunged into profoundest grief as to her inner woman, yet knows accurately who were the impertinent people who stared at her, and wonders gratefully at the forbearance of those who refrained. Some time, too, she may be capable of recognizing an impassable barrier when she sees it, and of suspecting that to station at the outposts of her card fortification even such doughty sentinels as Whately and Chalmers and Isaac Taylor is still to leave the fortress exposed to the adverse winds of criticism.

Meantime, her little book is put forth with such evident good faith as to its providing the true panacea for human ills, that it would only provoke a half sympathetic smile if it did not also make one sigh over the radical defect of much of the religious training given to the young. Here is Miss Phelps's heroine, a New England girl of the ordinary type, who, on losing her brother by death, finds her love of God and her belief in His goodness utterly swept away, and the lessons taught her by "six years' membership in good and regular standing" of no value as a support in her trouble. Miss Phelps finds nothing surprising in this state of things—nor do we; the remedy she proposes for it does move us to a little wonder and to some not very cheerful reflections. The reason why people sorrow without hope, and why their faith does not glow with a more penetrating warmth, is, so she thinks, that heaven is not painted in sufficiently attractive colors. Miss Phelps's experiment has been tried before. There are houris in the Mussulman's heaven, as there are cosy little houses with ever-blooming door-yards, grand pianos, garden tools, and so on in Miss Phelps's Winifred Forceythe. In that blest abode the believer is to have what he likes and do as he pleases, and meanwhile his love for God can best be kindled by seeing in Him the great archetype of that best of mortal types, "the good provider." So Miss Phelps translates into the vernacular what she reads in Holy Writ about harps and palm branches and streets of shining gold. It is all very pretty, and we, for our own part, should not be disposed to object to her pleasing herself and other people with fancies like these, if this sort of day dreaming did not seem as weakening to the moral fibre as any other. There is, at the bottom of it, not only a false estimate of what constitutes success here or hereafter, but a self-seeking and self-indulgence which sap the foundations of all the sterner virtues. Moreover, it seems to us that some of the religious lives which Miss Phelps has read ought to have shown her, if her own experience is barren, that on noble souls the natural effects of grief, and of a belief in a happy future life as the reward of virtue, are not such as she has depicted. What gives the record of a life like that of Alexandrine de la Ferronnays a permanent value is not its special beliefs, but the fact that it affords one more confirmation of the truth that through whatever channels the soul draws its nourishment, whether through the creeds or through conduits of philosophy, it lives and grows in all cases from the same source, and brings forth similar fruits. In certain ways lives like hers, which show the serenity and the absorption of self in larger ends which come from a real belief in the wisdom and goodness of God, are as satisfactory reading as we know. We recommend them to Miss Phelps's careful study. At present she appears to love God and desire heaven much as a child longs for Santa Claus and Christmas. A good thought for her practical consideration is that contained in the proverb that "a contented mind is a continual feast." Just now it is only a continual feast which can content her. She can be good for plenty of barley sugar; but that is a goodness one should outgrow before one gets into print.

A Comprehensive Dictionary of the Bible. Mainly abridged from Dr. Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible," but comprising important additions and improvements from the works of Robinson, Gesenius, Fürst, Pape, Pott, Winer, Keil, Lange, Kitto, Fairbairn, Alexander, Barnes, Bush, Thomson, Stanley, Porter, Tristram, King, Ayre, etc., etc. Edited by Rev. Samuel Barnum. Illustrated with five hundred Maps and Engravings. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1868.)—This is only a part of the contents of the rather pretentious title-page with which the editor of the third abridgment of Dr. Smith's Dictionary has seen fit to supply his ably-executed publication. A comparatively shorter preface of two pages—which is all we receive by way of introduction to so important a work—enumerates its distinctive features and special merits, by virtue of which, even after the appearance of the two abridgments superintended by Dr. Smith himself, and known as the "Concise Dictionary of the Bible," and the "Smaller Dictionary of the Bible," respectively, it aims to become a "Standard Dictionary for the People." The general principles which have guided the present editor are: "(1) To make everything intelligible to those who understand only the English language. . . . . (2) To condense the greatest possible amount of valuable information into one volume of convenient size and moderate cost. (3) To guard against all influences hostile to Christian faith and love." We fully appreciate the advantages of plainness and condensation, and readily acknowledge that this dictionary, well-deserving to be called comprehensive, is both concise and intelligible, but we are rather surprised to find that it was deemed necessary to do additional guarding against anti-Christian influences in the reproduction of a collection in which this kind of pious guardianship is carried to a degree almost destructive of true criticism. Mr. Barnum's greater anti-critical fastidiousness, as far as we could ascertain, manifests itself partly in omissions—like that of the remarks on Hebrew cosmogony under "Earth"—and partly in slight alterations and insertions—as, for instance, in the article "Jacob," in regard to Stephen's statement concerning the burial in Shechem. The words, frequently given in parenthesis, "so . . . the original author of this article," serve to remove from the editor the responsibility for statements which might in the remotest degree appear heterodox. A great deal of care has evidently been bestowed upon the etymology and orthography of Hebrew names and words, though spellings like "Yehezekel" for "Yehezkel (art. "Hezekiel"), and "cinnor" for "kinnor" (art. "Harp"), the omission of the original Hebrew forms of so interesting names as Elijah and Jasher, and the inconsistent rendering of the Hebrew Cheth—generally, but not always, in two forms, h and ch, neither of which is as good as would be 'h—show that the book is still open to improvement in this department. It contains numerous maps, plans, views of places, and other pictorial illustrations, not given in the original work; various additions in the shape of references or supplementary historical and geographical remarks, and also some new articles. Yet, after a close comparison of various parts with the original "Dictionary of the Bible," we cannot refrain from rejecting as decidedly unwarranted the broad claim expressed in the preface that "the additions and modifications in every part of this volume, and on every subject in it, make it, indeed, almost a new work." Its mechanical execution is both fine and accurate.

A NEW JOURNAL AND CATALOGUE FOR BOOKBUYERS.

Its design is to be a Monthly Register of New Books—a Catalogue of Receipts and Additions to Stock, and Discursive Matter concerning Books, Auction Sales, and Literary Subjects generally.

The Publishers' extensive acquaintance and active connection with the trade, libraries, literary societies, and bookbuyers generally, will ensure a circulation to render it a profitable medium of advertisement.

The Journal will, for the present, be sent gratis to applicants, but a subscription of one dollar will ensure its receipt for a year.

The Nation.

This Journal commences its Eighth Volume with the first issue of January, 1869. It has a well-established character as a political, social, and literary force, a medium for the best talent of the country, and a representative of national principles; while its absolute independence has, the Publishers believe, won it the respect and confidence of men of all parties. Its increased circulation among Clergymen of every denomination is proof of its value for the class of public teachers; and for the sake of its still wider diffusion among them the Publishers offer to send the paper free, and postage prepaid, for one month, to any clergyman wishing to make a trial of it with a view to subscribing.

The Publishers are constantly assured by Advertisers of the profitable returns from their advertisements in the Nation, the circulation of which is considerably larger than that of any similar weekly published in this country. Book publishers in every part of the Union, principals of schools, makers and exhibitors of works of art, will find it peculiarly to their advantage to advertise in the Nation. Full particulars of terms, etc., given by circular.
